5. Levitical theory variously explained.—Not only are the priests of the local sanctuaries and those of Jerusalem both called 'Levites' in Dt.; but the name is distinctly understood as that of a tribe to which both belonged (18¹ 7). The traditional explanation accepted by Dt. of the exceptional position of the tribe, was that it was a reward for having slain a large number of rebellious apostates, probably on the occasion of the golden calf (cf. Dt 10⁶. 9 with Ex 32²⁵. 29). (There are some critical difficulties in both passages concerning the connexion of the incident with the context). This does not very well accord with P, which, as said above, connects the separation of the tribe with the dedication of the firstborn and the last of the plagues, and that of the priests, or the high priest especially, with the action of Phinehas at Baal-peor (Nu 31¹⁻¹² 25¹²). What is, however, probably an older tradition than either, while recognizing the Levites as a tribe, explains their being scattered in Israel as a punishment for an act of cruelty in conjunction with the Simeonites towards the Shechemites (Gn 49⁶⁻⁷ 34). It is quite impossible to say what elements of truth may underlie these traditions. But if the word 'Levite' was originally merely official, such a united act on the part of a body of priests seems improbable; and the stories may have arisen as different ways of accounting for their dispersion. But the belief that the priests all belonged to one tribe proves at any rate that at the time when Dt. was written, and probably long before, the priesthood had become a hereditary and isolated guild. That is to say, every priest was the son of a priest, and his sons became priests. The cursing of Levi in Jacob's blessing, so conspicuously contrasted with the glorification of Joseph (i.e. Ephraim and Manasseh), perhaps shows that the writer, evidently of the Northern Kingdom, despised the priestly office.

F. Reforms of Josiah as they concerned the Levites.—When Josiah abolished the local sanctuaries, the difficulty about the priests contemplated by Dt. seems to have arisen in fact. But it was not solved altogether in the way directed. Probably the priests of Jerusalem resented the presence of the local priests at their altar, and certainly their services could hardly have been required. In fact the language of Dt. almost suggests that the main purpose was to secure means of support (18¹). This purpose was at any rate secured by Josiah. They were to receive allowances of food with the priests of Jerusalem, but were not allowed to perform priestly functions (2 K 23⁹). It is to be noticed that the writer treats them with respect, calling them priests, and speaking of the priests of Jerusalem as brethren.

G. Ezekiel's ideal sanctuary.—1. His direction concerning the Levites.—In his ideal sanctuary Ezekiel makes a marked distinction between the 'Levites that went far from me, when Israel went astray,' and the 'priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok,' who had faithfully 'kept the charge of my sanctuary' (44¹⁰⁻¹⁵). The Levites are here charged with apostasy and idolatry, in reference, no doubt, to the sin of Jeroboam, which Ezekiel so regarded. He directs that as a punishment they should be forbidden the office of priest, and be allowed to do only the servile work of the sanctuary, such as the oversight of the gates, slaying of victims—work that had hitherto been done, so Ezekiel complains, by uncircumcised aliens (vv. 8-10). There can be little doubt that Ezekiel here gives the clue to the way in which the 'Levites' in the later sense of the term arose. The descendants of the priests, turned out from their local sanctuaries and not allowed to do the regular work of the priests, became a sort of inferior order, to do the menial service of the Second Temple.

2. The appellation 'sons of Zadok' seems to imply that the priests in Jerusalem also were, at least in Ezekiel's time, an hereditary guild. Zadok himself was the chief priest appointed by Solomon in the room of Abiathar, in consequence, no doubt, of his loyalty with reference to Adonijah (1 K 2³⁵). It is obvious that at first all the priests of Jerusalem could not have been 'sons of Zadok,' and it is extremely unlikely that their successors were all descended from him or any other one ancestor.

3. Like the 'Levites,' the high priest seems to have emerged gradually. In the different small sanctuaries each priest probably occupied an independent position. As some of these grew in importance, the priest attached to them would obtain a relatively greater influence, or possibly a paramount influence, over a district or tribe, as in the cases of Eli and Samuel, whose power, however, a later tradition seems to have greatly magnified. When several priests were associated together, as exceptionally perhaps at Nob (see II. B. 6), and afterwards in Solomon's Temple, some kind of leadership became necessary, without any necessary difference of religious functions. Such a leadership seems to have been held by Ahimelech (1 S 21), Zadok (1 K 2²⁶), and Jehoiada (2 K 11). These were known as 'the priest.' Such is probably meant by 'the priest that shall be in those days' in Dt 26⁹.

In Ezekiel's ideal sanctuary there is no distinction between priest and high priest, and the only special vestments sanctioned for the priests are the garments kept in the priests' chambers, but no details are given as to their character or style (42¹⁴).

The earliest document in which the distinction appears is probably the almost contemporary 'Code of Holiness' (Lv 17-26). In 21¹⁰ we find the curious phrase 'he that is the high priest among his brethren' (RV), which might be more exactly rendered, 'the priest that is greater than his brethren'—an expression which would very well apply to one who did not hold a distinctly different office, as the high priest of P, but was rather primus inter pares. The directions concerning him deal entirely with ceremonial and social obligations, which were rather more exacting in his case than with other priests. For instance he might not marry a widow, or rend his garments as a sign of grief (21¹⁰⁻¹⁵). The allusions to a special unction (see I. A. 1, B. 1) and the high-priestly dress in ¹⁰ and ¹² are almost certainly later interpolations.

III. DEVELOPMENTS IN THE HIERARCHY AFTER THE PRIESTLY CODE.—1. Relation of lower officers to Levites.

—The historical sketch just given shows clearly how, in many ways, the earlier arrangements paved the way for the hierarchical system of P. The later history points to new developments in the hierarchical system. The Books of Chronicles, and the parts of Ezra and Nehemiah which belong to them, point to a highly organized service in which singers, and players on musical instruments, porters (RV sometimes 'door-keepers'), and Nethinim take a prominent place.

The Nethinim are always distinguished from the Levites, as in 1 Ch 9² (Neh 11⁴), Ezr 2⁴⁵ (Neh 7⁶). Both singers and porters are distinguished from the Levites in documents contemporary with Nehemiah and Ezra, but included among them by the Chronicler (cf. 1 Ch 9¹⁴⁻²⁴ (Neh 11¹⁵⁻²⁴) 15¹⁶⁻²⁴ etc. with Ezr 7²⁴ 10²²⁻²⁴, Neh 7¹ 10²⁸). This shows that the 'porters and singers' came to be regarded as 'Levites,' and were believed to be descended from one tribe. Meanwhile the more menial work of the Levites passed into the hands of the Nethinim, who are said in a Chronicler's note to have been given by David to the Levites just as in P the Levites are said to have been given (nethanim) to the priests (cf. Ezr 8²⁰ with Nu 18⁸).

2. (a) Their history.—The origin of the singers and porters is unknown. That they were both in existence in some form when Ezra began his work of reform is clear from Ezr 7²⁴, where they as well as the Nethinim were exempted from taxation by a decree of Artaxerxes. What is apparently the first mention of them is in what is, on the face of it, a list of the families which returned from the Exile in Ezr 2 (Neh 7⁶⁸), in which the singers, porters, and Nethinim appear as separate classes. A closer examination, however, of the parallel passages makes it clear that the list in Nehemiah is not what was found in the archives, but the census made by himself. This is shown by the use of 'Tirshatha,' the official title of Nehemiah, in v. ⁶⁸, and the references to contemporary events in vv. ⁶⁴, ⁷⁰, ⁷². The Chronicler in Ezr 3, after giving the list, continues the parallel context of Nehemiah, showing that here too he has taken the whole extract from the same source as in Nehemiah; Ezr 2 cannot, therefore, be cited as independent evidence for the early date of this list.

The porters might very naturally have arisen out of the necessity of defending the city and Temple from hostile attack (2 Ch 23⁴, Neh 11¹⁹). The complicated arrangements in 1 Ch 26¹⁻¹⁹ suggest that an original necessity had become a stately ceremonial.

The singers, or at any rate the musicians, of Nehemiah's time appear to have belonged to one particular guild, that of Asaph (Neh 12⁴, ⁴⁶). The note in v. ⁴⁶ is probably a later insertion of the Chronicler, who ascribed to David all the Temple institutions not already assigned to Moses in P.

It appears from Neh 7¹ that Nehemiah probably went a long way in re-organizing the work of Levites, singers and porters.

(b) The Books of Chronicles and the Psalms as a whole point to a later development of the Temple offices. (1) New guilds connected with the names of Korah, Heman, and Jeduthun (or Ethan) were added. The guilds of Asaph and Korah, and perhaps Heman and Jeduthun, had each a psalm-book of their own, of which several were afterwards incorporated into the general Psalter (see Pss 73-85, 87-89, 1 Ch 15¹⁶⁻²²). On the other hand, in 1 Ch 9¹⁵, the Korahites, who were perhaps really of Levitical origin, are represented as doing the menial work, which had been that of the Levites, and yet are classed (9³³) under the general name of 'singers.' It is impossible to say which represents the earlier arrangement. (2) Another change in organization testified by the Chronicler is the division of priests and Levites (singers) into 24 'courses' (1 Ch 24¹⁻¹⁹ 25). These were believed to have been arranged by David, but first appointed by Solomon (2 Ch 8¹⁴). This meant that in later times the whole body of priests and 'Levites' was arranged in 24 guilds, each of which was believed to be a separate family. So the work could be conveniently arranged. Thus it became customary for each of the courses of priests to attend in turn to the public work of the Temple. Like much that came to be ascribed to David, the beginning of some arrangement of the kind was probably the work of Nehemiah (Neh 13^{30, 31}).

3. Further development of Levitical theory.—In the Books of Chronicles we find a considerable development of the Levitical theory of the hierarchy. (1) A Levitical origin is assigned to Samuel, Asaph, Heman, etc. (1 Ch 6^{27, 28, 33, 39, 44}). (2) Zadok is held to be a descendant of Eleazar (1 Ch 6¹²⁻¹³); Ahimelech (or Abimelech), Abiathar's father or son, a descendant of Ithamar, Eleazar's younger brother (1 Ch 24³; cf. 1 S 22²⁹, 2 S 8¹⁷, 1 Ch 24⁶). That Abiathar was a descendant of Eli, and Eli a descendant of Aaron, had already been implied by an editorial note in 1 K 12²⁷, which explained Solomon's supplanting Abiathar by Zadok as a fulfilment of the prophecy against the house of Eli (1 S 22⁷⁻⁹), whereas in all probability by the 'faithful priest' is meant Samuel. According to the Chronicler, what Solomon did was to restore the high priesthood from the line of Ithamar to that of Eleazar. The office had originally passed, according to the priestly tradition, from Eleazar to his son Phinehas (Jg 20²⁸), but how or when it got into the line of Ithamar is nowhere explained. There is a tendency in the Chronicler to ignore the priesthood of Abiathar, even in David's reign. In 1 Ch 16³⁹ Zadok is appointed priest when the ark is first brought to Jerusalem, and in 29²² he is anointed together with Solomon shortly before David's death.

4. Extraecclesiastical work of the priests and Levites.—The later books of the Bible make it likely that in the later period, at least from Nehemiah onwards, the priests and Levites engaged in other than sacrificial work, and especially in religious teaching (see 2 Ch 15³, where the Chronicler characteristically reads into the history the ideas of a later time, Mal 2⁷, Neh 8⁴⁻⁷). In 2 Ch 19⁸⁻¹¹ the work of administering justice is similarly referred to them. Thus the influence and also, to some extent, the work which in primitive times had been theirs, and had dwindled with the rise of king and prophet, seem to have returned to them, when these officers disappeared.

IV. INFLUENCE OF THE HIERARCHY ON THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL AT DIFFERENT PERIODS.—1. In primitive times, when each local sanctuary was the centre of religious, and, to some extent, of social and political, life, we find the influence of the priests very considerable (see II. A.). They were the natural persons to consult in case of difficulty. With them grew up a religious and moral tradition. They became the earliest channels of Divine revelation, and handed down that Divine teaching or instruction (the 'law' of our English Bibles, as in Is 1¹⁰).

2. It was probably out of the early priesthood that the prophetic office, as represented in the Books of Samuel, emerged. The prophet Samuel, who, according to tradition, combined the two offices, marks the transition between the spiritual influence of priest and prophet.

3. As the priestly power declined through loss of spiritual vigour, the prophetic influence became stronger, and we find the early prophets, in both the North and the South, but in the North especially, denouncing the unspiritual character of the priesthood, and the prevailing religious rites (see esp. Hos 4⁴⁻⁹, Is 1¹⁰⁻¹⁷).

4. With the religious revival under Josiah and the publication of the early chapters of Dt. we may notice a temporary reaction, but one marked by a strong tendency to give religion a more spiritual tone. It is still the prophet who is to be the source of Divine revelation (Dt 18¹⁸), though even the words of a prophet are not necessarily infallible (13¹⁻⁴). At about the same period Jeremiah denounces the popular valuation of a purely formal worship and an unworthy priesthood (31⁶ 5³¹ 7¹¹).

5. The possibilities, however, of a spiritual worship and a holy priesthood were never lost sight of, and a fresh impetus to priestly ideas is given, at latest during the Exile, by the 'Code of Holiness' (Lv 17-26) and the ideal sanctuary and priesthood sketched by Ezekiel (40-48).

6. With the first Return and the re-institution of Temple worship, the priesthood gained a fresh accession of power, all the greater as the secular power was under Persian rule. The contemporary prophets, Zech. and Haggai, not only insistently urge the importance of using every effort to re-build the Temple, but speak of Joshua the high priest as though on all but equal terms with Zerubbabel (Hag 1¹⁴ 2¹⁻³, Zec 3. 4¹¹⁻¹⁴ 6⁹⁻¹⁵).

7. The same priestly feelings influence Malachi, almost the contemporary of Nehemiah, who, while he attacks unmercifully the unworthy priests (1²⁻²⁷), is loud in denouncing those who robbed God by not paying tithes (3⁹), and seeks for a religious ideal in a purified Levitical system (3⁴ 4).

8. The exaltation of the priesthood reached its climax in the person of Simon the Just, who restored the Temple, and re-built the city walls which had been demolished by Ptolemy. The people regarded him with supreme veneration. Sir 50⁴⁻¹⁷ gives a most glowing description of the impression that he made as he officiated in his high-priestly vestments: 'He was as the morning star in the midst of a cloud, and as the moon at full; and as the sun shining upon the temple of the Most High, and as a rainbow giving light in the bright clouds,' etc. etc.

9. In the Maccabæan period we find Simon II., the younger brother of Judas, actually ruling the people as high priest. Later on (A.C. 106) Judas (Aristobulus), according to Josephus, bore the title of 'king,' and the title actually appears on the coins of his brother Jannæus.

10. The close of this period, nevertheless, marks a decline, at any rate in the spiritual influence of the priesthood, and especially of the high priest. The latter office ceased to be hereditary, and was often bought and sold. A high priest could be deposed, and another appointed for political purposes. One reason for this decline was that religious interest tended in an increasing degree to be diverted to ethical and moral questions, as we see in the Wisdom literature of the age. Other causes or perhaps rather symptoms of the spirit of the time at a later period were the growth of the Jewish sects and the practice of a childish casuistry, which depended more on the opinion of the ancients than on the spiritual needs of the present. F. H. Woods.

PRIEST (in NT).—'Priest' (Gr. hiereus) is employed in the NT to denote anyone whose function it is to offer a religious sacrifice. 1. It is used of a Gentile priesthood in Ac 14¹³ ('the priest of Jupiter'), and also in Heb. as applied to the 'order of Melchizedek' (5¹ 10 6²⁰ 7¹⁸); for Melchizedek, it is evident, was not merely a pre-Aaronic but a Gentile priest.

2. It is constantly employed to denote the members of the Jewish priesthood in their various ranks and functions. The ordinary officiating priests of the Temple come before us discharging the same offices of which we read in the OT. They burn incense (Lk 1⁸ 9), present the sacrificial offerings (Mt 12⁴, cf. Nu 28⁹ 10), effect the ceremonial cleansing of the leper (Mt 8⁴—Mk 1⁴—Lk 5¹⁴, cf. 17¹⁴). The high priest (archiereus) appears as president of the Sanhedrin (Mt 26⁴⁷ ||, Ac 5²⁷ 7¹ 23³ etc.), and as entering every year on the Day of Atonement into the Most Holy Place with his offering of blood (He 9²⁶). Most frequently of all the word occurs in the plural form 'chief priests' (archiereis), an expression that probably designates a high-priestly party consisting of the high priest proper, the ex-high priests, and the members of those privileged families from which the high priests were drawn.

3. In the Ep. to the Hebrews Christ is described as both priest and high priest, but the fact that Melchizedek (wh. see), the chosen type of His eternal priesthood, is also described by the same two terms (cf. 5⁶ with v. 10, 6²⁰ with 7¹) shows that no distinction in principle is to be thought of, and that Christ is called a high priest simply to bring out the dignity of His priesthood. This conception of Christ as a priest is clearly stated in no other book of the NT, though suggestions of it appear elsewhere, and esp. in the Johannine writings (e.g. Jn 17¹⁹, Rev 1¹³). In Heb. it is the regulating idea in the contrast that the author works out with such elaboration between the Old and the New Covenants. He thinks of a mediating priest as essential to a religion, and his purpose is to show the immense superiority in this respect of the new religion over the old. He finds certain points of contact between the priesthood of Aaron and that of Christ. This, indeed, was essential to his whole conception of the Law as having a shadow of the good things to come (10¹), and of the priests who offer gifts according to the Law as serving 'that which is a copy and shadow of the heavenly things' (8²). Christ, e.g., was Divinely called and commissioned, even as Aaron was (5⁴⁻⁵). He too was taken from among men, was tempted like His fellows, learned obedience through suffering, and so was qualified by His own human sympathies to be the High Priest of the human race (4¹⁴ 5¹⁴). But it is pre-eminently by way of antithesis and not of likeness that the Aaronic priesthood is used to illustrate the priesthood of Christ. The priests of the Jewish faith were sinful men (5³), while Jesus was absolutely sinless (4¹⁴). They were mortal creatures, 'many in number, because that by death they are hindered from continuing' (7²³), while Jesus 'abideth for ever,' and so 'hath his priesthood unchangeable' (v. 24). The sacrifices of the Jewish Law were imperfect (10²); but Christ 'by one offering hath perfected for ever them that are being sanctified' (10¹⁴). The sanctuary of the old religion was a worldly structure (9¹), and so liable to destruction or decay; but Christ enters 'into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God for us' (9²⁴).

And this contrast between the priesthood of Aaron and the priesthood of Christ is brought to a head when Jesus is declared to be a priest—not after the order of Aaron at all, but after the order of Melchizedek (7¹¹). 'Order,' it must be kept in mind, does not here refer to ministry, but to the high priest's personality—a fact which, when clearly perceived, saves us from much confusion in the interpretation of this Epistle. The distinctive order of Christ's priesthood is found in His own nature, above all in the fact that He is 'a priest for ever.' The Melchizedek high priest is conceived of all through as performing the same kind of priestly acts as were discharged by the high priests of the house of Aaron; but the quality of His Person is quite different, and this completely alters the character of His acts, raising them from the realm of copies and shadows to that of absolute reality and eternal validity (cf. A. B. Davidson, Hebrews, 149).

It is a mistake, therefore, to attempt, as some do, to distinguish between an Aaronic priesthood exercised by Christ on earth and a Melchizedek priesthood exercised by Him in heaven; and equally a mistake to attempt to confine His priestly ministry to a work of mediation and intercession that begins after His exaltation. No doubt it is true that His priestly work is not consummated until He enters into God's presence in the heavenly places, but all that the writer has previously set forth as bearing upon His priesthood must be borne in mind. It was all His life on earth, by the obedience He learned and the human sympathy He gained, that Christ was qualified to be the high priest of men. Moreover, every high priest 'must have somewhat to offer,' and the 'somewhat' of Jesus was Himself, yielded up on earth in a life of perfect obedience (5⁸⁻⁹) and an atoning death of spotless self-sacrifice (9¹¹⁻¹⁵, 28). It was with this priestly offering of His life and death, and in virtue of it, that Jesus entered into the presence of God (9²⁴) as the 'mediator of a new covenant' (v. 13) and the ever-living Intercessor (7²⁵), and so secured for us our access with boldness unto the throne of grace (4¹⁴ 10¹⁹⁻²²).

4. According to the teaching of the NT, the Church is a priestly institution, and all believers are themselves priests. The OT idea that Israel was 'a kingdom of priests unto God' (Ex 19⁶) is transferred in precise terms to God's people under the New Dispensation. They are 'a royal priesthood' (1 P 2⁹); Christ has made them to be 'a kingdom of priests unto God and his Father' (Rev 1⁶ 5¹⁰). Again, they are referred to by these same two writers as 'a holy priesthood' (1 P 2⁵), 'priests of God and of Christ' (Rev 20⁶). And though the author of Heb. does not so describe them in set language, it follows from his way of speaking that he regards all Christ's people as priests. When he says in the passage last cited (10¹⁹⁻²²) that they have boldness to enter into the Holy Place by a new and living way through the veil, it seems evident that he is thinking of those who draw near to God, by the blood of Jesus and in fulness of faith, as a company of worshipping priests; for under the old economy, which serves him at so many points as a type of the new, it was priests alone who could pass through the curtain into the Holy Place. It is the same idea, probably, that meets us in St. Paul when he speaks of our 'access' (Ro 5²), our 'access in one Spirit unto the Father' (Eph 2¹⁸), our 'access in confidence through our faith' in Christ (3²). And it is nothing more than a carrying out of this same conception that all believers belong to a holy priesthood, when St. Peter writes of the 'spiritual sacrifices' which we are called to offer up (1 P 2⁵); and St. Paul beseeches us to present our bodies a living sacrifice (Ro 12¹); and the author of Heb. bids us offer to God the sacrifice of praise (13¹⁵), or declares that God is well pleased with such sacrifices as kindly deeds and gifts of Christian liberality (v. 16); and the seer of the Apocalypse speaks of the prayers of all the saints as rising up like incense from the golden altar before the throne (Rev 8³).

5. It is a noteworthy fact that the NT never describes the Christian ministry as a priesthood, or the individual minister as a priest, except in the general sense in which these terms are applicable to all believers—a fact which is all the more significant when we consider how frequently both the minister and the ministry are referred to. In particular, there is no trace in the NT of the later idea that in the Lord's Supper a sacrifice of propitiation is offered to God, much less that this sacrifice is presented through the mediation of an official priesthood. The two terms 'presbyter' (presbyteros) and 'priest' (hiericus), which came to be confounded by and by, were at first kept absolutely apart. Thus, so far as the NT is concerned, it is only in an etymological sense that it can be said that 'presbyter is priest writ large.'

PRINCE.—This is the tr. of a considerable number of Heb. and Gr. words, expressing different shades of meaning, e.g. 'chieftain,' 'ruler,' 'king,' 'governor,' 'noble,' 'deputy.' The main terms are 1. sar, 'one who has authority or bears rule.' It is used of rulers (Is 21¹, Nu 21¹⁸ etc.), of royal officials (Gn 12⁸, 2 K 24¹¹ etc.), of leaders in war (1 S 22²), of tribal chieftains (e.g. Philistines, 1 S 18²⁰), of the chief butler and baker (Gn 40²⁻³), of the keeper of prison (Gn 39²¹), of the taskmaster (Ex 11¹), of the prince of the eunuchs (Dn 17¹). It came later to be applied to the guardian angels of the nations (Dn 10^{13, 20, 21}), to Michael the archangel (Dn 12¹). It is the most general term for prince, and occurs in the fem. form sārāh, 'princess,' used of the wives of Solomon (1 K 11³), and also of Jerusalem 'princess among the provinces' (La 1¹), and it is translated 'ladies' in Jg 5²⁹ and 'queens' in Is 49².

2. nāḡīd, 'one who is high, conspicuous, outstanding.' It is applied to the governor of the palace (2 Ch 28⁷), the keeper of the treasury (1 Ch 26²⁴), the chief of the Temple (1 Ch 9¹, 2 Ch 31¹³); also to the chief of a tribe (2 Ch 19¹¹), the son of a king (2 Ch 11²), the king himself (1 S 25³⁰), the high priest (Dn 9²⁴), and is occasionally in AV translated 'captain.'

3. nāsī, 'one lifted up,' is applied to chiefs of tribes, princes of Ishmael (Gn 17²⁰), to Abraham (23²), to Shechem (34²), to Sheshbazzar (Ezr 1⁸). It is often used of the heads of the Israelitic tribes, and translated 'ruler' in AV. The word is frequently in Ezekiel used of kings of Judah and foreign princes, and is also applied to the future head of the ideal State (34²⁹ etc.).

4. nāḡīb, 'willing,' 'a volunteer,' 'generous,' 'noble,' generally found in plur. and often translated 'nobles,' used of those of noble or princely birth (1 S 2³, Ps 47³ 107⁴ etc.).

Other less frequent terms are nāsīk 'installed,' parīēmīn 'leading men,' qāṣīn 'judge,' shālīṣh 'officer,' 'captain,' sēḡānīm 'deputies.' In Dn 3^{2, 27} 6^{2, 4, 7} the 'princes' of AV are Persian satraps, while in the names Rabshakeh, Rabaris the prefix rab signifies 'chief,' as also the proper name Rezon (1 K 11²²), which occurs as a common noun (rāzōn) in Pr 14²⁸. We may also note that in Job 12¹⁹ the word 'priests' (kāhānīm) is wrongly rendered 'princes,' and in Ps 68²⁴ the word translated 'princes' is not found in any other passage, the text being likely corrupt.

The MT terms are 1. archēgos, applied to Christ 'the Prince (author) of life' (Ac 3¹⁵), 'Prince and Saviour' (Ac 5³¹); so in He 2¹⁰ Jesus is 'the author' (AV 'captain' of salvation) and in He 12² the 'author and finisher of our faith.' 2. archōn, used of Beelzebub (Mt 9³⁴ 12²⁴, Mk 3²²), of the princes of the Gentiles (Mt 20²⁵), the princes of this world (1 Co 2⁸), prince of the power of the air (Eph 2²), the Prince of the kings of the earth (Rev 1⁵). 3. hēgemōn, used of Bethlehem, 'not least among the princes of Judah' (Mt 2⁶).

PRISCA, PRISCILLA.—See AQUILA and PRISCILLA.

PRISON.—Imprisonment, in the modern sense of strict confinement under guard, had no recognized place as a punishment for criminals under the older Hebrew legislation (see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 9). The first mention of such, with apparently legal sanction, is in the post-exilic passage Ezr 7²⁶. A prison, however, figures at an early period in the story of Joseph's fortunes in Egypt, and is denoted by an obscure expression, found only in this connexion, which means 'the Round House' (Gn 39^{20, 21} 40^{1, 5}). Some take the expression to signify a round tower used as a prison, others consider it 'the Hebraized form of an Egyptian word' (see Driver, Com. in loc.). Joseph had already found that a disused cistern was a convenient place of detention (Gn 37³⁶; see PR). The same word (bōr) is found in Ex 12²⁹ and Jer 37¹⁸ in the expression rendered by AV 'dungeon' and 'dungeon house' respectively; also alone in 38⁶, Zec 9¹¹.

The story of Jeremiah introduces us to a variety of other places of detention, no fewer than four being named in 37¹⁸⁻¹⁹, although one, and perhaps two, of these are later glosses. Rigorous imprisonment is implied by all the four. The first 'prison' of v. 18 EV denotes literally 'the house of bonds,' almost identical with the Philistine 'prison house,' in which Samson was bound 'with fetters of brass' (Jg 16^{21, 22}). The second word rendered 'prison' in Jer 37¹⁸ (also vv. 1⁸ 52²¹ and elsewhere) is a synonym meaning 'house of restraint.' The third is the 'dungeon house' above mentioned, while the fourth is a difficult term, rendered 'cabins' by AV, 'cells' by RV. It is regarded by textual students, however, as a gloss on the third term, as the first is on the second.

Jeremiah had already had experience of an irksome form of detention, when placed in the stocks (20²; cf. Ac 16²⁴), an instrument which, as the etymology shows, compelled the prisoner to sit in a crooked posture. 2 Ch 16¹⁰ mentions a 'house of the stocks' (RVm; EV 'prison house'), while Jer 29²⁶ associates with the stocks (so RV for AV 'prison') an obscure instrument of punishment, variously rendered 'shackles' (RV), 'pillory' (Orf. Heb. Lex.), and 'collar' (Driver). The last of these is a favourite Chinese form of punishment.

In NT times Jewish prisons doubtless followed the Greek and Roman models. The prison into which John the Baptist was thrown (Mt 14^{12, 10}) is said by Josephus to have been in the castle of Machærus. The prison in which Peter and John were put by the Jewish authorities (Ac 4² AV 'hold,' RV 'ward') was doubtless the same as 'the public ward' of 5¹⁸ RV (AV 'common prison'). St. Paul's experience of prisons was even more extensive than Jeremiah's (2 Co 6⁵), varying from the mild form of restraint implied in Ac 28³⁰, at Rome, to the severity of 'the inner prison' at Philippi (16²⁴), and the final horrors of the Mamertine dungeon.

PRIZE.—See GAMES.

PROCHORUS.—One of the 'Seven' appointed (Ac 6³).

PROCONSUL.—This was originally two words—pro consule, meaning a magistrate with the insignia and powers of a consul. When the kingship was abolished in Rome it gave place to a rule of two men, not called by the now detested name, but named prætores ('generals') or consules ('colleagues'). As the Roman territory increased, men of prætorian or consular rank were required to govern the provinces (wh. see). During the Empire all governors of senatorial provinces were called proconsuls, whether they were ex-consuls and governed important provinces like Asia and Africa, or merely ex-prætors, like Gallio (Ac 18¹² AV deputy), who governed a less important province, Achaia.

A. SOUTER.

PROCURATOR.—Originally a procurator was a steward of private property, who had charge of the slaves and his master's financial affairs. His importance depended on that of his master. Thus the Emperor's stewards were persons of consequence, and were sometimes trusted with the government of some less important Imperial provinces as well as with the Emperor's financial affairs in all provinces. They were of equestrian rank, like Theophilus, to whom the Third Gospel and Acts are addressed. The following were at different times procurators of Judæa: Pontius Pilate, Felix, and Festus, called in NT by the comprehensive term 'governors.'

PROFANE.—'To profane' is 'to make ceremonially unclean,' 'to make unholy.' And so a 'profane person' (He 12¹⁶) is an 'ungodly person,' a person of common, coarse life, not merely of speech.

PROGNOSTICATOR.—See MAGIC DIVINATION AND SORCERY, and STARS.

PROMISE.—Although the OT is the record of God's promises to lowly saints and to anointed kings, to patriarchs and to prophets, to the nation of His choice and to the world at large, the word itself is rarely used in the EV, and less frequently in the RV than in the AV. The Heb. noun dābhār is generally rendered 'word,' but 'promise' is found in 1 K 8²⁶ Neh 5¹².

PROMISE

In Ps 105⁴² the change made in the RV reminds us that God's 'holy word' is always a 'holy promise.' Similarly, the Heb. verb dābhar is usually tr. 'speak'; but 'promise' is found in Ex 12²⁵, Jer 32⁴² etc. In several passages, as, e.g., Dt 10⁹, Neh 9²², the RV gives 'speak' or 'say' instead of 'promise.' A complete study of the subject would therefore require a consideration of the whole question of OT prophecy. For thy word's sake' is the ultimate appeal of those who can say 'thou art God, and thy words are truth, and thou hast promised' (2 S 7²¹, 28). See PROPHECY.

1. In a few passages (Jos 9¹, Neh 5¹², Est 4⁷, Mt 14⁷, Mk 14¹, Ac 7¹, 2 P 2¹⁹) the reference is to a man's promises to his fellow-man; once only (Ac 23¹) the noun has this meaning in the NT. In Dt 23² the verb refers to man's promises to God, and is synonymous with vowing unto God. This passage is instructive, on account of the stress that is laid on the voluntary nature of the obligation that is incurred by him who promises or makes a vow. Driver renders 'according as thou hast vowed freely unto Jehovah, thy God, that which thou hast spoken (promised) with thy mouth' (ICC, in loc.). The thought of spontaneity is an essential part of the meaning of the word when it is used of God's promises to man, and especially of 'the promise' which comprises all the blessings of the Messianic Kingdom (Ac 2³⁹ 7¹⁷ etc.).

2. The Gr. word epangellesthai, tr. 'promise,' is found only in the middle voice in the NT; its root-meaning is 'to announce oneself,' hence it comes to signify 'to offer one's services,' and 'to engage oneself voluntarily to render a service.' Dalman derives the NT conception of the 'promise' from the Rabbinic phraseology concerning 'assurance.' A typical example is Ber. R. 76: 'for the pious there is no assurance (promise) in this age'; cf. Apoc. Bar 53¹, 'the promise of life hereafter' (The Words of Jesus, p. 103). The promises of God are numerous (2 Co 1²⁰); they are also 'precious and exceeding great' (2 P 1⁴). 'His every word of grace' is a promise; even His commandments are assurances of grace, conditional only upon men's willingness to obey. When God commanded the children of Israel to go in to possess the land, it was as good as theirs; already He had 'lifted up' His hand to give it them; but the promise implied in the command was made of no effect through their disobedience. The possession of Canaan, the growth of the nation, universal blessing through the race, are examples of promises of which the patriarchs did not receive the outward fulfilment (He 11¹³). On the one hand, Abraham 'obtained the promise,' because the birth of Isaac was the beginning of its fulfilment (6¹⁵); on the other hand, he is one of the fathers who 'received not the promise,' but 'with a true faith looked for a fulfilment of the promises which was not granted to them' (cf. Westcott's note on He 11¹³).

3. The NT phrase 'inherit the promises' (He 6¹²; cf. 11¹³, Gal 3²⁹) is found in Ps. Sol 13⁴ (a.c. 70 to a.c. 40). This passage is probably 'the first instance in extant Jewish literature where the expression "the promises of the Lord" sums up the assurances of the Messianic redemption' (Ryle and James, Com., in loc.). In the Gospels the word 'promise' is used in this technical sense only in Lk 24⁴⁹, where 'the promise of the Father' refers to the gift of the Holy Spirit (cf. Ac 1⁴ 2³⁸, 33, Gal 3¹⁴, Eph 1¹³). The Ep. to the Hebrews is especially rich in passages which make mention of promises fulfilled in Christ (4¹ 6¹⁷ 7⁹ 9¹⁵ etc.); but both in his speeches and in his Epistles St. Paul looks at the Christian gospel from the same point of view (Ac 13²⁶, 26⁶, Ro 9⁴, Gal 4³¹, Eph 3⁶; cf. the only Johannine use of 'promise' in 1 Jn 2²⁸). There are promises to encourage believers as they strive to perfect holiness (2 Co 7¹), whilst 'to them that love him' the Lord hath 'promised the crown of life' (Ja 1¹²); there is also the unfulfilled 'promise of his coming' (2 P 3⁴). But 'how many soever be the promises of God, in him is the Yea: wherefore also through him is the Amen, unto the glory of God through us.' J. G. TASKER.

PROPHECY, PROPHETS.—Hebrew prophecy represents a religious movement of national and world-wide importance, not paralleled elsewhere in history. Most significant in itself, it has acquired deeper and wider import through its connexion with Christianity and the philosophy of religion generally. The present article will deal in brief outline with (1) the history, (2) the inspiration, and (3) the functions and specific teaching, of the prophets of the OT; also (4) with the special topic of Messianic prophecy and its fulfilment in the NT.

1. History and prophecy.—The prophetic period proper may be said to have extended from the 8th to the 4th cent. b.c. During these centuries at least, prophecy was a recognized, flourishing, and influential power in Israel. But a long preparatory process made ready for the work of Amos, Hosea, and their successors, and it is not to be understood that with the last of the canonical writings the spirit of prophecy disappeared entirely from the Jewish nation. It is not surprising that the beginnings of Hebrew prophecy are lost in comparative obscurity. Little light is shed upon the subject by a comparison between similar phenomena in other religions. It is true that among Semitic and other peoples the idea was widely prevalent of an order of men who were favoured with special intercourse with the Deity and entrusted with special messages from heaven, or an unusual power of prognostication of future events. The line which separated the priest from the prophet was in early times a very narrow one, and sometimes the functions of the two offices were blended. In Israel also, during the earlier stages of history, lower conceptions of the Divine will and human modes of obtaining knowledge of it prevailed, together with practices hardly to be distinguished from pagan rites. The description in Dt 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴ proves how long these mantic ideas and customs lingered on in the midst of clearer moral and spiritual light. When the true significance of prophecy came to be understood, the contrast between it and heathen divination was very marked, but the process by which this stage was reached was gradual. Its course cannot always be clearly traced, and down to the Christian era, the lower and less worthy popular conceptions existed side by side with the high standard of the prophetic ideal.

No certain information can be gathered from the names employed. The word most frequently used in OT (more than 300 times) is nābi, but its derivation is doubtful. It was long associated with a root which means to 'bubble up,' and would thus denote the ecstatic influence of inspiration, but it is now more usually connected with a kindred Arabic word meaning to 'announce.' Two other words—rō'eh, which occurs 9 times (7 times of Samuel), and chōzeh, about 20 times—are of known derivation and are both translated 'seer.' The historical note in 1 S 9⁹ marks the fact that rō'eh passed comparatively out of use after Samuel's time, but both it and chōzeh are used later as synonyms of nābi, and in Chronicles there appears to be a revival of earlier usage. We shall probably not be far wrong if we find in the words the two main characteristics of the prophet as 'seer' and 'speaker,'—the spiritual vision which gave him knowledge, and the power of utterance which enabled him to declare his message with power. Other phrases employed are—'man of God,' used of Moses, Samuel, and others; 'servant of God,' a term not limited to prophets as such; 'messenger of Jehovah,' chiefly in the later writings; and once, in Hos 9¹, the significant synonym for a prophet is used, 'man of the spirit,' or 'the man that hath the spirit.'

We may distinguish three periods in the history of prophecy: (1) sporadic manifestations before the time of Samuel, (2) the rise and growth of the institution from Samuel to Amos, (3) the period marked out by the canonical prophetic writings.

(1) In dealing with the first, it will be understood that the literary record is later than the events described, and the forms of speech used must be estimated accordingly. But it may be noted that in Gn 20⁷ Abraham is called a prophet, and in Ps 105¹⁵ the name is given to the patriarchs generally. In Ex 7¹ Aaron is described as a prophet to Moses who was 'made a god to Pharaoh.' In Nu 11²⁵⁻²⁹ the incident of Eldad and Medad shows that in the wilderness 'the spirit rested' on certain men, enabling them to 'prophesy.' The episode of Balaam in Nu 22-24 is very instructive in its bearing upon the ideas of Divine revelation outside Israel. In Nu 12⁵⁻⁸ the Divine intercourse vouchsafed to Moses—'with him I will speak mouth to mouth, even manifestly'—is distinguished from the lower kind of revelation, 'in a vision, in a dream, granted to the prophet; and in Dt 18¹⁵ Moses is described as possessing the highest type of prophetic endowment. Later, Deborah is described (Jg 4⁴) as both a prophetess and a judge, and an anonymous prophet was sent to Israel at the time of the Midianite oppression (Jg 6⁹). Samson was not a prophet, but upon him, as a Nazirite from infancy, 'the spirit of Jehovah began to move' in youth, and it 'came mightily' upon him. Finally, before the special revelation given to Samuel, there came a 'man of God' to Eli, rebuking the evil-doings of his sons and announcing punishment to come. It must be borne in mind, moreover, that during all this period God was, according to the OT narrative, speaking to His people in various ways, revealing Himself by dreams and visions, or through special messengers, though the term 'prophet' but seldom occurs.

(2) It is generally recognized that a new era begins with Samuel. Peter in Ac 3²⁴ used a current mode of speech when he said 'all the prophets from Samuel and them that followed after,' and the combination in him of the prophet and the judge enabled him to prepare the way for the monarchy. The statement in 1 S 3¹ that in the time of Eli 'the word of Jehovah was rare' and that 'vision' was not widely diffused or frequent, points to the need of clearer and fuller revelation such as began with Samuel and continued more or less intermittently for some centuries. Whether he originated the prophetic communities known as 'sons of the prophets,' who first appear in his time and are mentioned occasionally until after the times of Elisha, we cannot be sure. But at Ramah (1 S 19¹⁸), at Naioth (2 K 6), at Bethel, Jericho, Gilgal, and other places there were settlements which may be described as training-schools for religious purposes, and these provided a succession of men, who were in theory, and to some extent in practice, animated by the devoted and fervent spirit which was necessary for the maintenance of the prophetic fire in the nation. Music formed a prominent part in their worship (1 S 10⁵⁻¹⁰). These societies might constitute a true and abiding witness for Jehovah (1 K 18¹⁸), or they might be characterized by false patriotism and subservience to a prevailing policy (1 K 22⁵). Saul was at one time brought under their influence in a remarkable manner (1 S 10¹⁰⁻¹²), and Samuel evidently exercised a commanding influence over them, as did Elisha in later days. To these 'colleges' may probably be traced the preservation of national traditions and the beginnings of historical literature in Israel.

David is styled a 'prophet' in Ac 2³⁰, but this is not in accordance with OT usage, though the Spirit of Jehovah is said to have rested on him as a psalmist (2 S 23²). In his time began that close association between kings and prophets which continued in varying phases until the Exile. Nathan the prophet was his faithful spiritual adviser, and Gad is described as 'the king's seer' (2 S 24¹¹). Both these counsellors exercised a wholesome influence upon the large-hearted, but sometimes erring, king, and according to the Chronicler they assisted David in organizing Divine worship (2 Ch 29²⁵). Nathan, Ahijah of Shiloh, and Iddo the seer are mentioned in 2 Ch 9²⁹ as having taken part in the compilation of national records, history and prophecy having been from the first closely associated in Israel. In Solomon's time prophecy would seem to have been in abeyance.

But it appears again in connexion with the description of the Kingdom, and from this time forwards in Israel and Judah the relation between Church and State, between king and prophet, was of an intimate and very significant kind. The prophet, as a man specially endowed with the spirit of God, did not hesitate to warn, rebuke, oppose, and sometimes remove, the king who was 'God's anointed.' But when the monarch was faithful to the high position, the prophet was to him as a strong right hand. Elijah, in the idolatrous times of Ahab, is the very type of the uncompromising and undaunted reformer; and Elisha, though of a milder character and with a less exacting task to accomplish, was instrumental in the overthrow of the ungodly house of Omri (2 K 9). These two are essentially prophets of action; the writing prophets do not appear till a century later.

(3) It is inevitable that for us at least a new era of prophecy should appear to set in with the earliest prophetic book that has come down to us. We are dependent upon our records, and though the continuity of prophecy was never quite broken, the history of the prophets assumes a new character when we read their very words at length. Amos, the first in chronological order, shows in 2¹¹ that he was only one in a long line of witnesses, and that he was but recalling the people to an allegiance they had forgotten or betrayed. But he introduces the golden age of prophecy, in which Isaiah is the central glorious figure. Modern criticism has carried the analysis of the prophetic books as they have come down to us so far that it is not easy to present the chronology of the prophetic writings in a tabular form. But it may be said roughly and generally that six prophets belong to the Assyrian period, Amos and Hosea in the Northern Kingdom, about the middle of the 8th cent. B.C., and Isaiah and Micah in the Southern, a little later, whilst Zephaniah and Nahum belong to the early part of the 7th cent. B.C. As prophets of the Chaldean period we find Jeremiah and Habakkuk before the Exile (B.C. 586), and Ezekiel during the former part of the Captivity. Before its close appears the second Isaiah (perhaps about 540), and after the Return, Haggai and Zechariah (chs. 1-8), whilst Malachi prophesied in the middle of the 5th cent. B.C. The dates of Joel, Jonah, Obadiah, and Zec 9-14 are still debated, but in their present form these books are generally considered post-exilic. Many chapters of Isaiah, notably 24-27, are ascribed to a comparatively late date.

It is impossible here to trace the fluctuations in prophetic power and influence, as these waxed or waned with the varying fortunes of the nation throughout the period of the monarchy. The Northern Kingdom came to an end in B.C. 722, but for more than 150 years longer there appeared prophets in Judah who aided the repeated efforts at national reformation made by kings like Hezekiah and Josiah. These, however, met with little permanent success, and a change in the characteristic note of prophecy begins with Jeremiah. Thus far the prophets had aided the cause of religious and civil progress by bringing to bear upon national policy the moral principles of the religion of J^h, but as time passed, the recuperative power of the nation declined, 'false' prophets gained predominance, and the true prophet's task grew more and more hopeless. All that remained for Jeremiah was to preach submission to foreign foes, and the imminence of coming judgment, and to point the people to a spiritual fulfilment of promises which could no longer be realized by means of any earthly monarch or dynasty. It was the painful duty of Jeremiah to oppose princes, priests, and people alike, as none of his predecessors had done, and to stand alone, charged with lack of patriotism, if not with actual treachery. Though a man of peaceable and kindly temperament, he was involved in perpetual conflict, and whenever he was tempted to withdraw from a thankless and apparently useless office, the word of the Lord burned within him again like a fire in his bones, and he was bound to deliver it, whether men listened and heeded or not. The chief burden of this last pre-exilic prophet was the declaration that, as the measure of the people's sins was now filled up, they must as a nation suffer practical extinction; but stress was laid upon the importance of individual fidelity and the fullness of spiritual blessing which might still be enjoyed, whilst hopes of material good and national prosperity had been disastrously overthrown.

The fall of Jerusalem brought with it many changes. Ezekiel adopted and expanded many of Jeremiah's ideas, but his forecasts of restitution, as delivered to the exiles in Babylon, took fresh shapes, determined by his circumstances, his personal temperament, and the fact that he was priest as well as prophet. It was left for a great unknown seer to deliver in the second part of the Book of Isaiah the most spiritual message of all, and to re-animate his countrymen by means of pictures glowing with larger and brighter hopes than any of his predecessors had portrayed. But after the return from captivity prophecy did not renew its ancient fires. Haggai and Zechariah are but minor stars in the great constellation, and the book known as 'Malachi' testifies to a dwindling inspiration, though fidelity to truth, and hope of fuller Divine manifestations yet to come, were not entirely extinct in God's messengers and representatives.

At last Ps 74⁹ and 1 Mac 4⁴⁶ 92⁷ and 14⁴¹ point to a time when 'signs' were no longer seen among the people, when 'there is no more any prophet, neither is there any among us that knoweth how long.' The latest 'prophetic' book, Daniel, does not properly belong to this list; it was not reckoned by the Jews among the prophets, but in the third part of the sacred canon known as 'writings.' The remarkable visions it contains do not recall the lofty spirit or the burning words of Isaiah; they contain another kind of revelation, and belong not to prophecy but to apocalypses. Nearly two centuries elapsed before John the Baptist, the last prophet under the Old Covenant and the forerunner of the New, came in the very spirit and power of Elijah 'to make ready for the Lord a people prepared for him.'

2. Inspiration of the prophets.—When we seek to pass from the outward phenomena of prophetism to its inner mental processes, from its history to its psychology, many questions arise which cannot be definitely answered. How did God reveal His will to the prophets? In what did their inspiration consist? How far were their natural faculties in abeyance, or, on the other hand, heightened and strengthened? Did the prophet fully understand his own message? How could personal errors and prejudices be distinguished from direct Divine affluence? To these questions no simple categorical replies can be made. But Scripture sheds sufficient light on them for all practical purposes.

It must be borne in mind that prophecy has a history, that the record is one of development—of rise, progress, and decay—and that precise definitions which take no account of these changes are misleading. Some forms of 'inspiration' are higher than others, and a measure of advance is discernible from the lower forms which belonged rather to the soothsayer, to those higher moods which distinguish the OT prophet from all others. The steps of the process are not always discernible, but the distinction between lower and higher is to be drawn according as (1) the prophet was a mere unconscious instrument, or his highest mental and spiritual faculties were enlisted in his work; (2) the inward revelation of the Divine will was or was not bound up with external and objective manifestations; and especially (3) the moral and spiritual element in the message became its distinguishing feature, in contrast with a mere non-ethical 'seeking for signs.' Revelation by means of dreams and visions was recognized throughout, and in Nu 12⁶, Dt 13¹, Jer 23³ a dreamer of dreams is synonymous with a prophet. The distinction between dream and vision appears to be that the former occurred in sleep, the latter in a kind of ecstatic waking state, the seer 'falling down and having his eyes open.' But the distinction is not strictly enforced, and in the Hexateuch, and where the Elohist speaks of dreams, the Jahwist more frequently describes God as speaking directly to His messengers. Side by side with revelation by means of dreams and visions went that higher spiritual enlightenment which we associate with Hebrew prophecy at its best estate.

It was not necessary that a prophet should receive a formal 'call' to undertake the office. Many were trained in the schools who never became prophets, and some prophets, like Amos, received no preparation, whether in the schools or elsewhere. Upon some, the affluence appears to have descended occasionally for a special purpose, whilst in other cases the influence of the Divine Spirit was permanent, and they were set apart to the work of a lifetime. The important point was that in every case the Spirit of God must rest upon His messenger in such a way as to supersede all other influences and ideas, and this higher impulse must be obeyed at all costs. The prophet must be able to announce with unwavering confidence, 'Thus saith the Lord.' In some instances a description is given of the way in which this overpowering conviction came upon the man. Samuel was (perhaps) called as a child; Amos exclaimed, when both king and priest did their best to silence him, 'Jahweh hath spoken, who can but prophesy?' Isaiah, when he beheld God lifted up upon His throne and when his lips had been purified by the hot stone from the altar, cried, 'Here am I, send me.' Jeremiah, when but a youth, was strengthened to be as an iron pillar and a brazen wall against the whole force of the nation, because God had put His words in his mouth. The vision of the chariot which came to Ezekiel by the Chebar dominated his imagination and moulded all his ministry. Whether a 'vocation' in the formal sense was, or was not, vouchsafed at the opening of a prophet's course, it was absolutely essential that he should be directly moved by the Spirit of God to deliver a message which he felt to be an irresistible and overwhelming revelation of the Divine will.

The phraseology used to describe this inspiration, though varied, points entirely in this direction. The Spirit of the Lord is described as coming mightily upon Saul (1 S 10⁶ 10); the hand of the Lord was on Elijah (1 K 18⁴⁶, Ezk 1³); or the Spirit 'clothed itself' with the man as in Jg 6³⁴, 2 Ch 24²⁰; or Micah is said to be 'full of power by the spirit of the Lord' to declare to Jacob his transgression (3³). Perhaps the impulses were more violent and external in the earlier history, whilst in the later more room was left for human reflexion, and a more intelligent comprehension of the Divine will and word. Still, it would be a mistake to suppose that the overmastering power of the Divine commission was relaxed in the later prophetic period. No stronger expressions to describe this are found anywhere than those used by Jeremiah, who 'sat alone because of God's hand,' and to whom God's word was 'as a burning fire shut up in his bones,' so that he could not contain (15¹⁷ 20⁹).

Neither the exact mode of communicating the Divine will, nor the precise measure of personal consciousness which obtained in the prophetic state, can be defined; these varied according to circumstances. But speaking generally, it may be said that the personality of the prophet was not merged or absorbed in the Divine, nor was his mind as an inanimate harp or lyre which the Divine Spirit used as a mere instrument. Moses is represented as holding back from the Divine call (Ex 3³), as remonstrating with God (32¹¹), and offering himself as a sacrifice to appease the Divine anger (32²⁰). Amos succeeded in modifying the Divine decree (7² 3), and Jeremiah was very bold in reproaching the Most High with having given him an impossible task, and as having apparently failed to fulfil His own promises (15¹⁰). A careful study of all the phenomena would go to show that whilst supernatural power and operation were taken for granted, the workings of the prophetic mind under inspiration were not very different from some of the highest experiences of saints in all ages, the Divine and human elements being blended in varying proportions. The fact of inspiration, rather than its mode, is the important feature in the Bible narratives.

A similar answer must be given to the question whether the prophets understood their own prophecies. For the most part they understood them very well, and expressed themselves with remarkable clearness and vigour. What they often did not understand, and could not be expected to understand, was the full bearing of their words upon contingent events and their application to conditions as yet in the far future. In 1 P 1¹⁰ we are told that they searched diligently 'what time or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did point unto,' perhaps with special reference to Dn 8¹⁴. That is, it was not given them to discern at what epoch, or under what circumstances, the fulfilment of their words should come to pass. But the declaration of moral principles required no such elucidation, and the prophets were the first to recognize that the fulfilment of their words depended on the way in which they were received. For the work of the prophet was not to mouth out oracles, mystic sayings obscure to the mind of the speaker and enigmatical to the hearers, like the utterances of Delphi or Dodona. The root idea of prophecy is revelation, not mystery-mongering—'Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets' (Am 3⁷).

Deeper and more important questions concerning the nature of prophetic inspiration gather round the existence of 'false prophets,'—this term does not occur in the Hebrew text—the line of distinction between the true and the false, and the tests which should separate the two in practice. The subject is greatly complicated to the modern mind when we read in Dt 13 that a prophet might be utterly mistaken, that a lying spirit might come from the Lord (1 K 22²), that tests of genuineness were necessary, and that God might mislead the very prophets themselves, destroying the people through the agency of a deceptive vision (Ezk 13¹⁴). These are no doubt exceptional expressions, a sharp contrast being usually drawn between genuine and spurious prophecies, as those which come from God, and those which come from the prophet's own heart (Jer 23¹⁴). Professed prophets might be treacherous (Zeph 3⁴), just as the priests might profane the sanctuary and do violence to the law. The fact that Divine gifts may be abused does not interfere with their significance when rightly used. But wherein lay the distinction between true and false? If the prophets were connected with idolatrous worship (1 K 18), or devoted to other gods (Dt 13²), their departure from the truth is obvious. Also if high prophetic gifts were perverted for purposes of selfish advancement, or a part were deliberately assumed to deceive (Zec 13⁴), or office were desired merely for a livelihood (Mic 3⁹), the case is clear. But might the prophets themselves be deceived, and how were the people to distinguish between the true and the false?

Ostensibly both classes had the same ends in view—the honour of Jehovah and the prosperity of the nation. But some put religious principle first and taught that prosperity would follow obedience; others, blinded by false ideas of national advantage, thought they were doing God service by promoting a policy which seemed likely to lead to 'the aggrandizement of His people.' The same difference has often been observed in the Christian Church between a true religious leader and a mere ecclesiastic, honestly persuaded that whatever advances 'the Church' must be for the Divine glory, but who, none the less, perverts the truth by setting the means above the end. Lower ideas of God, of morality, and of true national prosperity lay at the root of the utterances of the false prophets. The main distinction between them and the true messengers of God was a moral and spiritual one, and discrimination was possible only by trying each on its own merits.

But certain tests are suggested. Sometimes (a) a sign or wonder was wrought in attestation (Dt 13²), but even this was not conclusive, and the true prophets seldom relied upon this evidence. Again, (b) in Dt 18²¹ fulfilment of prediction is adduced as a test. Clearly that could not be applied at once, and it would rather be useful afterwards to students of the national history than to kings or people about to enter on a battle or an alliance. But (c) the people were expected to use their moral and spiritual insight and distinguish the issues set before them, as a man has to judge for himself in questions of conscience. In the case of Hananiah (Jer 28), an example is given of two lines of national policy presented by two leading prophets, and the process of judging between the true and the false was a part of the education through which Israel was called to pass and in which unfortunately it often failed. The difficulty of this process of discrimination was often lightened (d) by watching the career of the prophets, as to how far their character bore out their professions, what motives actuated them—whether crooked policy, immediate expediency, or high self-denying principle—and thus in the centuries before Christ, as afterwards, one of the best criteria was, 'by their fruits ye shall know them.'

One other point remains. To what does the term 'inspiration' apply—the men or their writings? What relation do the books that have come down to us bear to the originally spoken words of the prophets? The answer is that in the first instance it is the man who is inspired, not the book. In the case of the Hebrew prophet especially, the very nature of the influence at work impelled him to immediate utterance, and if he was inspired at all, the word is most applicable at this stage. In many instances the prophet went as it were from the very presence of God to perform his errand and utter winged words which have come down to us as delivered, white-hot from the very furnace of Divine prompting. But in other cases the record was not written till long after the original utterance; only a summary of the addresses delivered was handed down. The literary element predominates in the composition, and a finish is given to its phraseology which does not belong to the spoken word. A full account of the process is given in one case (Jer 36⁴), where we are told that the prophecies delivered through 21 years were carefully written out with the aid of a secretary, the transcription taking some months to accomplish. The document thus prepared was handed to the king and destroyed by him in anger at its contents, whereupon another record was made with considerable additions. Probably a similar process was usual in the case of the literary prophets. The utterances called forth by a crisis could not be prepared beforehand; sometimes, as in Malachi, the prophet would be interrupted by objections from the people, to which he must reply on the spur of the moment, and open conflicts were not infrequent. But the words in which the substance of many utterances was embodied were carefully chosen and were of more abiding import. The process of selection and transcription, as well as the original outpouring of the message, was under the guidance of the Divine Spirit, who actuated the prophet in all he said or did.

That the work of collecting the prophetic utterances was not always carefully done is clear from the state of the text in some of the books that have come down to us, e.g., the serious differences between the Hebrew and the LXX in Jeremiah. Also it should be noted that the utterances of different authors were often blended under one well-known name: e.g., under 'Isaiah' many prophecies extending over a long period have been gathered; the Book of Zechariah is certainly composite, and indications of additions, editorial notes, and modifications are numerous. But the God who inspired

His servant first to see and then to speak, did in certain cases inspire him also to write; and thus words which were intended in the first instance for rebellious Israel or disconsolate Judah have proved of perennial significance in the religious education of the world.

3. Functions and teaching.—One who was essentially a 'man of God' under the conditions of life which obtained in Israel must have had many parts to play, many messages to give; and many would be the ways in which he brought his influence to bear upon the life of his time. The prophetic office in its essence implied freedom from such routine duties as occupied (e.g.) the priest and later the scribe. These could easily be enumerated, but the work of the prophet, from its very nature, cannot be defined by strict boundary lines.

In the earliest times prophets were consulted on common matters of daily life. Samuel was asked by Saul's servant how to find the lost asses of his master. Later, inquiry was made concerning the sickness of Jeroboam and its probable issue, and Elisha throughout his life was sought for in times of private and domestic need. On another side of their lives the prophets were closely connected with literature; they compiled historical records and preserved the national chronicles (see 1 Ch 29²⁹). The narrative portions of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other prophetic books show that the seer is a man whose searching glance may run backwards as well as forwards. It required a prophetic eye rightly to read the lessons of Israel's past, and to this day the inspired historical books of OT teach lessons which no mere annalist could have perceived or conveyed to others. The work of other prophets lay in the department not of literature but of action, and—apart from Elijah and Elisha—some of the most notable figures in the prophetic succession were distinguished, not so much for what they taught as because at the critical moment they threw the weight of deservedly great influence into the right scale, and actually led the people in the right way.

These, however, were not the prophet's main functions. His chief work was to serve as a great moral and religious teacher, especially in relation to the duties of national life. He was sent to minister to his own age, to teach his contemporaries the duties of the hour, how to apply the highest religious principles to current questions of political and social life. In the course of the delivery of this message he was moved to utter predictions, and these formed so characteristic and important a feature of the prophet's teaching that foretelling the future came to be regarded as his chief work. This was not strictly the case, since the forecasts of the future arose out of the delivery of the message to the speaker's own age. But prediction must be allowed its due place in an estimate of Hebrew prophecy; a reaction against the excessive stress formerly laid upon this element has unfortunately led to the opposite extreme of underestimating its importance.

Moral teaching was pre-eminent. The prophets were not exponents of the 'law' in the technical sense; that belonged to the priest (Jer 18¹⁸); but the 'word' which was given to the prophet was an immediate revelation of the will of God, and was sometimes necessarily opposed to the orthodox and conventional religious teaching of men more anxious about following precedents than discerning the highest duty. In Is 1 and 58, in Mic 6, and Ezk 18 we have examples of lofty ethical teaching which might appear to disparage the routine of religious service and the traditions of religious doctrine. It is not sacrifice in itself, however, that is denounced, but a trust in formal service punctiliously rendered to God, without a corresponding reformation of character. The prophet was the messenger who recalled the people to their highest allegiance, who fearlessly rebuked spiritual unfaithfulness, and who laid emphasis, not on the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin, but on those weightier matters of the law, judgment and mercy and faith. Of worship and ritual they would have said, as did the greater Prophet who followed them, 'These ought ye to have done, and not to have left the other undone' (Mt 23²³). These moral teachings covered a very wide field. The prophets called evils by plain names and denounced them in uncompromising terms, however high the places in which they were found. Habits of luxury and self-indulgence in the upper classes; intemperance and tendencies to excess of all kinds; the oppression of the poor, the usurpations of landowners, the extravagance of women in dress—these are only a few specimens of class-sins which they frankly exposed and fearlessly denounced.

In this sense the prophets strove to recall the best features of Israel's past. The tone of remonstrance adopted shows that for the most part the people were familiar with the principles laid down. The prophets were not innovators; they spoke as men whose words were likely to find an echo in the consciences of their hearers. But reformers they undoubtedly were in the sense that they 'spared not the hoary head of inveterate abuse,' and they prevented many of the evils which an undisturbed conservatism induces. They belonged to the party of progress in the best sense of the term, and their work was especially to break up the fallow ground of habit that had become hard and set and unfit to receive the seed of fresh spiritual teaching. Moral reformation, they taught, was a necessary condition for the acquisition of spiritual knowledge, and the enjoyment of spiritual privilege. 'Wash you make you clean,' was the burden of their message; the arm of Jehovah is not shortened, nor His ear heavy, but your sins have separated between you and your God. Deal bread to the hungry and let the oppressed go free, then shall thy light break forth as the morning . . . and thine obscurity shall be as the noonday . . . and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water whose waters fail not.'

This moral teaching was brought to bear especially upon national life. Israel was a church-nation, one in which the community counted for much more than the individual, and the prophet's chief function was to promote national righteousness. He represented the highest civic consciousness. He might, and did, rebuke private individuals and point out personal faults, though this was chiefly in the case of kings like David, Jeroboam, or Ahab, or State officials like Shebna in Is 22. Whole classes might go astray, the prophets themselves be unfaithful to their calling, and then an individual prophet was sent to recall all alike to their duty, himself the sole representative of Jehovah in a degenerate nation. For a time the political influence of the prophets was great, while their power was at its zenith, but this period did not last very long. Isaiah and Micah, Amos and Hosea, illustrate the way in which, both in the Southern and in the Northern Kingdom, the prophets intervened in questions of wars and alliances and treaties—the foreign policy of their times. They took their part in domestic policy no less, sometimes standing between the sovereigns and their subjects—teachers and examples of patriotism in the best sense of the word. Whilst the false prophets practically asserted the maxim 'My country, right or wrong,' the true prophet enforced the lesson that 'There is no wisdom nor understanding nor counsel against the Lord,' and that unflinching loyalty to Him is the only secret of national stability and success. Sometimes they urged bold defiance of enemies, as in the invasion of Sennacherib (2 K 19); sometimes they recommended a policy of neutrality as between Egypt and Assyria (Is 30); whilst, as already pointed out, it was sometimes the duty of a Jeremiah to preach submission to the power of Babylon, even though that course might be represented as pusillanimous truckling to superior force. In thus directing the national policy, the prophet might be commissioned to announce the success or failure of certain projects, and to foretell the consequences of a given course of action. But if the prophecies be closely examined, it will be seen that the forecasts were for the most part conditional—'If thou wilt hear and obey, thou shalt eat the good of the land; if not, thou shalt be devoured with the sword'—the object of such vaticinations being pre-eminently moral, to bring the people to such a state of mind that the threatened evils might be averted.

The value of such an institution in any State is obvious. J. S. Mill describes it as an 'inestimably precious' feature, that 'the persons most eminent in genius and moral feeling could reprobate with the authority of the Almighty, and give a higher and better interpretation of religion, which henceforth became a part of that religion.' The power of the prophet has been compared to the modern liberty of the press. The comparison is sadly inadequate, for at best the press represents the highest current of public opinion, whilst it was one of the chief duties of the prophet to rebuke public opinion in the light of higher truth, which he discerned as from a mountain top whilst all the valley below lay in darkness. That the ethical standard was maintained in Israel as high as it was, and that the Jews were the most progressive people of antiquity, and conjointly with the Greeks have so strongly influenced modern culture, is due mainly to the prophets.

Religious teaching was closely connected with the ethical. The prophet would not permit any severance of these two elements. The explanation of the freedom and beauty of the moral life on which they insisted was that it was not inculcated as a code, but as a service rendered to a holy and gracious God. The people were to offer the kind of service with which He would be pleased; hence the higher their conceptions of God were raised, the higher also became their standard of conduct. The prophets of the 8th cent. b.c. are sometimes described as the first teachers of ethical monotheism, but this position it would be difficult to establish. That the standard of the people had sunk sadly below that of the revelation granted them is certain, and that the prophets not only recalled them to their duty, but raised their very conceptions of Deity, is practically certain. But Amos, the first of the writing prophets, appealed to a conscience and a God-consciousness already developed, and his rebukes presuppose the knowledge of one holy God, and do not inculcate the doctrine for the first time. Both he and Hosea press home the duty of the people to return to the God they had forsaken; sometimes sternly, sometimes with tender and pathetic pleading: 'O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? Thou art graven on the palms of my hands.' The worst feature of the wickedness of the times lay in the unfaithfulness of Israel to the God who had bound His people to Him by the closest ties, and their disobedience is described as infidelity to a spiritual marriage vow. The prophets strove and urged and remonstrated, 'rising up early' and pleading that they might win the heart of the people back to God, sure that thus, and thus only, a basis could be secured for a permanently upright national and individual character. From this point of view their words can never grow obsolete.

As to the predictive element in prophecy, it may be discerned on every page, but it is not of the 'fortune-telling' order. Most of the predictions refer to national events, in Israel or surrounding nations. Some of these enter into detail, as in the overthrow of Ahab at Ramoth-gilead foretold by Micaiah (1 K 22*), and the failure of Sennacherib's expedition announced by Isaiah. Others threaten in a more general way that punishment will follow disobedience, this strain becoming ever sterner and more pronounced as time advanced. These dark presages were fulfilled in the case of the Northern Kingdom in the 8th cent. b.c.; and afterwards when Judah refused to take the warning, her calamities culminated in the capture and overthrow of Jerusalem.

The prophets, however, are able to take a wider outlook, their penetrating gaze extends to the more distant future. This feature is so closely blended with the last, that it is sometimes hard to distinguish the two. It is the habit of the prophets to pass immediately and without warning from the nearer to the further horizon, and the question perpetually recurs—Of whom, of what period, speaketh the prophet this? That their power of foresight was akin to the moral insight which other exceptionally gifted persons have possessed, enabling them within limits to forecast the future, may be admitted. But no parallel has been found in any other nation to the phenomena of Hebrew prophecy, especially in the continuous succession of men carrying on the same remarkable work for generations. Many critics seek to eliminate the element of the supernatural from prophecy. But, whilst it may be granted that many prophecies were not fulfilled because they were given with a condition stated or implied, and that the poetical language of many others never was literally fulfilled, or intended to be so, there remain a considerable number of national predictions which were fulfilled in a very remarkable manner, especially when we bear in mind that they ran directly counter to the prejudices of the times and were sometimes uttered at the risk of very life to the daring messenger himself.

A candid examination of the whole conditions of the case must lead to the admission of a supernatural power and knowledge in Hebrew prophecy—quite apart from the Messianic element, which will be considered separately. The attempts to explain this away have failed. The prophetic power was not exceptional political shrewdness, not the mere sanguine expectation of enthusiasts, or the gloomy foreboding of convinced pessimists; it was not like the second-sight of the Highlander, the effect of excitement upon a highly sensitive temperament; nor, as rationalism teaches, can all predictions be explained on the vaticinia post eventum principle, as history written after the event. On the other hand, supernatural enlightenment and direction must be included, whilst it may be freely admitted with Tholuck that the predictions were for the most part 'not of the accidental, but of the religiously necessary,' that they were mostly general, sometimes hypothetical, consistent with the freedom of the persons addressed, and that while they contain what some call 'failures,' in broad outline they reflect with wonderful accuracy and force the word of God in relation to the principles and progress of human history.

4. Messianic prophecy and its fulfilment.—It was inevitable that teachers so commissioned by God to declare His will should take a wider range. Theirs was emphatically a message of hope—they were sent to prepare the way for a brighter future. Hence we find them passing, by rapid and almost insensible gradations, from immediate to far distant issues, and descriptions of a Final Consummation are blended with their very practical teaching as to present duty. In later Judaism these prospects of coming national felicity gathered round the term Messiah, the Anointed One, used to designate a coming Deliverer, through whose instrumentality the glories of the future age were to be realized. Christians believe that Jesus of Nazareth claimed to be, and was, the promised Messiah of the Jews, and the name 'Messianic prophecy' has been given to predictions which refer directly to the ideal personage of whose coming the prophets were the heralds. But this narrower meaning of the phrase is for several reasons unsatisfactory. In the first place, 'Messiah' is not a recognized OT term for this Deliverer; it may be questioned whether the word is once used in this sense. Further, there is a great body of prophetic utterances which belong to the 'Messianic' era, though no mention is made of a personal King or Saviour. And from the Christian point of view, the preparation for the coming of Christ was very various: many prophecies are believed to find direct fulfilment in Him, in which neither the name nor the idea of a personal Messiah occurs; hence 'Messianic prophecy' is now generally understood to mean all the OT promises which refer to the final accomplishment of God's purposes for the nation and the world.

The whole OT religion is one of hope. God's promises made to His people were too large, the ideal descriptions of their privileges were too lofty, to find full realization at any early stage of national development. And Israel itself was so intractable and unfaithful, and the gap between profession and practice was so painfully obvious, that the gaze of the people was ever fixed on the future. Sometimes the prospect was held out of a regenerated city, sometimes of an ideal temple and its worship, sometimes the idea prevailed of a clearer manifestation of God Himself in the midst of His people, sometimes expectation pointed to a Ruler who would embody all the qualities of righteousness, wisdom, and power which had been so conspicuously lacking in many monarchs of the Davidic line. Sometimes material considerations figured most largely in the pictures of the future—the fruitfulness of the land, abundance of corn and wine and oil; sometimes a promise filled the air like music, of an unprecedented peace which should bless the often invaded and always more or less disturbed country; sometimes a broad landscape picture was drawn of the extensive dominion and influence which Israel should exercise over the nations around. And it is obviously undesirable that forecasts which contain a more directly personal reference should be separated from these others with which they were closely connected in the prophets' thoughts, especially as closer examination has tended to reduce the number of passages which may be described as directly Messianic. A few central ideas lay at the heart of the whole. The Covenant which bound together God and His people, the City in which He made His abode, the Temple hallowed by His presence, the Kingdom in which His law should prevail and His will be always done, were never very far from the minds of the ancient seers. Correspondingly, the Jew anticipated, and the prophet foretold, the coming of the ideal King who would dwell in the City and at the head of the Kingdom, the ideal Priest of the Temple, the ideal Prophet to declare the Divine purposes completely, and cement the Divine Covenant so that it should never again be broken. Brooding over the whole was the thought of the Divine Presence, which in the future was to be a Theophany indeed.

It was only in the 2nd cent. n.c. that the term 'Messiah' became the focus in which all these rays were centralized. In the OT books the word is used as an epithet of the king, 'Jehovah's anointed'; it is used of Cyrus, a heathen prince, in Is 45¹; possibly, though improbably, it may be understood as a proper name in Dn 9²; whilst some would find in Ps 2 an almost unique use of the word to designate the ideal Prince of the house of David who should rule all the nations with unparalleled and illimitable sway. But if the term 'Messiah,' standing alone to designate a unique office, appears comparatively late in Jewish history, a less clearly defined idea of a personal Ruler and Deliverer pervaded the national thought for centuries before. The terms (1) 'Son of David,' pointing to a ruler of the Davidic line, together with 'Branch' or 'Shoot,' with the same connotation; (2) 'Son of Man,' applied in OT to Ezekiel and others, sometimes indicating man in his frailty, but sometimes man as God intended him to be; and (3) 'Son of God,' indicating the nation Israel, Israel's judges and Israel's king, alike representing the Most High upon earth—all helped to prepare the way for the idea of a Messiah who should, in an undefined and unimaginable way, unite the excellences of the whole in His person. (4) One other name, such as would not have occurred to the earlier prophets, appears freely in Second Isaiah; and, as the event proved, influenced subsequent thought to an unexpectedly profound degree—the 'Servant of Jehovah' as Sufferer and Saviour. It was along these lines and others kindred to them which have not been named, that the preparation was made for the prophets for the coming of Israel's true Deliverer. When all are put together, it will be seen that if the number of passages referring directly to the Messiah by name is unexpectedly small, the number which prepared the thoughts of the people for His Advent is exceedingly large, and these are so various in their character that it might well have seemed impossible that they should all be realized in one Person.

It is quite impossible here to survey this vast field even in outline. But one point must not be lost sight of—the distinction between those prophecies which are directly and those which are only indirectly Messianic. When the meaning of the prophet's words is obviously too lofty to be applied in any sense to a mere earthly kingdom, or where the context necessitates it, we may assume that the prophet's eyes were fixed, not on his contemporaries but on the far distance, and the period of the Consummation for which it was needful long to wait. But where the mention of local and temporal conditions or of human imperfections and limitations makes it clear that the immediate reference of a passage is to the prophet's own times, whilst yet his glance shoots at intervals beyond them, there the words are only indirectly Messianic, and a typical significance is found in them. That is, the same ideas or principles are illustrated in the earlier as in the later dispensation, but in an inferior degree; the points of similarity and difference varying in their relative proportions, so that a person or an event or an institution under the Old Covenant may more or less dimly foreshadow the complete realization of the Divine purpose yet to come. The type may be described as a prophetic symbol.

The line between typical and directly prophetic passages is not always easy to draw. For example, it may be debated in what sense Ps 2. 8. 16. 45. 72 and others are 'Messianic,' the probability being that in every case the primary thought of the Psalmist was occupied with the history that he knew, though his words in each case soared beyond their immediate occasion. So the language of Is 53—which for centuries has been understood by Christian interpreters to refer directly to a suffering Messiah—is now understood by some of the best Christian scholars as referring at least in the first instance to faithful Israel. An ideal personification of Israel, i.e., identified with the nation yet distinct from it, is represented as the true servant of God carrying out His purposes for the national purification, even through persecution, suffering, and death. Opinions may well differ as to whether this interpretation is adequate. But it must be borne in mind in any case that in the prophets we do find a remarkable combination of two features—a wide outlook into the future implying preternatural insight, and very marked limitations of vision derived from the ideas of the times in which they lived. The object of the student of Messianic prophecy is to examine the relations between these two elements, and to show how out of the midst of comparatively narrow ideas, determined by the speaker's political and historical environment, there arose others, lofty, wide, and comprehensive, with 'springing and germinant accomplishments,' and thus the Spirit of Christ which was in the prophets 'testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glories that should follow them.'

When we inquire concerning the fulfilment of prophecy, it is necessary to distinguish between (1) what the prophet meant by his words in the first instance, according to their plainest and simplest interpretation; (2) any realization, more or less imperfect, of his utterances in Israelitish history; (3) any more complete realization of them which may have taken place in Christ and Christianity, considered as the Divinely appointed 'fulfilment' of Judaism; and (4) any appropriate application of the prophetic words which may be made in subsequent generations in further illustration of the principles laid down. If there be a wise and gracious God who orders all the events of human history, if He inspired the OT prophets to declare His will for some centuries before Christ, if the climax of His self-revelation was reached in the gift of His Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, and if He is still working out His purposes of righteous love among the nations of the modern world, it is to be expected that the declarations of the prophets will receive many 'fulfilments,' many of them much wider, deeper, and more significant than the prophets themselves could possibly understand. But the meaning of the original words as first uttered should first of all be studied without any reference to subsequent events. Then the nature of the connexion between OT and NT should be clearly understood and the principles on which the NT writers find a complete realization of the promises of the Old Covenant in the New. And afterwards it will not be difficult to see in what sense perpetually new applications of the prophets' words may be legitimately made to the subsequent history of the Kingdom of God in the earth.

Every reader of the NT must have noticed that the words 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet' are used very freely by the several writers, and not always in precisely the same sense. Christ Himself led the way and the Apostles followed Him in declaring that His work on earth was to 'fulfil' both the Law and the prophets, and that the whole of the OT Scriptures pointed to Him and testified of Him. It was not so much that minute coincidences might be discerned between the phraseology of the OT and the events of His life, though it was natural that such should be noted by the Evangelists. But Jesus specially insisted upon the fact which it is most important for the student of the Bible to observe, viz. that what the Law failed to accomplish, and what the prophets and those who looked for the fulfilment of their words had failed to realize, He had come completely and perfectly to achieve. The emphasis lies, as might have been expected, upon the spiritual, rather than the literal, meaning of the Scriptures; and the most complete fulfilment of OT words lies not in a precise correspondence between circumstantial forecasts made long before with the details of His personal history, but in a spiritual realization of that great end which lawgivers, kings, prophets, and righteous men under the Old Covenant desired to see, but were not able.

OT prophecy, then, is best understood when it is viewed as one remarkable stage in a long and still more remarkable history. Some of its utterances have not been, and never will be fulfilled, in the sense that many of its students have expected. A large proportion of them have already been fulfilled, though in strange and unlooked-for fashion, by Him of whom it has been said that 'the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy' (Rev 19¹⁰). In the Person, life, sufferings, death, and resurrection of Jesus the Christ, and in the establishment of His Kingdom on the earth, is to be found the fullest realization of the glowing words of the prophets who prepared the way for His coming. For a still more complete fulfilment of their highest hopes and fairest visions the world still waits. But those who believe in the accomplishment of God's faithful word thus far will not find it difficult to believe that our Lord's words concerning the Law (Mt 5¹⁸) may be adapted, and that in the highest spiritual sense they will be at last realized—'Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the prophets, till all things be accomplished.'

W. T. DAVISON.

PROPHET (in NT).—1. The spirit of prophecy, as it meets us under the Old Dispensation, runs on into the New, and there are prophets in the NT who are properly to be described as OT prophets. Such as Anna the prophetess (Lk 2³⁶; cf. Miriam, Deborah, and Huldah in the OT); Zacharias, who is expressly said to have prophesied (Lk 1⁶⁷); Simeon, whose Nunc Dimittis is an utterance of an unmistakably prophetic nature (2²⁶). But above all there is John the Baptist, who was not only recognized by the nation as a great prophet (Mt 14⁵ 21⁹, Mk 11⁹, Lk 20⁶), but was declared by Jesus to be the greatest prophet of the former dispensation, while yet less than the least in the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 11⁹. = Lk 7²⁸).

2. Jesus Himself was a prophet. It was in this character that the Messiah had been promised (Dt 18¹⁵. 18; cf. Ac 3²² 7³⁷), and had been looked for by many (Jn 6¹⁴). During His public ministry it was as a prophet that He was known by the people (Mt 21¹¹; cf. Lk 7¹⁶), and described by His own disciples (Lk 24¹⁹), and even designated by Himself (Mt 13⁵⁷, Lk 13³³).

PROPHET (IN NT)

And according to the teaching of the NT, the exalted Christ still continues to exercise His prophetic function, guiding His disciples into all the truth by the Spirit whom He sends (Jn 16⁷. 13), and 'building up the body' by bestowing upon it Apostles, prophets, and teachers (Eph 4¹¹).

3. From the prophetic office of her exalted Head there flowed the prophetic endowment of the Church. Joel had foretold a time when the gift of prophecy should be conferred upon all (2²⁸), and at Pentecost we see that word fulfilled (Ac 2¹⁷). Ideally, all the Lord's people should be prophets. For 'the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy' (Rev 19¹⁰), and in proportion as Christians are filled with the Pentecostal Spirit they will desire, like the members of the newborn Church, to bear testimony to their Master (cf. Nu 11²⁹, 1 Co 14³¹).

4. But even in the Spirit-filled Church diversities of gifts quickly emerged, and a special power of prophetic utterance was bestowed upon certain individuals. A prophetic ministry arose, a ministry of Divine inspiration, which has to be distinguished from the official ministry of human appointment (see art. MINISTRY). In a more general sense, all those who 'spoke the word of God' (He 13⁷) were prophets. The ministry of the word (Ac 6⁴) was a prophetic ministry, and so we find St. Paul himself described as a prophet long after he had become an Apostle (Ac 13¹).

5. But in a more precise use of the term we find the specific NT prophet distinguished from others who 'speak the word of God,' and in particular from the Apostle and the teacher (1 Co 12²⁸, cf. Eph 4¹¹). The distinction seems to be that while the Apostle was a missionary to the unbelieving (Gal 2⁷. 8), the prophet was a messenger to the Church (1 Co 14²⁶); and while the teacher explained or enforced truth that was already possessed (He 5¹²), the prophet was recognized by the spiritual discernment of his hearers (1 Co 2¹⁵ 14²⁹, 1 Jn 4¹) as the Divine medium of fresh revelations (1 Co 14²⁶. 30. 31, Eph 3⁵; cf. Did. iv. 1).

Three main types of prophesying may be distinguished in the NT—(a) First, there is what may be called the ordinary ministry of prophecy in the Church, described by St. Paul as 'edification and comfort and consolation' (1 Co 14³). (b) Again, there is, on special occasions, the authoritative announcement of the Divine will in a particular case, as when the prophets of Antioch, in obedience to the Holy Ghost, separate Barnabas and Saul for the work of missionary evangelization (Ac 13¹⁶. cf. 22¹ 16²²). (c) Rarely there is the prediction of a future event, as in the case of Agabus (11²⁸ 21¹⁰; cf. v. 4).

Of Christian prophets in the specific sense several are mentioned in the NT: Judas and Silas (Ac 15²²), the prophets at Antioch (13¹), Agabus and the prophets from Jerusalem (11²⁷. 21¹⁰), the four daughters of Philip the evangelist (v. 9). But these few names give us no conception of the numbers and influence of the prophets in the Apostolic Church. For light upon these points we have to turn especially to the Pauline Epistles (e.g. 1 Co 12²⁸. 14, Eph 2²⁰ 3⁴ 4¹¹). Probably they were to be found in every Christian community, and there might even be several of them in a single congregation (1 Co 14²⁹). Certain of them, possessed no doubt of conspicuous gifts, moved about from church to church (Ac 11²⁷. 21¹⁰; cf. Mt 10⁴¹, Did. xiii. 1). Others, endowed with literary powers, would commit their 'visions and revelations' to writing, just as some prophets of the OT had done, though of this literary type of prophecy we have only one example in the NT—the Book of Revelation (cf. Rev 1³ 22⁷. 9. 10. 18).

Quite a flood of light is shed upon the subject of the NT prophets by the evidence of the Didache. We see there that about the end of the first century or the beginning of the second the prophet is still held in the highest estimation (xl. 7, xiii.), and takes precedence, wherever he goes of the local ministry of bishops and deacons (x. 7). But we also see the presence in the Church of those influences which gradually led to the elimination of the prophetic ministry. One influence is the abundance of false prophets (xl. 8 ff.; cf. Mt 7¹⁸ 24¹¹, 24, 1 Jn 4¹), tending to make the Church suspicious of all prophetic assumptions, and to bring prophecy as such into disrepute. Another is the growing importance of the official ministry, which begins to claim the functions previously accorded to the prophets alone (xv. 1). Into the hands of the official class all power in the Church gradually passed, and in spite of the outburst of the old prophetic claims, during the latter half of the 2nd cent., in connexion with the Montanist movement, the prophet in the distinctive NT sense disappears entirely from the Catholic Church, while the ministry of office takes the place of the ministry of inspiration. J. C. LAMBERT.

PROPHETESS.—1. The courtesy title of a prophet's wife (Is 8³). 2. The OT title of women in whom the promise was fulfilled: 'your daughters shall prophesy' (Jl 2²⁸; cf. Ps 68¹¹ RV). 'The term is of course not to be misunderstood, as if it referred merely to predictions relating to the future: the reference is in general to inspired instruction in moral and religious truth' (Driver, Camb. Bible, in loc.). The title is given to Miriam (Ex 15²⁰), Deborah (Jg 4⁴), Huldah (2 K 22¹⁴, 2 Ch 34²²), and Noadiah (Neh 6¹⁴). 3. The NT gift of prophecy was bestowed on women (Ac 21⁸, 1 Co 11⁵). Anna (Lk 2³⁶) is the only 'prophetess' mentioned by name, except Jezebel (Rev 2²⁰), who was probably not the wife of the angel of the church (RVm), but a temptress of the Christians at Thyatira to whom was given the name of Israel's wicked queen. J. G. TASKER.

PROPTIATION.—The idea of propitiation is borrowed from the sacrificial ritual of the OT, and the term is used in the EV of the NT in three instances (Ro 3²⁵, 1 Jn 2² 4¹⁰) of Christ as offering the sacrifice for sin which renders God propitious, or merciful, to the sinner. In the first of these passages the word is strictly 'propitiatory' (answering to the OT 'mercy-seat'), and RVm renders 'whom God set forth to be propitiatory,' without, however, essential change of meaning. In the two Johannine passages the noun is directly applied to Christ: 'He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world' (2²); 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins' (4¹⁰). In one other passage, He 2¹⁷, the RV renders 'to make propitiation for the sins of the people,' instead of, as in AV, 'to make reconciliation.'

1. In the OT.—In the OT, to which we go back for explanation, the Heb. word kippur, which corresponds with 'to make propitiation,' is ordinarily rendered 'to make atonement,' sometimes 'to reconcile' (e.g. Lv 6³⁰ AV, but in RV 'to make atonement'); the word has primarily the sense 'to cover,' but in actual usage has the meaning of 'to conciliate' an offended party, or 'to hide or expiate' an offence. A person may be conciliated by a gift (Gn 32²⁰); may be made propitious by intercession (Ex 32³⁰); an offence may be atoned for by an act of zeal for righteousness (Nu 25¹³). In ritual usage it is the priest who 'makes atonement' for the offender, as touching, or concerning, his sin (cf. Lv 1⁴ 5¹⁸ 18 etc.). Both ideas seem to be implied here; the offence is cancelled or annulled,—hidden from God's sight,—and God is rendered propitious: His displeasure is turned away. The means by which this was effected under the Law was ordinarily sacrifice (burnt-offering, sin-offering, guilt-offering; the idea was doubtless present in the peace-offering as well). The blood of an unblemished victim, obtained by slaughter, was sprinkled on the altar, or otherwise presented to Jehovah (cf. Lv 1-7, and see ATONEMENT). On the annual Day of Atonement expiation of the sins of the people was effected by an elaborate ceremonial, which included the carrying of the blood into the Holy of Holies, and the sprinkling of it upon the mercy-seat (Lv 16). The significance of these rites is considered in the artt. ATONEMENT and ATONEMENT [DAY OF].

2. In the NT.—These analogies throw light upon the meaning of the term in the NT in its application to Christ, and further illustration is found in St. Paul's words in Ro 3²⁵. The Apostle, having shown that no one can attain to righteousness, or be justified before God, by works of law, proceeds to exhibit the Divine method of justification, without law, by 'a righteousness of God' obtained through faith in Jesus Christ. 'Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, by his blood, to show his righteousness, because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God.' The ideas in this passage include the following: (1) that Christ's death is a propitiatory sacrifice; (2) that sin cannot be righteously passed over except on the ground of such a sacrifice; (3) that Christ's propitiatory death is the vindication of God's righteousness in passing over sins under the older dispensation (cf. He 9¹²); (4) that the virtue of Christ's propitiation is appropriated by faith; (5) that everyone thus appropriating Christ's propitiation, freely set forth, becomes possessed of 'a righteousness of God' which perfectly justifies him. It is seen, therefore, that Christ's death is here regarded as having a true power to expiate guilt, redeem the sinner from condemnation, set him in righteous relations with God, and make him an object of God's favour. It is not otherwise that Christ's manifestation is conceived of by St. John, who in his Epistle emphasizes the cleansing power of Christ's blood (1⁷), extols Christ as the propitiation for the sins of the world (2²), and declares that the love of God is seen in this, that He sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins (4¹⁰; cf. 'to take away sins,' 3⁹).

This last passage raises the difficulty which will naturally be felt about 'propitiation.' Assuming, as can hardly be denied, that the term includes the idea of rendering God propitious, or favourable, how is this to be reconciled with the statement that the propitiation itself proceeds from, and is a demonstration of, the love of God? Can it be supposed that God, who Himself sends the Son, needs to be appeased, conciliated, or in any way made more gracious than He is, by His Son's death? That idea, which belongs to the heathenish conception of propitiation, must certainly be excluded. Yet the paradox holds good that, while God loves the sinner, and earnestly seeks his salvation, there is a necessary reaction of the holiness of God against sin, manifesting itself in displeasure, withdrawal, judgment, wrath, which hinders the outflow of His friendship and favour to the world as He would desire it to flow forth. The sinner cannot take the initiative here; it must come from God Himself. Yet it must come in such a way as furnishes an adequate ground for the extension of His mercy. Christ's work in our nature was one which entered into the deepest need of God's own being, as well as into the imperatives of His just government of the world. In the Person of His own well-beloved Son a reconciliation was truly effected with humanity, which extends to all who receive the Son as Saviour and Lord. This is the reality in propitiation. See ATONEMENT. JAMES ORR.

PROSELYTE.—1. The character and the history of the proselyte.—The character and the history of the proselyte are somewhat obscured by the fact that the name 'proselyte' occurs only in the NT, and there in the final meaning of a convert to Judaism, as if he were a product of NT times alone. But the same Greek word that stands for 'proselyte' in the NT is very largely used in the LXX, where EV has 'stranger.' Even the Hebrews themselves are described by the LXX as 'proselytes' in Egypt (Ex 22²¹ 23¹, Lv 19¹⁰, Dt 10¹⁹). The 'stranger' of the OT becomes the 'proselyte' of the NT. For the history that lies behind the use of the word see art. STRANGER. By the 4th cent. B.C. the 'stranger' had become a member of the Jewish Church—a proselyte in the technical sense (Bertholet, Stellung der Israeliten, p. 178).

Other expressions are used in the NT to indicate a more or less close sympathy with Jewish religious thought and life without implying absolute identity with and inclusion in Judaism. These are 'fearers of God' (phoboumenoi ton Theon, Ac 10² = 13¹⁶ = 16¹⁴ etc.), and 'worshippers of God' (sebomenoi ton Theon, Ac 16¹⁴ 17¹⁷ etc.). They were such as were drawn from heathenism by the higher ideals and purer life of Judaism. They were dissatisfied with the religious teaching of their nation, and found in Judaism an intellectual home and a religious power they sought in vain elsewhere. But a study of Ac 10. 11, esp. 11³, shows that these were not proselytes; they refused to take the final step that carried them into Judaism—viz. circumcision (EGT vol. ii. p. 250 f.; Ramsay, Expositor, 1896, p. 200; Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, i. p. 11). They lived on the fringe of Judaism, and were, it seems (Lk 7⁹, Ac 10²), often generous benefactors to the cause that had lifted them nearer to God and truth.

2. Proselytizing activity of the Jews.—Up to the time of the Exile and for some time after, the attitude of the Hebrews towards 'strangers' was passive: they did not invite their presence into their community, and did not encourage them to be sharers of their faith. But before the 3rd cent. B.C. a change of outlook and national purpose had taken place, which had converted them into active propagandists. There appear to have been three reasons for this change. (1) The Hebrews were no longer concentrated in one narrow land where a homogeneous life was followed, but were scattered over all parts of the civilized world, and found themselves in contact with peoples who were religiously far inferior to themselves, however otherwise they might be placed, and who excited, it may be, their disdain, but also their pity.—(2) Many of those in the Gentile world who were dissatisfied with the intellectual results and the religious conditions of their time saw in Judaism, as lived and taught before their eyes, something finer and nobler than they had found elsewhere; and were drawn to its practical teaching and life without committing themselves to the ritual that offended their sense of fitness and decency (cf. Harnack, op. cit. i. 10 f.).—(3) The Hebrews themselves seem to have responded to their opportunity with a quickened enthusiasm for humanity and a higher ideal of their national existence, in the providence of God, among the nations of the earth. It does not appear that the Hebrews have ever been so powerfully moved towards the peoples lying in darkness as in this time subsequent to the Exile (Harnack, op. cit. i. 11, 12). They were convinced of the claim of God to the homage of men everywhere, the universalism of their revelation of truth and duty, and their own fitness to bring the world to God. The needs of the world moved them powerfully, and the thoughts that found expression in such passages as Ps 33⁸ ('Let all the earth fear the Lord, let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him') 36⁷⁻⁹ 64¹⁰ 65⁵ etc., filled them with a burning zeal to make the world their offering to God. (Bertholet, op. cit. p. 191 f.). Perhaps we may not be wrong in regarding the Septuagint as a product of, as it certainly was an aid to, this missionary effort.

This spiritual enthusiasm for God's honour and man's salvation continued till about the time of the Maccabees, when the tenderer springs of the Jewish spirit were dried up, and the sword became the instrument of national idealism, and whole cities and tribes were given the option of circumcision or exile, if not slaughter (1 Mac 2⁶ 13¹⁸ 14¹⁴; Jos. Ant. xiii. ix. 1, xi. 3, xv. 4). Of course, this was a means that was not available outside their hereditary home. This propaganda went on till the 1st cent. of our era, when the dissatisfaction of the Jews with the Roman supremacy culminated in insurrection. In their conflict with Rome their numbers were greatly reduced by slaughter, and their power of religious expansion was checked by the decree of Hadrian, modified later by Antoninus, in forbidding circumcision. By this time, however, Judaism had won a large following in every town of size and importance (cf. Ac 2⁹⁻¹¹; Jos. BJ vii. iii. 3, c. Apion, ii. 11, 40; Seneca, ap. August. de Civitate Dei, vi. 11: cf. 'victi victoribus leges dederunt'; Harnack, op. cit. i. 14; Schürer, HJP ii. ii. 304 ff.). But now bloodshed and persecution produced the twofold result of closing and steeling the heart of Judaism to the outside world, so that proselytes were no longer sought by the Jews, and the tenets and the practices of Judaism became crystallized and less amenable to Hellenistic influences, and so less fitted to win the Gentile spirit.

3. Admission of the proselyte.—The ritual conditions imposed on the proselyte on entering Judaism were three: (1) circumcision, (2) cleansing or baptism, (3) sacrifice. Baptism took place after the healing of the wound caused by circumcision. Some have sought to discover in it an imitation of Christian ritual. But there is no foundation for such a claim. Cleansing or baptism lay in the very nature of Judaism,—the heathen was unclean and so had to be cleansed by washing in water before admission into Judaism. Sacrifice was both an expression of thanksgiving and an individual participation in Jewish worship. With the fall of the Temple sacrifice lapsed, though at first it was made a burden on the proselyte to lay aside enough to pay for the sacrifice, should the Temple again be restored; but even this demand was in course of time allowed to lapse, as the prospect of restoration vanished. These three conditions seem of early origin, though we may not have specific reference to them till the 2nd cent. A.D.

Among individual Jewish teachers there was difference of opinion as to the necessity of circumcision and baptism, but all early usage seems to confirm their actual observance. It is true that Izates, king of Adiabene, for a time refrained from circumcision under the guidance of his first Jewish teacher, Ananias, but this counsel was given, not because it was at the time deemed unnecessary for a proselyte to be circumcised, but because circumcision might alienate the sympathies of his people from Izates and endanger his throne. And Ananias wisely laid greater stress upon the moral than upon the ritual side of conversion. All through the Dispersion we find the same disposition to conciliate the Gentiles who were willing to share in the Jewish faith in any measure, by relaxing the ritual demands. And we cannot withhold our appreciation of the action of the Jews, for they wisely discriminated between the real and the formal side of their religion. They never did anything, however, to lower or compromise the moral demands of their faith. They rigorously insisted on the recognition of God from all their proselytes with all His claims upon their service (Harnack, op. cit. i. 72). It does not appear that conversion enhanced the reputation of the proselytes; for although they could not but win the esteem of the finer minds of their nation by their higher moral life, yet they seemed to the people to display a type of daily life lacking in domestic reverence and civic and national patriotism (Tac. Hist. v. 5. 8; Juv. Sat. xiv. 103-4).

4. Place of the proselytes in the growth of the Christian Church.—Those proselytes who had embraced Judaism in its entirety seem to have accepted the attitude of the Jews generally towards Christianity. Most of them would oppose it, and those who accepted it would make the Law the necessary avenue to it, and so they acted rather as a hindrance than as a help to the progress of the gospel. If the experience of Justin be any indication of the general attitude of the proselytes to the Church, they must have deemed it a duty to their adopted faith to manifest a violence of speech and an aggressiveness of action unsurpassed by the Jews themselves; for he says, 'the proselytes not only do not believe, but twofold more than yourselves blaspheme His name, and wish to torture and put to death us who believe in Him' (Dial. 122).

But the proselytes must always have formed a very small minority of those amongst the Gentiles who had lent an ear to Jewish teaching. There were many who were attracted to the synagogue by the helpfulness of its worship and the purity of its teaching, who had no sympathy with its ritual. Amongst these the gospel had a different reception; it was readily accepted and eagerly followed. They found in it all that drew them to the synagogue, and a great deal more. With historical Judaism they had nothing to do, and loyalty and nationality did not appeal to them as motives to maintain it against Christianity. Amongst the Jews both the proselyte and the devout worshipper occupied an inferior place, but here was a faith that made no distinction between Jew or Gentile, a faith whose conception of God was tenderer and whose ethical standards were higher, that made love and not law the interpreter of duty and the inspiration of service, that lived not in an evening twilight of anticipation of a glorious Messianic morning, but in warm fellowship with a Personality that was the evidence of its power and truth. It is easy to understand how quickly the gospel would be adopted by these adherents of Judaism. Every synagogue would become the seed-plot of a Christian church. And so it was specially to these that St. Paul addressed himself on his missionary journeys, and from them he formed the beginnings of many of his churches and received so much kindness (Ac 13¹⁶, 43 16¹⁴, 16 etc.). One can easily understand with what feelings of combined jealousy and hate the Jews would see these worshippers detached from the synagogue and formed into a church. But Judaism had nothing to offer the Gentile that was not better provided by the Christian Church, and so it recoiled from the attack on Christianity like the spent waves from the rock-bound coast, angry but baffled. Failure drove the Jews in sullenness upon themselves. They left the field to Christianity, restricted their vision to their own people, and left the outer world alone. J. GILROY.

PROVENDER.—1. mispd' (Gn 24²⁶, 27 43²⁴, Jg 9¹⁹, 21), a general name for cattle food. 2. bētl, Job 6⁶ fodder; bētl chāmūs, Is 30²⁴ 'clean' (AVM and RV savoury, RVm 'salted') provender, i.e. fodder mixed with salt or aromatic herbs. The ordinary food of cattle in Palestine—besides pastureage—is ibn (broken straw), kursenneh (the vetch, Vicia ervilia), bran for fattening especially, and sometimes hay made from the flowering herbs of spring.

PROVERB.—1. Meaning.—In the Bible there is no essential difference between the proverb and the parable (wh. see). The Heb. māshāl and the Gr. parabolē, meaning 'resemblance,' were applied indiscriminately to both. The value arising from this likeness was twofold. In the first place, as the moral truth seemed to emerge from the observed habits of animals, objects in nature, familiar utensils, or occurrences in daily life, such juxtaposition gave to the ethical precept or fact of conduct the surprise and challenge of a discovery. Thus the whole influence of example and environment is compressed into the proverb, 'As is the mother, so is her daughter' (Ezk 16⁴⁴). The surprise was intensified when the parable product contradicted ordinary experience, as in the statement, 'One soweth and another reapeth' (Jn 4³⁷). Definite labour deserves a definite reward, yet the unexpected happens, and, while man proposes, there remains an area in which God disposes. Out of such corroboration grew the second value of the proverb, namely, authority. The truth became a rule entitled to general acceptance. The proverb usually has the advantage of putting the concrete for the abstract. Among the modern inhabitants of Palestine, when a letter of recommendation is asked, it is customary to quote the proverb, 'You cannot clap with one hand.' Of a dull workman without interest or resource in his work it is said, 'He is like a sieve, he can do only one thing.'

2. Literary form.—(1) Next to the fact of resemblance was the essential feature of brevity. Such a combination at once secured currency to the unpremeditated exclamation, 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' (1 S 10¹¹, 12). When the proverb consisted of two parts, rhetorical emphasis was secured either by repeating the same thought in different words (Pr 3¹⁷) or by the introduction of contrasting particulars (3³³). (2) Rhythmic measure was also studied, and there was often an untranslatable felicity of balance and repeated sound. The final mark of literary publicity was conferred by a rhetorical touch of picturesque hyperbole, as in the reference to a camel passing through the eye of a needle (Mt 19²⁴). (3) The fact that a wise saying was meant for the wise encouraged the use of elliptical form. This carried the complimentary suggestion that the hearer was able to understand a reference that was confessedly obscure. On this account proverbs were called 'the words of the wise' (Pr 22¹⁷). Hence the note of surprise and unexpectedness in Christ's words, when He said that the mysteries of the Kingdom had been hidden from the wise and understanding and revealed unto babes (Mt 11²⁵, Lk 10²¹). (4) The obscurity referred to was sometimes made the leading feature and motive of the proverb, and it was then called an 'enigma' or 'dark saying' (Ps 49⁴, Pr 1⁶ 30¹⁵⁻²¹). Its solution then became a challenge to the ingenuity of the interpreter. Both the prophets and Christ Himself were charged with speaking in this problematical manner (Ezk 20⁴⁹, Jn 16²⁹). Riddles were introduced at festive gatherings as contributing an element of competitive acuteness and facetious exhilaration. Instances resembling Pr 30¹⁵⁻²¹ are common among the modern Arabs and Jews in Syria, as when it is said: 'There are three chief voices in the world, that of running water, of the Torah, and of money.' An enigma for the study of books is: 'Black seeds on white ground, and he who eats of the fruit becomes wise.'

3. Subject-matter.—This is summarized in Pr 1⁴. The reference is generally to types of character, the emotions and the desires of the heart, and the joys and sorrows, the losses and gains, the duties and the relationships of human life. Amid these the proverb casts a searching light upon different classes of men, and points out the path of wisdom. Hence the name 'words of truth' (Pr 22²²).

4. Authority.—Proverbial literature is more highly esteemed in the East than in the West. While the popularity of proverbs is partly due to literary charm and intellectual force, and the distinction conferred by the power of quoting and understanding them, the principal cause of their acceptance lies in their harmony with Oriental life. The proverb is patriarchal government in the region of ethics. It is an order from the governing class that admits of no discussion. The proverb is not the pleading of the lawyer in favour of a certain view and claim, but the decision of a judge who has heard both sides and adjudicates on behalf of general citizenship. Such authority is at its maximum when it not only is generally current but has been handed down from previous generations. It is then 'a parable of the ancients' (1 S 24¹⁹). The quotation of an appro private proverb in a controversy always carries weight, unless the opponent can quote another in support of his claims. Thus, to the careless and inattentive man in business who says 'Prosperity is from God,' it may be retorted 'He that seeketh findeth.' Beneath some commendable social qualities belonging to this attitude there is a mental passivity that seeks to attain to results without the trouble of personal inquiry, and prefers the benefits conferred by truth to any sacrifice or service that might be rendered to it. G. M. MACKIE.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF.—The second book among the 'Writings' is the most characteristic example of the Wisdom literature in the OT. 1. We may adopt the division of the book made by the headings in the Hebrew text as follows:—

- I. 1-9, The proverbs of Solomon, son of David, king of Israel (heading for more than this section). See below.
- II. 10-22¹⁻², The proverbs of Solomon.
- III. 22¹⁻², . . . the words of the wise (22¹⁻² forms an introductory poem).
- IV. 24¹⁻⁴, These also are the sayings of the wise.
- V. 25-29, These also are the proverbs of Solomon which the men of Hezekiah copied out.
- VI. 30, The words of Agur, etc.
- VII. 31¹⁻⁵, The words of king Lemuel, etc.
- VIII. 31¹⁻³¹, Without heading, but clearly distinct from VII.

Sections I., II., and III. form the body of the book; sections IV. and V. are additions to the earlier portion, and VI., VII., and VIII. are still later additions.

We consider section II. first, because here the typical Hebrew proverb is best seen, especially if chs. 10-15 are taken by themselves as IIa. These chapters consist of aphorisms in the form of couplets showing antithetic parallelism (see POETRY). The couplets are wholly detached, and little order is observable in their arrangement. In content they come nearest being popular, even if they are not so actually. In general they show a contented and cheerful view of life. The wise are mentioned, and with admiration, but not as a class or as forming a school of thought or instruction. They are the successful, upright, prosperous men, safe examples in affairs of common life. In IIb the lines are still arranged in distiches, but the antithetic parallelism has largely given way to the synonymous or synthetic variety. This form gives a little more opportunity for classifying and developing the sentiment of the proverb. 'My son' is addressed a few times, but not regularly. Section III. again marks an advance over IIa and IIb. The verses 22¹⁻² are a hortatory introduction. There follows a collection of quatrains, instead of couplets. They are maxims with proverbs among them. Consecutive thought has developed. The truths stated are still the simple every-day ones, but they show meditation as well as observation. Section IV. is an appendix to the third, both coming from 'the Wise.' It is very defective in rhythm, and seemingly the text has suffered corruption. In the few verses three themes are treated, chiefly the sluggard. Section V. is easily subdivided. Chs. 25-27²² contain proverbs in the form of comparison. Chs. 28-29 are in the style of section II. Between the two a little piece (27²³⁻²⁷) praises the life of a farmer. Section VI. consists of several independent discourses. The heading (30¹) separates the chapter from the preceding, but otherwise adds little to our knowledge of the origin, for it is wellnigh unintelligible. Even if it consists of proper names, as is most likely, there is no gain from knowing them and nothing more. In vv. 1-18 are several stanzas of peculiar 'numerical' style: 'there are three things that . . . and four . . . namely . . .' Section VII. is a brief manual for a king or judge, though the maxims are rather rudimentary and homely. If there is a temperance lesson, it is only for the king; the advice to the poor and oppressed is very different (see vv. 6 and 7). The remainder of the chapter, section VIII., is noticeable for two things: its alphabetical structure, each couplet beginning with a new letter in regular order, and the unusual subject, the capable housewife. A most delicate tribute is in the omission of any reference to her virtue, which is tacitly assumed, and not even mentioned.

There remains the important section chs. 1-9. Its position at the head of the book does not show that it was first in point of time. It is clearly a preface, or hortatory introduction. It does not so much give wise counsel of a concrete kind, as praise the wisdom illustrated in the concrete counsels of the following sections. It is studied, philosophical, flowing in style. It addresses 'My son' at the beginning of a new paragraph, exactly as a teacher addresses 'My hearers' as he begins a lecture. In one chapter at least, the eighth, the adoration of wisdom is carried to the limit, and in spite of the fine personification one feels, regretfully, far removed from the plain practical precepts of sections II. and III. In this 'cosmogonic hymn' wisdom is assigned a dignity in the universe hardly inferior to that of the Creator.

Among the various attempts to explain the form in which the book comes to us, perhaps the following will be found as simple as any. We may suppose that the proverbs 'of Solomon' in IIa and IIb were collected separately and then combined in II.; that 'the words of the wise' in III. at first stood by themselves, and were supplemented by IV.; that the two groups, II. and III.-IV., were then joined together, becoming known as the proverbs 'of Solomon'; that the collection in V. was attached; that to this book section I. was then prefixed as an introduction, which was thus stamped as the literature of the school of Wisdom. The few remaining chapters, sections VI., VII., and VIII., were added later from the mass of Wisdom literature which must have been in existence, or later came into existence.

2. As for the date of the book, the traditional ascription of parts of it to king Solomon must, of course, be discarded. And with this rejection there disappears any reason for seeking an early date for it. The time when, all things considered, the compilation is best explained, is between B.C. 350 and 150. From the nature of the case it is impossible to fix even approximately the date of the origin of individual couplets. Many of the arguments valid against an early date of compilation are valueless so far as the single proverbs are concerned.

3. The authors of the Wisdom literature do not claim revealed wisdom; their teachings are only practical common sense. They are humanists, basing their morality upon the universal principles underlying all human nature. From this practical interest the view broadens to the wide sweep of ch. 8. 'Proverbs may be regarded as a manual of conduct, or, as Bruch calls it, an "anthology of gnomes." Its observations relate to a number of forms of life, to affairs domestic, agricultural, urban (the temptations of city life), commercial, political, and military' (Toy, Proverbs, p. x.). O. H. GATES.

PROVIDENCE.—1. The word is not found in the OT. In the NT it is used only once; in the exordium of his address to Felix, the orator Tertullus says: 'By thy providence evils are corrected for this nation' (Ac 24⁷). Here 'providence' simply means 'foresight,' as in 2 Mac 4⁶ 'the king's providence.'

2. The first appearance of the word 'providence' (Gr. pronoia) in Jewish literature is in Wis 14³, where God is represented as making for a ship 'a way in the sea'; the Jewish author, borrowing the expression from the Stoic philosophers, says: 'Thy providence, O Father, guideth it along.' In a later passage, recognizing the sterner aspect of the truth to which the OT also bears witness, he contrasts the destinies of the Israelites and Egyptians and describes the latter, when they were 'prisoners of darkness,' as 'exiled from the eternal providence' (17³).

3. Although the OT does not contain the word 'providence,' it is a continuous and progressive revelation of Him 'whose never-failing providence ordereth all things both in heaven and earth.' Historians narrate the gradual accomplishment of His redemptive purpose concerning the Chosen People and the world at large (Gn 50²⁰, Ex 8²², Dt 32²⁶; cf. Ps 74¹²); poets delight to extol Him 'whose tender mercies are over all his works' (Ps 145⁹; cf. 29¹⁰, 104, 136); prophets point to the proofs of God's guidance in the past in order that the people may gain wisdom for the present and courage for the future (Dt 32⁷, Hag 2¹, Is 51², Mal 4⁶). The Book of Job has been called 'the book of Providence,' because it not only gives the author's solution of perplexing problems, but also 'furnishes reasons for believing in the righteous providence of God from the consideration of His character and His dominion over nature' (Oehler, Theology of OT, II, 474; cf. Job 27, 34¹⁰ 36²⁷).

4. Belief in Providence stands or falls with belief in a personal God. It is incompatible with mechanical or pantheistic theories of Creation. Ancient problems which perplexed Greek philosophers and Hebrew sages press heavily upon the modern mind as it strives to reconcile its trust in Divine providence with the reign of law in the universe and with the existence of pain and evil. Jesus Christ taught that the laws of nature are the established methods of His Heavenly Father's working, and that they fulfil as well as reveal His will (Mt 6²⁸, 10²⁹, Jn 5¹⁷). Belief in Providence means to the Christian, trust in the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has so clearly revealed His will in His Son as to make it plain to His children that natural laws may not only subserve moral and spiritual ends in this present time, but may also further His unerring purposes which are not bounded by this mortal life (Ro 8²⁸, 2 Co 4¹⁸, 1 P 1⁵). J. G. TASKER.

PROVINCE.—This word, of unknown derivation, originally meant simply 'a sphere of (magisterial) duty,' and was applied, for example, to the duty of the prætor urbanus, who was never permitted to leave Rome. With the extension of the Roman Empire, and the consequently much increased number of spheres of duty outside Rome and Italy, the word came gradually to have a territorial application also. It is in this derived sense that the word is taken here. It was part of the Roman policy throughout to be in no unnecessary hurry to acquire territory and the responsibility connected with it, and it was not till the year a.c. 227—hundreds of years after the foundation of the Roman State—that the first province was taken over. In that year Sardinia and Corsica became one province, Western Sicily another, and each, after the details of government had been settled by special commissioners, was put under an additional prætor elected for the purpose. Behind this step, as behind the annexation of most Roman provinces, there lay long years of warfare. Province after province was annexed, until in the time of Christ the Romans were in possession of the whole of Europe (except the British Isles, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and Russia), all Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and the north-west of Africa. Most of this vast 'erritory had been acquired during the Republic, but certain portions had not been annexed till the time of the first Emperor, Augustus. During the Republic the governors of these provinces were appointed by the Roman senate from among their own number, generally after a period of service as prætor or consul, as the case might be. They were unpaid, and had heavy expenses to bear. Few resisted the temptation to recoup themselves at the expense of the long-suffering provincials, and the vast sums acquired by an extortionate governor in his one year's governorship may be estimated from the fact that Cicero, a just and honest man, acquired £18,000 during his tenure of the province Cilicia.

During the Empire the provinces were treated according to a notable settlement made between the Senate and the Emperor Augustus on January 1, B.C. 27. On that day it was arranged that those provinces which were peaceful and did not require the presence of an army should be under the control of the senate, who would appoint their governors; while the disturbed provinces that did require the presence of an army were to be under the Emperor himself, who was generalissimo of all the forces of the State. At the same time the Emperor retained financial interests even in senatorial provinces. The following thus became senatorial (or public) provinces: Asia (i.e. roughly the western third of Asia Minor), Africa (i.e. practically Tunis), Gallia Narbonensis, Hispania Bætica, Achaia, Cyprus, Creta et Cyrenaica, Macedonia, Sicilia, Bithynia, Illyricum, Sardinia et Corsica. The first two were senatorial provinces of the first rank, and were governed each by an ex-consul with the title of proconsul, and three legati under him. The others were senatorial provinces of the second rank, and were governed each by an ex-prætor, also with the title proconsul. All the rest of the Roman world outside Italy, namely, three-fourths of the whole, was made up of Imperial provinces, including the following: Egypt (where the Emperors, as successors of the Ptolemys, ruled as kings), Judæa, Syria-Cilicia Phœnice, Galatia (established B.C. 25), Thracia, Pamphylia (established B.C. 25), Gallia tres (Aquitania, Lugudunensis, Belgica), Britannia (established A.D. 43). Every new province naturally came under the Emperor's authority. He governed his more important provinces (e.g. Syria, Galatia) through a legatus pro prætore in each—a man of consular or prætorian rank, who was paid a fixed salary in and after the time of Tiberius—and his less important provinces through a procurator (e.g. Judæa) or præfectus (e.g. Egypt). The period of senatorial governorships was one year, that of Imperial indefinite. Each province was governed according to a definite statute, which determined the administrative procedure and defined the privileges of individual cities in it. The inhabitants were disarmed and taxed. The oppressive and unjust rule of the Republic was exchanged for a much better during the Empire; and the provinces, at least during the first three centuries of our era, were prosperous and contented. A. SOUTER.

PROVOKE.—'To provoke' is now 'to try to call forth evil passions,' but in AV it is used in the sense of inciting to any action, good or evil, as 2 Co 9² 'Your zeal hath provoked very many.' 'Provocation,' however, always occurs in a bad sense. It is used in Ps 95⁸ of the conduct of the children of Israel towards God in the wilderness.

PSALMS.—1. Title and place in Canon.—The Book of Psalms is a collection of sacred poems, in large part liturgical in character and intended to be sung. The book belongs to the Kethubim or 'Writings,' i.e. the third and last group of the Jewish Scriptures. The order of the Writings was much less fixed than the order of the Law and the Prophets, the other two groups of Scriptures; but the Psalms in all cases come near the beginning of this group, and in the modern Hebrew printed Bibles, which follow the great majority of German MSS, they stand first. In placing the Psalms, together with the rest of the Writings, before the ('Later') Prophets, the EV has followed the Greek version; but in the internal arrangement of the Writings, the English and Greek versions differ from one another.

The title of this collection of poems is derived from the Greek version, in which the book is entitled in some MSS Psalmoi, in others Psalterion (in NT 'Psalms,' and 'Book of Psalms,' Lk 20¹⁷ 24⁴, Ac 1²⁰). psalmos in classical Greek signified the twanging of strings, and especially the musical sound produced by plucking the strings of a stringed instrument; as used here it means poems played to the music of (stringed) instruments. The Greek word thus corresponds closely to the Heb.

mizmor, of which it is the tr. in the titles of individual Psalms (e.g. 3¹). The Jewish title for the whole book was 'Book of Praises': this referred directly to the subject-matter of the poems, and less directly than the Greek title to their musical character. Both titles take into account the majority of the poems rather than the whole; not all the Psalms were sung to musical accompaniment, and not all of them consist of praise.

The Psalter contains, according to the division of the Hebrew text followed by EV, 150 poems; the Greek version contains 151, but the last of these is described as 'outside the number'. This number does not exactly correspond with the number of different poems. On the one hand, there are one or two clear cases, and there may be others less clear, of a single Psalm having been wrongly divided into two; thus Psalms 9 and 10 are shown by the continuance of the acrostic scheme through the latter Psalm (cf. ACROSTIC, and see Expositor, Sept. 1906, pp. 233-253) to have once formed, as they still do in the Greek version, a single poem. So Ps 42, 43 are shown by the recurrence of the same refrain (42^b, 43^b) to be one poem. But the Greek version is scarcely true to the original in making two distinct Psalms out of each of the Psalms numbered 116 and 147 respectively in the Hebrew text and EV. Probably in a larger number of cases, owing to an opposite fortune, two poems originally distinct have been joined together under a single number. A clear instance of this kind is Ps 108, which consists of two Psalms or fragments of Psalms (viz. 57¹⁻¹¹ 60¹⁻¹²). Among the more generally suspected instances of the same kind are Ps 19 (=vv. 1-6+7-14) 24 (=vv. 1-6+7-10) 27 (=vv. 1-4+7-14) and 36 (=1-4+5-12). A very much larger number of such instances are inferred by Dr. Briggs in his Commentary (ICC).

The Psalter does not contain quite the whole of what survives of Jewish literature of this type. A few psalms not included in the Psalter are found in other books: see, e.g., 1 S 21¹⁰, 1 S 12, 38¹⁰⁻²⁰, Hab 3. And we have another important, though much smaller, collection of psalms in the 'Psalms of Solomon' written about b.c. 63. These, with such NT psalms as Lk 1³⁴⁻³⁸, 68⁷⁻¹⁹, are important as showing that the period of psalm composition extended beyond the close of the OT.

2. Origin and history.—(1) Reception into the Canon.—The history of the Psalms and the Psalter is obscure; and many conclusions with regard to it rest, and for lack of other independent evidence must rest, on previous conclusions as to the origin and literary history of other Hebrew and Jewish literature. Conclusive external evidence for the existence of the Psalter in its present extent does not carry us very far back beyond the close of the Jewish Canon (see CANON OF OT); but the mode of allusion to the Psalms in the NT renders it very unlikely that the book was still open to additions in the 1st cent. A.D.; and the fact that none of the 'Psalms of Solomon' (see § 1, end) gained admission, and that this collection by its title perhaps presupposes the canonical 'Psalms of David,' renders it probable that the Psalter was complete, and not open to further additions, some time before b.c. 63. Other evidence (cf. Hastings' DB iv. 147), such as that derived from the substantial agreement of the Greek version with the Hebrew text, does not carry the proof for the existence of the Psalter in its present extent much further. The net result is that, if not impossible, it is unsafe, to place the completion of the Psalter much below b.c. 100.

(2) Previous history.—Behind that date lies a long history; for the Psalter represents the conclusion of a complex literary growth or development. We may note, first, two things that prove this general fact, that the Psalter is neither a simple edition of the poems of a single man or a single age, nor the first collection of its kind. (1) At the close of Ps 72 stand the words: 'The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.' This is intelligible if the remark once closed an independent collection, and was taken over with the collection by the compiler of a larger work. But apart from some such hypothesis as this it is not intelligible; for the remark is not true of the Psalter as we have it; the prayers of David are not ended, other Psalms actually entitled 'prayers' and described as 'of David' are Pss 86 and 142; and several subsequent Psalms assigned to David are, without being so entitled, actually prayers. (2) The same Psalm is repeated in different parts of the Psalter with slight textual or editorial variations: thus Ps 14 = Ps 53; 40¹³⁻¹⁷ = 70; 108 = 57¹⁻¹¹ + 60¹⁻¹². The Psalter, then, was composed by drawing on, and in some cases incorporating, earlier collections of Psalms.

Our next questions are: How many collections earlier than the Psalter can be traced? How far can the methods of the editor who drew on or combined these earlier collections be discerned? The first clue to the first question may be found in the titles referring to persons and their distribution; the more significant features of this distribution may be shown thus—

1. Pss 1-2 are without title.
2. Pss 3-41 are all entitled 'of David,' except Ps 10 which is a continuation of Ps 9 (see above), and Ps 33.
3. Pss 42-49 are all entitled 'of the sons of Korah,' except Ps 43, which is a continuation of Ps 42 (see above).
4. Ps 50 is entitled 'of Asaph.'
5. Pss 51-72 are all entitled 'of David,' except Pss 66, 67, 71, 72.
6. Pss 73-83 are all entitled 'of Asaph.'
7. Of Pss 84-89, four (Pss 84, 85, 87, 88) are entitled 'of the sons of Korah,' one (Ps 86) 'of David,' and one (Ps 89) 'of Ethan.'
8. Pss 120-134 are all entitled 'Songs (so rather than 'A song' RV) of Ascent.'

The remaining 46 Psalms (90-119, 135-150) are either without title, or the titles are not the same in any considerable number of consecutive Psalms (but note 108-110 and 138-145 entitled 'of David').

Now, if it stood by itself, the statement at the close of Ps 72 could be explained by a single process—the incorporation of a previous collection consisting of Pss 1-72 by an editor who added these to Pss 73-150 derived from other sources. But within Pss 1-72 we have two occurrences of the same Psalm (Ps 14 = Ps 53), which in itself indicates that in Pss 1-72 at least two hymn-books are combined. Again, Ps 53 differs from Ps 14 by the entire absence from it of the name 'Jahweh' and the use in four places of the name 'God,' where Ps 14 uses 'Jahweh' (EV 'the Lord'). So also in Ps 70 = Ps 40¹³⁻¹⁷ 'Jahweh' is twice retained, but thrice it is replaced by 'God.' But the editorial activity thus implied proves on examination to have affected the entire group of Pss 42-83; for the difference in the use of the names 'Jahweh' and 'God' between Pss 1-41 and Pss 42-83 is remarkable; in Pss 1-41 'Jahweh' occurs 272 times, 'God' (absolutely) 15 times; in Pss 42-83 'Jahweh' 43 times, but 'God' 200 times (see Driver, LOT 371). Now this Elohist Psalter, as Pss 42-83 are termed on account of the marked preference which is shown in them for the term Elohim = 'God,' is one of the earlier collections embodied in our Psalter; but it is itself in turn derived from different sources; for it includes the group of David's Psalms which closes with the statement that the Prayers of David are ended—a statement which, though not true of the whole Psalter, is true of this earlier Psalter, for between Pss 73-83 no prayer of David occurs. It also includes Psalms 'of the sons of Korah' and 'of Asaph.' Very possibly this Elohist Psalter has not reached us in its original condition; for (1) the untitled Psalms may have been subsequently inserted; and (2) the Psalms entitled 'of Asaph' may have once stood all together: at present Ps 50 stands isolated from the rest (Pss 73-83).

In addition to the occurrences of Psalms in two recensions and the occurrence of similar titles or groups another feature points to earlier independent books or Psalms: this is the occurrence of a doxology or suitable concluding formula at certain points in the Psalter, viz. 41¹³ at the end of the first group of Psalms entitled 'of David'; 72¹⁸, 19 immediately before the statement that the Prayers of David are ended; and 89¹³. See also 106¹³ and 150, which last Psalm in its entirety may be taken as an enlarged doxology at the close of the completed Psalter. The doxologies at the end of Ps 41 and 72 occur at points which we have already found reason for regarding as the close of collections; that at 89^a, however, occurs not at the close of the Elohist Psalms, but six Psalms later. Now five of these six Psalms are drawn from the same sources as supplied the Elohist editor, viz. from the 'prayers of David' (Ps 86) and the book 'of the sons of Korah.' In Ps 42-89 we not improbably have the original Elohist Psalter (Ps 42-83), enlarged by the addition of an appendix (Ps 84-89), in which the name 'Jahweh' was left unchanged, and consequently the form 'Elohim' ceases to predominate.

From the evidence thus far considered or suggested (it cannot here be given in greater detail), we may infer some such stages as these in the history of the Psalms before the completion of the Psalter:—

1. Compilation of a book entitled 'of David' and including Ps 3-41 (except the untitled Ps 33).
2. Compilation of a second hymn-book entitled 'of David' (Ps 51-72, with exceptions).
3. Compilation of a book entitled 'of Asaph' (Asaph being the name of a guild of singers, Ezr 2⁴⁰).
4. Compilation of a book entitled 'of the sons of Korah' (also probably a guild of singers; cf. 2 Ch 20¹⁹).
5. Compilation of 'the Elohist Psalter' out of Psalms derived from 2, 3, 4 by an editor who generally substituted 'Elohim' ('God') for 'Jahweh' ('EV' the Lom').
6. Enlargement of 5 by the addition of Ps 84-89.
7. Compilation of a book entitled 'Songs of the Ascents.'

Can we detect the existence of other earlier Psalters? So far we have taken account mainly of titles of one type only and of titles which occur in groups. Dr. Briggs carries the argument from titles to the existence of collections of Psalms further. He infers that there was a collection of Michtams or chosen pieces, whence Ps 16, 56-60 and 18 38^{a-20} were drawn; another collection of Maschils or meditations, whence Ps 32, 42-45, 52-55, 74, 78, 88, 89, 142 were derived; another collection of Psalms proper, of poems set to music, whence the 57 Psalms described in the titles as Mizmor ('EV' 'psalm') were derived; and yet another collection which bore the name of the musical director or choir master ('EV' 'the chief musician'), whence the 55 Psalms so entitled were derived. If this be the case, then the composite titles enable us to see that many Psalms stood successively in two or three collections before they obtained their place in the completed Psalter; e.g. Ps 10—entitled 'of (or belonging to) the chief musician, a Psalm, of (or belonging to) David'—had previously been included in three distinct collections; and so also Ps 44—entitled 'of the chief musician, of the sons of Korah, Maschil.' Perhaps the strongest case for these further collections is that of the chief musician's Psalter; in any case, the English reader must be warned that the preposition prefixed to the 'chief musician' is the same as that prefixed to 'David' or 'Asaph' or 'the sons of Korah,' though in the first case RV renders 'for' and in the latter cases 'of.' Consequently, since in many cases it is impossible, owing to intervening words (e.g. in Ps 12, 45), to interpret such a combination as 'of the chief musician, of David,' 'of the chief musician, of the sons of Korah' of joint authorship, we must see in them either conflicting ascriptions of authorship placed side by side, or, far more probably, as just suggested, the titles of collections of Psalms or hymn-books to which they had previously belonged. It is then highly probable that in the first instance such titles as 'of David,' 'of Asaph,' 'of the sons of Korah,' were neither intended nor understood to name the author of the Psalm in question. But if this was so, we can also see that before the final stage in the growth of the Psalter they were misunderstood; for the title 'of David' clearly implied authorship to the author(s) of the longer titles in Ps 7 and 8; it is scarcely less clear that the title implied authorship to the authors of other titles that suggest an historical setting (see, e.g., Ps 3, 57).

Titles of the Psalms.—Inasmuch as the terms occurring in the titles to the Psalms are not explained elsewhere in this Dictionary, it will be convenient to give here brief notes on those which have not already been discussed. It may be said in general that great obscurity enshrouds the subject, and that, in spite of the many ingenious speculations to which the terms in question have given rise, it is hazardous to base, on any particular theories of interpretation, far-reaching conclusions. With few exceptions the titles of the latter part of the Psalter (Ps 90-150) are free from these terms.

Apparently we have in the titles not only notes indicating the source whence the Psalm was derived (see above), but also in some cases notes defining the character of the Psalm (see below, Nos. 12 and 13 and [?] No. 18), or some circumstances of its use. Thus Ps 92 was to be used on the Sabbath, Ps 30 at the Feast of the Dedication (1 Mac 4⁴⁶, Jn 10²²), celebrated from the time of the Maccabees onward; and Ps 100 'on the occasion of offering thank-offering'; so also 'to bring to remembrance' (EV) in Ps 38 and 70 may rather mean 'at the time of making the offering called azkarah' (RV memorial, e.g. Nu 5²⁶); see also No. 6 (below). This type of note is more frequent in the LXX, which assigns Ps 24 for the use of the first day of the week, Ps 48 for the second, Ps 64 for the third, Ps 93 for the day before the Sabbath. Other titles, it is supposed, name, by the opening words of songs sung to it or otherwise, the tune to which the Psalm was to be sung (see Aljeleth hash-shahar, Al-tashheth, Jonath-elen-rehokim, Shoshannim; see below), or the instruments which were to accompany the singing of the Psalm (? Nehiloth, Neginoth).

For ease of reference we give the terms in alphabetic order.

1. Aljeleth hash-shahar (Ps 22) is a transliteration of Heb. words which mean 'the hind of the morning'; the Heb. consonants might equally well mean 'the help of the morning.' These words are preceded by the Heb. preposition 'al, which, among many others, has the meaning 'in accordance with,' and here and in other similar titles not improbably means 'set to' (AV). The whole note, then, may mean that the Psalm was to be sung to the tune to which the song beginning 'the hind (or 'the help') of the morning' had been accustomed to be sung. The renderings upon Aljeleth Shahar (AV) and concerning Aljeleth hash-shahar are also legitimate, but less probable. With this title cf. below Nos. 3, 7, 9, 10, 14, 19 (not all equally probable instances).

2. Alamoth (Ps 46). This term and Sheminith (Ps 6, 12) must be treated together. They are preceded by the same preposition 'al discussed under No. 1, and accordingly RV renders 'set to the Sheminith,' etc. But it is hardly likely, in view of 1 Ch 151¹⁻², that these terms are names of tunes, though they obviously have some reference to the music. The usual meaning of sheminith in Heb. is 'eighth,' of alamoth 'young women'; so that the titles run 'upon' or 'according to' or 'set to the eighth' or 'the maidens.' 'The maidens,' it is conjectured, means 'the voices of maidens,' and that, it is further conjectured, stands for 'the falsetto voice of males'; so that the whole phrase 'set to the maidens' would mean 'to be sung with soprano voices.' Thence, it is inferred, 'set to the eighth' means 'sung with the bass voice.' All this, though it has found considerable acceptance and has sometimes been stated with little or no qualification, possesses no more than the value of an unverified and perhaps unverifiable guess.

3. Al-tashheth (Ps 57, 58, 59, 75). The words mean 'destroy not,' and may be the beginning of a vintage song cited in 1s 65⁹ 'Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it.' Then the note presumably directs that the Psalms shall be sung to the tune of this song (cf. No. 1). But the omission of the preposition 'al used in similar cases is suspicious.

4. The Chief Musician. See precd. column.

5. 'Ascents' (RV; 'degrees' AV), a song of (Ps 120-134). The Heb. may also be the plural of a compound expression, and mean 'Songs of Ascent.' In the latter case the title of the whole collection has been prefixed to each Psalm (see above). 'Songs of Ascent' might mean 'Songs of the Ascent' (cf. Ezr 7⁹), from Babylon, but more probably 'Songs of the Ascent' to Jerusalem on the occasion of the great yearly festivals. On the supposition that the meaning is 'A song of Ascents' (pl.), the phrase has been explained with reference to the 15 'ascents' or 'steps' (such is the meaning of the Heb. word in Ex 20²², 1 K 10¹⁹), that led from the Women's Court to that of the men in the Temple area; it has been inferred that one of each of these 15 Psalms was sung on each of the 15 steps. Other ingenious but improbable suggestions have been offered (cf., most lately, J. W. Thirlie, Old Testament Problems).

6. Dedication of the House, i.e. the Temple (Ps 30). See above and art. DEDICATION [FEAST OF THE].

7. Gittith (Ps 8, 81, 84). The word is the fem. of the adj. derived from Gath. In the three titles it is preceded by the prep. 'al (see under No. 1), and the phrase has been supposed to mean that the Psalm was to be sung to the accompaniment of the Gittite instrument (cf. Nos. 15 and 716), whatever that may have been, or to the Gittite tune (cf. No. 1). If the word was originally pronounced 'Gittoth' (pl. of gath, 'a wine-press'), the note may direct that the Psalms were to be sung to some vintage melody (cf. No. 3).

8. Higgaion.—The word thus transliterated in 91^a (RV) is translated in 92^a 'a solemn sound' (RV), 'murmuring sound' (Driver), and in 194^a 'meditation.' In 91^a it seems to be a musical note.

9. Jeduthun.—On the analogy of 'of David,' etc. (see above), the title in Ps 39 should run 'of the sons of Korah, of Jeduthun.' In Ps 62. 77 the preposition prefixed to the term is 'al (cf. No. 1), and by analogy Jeduthun might be the name of a tune or an instrument. But this is very uncertain; see art. JEDUTHUN.

10. Jonath-elem-rehokim (Ps 56). The Heb. consonants are most naturally translated 'the dove of the distant terebinths'; less probably, but as the tradition embodied in the vocalized Heb. text suggests, 'the dove of the silence of them that are distant.' The note is to be explained as No. 1.

11. Mahalah (Ps 53), Mahalah Leannoth (Ps 88). The words are very ambiguous and obscure, but the fact that in both Psalms the prep. 'al precedes, relates these notes to the group of which No. 1 is typical.

12. Maschil (Ps 32. 42-45. 52-55. 74-78. 88. 89. 142). The term describes the character of the poem, but whether its precise meaning is 'a meditation' (Briggs) or 'a cunning Psalm' (Kirkpatrick), or something else, cannot be determined with certainty. See also p. 771^a.

13. Michtam (Ps 16. 56-60, also perhaps in the original text of Is 38^a) is a term like the last, but of still more uncertain meaning. The Rabbinical interpretation—a golden (poem)—though adopted by Briggs, is quite unconvincing.

14. Muth-labben (Ps 9). The Heb. consonants may mean 'Death whiteness,' and this may have been the commencement of a song which gave a name to a tune; cf. No. 1. But it is not unreasonable to suspect the text, as many have done.

15. Neginoth (AV in Ps 4. 6. 54. 55. 67. 76) and Neginah (Ps 61). The words thus, in excess of caution, transliterated by AV, are correctly translated by RV 'stringed instruments' (Ps 61 'song'), and so even by AV in Hab 3^a.

16. Nehiloth (Ps 5), often supposed to mean 'wind instruments' (cf. No. 15). But this is quite doubtful. Uncertain, too, is the view that the word indicates a tune; the preposition ('el) that precedes is not the same as that which generally introduces what appear to be names of tunes elsewhere (cf. No. 1); but cf. No. 19.

17. Sheminith. See No. 2.

18. Shiggaion (Ps 7). The pl. of this word (Shigionoth) occurs in Hab 3^a, possibly by error for Neginoth (cf. No. 15), which perhaps stood in the text from which the Greek version was made. The root from which the word is derived means 'to go astray' or 'to reel' (as, e.g., from drunkenness). Hence, since Ewald, many have conjectured that Shiggaion means 'a wild, passionate song, with rapid changes of rhythm' (Oxf. Lex.). The meaning really remains entirely uncertain.

19. Shoshannim (Ps 45. 69), Shushan-eduth (Ps 60), and Shoshannim-eduth (Ps 80) appear to be different ways of citing the same song to the tune of which these Psalms were to be sung. The preposition used before these words is 'al (cf. No. 1), except in Ps 80, where it is 'el, which in some cases is used interchangeably with 'al. It is curious that Psalms so different as 45 and 69 should be set to the same tune. Ps 80 cites the first two words of the poem, '(Like) lilies (or rather anemones) is the Testimony (or Law)'; Ps 45. 69 the first word only; and Ps 60 apparently was variant, '(Like) a lily' (singular for plural), etc.

3. Dates of the various collections.—Is it possible to determine the dates at which any of these collections of Psalms were made? Obviously they are earlier than the completion of the Psalter, i.e. than about B.C. 100 (see above); obviously also the collections were later than the latest Psalm which they originally contained. One or more Psalms in all the collections show more or less generally admitted signs of being post-exilic. The various collections therefore which we have in the Psalter were compiled between the 6th and the 2nd centuries B.C. By arguments which cannot here be reproduced, Robertson Smith (OTJC ch. vii.) reached the following conclusions in detail. The first Davidic collection (Pss 3-41) was compiled about the time of Ezra and Nehemiah; the second Davidic collection (Pss 57-72) in the 4th cent.; the Asaphite (Pss 50. 73-83) and Korahite (Pss 42-49) collections between B.C. 430 and 330. Dr. Briggs places the Korahitic and Asaphite collections somewhat later—after B.C. 332; the Elohist Psalter (Pss 42-83) and the chief musician's collection in the 3rd cent. B.C. But whatever the value of these detailed conclusions, which are not all very secure, one general fact of much importance already stands out: the period between the Exile and the 1st cent. B.C. was marked by much activity in the collection and editing of Psalms; and this, apart from the dates of individual Psalms, is significant for the part played by the Psalms in the religious life of the post-exilic community.

4. Dates of individual Psalms.—From the collections we pass to the difficult and much discussed question of the dates of the individual Psalms. All that will be possible here is to point out certain general lines of evidence, with one or two illustrations in detail. 1^a the detailed conclusions with reference to the collections are sound, a minimum date is fixed for many Psalms: e.g. Pss 3-41 (except the untitled Ps 33) are not later than about the time of Ezra and Nehemiah; Pss 42-49 and 50. 73 and 83 not later (on Robertson Smith's theory) than B.C. 330, and so on. The collections are indeed post-exilic, but in itself that need not prevent even the whole of the Psalms being pre-exilic: the collections might be post-exilic hymn-books composed entirely of ancient hymns. As a matter of fact, not all the Psalms are pre-exilic; many of the individual Psalms are somewhat clearly of post-exilic origin; indeed, there is a fairly general consensus of opinion that the majority, a considerable body of opinion that the great majority, of the Psalms are post-exilic. Signs of exilic or post-exilic origin are: (1) Allusions to the Exile or the desolation of Zion, as a present or past fact, as the case may be; see e.g. 51^{1st}. 89⁴⁻⁵ 102¹³. 106⁷ 107^{1st}. 126¹ 137¹ 147¹. The profanation of the Temple by the heathen alluded to in Pss 74-79 may refer rather to the events of Maccabæan times (B.C. 165) than to 586. (2) Other allusions to social and political conditions, such as the frequent division of the Jews into religious parties, with the use of terms like 'the poor,' 'the pious' (Chasidim) as party names; but this and other such allusions are differently interpreted and weighed by different scholars. (3) Language such as that of, e.g., Pss 116. 139; style and language in many other Psalms is less conclusive though (granted certain previous conclusions) not without weight. (4) Dependence upon exilic and post-exilic writings: e.g. Pss 93. 96-100 almost certainly, and Ps 57 most probably, imply familiarity on the part of the writer with much of Is 40-66. (5) The presence of certain religious ideas which were not developed till late in the history of Israel's religion. There is much variety of judgment as to the number of Psalms and the particular Psalms shown by these criteria to be late, but, as previously stated, it is admittedly large. Strictly speaking, indeed, these criteria determine the date of those sections only to which they apply, not necessarily that of the entire Psalm; and if it can be shown that the obviously post-exilic sections in any particular Psalm are interpolations, the rest of the Psalm may be (but, of course, by no means necessarily is) pre-exilic. Dr. Briggs in his Commentary has carried the hypothesis of interpolation far, using as his test certain theories of metre and strophe.

What, then, are the positive criteria for pre-exilic Psalms or pre-exilic elements in Psalms which may show in parts obvious signs of post-exilic origin? Failing such criteria, the Psalms cannot be shown to be considerably earlier than the post-exilic collections in which they have come down to us. The criterion of pre-exilic date most relied on is an allusion to the king; from the fall of Judah in B.C. 586 down to B.C. 105, when Aristobulus I. assumed the title of king, there was no native king of Judah.

Now, since in, e.g., Pss 20, 21 the allusion to the king cannot satisfactorily be explained of a foreign monarch, and these Psalms cannot be thrown as late as b.c. 105, it appears to follow that they originated before 586. Other Psalms alluding to a king who cannot well be a foreigner, or have lived so late as b.c. 105, are Pss 2, 18, 28, 45, 61, 63, 72. Yet there still remains a question of interpretation: Is the king in these Psalms an actual contemporary individual, or the Messianic king whether regarded as an individual or as the royal people of Israel (cf. JQR, 1895, p. 658 ff.)? If the latter interpretation is correct (as, e.g., in the case of Ps 2 at least, it probably is), the value of the allusion as a criterion of pre-exilic date vanishes; for a reference to a king who is not a person of history but an ideal conception is not less probable in a post-exilic than in a pre-exilic poem. Further, a purely proverbial allusion to the king, such as occurs in Ps 33⁶, furnishes no valid criterion for pre-exilic origin, nor does an allusion to kings in the plural (e.g. Ps 119⁴ 143¹¹).

If, as the previous remarks should have suggested, it is in most cases only possible to determine whether a Psalm is pre-exilic or post-exilic on evidence somewhat widely applicable, and in many cases impossible to determine even this quite decisively, it should be clear that the attempt to fix the authorship or dates of Psalms very precisely must generally prove fruitless. Are there any that can be referred, even with great probability, to a particular occasion as that of their origin, or to a particular writer? The mere fact that a Psalm may appear to us suitable to a particular occasion, as, e.g., Ps 46 to the deliverance from Sennacherib in 701, does not necessarily prove that it even refers to it, still less that it was written at the time; the question arises, Is the occasion in question the only one to which the terms of the Psalm are applicable, or are those terms sufficiently specific to render it improbable that the Psalm might have fitted other occasions unknown to us, or but partially known? Thus Pss 44, 74, 79, 118 presuppose conditions which resemble what is known of the period of the Maccabean revolt (cf. 1 Maccabees), more closely than what is known of any other period, and on that ground they have been assigned by many to the Maccabean period; the question is, Are the descriptions so specific that they might not also correspond to the conditions of the middle of the 4th cent. b.c. (to which other scholars have referred Pss 44, 74, 79) if we were equally well informed with regard to these?

5 The question of Davidic Psalms.—The question of authorship retains an interest only with reference to David. The theory that David was the author of Psalms can be traced back as far as the time (not to be dated very precisely, but centuries at least after David's time) when the historical notes were added in certain Psalms to the title 'of David' (see above). Whether it goes back further (except in the case of Ps 18=2 S 22; see below) to the time of the origin of the collection entitled 'of David' is less clear, for it is by no means certain that the similar title 'of the chief musician' referred to authorship (see above). Still, we may consider the argument which, based on the assumption that it did, is to the effect that if so many Psalms (as 73 in the Hebrew text, more in the Greek text, and all in later Jewish tradition) were attributed to David, some must actually be his, though many so entitled are demonstrably and admittedly not. In a word, where there is much smoke, there must have been some fire. The argument at best does not seem to justify more than a strong probability that David wrote psalms; and possibly the fact that David was a famous poet, even though all his poems more nearly resembled 2 S 19²⁷ than the Psalms, coupled with his fame as a zealous worshipper of Jahweh, may be the extent of the historical fact underlying the late traditions. But even granted that the evidence were strong enough to justify the statement that some Psalms of David are preserved in the Psalter, the most important problem still remains to be solved, viz. which Psalms in particular are David's? It will be found on an examination that the positive reasons assigned for regarding any particular Psalm as David's are inconclusive; they often amount to nothing more than an argument that there is nothing in such and such Psalms which forbids us to ascribe them to David. There are some Psalms which in whole or in part may not be incompatible with what we know of David's life, but the allusions are too general to enable us to deny that they are equally applicable to many other lives. The Psalm which is most generally claimed for David by those who go beyond the general argument and specify particular Psalms as his, is Ps 18; but many who hold this to be in the main David's feel compelled to treat vv. 20-27 as later. An external argument in favour of the Davidic authorship of this Psalm has often been sought in the fact that it appears in 2 S 22 as well as in the Psalter; but the argument is of little value; it carries us back, indeed, beyond the evidence of the Psalm-titles, but the Books of Samuel were composed long after David's time, and 2 S 22 occurs in a section (2 S 21-24) which shows signs that entitle us to conclude that it was inserted after the main work was complete. We may safely conclude thus: There are Psalms in the Psalter of which, if we may remove certain parts as later interpolations, a residuum remains of which it would be unjustifiable to assert that it was not written by David.

6. Character of the contents; the 'I' of the Psalms.—But if we cannot determine the authors of the Psalms, or the particular occasions out of which they sprang, we may yet ask, and ought to ask, What type of persons wrote them, what type of experiences do they embody, with what type of subject do they deal? In order to answer these questions, it will be necessary to discuss briefly an important principle of interpretation.

A considerable proportion of the Psalms describe, from the writer's standpoint, the experiences or aspirations or the religious faith of the nation or of the religious community—whether this community be co-extensive with the nation or a group or party within it. The Psalms which most obviously belong to this class are those in which the pronoun of the first person plural is used. These are some 27 in number (see Pss 21, 33, 46, 47, 48, 50, 60, [both vv. 1-4 and 5-12 = 108⁶⁻¹³] 65, [in v. 3^a Vulg. and LXX read 'us' for 'me'] 67, 79, 80, 81, 90, 95, 98, 99, 100, 105, 113, 115, 117, 124, 126, 132, 136, 144, 147). In another group of 25 Psalms (viz. Pss 8, 17, 22, 40, 44, 59, 62, 66, 68, 71, 74, 75, 78, 84, 85, 89, 94, 103, 106, 116, 118, 122, 135, 137, 141) the personal pronoun is sometimes in the first singular, sometimes in the first plural; this interchange is not perhaps to be always accounted for in the same way; but in some of these Psalms it is obviously the main purpose of the writer to describe the experiences of the nation (cf. e.g., Pss 44, 74, 78). Another group of Psalms not so easily defined as the two preceding, but including some 22 Psalms at least (Pss 1, 12, 14, (= 53) 15, 19¹⁻⁶ 24, 29, 34, 72, 76, 82, 93, 96, 97, 107, 112, 114, 125, 127, 133, 134, 148, 149, 150), are as little limited to individual experience as the first: they are, for example calls to praise God for His goodness, or descriptions of the character which is pleasing to God. The remainder of the Psalms, about (yet barely) half the whole number, appear superficially, in contrast to the foregoing, to describe the experiences or aspirations of some individual. They are written in the first person singular. But in one Psalm, owing to its peculiar structure, the Psalmist supplies the interpretation of the pronoun of first singular, and in this case the singular pronoun refers, not to an individual, but to the nation (see Ps 129⁹). The personification of the nation as an individual which underlies this usage occurs often in Hebrew literature (see SERVANT OF THE LORD, § 5). How far does it extend in the Psalter? Is the much afflicted subject of other Psalms written in the first person an individual, or, like the much afflicted subject of Ps 129, Israel? For instance, does the author of the words, 'Thou wilt not abandon my soul to Sheol, nor suffer thy holy one to see corruption' (Ps 16¹⁰), express the conviction that he himself will never see death (for it is this and not resurrection that the words imply), or that Israel will never cease to be? Does the author of Ps 51 make confession of purely personal sins (vv. 1-5), and look forward as an individual to a missionary career (v. 13), or, like the authors of La 1¹⁸⁻²², Is 63^{7-64¹²}, does he, identifying himself with his people, make confession of national sins? It is impossible either to discuss this fully here, or to attempt to determine how far the use of 'I' = Israel extends beyond Ps 129. One other feature of the Psalms which superficially appear to describe the experiences of the individual may be noted: many of them break off into perfectly obvious prayers for the nation (e.g. Ps 25²²⁻²⁸), or into appeals to the community as a whole to participate in the writer's experience or aspirations (cf. e.g. Ps 30^{1-32¹¹}). These departures from the apparently individual tenor of the rest of the Psalm are sometimes treated as glosses; and they may be such. Not all of these Psalms need have the same origin: some may have been originally written as national confessions, some, originally of a more exclusively individual character, may have been fitted for use by the community, by the addition of liturgical verses and the elimination of what was too limited to be of general applicability.

Summary.—The conclusion to be drawn even from this brief survey of the origin of the Psalter and the character of the Psalms may be stated thus:—The Psalms as we have received them are sacred poems that reflect more or less clearly the conditions of the post-exilic Jewish community and express its varying religious feelings and aspirations, in origin some of these Psalms may go back to the pre-exilic period, some may originally have sprung out of circumstances peculiar to an individual; but in consequence of editing by the successive compilers of the post-exilic hymn-books through which the Psalms have come down to us, most of the peculiarly pre-exilic or individual characteristics which may have distinguished them originally have been largely obliterated.

7. Religious value and influence of the Psalter.—Probably no book of the OT has exercised a more profound and extensive influence over succeeding ages than the Psalms. Among the Jews, indeed, the Law has received a more persistent and greater attention; but the place of the Psalms in the history of the Christian Church and in Christian experience is typified by the frequency with which they are quoted in the NT. To trace this influence, or to illustrate it as Mr. Prothero has so excellently done in his volume entitled The Psalms in Human Life, falls outside the scope of this article. All that can be attempted, and even that but very inadequately, is to indicate some of the leading religious ideas, some of the striking religious qualities of the Psalms. And in doing this it is necessary to emphasize clearly the fact that such ideas and qualities are by no means common to all the 150 or more poems which were written by an indefinite number of writers, and were gathered together in our Psalter. What alone is aimed at here is to draw attention to some of the qualities that are at least frequently present, and some of the ideas which frequently or strikingly appear—to the ideas and qualities which have in large measure been the cause of the great and persistent influence which the Psalms have exercised.

(1) The Psalms occupy a peculiar position in the OT literature in consequence of their character. The Law codifies the customs of Israel which had received the approval of Jahweh; the Historical Narratives relate Jahweh's dealings with Israel; the Prophets deliver Jahweh's message to Israel, and in the Psalms Israel replies. These distinctions are of course broadly drawn, and we may find, for example, in Jeremiah (e.g. 20⁷⁻⁹) 'contentions' with Jahweh that may besomewhat closely paralleled in the Psalms; or, again, the facts that faced the author of the Book of Job are discussed, for example, in Pss 37, 49, 73, though more briefly, and in the case of Pss 37 and 49 less penetratingly. Yet it is true that in the main the Psalter contains the prayers and praises of Israel, and that they have become classical and stimulating examples for later generations.

(2) But if in the Psalms Israel speaks to God, it speaks as one who has been taught by the Prophets. The Prophets stood alone, or supported by but a small company of disciples, addressing a deaf or gainsaying nation; the Psalmists identify themselves either with their whole people or at least with a numerous, if oppressed, community. The Prophets upbraid the people with forgetting Jahweh, with forsaking Him for other gods; the Psalmists find difficulty in accounting for the calamities that have come upon their nation, which has not forgotten God, but suffers for its very loyalty to Him (e.g. Ps 44²⁰ [render 'If we had forgotten,' etc.]). The prophet of the Exile endeavours to awaken Israel to its destiny as a missionary nation (Is 40-55; cf. art. SERVANT OF THE LORD); the Israel of many of the Psalms has accepted the rôle (e.g. 47, 51, 100). But a full discussion of the manifold influence of the Prophets on the Psalmists is impossible here.

(3) We turn now to the Psalmists' belief in God; and here it must suffice to draw attention to two features—the breadth of the conception, and the intensity of the consciousness, of God. The early belief of Israel that other gods besides Jahweh existed has left traces in the Psalter, but is probably nowhere present as a living belief. Some of the Psalmists use phrases that originally sprang from a belief in other gods (e.g. 77¹⁹ 95²), but the mere use of such phrases proves nothing as to the actual belief of a later generation that may continue to employ them; we continue to use them ourselves; and often the Psalmists refer to other gods only in order to emphasize Jahweh's supremacy (89⁶⁻⁸ 96¹), or to imitate the arguments with which the Deutero-Isaiah had ridiculed the gods of the nations out of existence (e.g. 115, 135). A deeper effect of the earlier belief may probably be seen in what is in any case a conspicuous and permanently influential feature of the Psalms—the intimacy of the consciousness of God. In Israel the monotheistic idea sprang, not from an abstraction of what was common to many gods previously or still worshipped, but from the expansion of the thought of the same one God whom alone Israel had previously worshipped. While Israel believed the gods of other nations to be real beings set over against Jahweh, it was natural for them to feel a peculiarly close relation to Jahweh, to look upon Him as their possession; the belief in other gods perished, the sense of Jahweh as a close and intimate Personality survived; and not a little of the enduring power of the Psalms is due to the vivid apprehension of God that resulted. Jahweh is the 'living God' as opposed to the unrealities that have been taken by other peoples as gods. Supreme in Nature (Pss 8, 104, 93) as in History (and such He is to many at least of the Psalmists), Jahweh nevertheless remembers and visits man (Ps 8); He abides though all else perishes (e.g. Pss 46, 102), and to those who possess Him all else sinks into insignificance (Ps 73²⁴).

At times, indeed, this sense of possessing Jahweh obscures for the Psalmists the full meaning of Jahweh as the one and only God of the whole world and of all mankind. Not all the imprecatory Psalms, as they are termed, show a sense of the universality of Jahweh's relations. But in others the universal note rings clear (sec. e.g., Pss 47, 65, 67, 100).

(4) This brings us to another feature of the Psalms which has contributed to the influence exercised by them—the hope that is in them, their Messianic outlook.

they look beyond the present which for the writers is often full of oppression and affliction, to a future which is sometimes described with some fulness (e.g. Ps 72), but is often merely suggested by the call on God to arise, to awake, to reveal Himself; or by some other brief but pregnant phrase. We cannot here discuss how far the Psalms anticipate a particular Messianic individual; it must suffice to say that the original sense of many passages has been obscured by specific applications to the life of Christ—applications which in some instances have been built on a very questionable Hebrew text or an illegitimate translation, and that in some Psalms (e.g. Ps 2) the 'Messiah' is perhaps rather the nation of Israel, supreme among the nations of the world (cf. Dn 7), than an individual ruler or deliverer, whether of Israel or of the world. But where fuller expression is given to the hope, it often takes the form of the establishment of the Kingdom of God, without reference to any other king than God Himself; the overruling thought is of the manifestation of His supreme sovereignty and the consequent promotion of righteousness and equity among all people (so pre-eminently Pss 96-100). Even in the broadest form of this thought, it is true that Israel occupies a central position and Zion is to become for the whole world what it has long been for Israel—the centre of religion, the place where Jahweh will be worshipped (cf. esp. Ps 87). No Psalmist has attained to the standpoint of our Lord's teaching in Jn 4th.

(5) From the thought of the Psalmists about God and their hope in Him, we may turn to their thought of men, which is for the most part primarily of Israel, and in particular to their sense of sin.

Judged by their attitude towards sin, the Psalms fall into two great groups: the extreme representatives of each group are very different in thought, tone, and temper; the less extreme approximate more or less closely to one another. In the one group the writers claim for themselves, and, so far as they identify themselves with Israel, for their nation, that they are righteous, and in consequence have a claim on God's righteousness to deliver them from present afflictions (so, e.g. Pss 7, 17, 26, 28, 44, 86). In the other group, confession is made of great iniquity; the appeal for help, if made, can be made to God's mercy and lovingkindness alone (see Pss 25, 32, 40, 51, 65, 85, etc.). The first group stand far removed from the early Prophets; but they have considerable resemblance in thought to Habakkuk; the second group, again, differ from the early Prophets, for though both recognize the sinfulness of Israel yet the Prophets complain that Israel does not recognize its sin, whereas these Psalms make confession of sin on behalf of the nation (cf. the late confession in Is 63⁷-64¹²).

(6) The view taken of sin in both groups of Psalms is best appreciated by noticing how, with all their difference, they are yet related. Some sense of sin is perhaps never altogether absent from the Psalms that lay claim to righteousness, and a strong sense of relative righteousness generally accompanies the most fervent confession of sin. Even in such Psalms as the 32nd and the 51st, where the difference is most clearly felt between God's standard and man's performance, the sense is also present of a sharp difference between those who, in spite of sin, yet pursue after righteousness, and those who constitute the class of 'the wicked' or 'the transgressors.' This attitude towards sin might doubtless without much difficulty become that of the Pharisee in the parable; but it is also closely akin to the highest Christian consciousness, in which the shadow of sin shows darkest in the light of the righteousness and love of God as revealed in Christ, and which leads the truest followers of Christ, with all honesty, to account themselves the chief of sinners. And it is because the penitential Psalms are confessions, not so much of grosser sins open to the rebuke of man, but of the subtler sins which are committed in the sight of and against God only, of the sins which stand in the way of the nation called of God fulfilling its missionary destiny that these Psalms have played so conspicuous a part in forming the habit and moulding the form of the confession of the Christian man and the Christian Church.

On the poetical form of the Psalms, see POETRY and ACROSTIC. The first edition of T. K. Cheyne's Book of Psalms (1882) with its fine original translation and terse notes full of insight, is one of the best books the student can use; in the second edition the translation is based on a very radical re-construction of the Hebrew text, which has not obtained general approval. Other translations are Wellhausen-Furness's in the Polychrome Bible and S. R. Driver's Parallel Psalter (Prayer-Book version and a revised version based thereon). The most important Com. in English is by C. A. Briggs (ICC, 1906-7). Other useful commentaries are W. F. Cobb (with independent translation), Kirkpatrick on AV (in Cambridge Bible), and W. T. Davison and T. W. Davies on RV (Century Bible). The most exhaustive treatise on the literary criticism and religious thought of the Psalter is T. K. Cheyne's Origin of the Psalter (1891; many details implicitly withdrawn or corrected in the author's later writings; see, e.g., art. 'Psalms' in EBI). For briefer treatment of the literary questions see W. R. Smith's chapter (vii.) on the Psalter in OTJC, and S. R. Driver's LOT.

PSYCHOLOGY.—The Bible does not contain a science of psychology in the modern sense; but there is a definite and consistent view of man's nature from the religious standpoint. This being recognized, the old dispute, whether it teaches the bipartite or the tripartite nature of man, loses its meaning, for the distinction of soul and spirit is not a division of man into soul and spirit along with his body or flesh, but a difference of point of view—the one emphasizing man's individual existence, the other his dependence on God. The account in Gn 2⁷ makes this clear. The breath or spirit of God breathed into the dust of the ground makes the living soul. The living soul ceases when 'the dust returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit returns to God who gave it' (Ec 12⁷). The soul is not, as in Greek philosophy, a separate substance which takes up its abode in the body at birth, and is released from its bondage at death, but is matter animated by God's breath. Hence no pre-existence of the soul is taught (except in Wis 7¹⁴⁻²⁰), nor is the future life conceived as that of a disembodied soul. Man is the unity of spirit and matter; hence the hope of immortality involves the belief in the resurrection of the body, even though in St. Paul's statement of the belief the body raised is described as spiritual (1 Co 15⁴). The OT has not, in fact, a term for the body as a whole; the matter to which the spirit gives life is often referred to as 'flesh.' This term may be used for man as finite earthly creature in contrast with God and His Spirit. Man is 'flesh,' or 'soul,' or 'spirit,' according to the aspect of his personality it is desired to emphasize. The varied senses in which these terms are used are discussed in the separate articles upon them; here only their relation to one another is dealt with. These are the three principal psychological terms; but there are a few others which claim mention.

Heart is used for the inner life, the principles, motives, purposes (Gn 6⁵, Ps 51¹⁰, Ezk 36², Mt 15⁸, 2 Co 3³), without precise distinction of the intellectual, emotional, or volitional functions; but it can never, as the preceding terms, be used for the whole man. St. Paul, influenced probably by Greek philosophy, uses nous for mind as man's intellectual activity (Ro 7²³⁻²⁵), and even contrasts it with the ecstatic state (1 Co 14¹⁴⁻¹⁵), and adopts other terms used in the Greek schools. Another Greek term, synderesis, rendered 'conscience,' is used in the NT consistently for what Kant called the practical reason, man's moral consciousness (Ac 23¹ 24¹⁶, Ro 2¹³ 9¹ 13⁹, 1 Co 8⁷ 12¹⁰⁻¹³, 27, 28, 29, 2 Co 1¹² 4¹, 1 Ti 15. 19 39 42, 2 Ti 11, Tit 11, He 99. 14 102¹³, 1 P 29³⁰, 21), and is an instance of the influence of the Stoic ethics on 'the moral vocabulary of the civilized world at the time of the Christian era.' This distinction of the intellectual and the moral functions of personality is the nearest approach in the NT to the modern science; but the analysis is not carried far. It must be observed that in poetic parallelisms 'soul,' 'spirit,' 'heart' are often used as synonymous in contrast to 'flesh' (Ps 63⁸⁴; Ec 11¹⁰ 12⁷, Ezk 44⁷ 9). The Bible distinguishes the material and the immaterial, the creature and the creature, man in his individuality and his dependence on God, but always in the religious interest, that he may recognize his own insufficiency, and his sufficiency in God. ALFRED E. GARVIE.

PTOLEMAIS (Ac 21⁷).—The same as Acco (Jg 13¹), now the port 'Akka, called in the West, since Crusading times, Acre or St. Jean d'Acre. Acco received the name Ptolemais some time in the 3rd cent. B.C., probably in honour of Ptolemy II., but although the name was in common use for many centuries, it reverted to its Semitic name after the decline of Greek influence. Although so very casually mentioned in OT and NT, this place has had as varied and tragic a history as almost any spot in Palestine. On a coast peculiarly unfriendly to the mariner, the Bay of 'Akka is one of the few spots where nature has lent its encouragement to the building of a harbour; its importance in history has always been as the port of Galilee and Damascus, of the Hauran and Gilead, while in the days of Western domination the Roman Ptolemais and the Crusading St. Jean d'Acre served as the landing-place of governors, of armies, and of pilgrims. So strong a fortress, guarding so fertile a plain, and a port on the highroad to such rich lands to north, east, and south, could never have been overlooked by hostile armies, and so we find the Egyptian Thothmes III., Seti I., and Rameses II., the Assyrian Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal, and several of the Ptolemys engaged in its conquest or defence. It is much in evidence in the history of the Maccabees,—a queen Cleopatra of Egypt holds it for a time, and here some decades later Herod the Great entertains Caesar. During the Jewish revolt it is an important base for the Romans, and both Vespasian and Titus visit it. In later times, such warriors as Baldwin I. and Guy de Lusignan, Richard Cœur de Lion and Saladin, Napoleon I. and Ibrahim Pasha are associated with its history.

In the OT it is mentioned only as one of the cities of Asher (Jg 12¹), while in Ac 21⁷ it occurs as the port where St. Paul landed, 'saluted the brethren, and abode with them one day,' on his way to the new and powerful rival port, Caesarea, which a few decades previously had sprung up to the south.

The modern 'Akka (11,000 inhabitants) is a city, much reduced from its former days of greatness, situated on a rocky promontory of land at the N. extremity of the bay to which it gives its name. The sea lies on the W. and S., and somewhat to the E. The ancient harbour lay on the S. and was protected by a mole running E. from the S. extremity, and one running S. from the S.E. corner of the city. Ships of moderate dimensions can approach near the city, and the water is fairly deep. The walls, partially Crusading work, which still surround the city, are in the ruined state to which they were reduced in 1840 by the bombardment by the English fleet under Sir Sidney Smith. Extending from Carmel in the south to the 'Ladder of Tyre' in the north, and eastward to the foothills of Galilee, is the great and well-watered 'Plain of Acre,' a region which, though sandy and sterile close to the sea, is of rich fertility elsewhere. The two main streams of this plain are the Nahr Na'mān (R. Belus), just south of 'Akka, and the Kishon near Carmel.

Under modern conditions, Haifa, with its better anchorage for modern steamships, and its new railway to Damascus, is likely to form a successful rival to 'Akka.

PTOLEMY V. (Epiphanes).—'Ptolemy' was the dynastic name of the Macedonian kings who ruled over Egypt B.C. 305-31; during the whole of this period Egypt was an independent country; it was not until the great victory of Augustus at Actium (B.C. 31) that Egypt again lost her independence and became a province, this time under Roman rule. Ptolemy V. reigned B.C. 205-182. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus III. the Great; this matrimonial alliance between the Ptolemys and the Seleucids is alluded to in Dn 2¹⁹. During his reign Palestine and Coele-Syria were lost to Egypt, and were incorporated into the kingdom of Syria under Antiochus III.; this is probably what is alluded to in Dn 11¹³⁻¹⁶; see Jos. Ant. XII. III. 3, iv. 11.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

PTOLEMY VI. (VII.) (Philometor).—Son of the foregoing, who reigned B.C. 182-146; in 170 the kingdom was divided between him and his brother Ptolemy VII. (Physcon); peace was made between them by the Romans, and they continued as joint kings. In the year 170, while Ptolemy VI. was still sole king, he attempted to reconquer the Syrian provinces which had been lost during his father's reign; the attempt was, however, abortive, and he was defeated by Antiochus IV. It was only through the intervention of the Romans that Antiochus was prevented from following up this victory by further conquests. References to Philometor are to be found in 1 Mac 1¹⁸ 10¹⁰, 11¹⁻¹⁸ 15¹⁶⁻²², Dn 11²⁻³⁰; and see Jos. Ant. XIII. IV. 5-9.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

PUAH.—1. One of the Hebrew midwives (Ex 1¹⁶). 2. Father of Tola (Jg 10¹). In Gn 46¹³, Nu 26²³ [Puvah], 1 Ch 7¹, he is Tola's brother.

PUBLICAN.—This term is a transliteration of a Latin word, which strictly meant a member of one of the great Roman financial companies, which farmed the taxes of the provinces of the Roman Empire. The Roman State during the Republic relieved itself of the trouble and expense of collecting the taxes of the provinces by putting up the taxes of each in a lump to auction. The auctioneer was the ensor, and the buyer was one of the above companies, composed mainly of members of the equestrian order, who made the best they could out of the bargain. The abuses to which this system gave rise were terrible, especially as the governors could sometimes be bribed to wink at extortion; and in one particular year the provincials of Asia had to pay the taxes three times over. These companies required officials of their own to do the business of collection. The publicans of the Gospels appear to have been agents of the Imperial procurator of Judaea, with similar duties (during the Empire there was State machinery for collecting the taxes, and the Emperor had a procurator in each province whose business it was to supervise the collection of revenue). They were employed in collecting the customs dues on exports. Some Jews found it profitable to serve the Roman State in this way, and became objects of detestation to such of their fellow-countrymen as showed an impotent hatred of the Roman supremacy. The Gospels show clearly that they were coupled habitually with 'sinners,' a word of the deepest contempt.

A. SOUTER.

PUBLIUS, or Poplius.—The 'first man' of Malta, whose father was cured by St. Paul of fever and dysentery by laying on of hands (Ac 28⁷⁻⁹). The title Prōtos ('first man') at Malta is attested by inscriptions; it occurs also at Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13¹⁰, cf. 25²).

A. J. MACLEAN.

PUDENS.—Mentioned by St. Paul as sending greetings from Rome to Timothy (2 Ti 4²¹): 'Pudens and Linus and Claudia'. For the suggested relationship of these persons and identification of the first and of the last, see art. CLAUDIA. Pudens is a common Roman name. A. J. MACLEAN.

PUL.—1. See ASSYRIA AND BABELYONIA, p. 66.
2. In Is 66¹² Pul is prob. a slip for Put (wh. see).

PULSE (zēd'ntm, Dn 1¹²; zēd'ntm, v. 16 RVm 'herbs,' cf. Is 61¹¹ EV 'things that are sown') may have been any garden produce. The Eng. word 'pulse' belongs to leguminous grains specially, but it is doubtful whether the meaning of the Heb. can be so restricted. In 2 S 17²⁸ 'pulse' is supplied after 'parched,' but 'grain' would be better. See also FOOD, § 3.

PUNISHMENTS.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, §§ 8-11.

PUNITES.—The gentilic name from Puvah, Nu 26²³. See PUAH, No. 2.

PUNON.—A station of the Israelites (Nu 33⁴², 43). Cf. also art. PINON.

PUR.—See PURIM.

PURAH.—Gideon's servant or armour-bearer Jg (7^{10f.}).

PURGE.—To 'purge' in AV is simply to 'cleanse or purify,' as Ps 51⁷ 'Purge me with hyssop and I shall be clean'; Mk 7¹⁹ 'purging all meats,' i.e. making all food ceremonially clean.

PURIFICATION.—See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

PURIM.—1. In the OT.—On the 14th and 15th of the month Adar (March) fell the celebration of the Feast of Purim or Lots. This commemorated the deliverance of the Jews from Haman, who in b.c. 473 had plotted their extermination throughout the Persian empire (Est 3⁷ 9¹⁵⁻³²). In 2 Mac 15³⁶ it is called 'Mordecai's day.' The observance of this festival was probably not at first universal, but Josephus mentions its occurrence, and it held an established position before the time of Christ. At first no special religious services were enjoined to mark it, nor was there any prohibition of labour. It was a time of feasting and joy, of the giving of presents and alms. In later times it was celebrated by a synagogue meeting on the evening of the 13th and the morning of the 14th, when the Book of Esther was read through, special prayers and thanks were offered, and the congregation ejaculated curses on Haman and blessings on Esther and Mordecai. The rest of the feast was given up to good cheer and boisterous enjoyment of an almost Bacchanalian character. In 1 Mac 7⁴⁸ and 2 Mac 15³⁶, as also in Josephus, the 13th of Adar is recorded as a feast-day in commemoration of the defeat of the Syrian general Nicanor in b.c. 161. But later ages observed it as the Fast of Esther (cf. Est 9³¹ 4³), the celebration taking place on the 11th, if the 13th happened to be a Sabbath.

The origin of the Purim feast is a matter of dispute. It is difficult to identify any known Persian word with pur (Est 3⁷ 9³¹), which gave the festival its name. Various theories have been put forward, of which the most noteworthy are: (a) that which derives it from a Persian spring festival; (b) that which regards it as a transformation of an old Zoroastrian festival of the dead; (c) that which traces its origin to a Babylonian New Year's festival.

2. In the NT.—Some have supposed that the nameless feast mentioned in Jn 5¹ was Purim. But this is not convincing, for (a) Purim was never one of the great national solemnities which called for attendance at Jerusalem: it was observed locally and not only at the capital; (b) Christ would naturally go up for the Passover in the next month. And it is more probable that the Passover is the feast here intended. Cf. art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, I. § 2. A. W. F. BLUNT.

PURITY.—1. Ceremonial purity is acquired by the due observance of external rites. The Jewish law prescribed various regulations by means of which outward defilement might be removed and the 'unclean' person be restored to fellowship with God. But the OT recognizes that moral purity is essential to acceptable worship of the Holy God (Ps 24⁴); the question of Eliphaz expresses the conviction of those who know how absolute is the Divine holiness: 'Shall a man be pure before his Maker?' (Job 4¹⁷ RVm); only to the man who 'purifies himself' can such a God reveal His glory (Ps 18², the verb is reflexive). The writer of the Ep. to the Hebrews reminds Christians who were familiar with the OT ceremonial of purification that the voluntary sacrifice of the Son of God is the means of purification under the new and better Covenant; 'the blood of Christ' removes the inward defilement which unfits sinful men for the service of the living God (9¹⁴).

2. In the NT 'pure' has the more restricted meaning of 'chaste' in a few passages. Underlying the true reading of 2 Co 11³, 'the simplicity and the purity that is toward Christ,' is the metaphor of v. 2 (RV), 'I espoused you to one husband, that I might present you as a pure virgin to Christ' (cf. Tit 2⁵, 1 P 3²). The same noun is tr. 'pureness' in 2 Co 6⁶ (RV); cf. 1 Ti 4¹² 5²; also, for the wider meaning of the verb, Ja 4⁸, 1 P 1¹², 1 Jn 3²; and of the adjective, Ph 4⁸, 1 Ti 5², Ja 3¹⁷. See, further, art. HOLINESS. J. G. TASKER.

PURPLE.—See COLOURS, § 5.

PURSE.—See BAG.

PUT, PHUT.—A people counted amongst the sons of Ham (Gn 10⁶, 1 Ch 1⁸), and frequently mentioned in the prophets as an ally of Egypt (Jer 46⁹, Ezk 27¹⁰ 30⁵ 38⁴, Nah 3⁹). It has been suggested that it represents (1) the people of Punt (rather Pwone in Egypt.), i.e. the African coast of the Red Sea with Somaliland, etc.; warriors may perhaps have been obtained thence for Egypt; or (2) Libya, whose people were called by the Egyptians Paial (in the times of the Hebrew prophets the Libyans were the backbone of the semi-native army); or (3) the bow-bearing allies pidati (?); (4) being generally associated with Lud = Lydians (once in Nah. Luoin), it is thought that Put may be a name for the Carians or other pre-Hellenic peoples of Asia Minor or the Aegean islands. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

PUTEOLI (modern Pozzuoli).—In ancient times an important harbour and emporium, especially for Eastern trade, on the W. coast of Italy near Naples. It was founded by Greeks at a very early period. Such cities were specially sought by Jews and other foreigners, and Christians would early be living there, as St. Paul and his party found them on reaching this port at the end of their voyage from the East (Ac 28¹³). A. SOUTER.

PUTHITES.—A family of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2³⁴).

PUTIEL.—The father-in-law of Eleazar (Ex 6²⁵).

PUVAH.—See PUAH.

PYGARG (dīshōn).—A 'clean' animal, Dt 14⁵ only. From its associates in the same verse it may be inferred that it was a deer of some kind. The LXX tr. is, on what grounds is not known, pygargos, i.e. 'white-rumped' (hence the Eng. 'pygarg'). This description and a process of exclusion—the hart, roebuck, etc., all being otherwise accounted for—make it probable that the dīshōn was the addar (A. nasomaculatus), an antelope with a white tail and long, backward-curved, twisted horns. It is rare in Palestine to-day, but is known to the Bedouin. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

PYRRHUS.—A man of Berea, father of Sopater, according to the best text (Ac 20⁴ RV). For the unusual insertion of the patronymic, see art. SOPATER.

A. J. MACLEAN.

PYTHON.—In Ac 16¹⁶ we read of a young girl at Philippi who had 'a spirit, a Python' (this is the reading of all the best MSS). Python was a district close to Delphi; and Python was the serpent at that place slain by Apollo, who therefore was called 'the Pythian.' Hence the priestess at Delphi was called 'the Pythian.'

QUAIL

This seems to be the connexion of the name with divination. Plutarch says that ventriloquists in his day (1st cent. A.D.) were called 'Pythons.' Their powers were considered to be due to spiritual influence, and to include prediction. The girl at Philippi, then, was probably a ventriloquist, who brought her masters gain by soothsaying. She proclaimed aloud for many days that Paul and his companions were slaves of the Most High God, and the Apostle at last drove out the spirit 'in the name of Jesus Christ.' Her masters thereupon, having lost their source of profit, denounced Paul and Silas to the magistrates. A. J. MACLEAN.

Q

QUAIL (sēldw, Ex 16¹⁴, Nu 11¹¹, Ps 105⁴⁰).—This bird (Coturnix communis), the smallest of the partridge family, migrates annually from Africa to Europe, crossing the Sinaitic peninsula and Palestine en route; it reaches the latter about March. It migrates in vast numbers, always flying with the wind, and often settling, after a long flight, especially across the sea, in such an exhausted condition as to be easy of capture. The flesh is fatty, and apt to disagree if taken to excess, especially if inefficiently preserved.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

QUARREL.—The original meaning of this Eng. word (from Lat. querela) is a 'complaint.' This is its meaning in Col 3¹ AV 'If any man have a quarrel against any.' Then it came to mean any cause of complaint, or any case that had to be stated or defended, as Mk 6¹⁹ 'Herodias had a quarrel against him'; so Lv 26²⁸, 2 K 5⁷.

QUARRY.—In the story of the slaughter of Eglon by Ehud (Jg 3) we are told (v. 12) that Ehud turned back from 'the quarries that were by Gilgal,' while after the assassination he 'escaped while they tarried, and passed beyond the quarries' (v. 28). An alternative translation 'graven images' is given in AVm and RVm, while other versions, e.g. LXX and Vulg., read 'idols.' The Heb. word pēstīm is applied to images of gods in wood, stone, or metal (Dt 7⁵, 28 12¹, Is 21⁹ 30²², 2 Ch 34⁴). Moore suggests the translation 'sculptured stones (probably rude images).' Probably the stones set up by Joshua to commemorate the crossing of the Jordan (Jos 4) are what is referred to.

'Quarry' occurs also in RV of 1 K 6⁷. The stones used for the Temple building are said to have been prepared 'at the quarry.' AV reads 'before it was brought thither,' RVm 'when it was brought away.' The translation 'quarry' is probably correct.

W. F. BOYD.

QUARTUS.—Mentioned as joining in St. Paul's greeting to the Church of Rome (Ro 16²³).

QUATEERNION.—A guard of four soldiers (Ac 12⁴).

QUEEN.—The functions of a queen reigning in her own right would be identical with those of a king (wh. see). The queen as the wife of a monarch in Israel held a position of comparatively little importance, whereas that of a dowager-queen ('queen-mother') commanded great influence (cf. the cases of Bathsheba, Jezebel, Athaliah).

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Heb. m'lekketh hash-shāmayim).—An object of worship to the people of Jerusalem (Jer 7¹⁸⁻²⁰) and the Jewish exiles in Egypt (44¹⁶⁻²⁰). The Massorettes evidently took the first word as m'lekketh ('work,' 'creation')—supposing that the silent aleph (') had been omitted—and considered the expression a synonym for 'Host of Heaven' (tsēbhā hash-shāmayim, Jer 8² 19¹, Zeph 1⁵, Dt 4¹⁹ 17³ etc.). In apparent confirmation of this view we have the fact that this term seems to be used in a collective sense as equivalent to 'other gods.' On the other hand, many modern scholars regard malikath ('queen') as the correct reading, and suppose the cultus to be a worship of the Semitic Mother-goddess, the Phœnician Ashtart = the Assy. Ishtar (see ASHTORETH). Indeed, Ishtar is called in Assy. inscriptions Bēlīt Shamē ('lady of heaven') and Sharrat Shamē ('queen of heaven'); but Malikath Shamē (which is the cognate of the term under discussion, and which in Assy. means 'princess of heaven') is not one of her titles. The fact that cakes were offered in this worship has little evidential value, as we find this rite a frequent feature in Semitic worship. In Arabia, cakes were offered to the goddess of the evening-star and to the sun-god; and the Israelites offered bread and cakes to Jahweh (see 'Meal-offering' and 'Shewbread' in art. SACRIFICE). Cf. the modern Jewish mazzōth. W. M. NESBIT.

QUICK, QUICKEN.—In AV 'quick' frequently means 'living,' and 'quicken' means 'bring to life.' The phrase 'the quick and the dead' occurs in Ac 10⁴², 2 Ti 4¹, 1 P 4⁶.

QUICKSANDS (Ac 27¹⁷, RV Syrtes).—The Syrtes, Major and Minor, are situated on the N. coast of Africa, in the wide bay between the headlands of Tunis and Barca. They consist of sandbanks occupying the shores of the Gulf of Sidra on the coast of Tripoli, and that of Gabes on the coast of Tunis or Carthage. They have been considered a source of danger to mariners from very early times, not only from the shifting of the sands themselves, but owing to the cross currents of the adjoining waters.

QUIRINIUS (AV Cyrenius).—In Lk 2¹⁻³ we are first met by a grammatical difficulty. V. 7 may be translated either: 'this was the first enrolment that took place (and it took place) while Quirinius was governing Syria'; or: 'this was the first of two (or more) enrolments that took place while Quirinius was governing Syria.' The first statement is probably true, but it is likely that the second is what the author meant, because it is certain that a census took place during the governorship of Syria by Quirinius (A.D. 6-9), when Judæa was incorporated in the province Syria. This latter census was a basis of taxation, and was made according to the Roman method: it thus aroused the rebellion of Judas (Ac 5³⁷). The fact that enrolments took place every fourteen years in Egypt has been absolutely proved by the discovery of numerous papyri there, containing returns made by householders to the government. One of the dates thus recovered is A.D. 20. There is also evidence in the ancient historians of enrolments held in certain other provinces. The truth of Luke's statement in 2² need not therefore be doubted. The real difficulty lies in the statement that Quirinius was governing Syria at the time the first census of all was made. It is quite certain that he could not be governing Syria, in the strict sense of the term governing, both at the time of the birth of Christ and in A.D. 6-9. This is contrary to all ancient procedure, and the rules as to such appointments were rigid. Further, we have ancient authority that the governor of Syria from B.C. 9 to 7 was Sentius Saturninus, and from B.C. 6 to 4 was Quinctilius Varus. After B.C. 4 we know nothing till the succession of P

QUIT

Sulpicius Quirinius in A.D. 6, but it is possible that an inscribed stone may yet turn up to enable us to fill the gap. Yet an inscription exists, which all authorities agree refers to P. Sulpicius Quirinius, stating that he governed Syria twice. Mommsen considered that the most probable period for his earlier governorship was A.C. 8-1, but admitted serious doubts. Ramsay has discussed the whole problem afresh, following out the clues offered by the ancient historians, and has adopted as most probable the conclusion that Quirinius was given command of the foreign relations of Syria during the critical period of the war with the Cilician hill tribe the Homonadenses. Roman history provides analogies for such a dual control of a province at a time of crisis. The date at which this position was held by Quirinius was about A.C. 6. The Greek word used (governing) is a general term applied to the Emperor, a proconsul, a procurator, etc., and is quite consistent with this view. The mention of Quirinius by Luke is merely intended to give a date. The enrolment itself, as it took place in Herod's kingdom, would be superintended by him, at the orders of Augustus, who had suzerainty over the kingdom of Herod, which constituted part of the Imperium Romanum in the full sense of the term. The census, however, was not carried out by the Roman method, but by tribes, a method less alien to Jewish feeling than the Roman method by households. Cf. also p. 559^b.

A. SOUTER.

QUIT.—The adj. 'quit' (from Lat. quietus) means 'free from obligation,' as Ex 21⁹ 'Then shall he that smote him be quit.' The vb. 'to quit' (from Lat. quietare) is used in AV reflexively—quit oneself, i.e. discharge one's obligations, as 1 Co 16¹³ 'Quit you like men.'

QUIVER.—See ARMOUR, 1 (d).

QUOTATIONS (IN NT).—The NT writings contain quotations from four sources: (1) the OT; (2) non-canonical Jewish writings; (3) non-Jewish sources; (4) letters to which the author of a letter is replying, or other private sources. It is significant of the relation of the NT writings to the OT Scriptures and of the attitude of the NT writers to these Scriptures, that the quotations of the first class far outnumber all those of the other three classes. Swete counts 160 passages directly quoted from the OT by writers of the NT, including those which are cited with an introductory formula, and those which, by their length or accuracy of quotation, are clearly shown to be intended as quotations. Westcott and Hort reckon the total number of NT quotations from the OT at 1279, including both passages formerly cited and those in which an influence of the OT upon the NT passage is otherwise shown. Even this list is perhaps not absolutely complete. Thus, while WH enumerate 61 passages from Is 1-39, H. Osmond, in his essay Quotations from the OT in the NT, finds exactly twice as many—122. Against this large number of quotations from the OT there can be cited at the utmost only some 24 quotations by NT writers from non-canonical Jewish sources (see Ryle, art. 'Apocrypha' in Smith's DB; Zahn, Com. on Gal 3⁹ 5⁶ 6⁴; Woods, art. 'Quotations' in Hastings' DB). Of quotations from non-Jewish sources the following are the only probable instances: Tit 1², Ac 17²⁸, 1 Co 12¹²⁻²⁷ 15³. To this short list it should be added that Luke's preface (1¹⁻⁴) is perhaps constructed on classical models (cf. Farrar, Life and Work of Paul, Excursus 3; Zahn, Evd. 1. p. 51). Of quotations from private sources there are several unquestionable examples in the Pauline letters; 1 Co 7⁸ 11² 17⁶ 12¹, Ph 1² 2²⁶ 4¹⁴⁻¹⁸; cf. also Philem⁵⁻⁷.

Of the numerous quotations from the OT by far the largest number are derived directly from the LXX, even the freedom of quotation, which the NT writers in common with others of their time permitted themselves, in no way obscuring their direct dependence upon the Greek version. Among the NT books the Epistle to the Hebrews shows the strongest and most constant influence of the LXX. According to Westcott (Com. p. 479), 15 quotations agree with the LXX and Hebrew, 8 with the LXX where it differs from the Hebrew, 3 differ from LXX and Hebrew, 3 are free renderings. Westcott adds that 'the writer regarded the Greek version as authoritative, and . . . nowhere shows any immediate knowledge of the Hebrew text.' The Gospel of Matthew, on the other hand, exhibits the largest influence of the Hebrew. In the quotations from the OT which are common to the Synoptic Gospels (occurring chiefly in the sayings of Jesus) the LXX clearly exerts the dominant influence. But in those passages which are peculiar to this Gospel—being introduced by the writer by way of comment on events—though the writer is not unacquainted with or uninfluenced by the LXX, the Hebrew is the dominant influence; 1² 2¹⁸ 13. 22 41⁶ 81⁷ 121¹⁰ 135²¹ 27³⁴; cf. also 2⁸. This difference in the two groups of quotations tends to show that while the common source of the Synoptic Gospels was, in the form in which it was used by the Evangelists, in Greek, and shaped under Hellenistic influence, the author of the First Gospel was a Christian Jew who still read his Bible in Hebrew, or drew his series of prophetic comment-quotations from a special source compiled by a Jew of this kind. The quotations in the Gospel of John and the Epistles of Paul, while derived mainly from the LXX, show also an acquaintance of their authors with the original Hebrew. (On the singular fact that the NT quotations from the LXX show a special similarity to the type of LXX text found in Cod. A, cf. Staerk, Ztschr. f. wiss. Theol. Nos. XXXV, XXXVI, XXXVIII, XL; and Swete, Intro. to OT in Greek, p. 395.)

As regards the nature and extent of the influence exerted by the OT in passages which may be called quotations in the broad sense indicated above, there are several distinguishable classes, though it is sometimes difficult to draw the line sharply. We may recognize: (1) Argumentative quotations. The OT passage is quoted, with recognition of its source, and with intention to employ the fact or teaching or prophecy for an argumentative purpose. Passages so quoted may be: (a) historical statements which are supposed to contain in themselves an enunciation of a principle or precept, or to involve a prediction, or to tend to prove a general rule of some kind; cf. Mk 2²¹, Mt 2¹⁸, Jn 19²⁴, Mt 15⁷⁻⁹, He 7¹⁻¹⁰; (b) predictions; cf. e.g. Ac 2¹⁷; (c) imperative precepts, quoted to enforce a teaching; Mk 12²⁹, 1 Co 9²; or (d) affirmations interpreted as involving a general principle of Divine action or a general characteristic of human nature; Mk 12²⁹, Mt 9¹³, Lk 4¹, Ac 7¹⁴, Ro 3¹⁰⁻¹⁸, Ja 1¹⁰, 1 P 1²¹. (2) Quotations made the basis of comment. In this case the language of the OT is not cited as supporting the statement of the speaker or writer, but is itself made the basis of exposition or comment, sometimes with disapproval of its teaching or of the teaching commonly based on it; Mt 5²¹ 27. 31 etc., Ro 4¹, Ac 8². (3) Quotations of comparison or of transferred application. The OT language is employed, with recognition of it as coming from the OT and with the intention of connecting the OT event or teaching with the NT matter, but for purposes of comparison rather than argument. The language itself may refer directly and solely to the OT event, being introduced for the sake of comparing with this event some NT fact (simile); or the OT language may be applied directly to a NT fact, yet so as to imply comparison or likeness of the two events (metaphor); Mt 12¹⁰ 4¹, Lk 11²¹, Ac 28²¹, Mt 21⁴², 1 Co 10⁷. Closely allied to these, yet perhaps properly belonging to the class of argumentative quotations are cases of quotation accompanied by allegorical interpretation; cf. e.g. Gal 4²¹⁻³¹. (4) Literary influence. In the cases which fall under this head the language is employed because of its familiarity, and applicability to the matter in hand, but without intention of affirming any other connexion than this between the OT thought and the NT fact or teaching. The writer may be conscious of this influence of the OT language or not, and the interpreter often cannot determine with certainty which is the case; Mt 5¹⁰, Gal 6¹⁶, Eph 1²⁰, Rev 5⁷ 9¹⁴ 14⁵ 21¹¹.

As concerns the method of interpretation and the attitude towards the OT thus disclosed, there is a wide difference among the speakers and writers of the NT. It is an indirect but valuable testimony to the historical accuracy of the Synoptic Gospels that they almost uniformly ascribe to Jesus a method of interpretation quite different from that which they themselves employ. Jesus quotes the OT almost exclusively for its moral and religious teaching, rather than for any predicative element in it, and interprets alike with insight and with sobriety the passages which He quotes. The author of the First Gospel, on the other hand, quotes the OT mainly for specific predictions which he conceives it to contain, and controls his interpretation of the passages quoted rather by the proposition which he wishes to sustain, than by the actual sense of the original. The one quotation which is common to the first three Gospels, and not included in the teaching of Jesus, has the same general character (Mk 1³ and parallels). In general it may be said of the other NT writers that they stand in this respect between Jesus and Matthew, less uniformly sober and discerning in their interpretation of the OT than Jesus, yet in many instances approaching much nearer to His method than Matthew commonly does. The Apocalypse, while constantly showing the literary influence of the OT, contains no explicit or argumentative quotation from it. ERNEST D. BURTON.

R

RAAMAH is called (Gn 10⁷—1 Ch 1⁴ [Raama]) a son of Cush, and father of Sheba and Dedan (Gn 10²⁸). The locality of this Arabian tribe is not yet ascertained. Opinion is divided between the Regma of Ptolemy, on the W. of the Persian Gulf, and the Rammanita of Strabo in S. Arabia, N.W. of Hadramaut (see HAZAR JAVETI) and E. of the ancient Sheba. The latter is the more probable identification. Raamah is also associated with Sheba in Ezk 27²² as trading with Tyre.

J. F. McCURDY.

RAAMIAH.—One of the twelve chiefs who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7⁷—Ezr 2² [Reelaiah], 1 Es 5⁸ [Resaias]).

RAAMESSES, RAMESES.—One of the treasure cities built by the Israelites in Egypt, and the starting-point of the Exodus (Ex 11¹ 12³⁷, Nu 33³ 4⁵). The site is not quite certain, but it was probably one of the cities called in Egypt. P-Ra-messe, 'House of Ramesse,' after Rameses II. In Gn 47¹¹ Joseph, by Pharaoh's command, gives to Jacob's family 'a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Ramesse.' It thus lay in the Land of Goshen (wh. see), and is to be looked for in the first place in the Wady Tumilat. Petrie identifies it with Tell Rotab, where he has found sculptures of the age of Rameses II. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

RABBAH.—1. The capital city of the Ammonites (wh. see). Rabbah was situated on the upper Jabbok on the site of the modern 'Ammān. It was distant from the Jordan about 20 miles, though the distance by way of the Jabbok is much greater, for the stream at Rabbah flows towards the N.E. and reaches the Jordan only after a wide detour. The Ammonite city was situated on the hill-top to the N. of the river. From its position it commanded a wide view in all directions, but especially extensive to the N.E. Rabbah is mentioned in Dt 3¹ as the place where Og's 'bedstead' might still be seen. This is thought by some to be a reference to a large dolmen still visible not far from 'Ammān. In Jos 13²⁵ Rabbah is mentioned in defining the boundaries of the tribe of Gad. The chief event connected with Rabbah which the OT relates is its siege by Joab, in connexion with which Uriah the Hittite, by the express direction of king David, lost his life (see 2 S 11¹ 12²⁶ 21²² and 1 Ch 20¹). The city was at this time confined apparently to the hill mentioned above, and since the sides of the hill are precipitous (see the photograph in Barton's Year's Wanderings in Bible Lands, opp. 156), the task of capturing it was difficult, and the siege was stubborn and prolonged.

These conditions gave Joab his opportunity to carry out David's perfidious order (2 S 11¹⁶).

From 2 S 12²⁸⁻²⁹ it appears that the city consisted of two parts, one of which was called the 'royal city' or the 'city of waters.' This Joab captured, after which David came and captured Rabbah itself. What relation this 'royal city' bore to Rabbah proper, it is difficult now to conjecture. It is probable, however, that the text of Samuel is corrupt—that we should read 'city' or 'cistern of waters'—and that Joab, like Antiochus III. and Herod in after centuries, captured the covered passage by which they went to a cistern for water, or the fort which defended it, and so compelled a surrender to David. This cistern was discovered by Conder (see Survey of Eastern Pal. p. 34 ff.).

The Israelites did not occupy Rabbah, but left it in the possession of the Ammonite king, who became David's vassal. When David later fled to Mahanaim, east of the Jordan, because of Absalom's rebellion, the Ammonite king was residing in Rabbah (2 S 17²⁷).

In the time of Amos (c. b.c. 750) Rabbah was still the capital of the Ammonites (Am 1¹⁴), and such it continued to be down to the time of Nebuchadnezzar, who, if we may judge from the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel (Jer 49², Ezk 21²⁰ 25⁵), punished Rabbah for a rebellion of the Ammonites by a siege. Whether the siege resulted in a capture we do not know, but it probably did. Only cities situated like Tyre, which was partly surrounded by water, could withstand the might of that monarch.

For a time the city (one of the Decapolis group) bore the name Philadelphía, given to it by Ptolemy Philadelphus (b.c. 285–247), but finally received its modern name, Ammān. It is to-day quite a flourishing city, named partly by Arabs and partly by Circassians. The latter form a more energetic element than is found in most Syrian cities, and give 'Ammān a greater air of prosperity. The Haj railway, from Damascus to Mecca, passes near 'Ammān, which has a station on the line.

2. A city in Judah (Jos 15⁶⁵); site unknown.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

RABBI.—The transliteration of a Heb. word meaning 'my master.' In Mt 23¹ it is referred to as 'the usual form of address with which the learned were greeted' (Dauman, Words of Jesus, p. 331); in the following verse it is regarded as synonymous with 'teacher.' John the Baptist is once called 'Rabbi' by his disciples (Jn 3²⁶). Elsewhere in the Gospels it is our Lord who is thus addressed: by His disciples (Mt 26²⁵ 4⁶, Mk 9⁵ 11² 14⁴⁵, Jn 13⁵ 4⁹ 4³¹ 9² 1¹⁴), by others (Jn 3² 6²⁵). Rabboni is the transliteration of the Pal.-Aram. form of the word; it occurs twice, namely in Mk 10⁶¹ and Jn 20¹⁶.

J. G. TANKER.

RABBITH.—A town of Issachar (Jos 19²⁰), probably the modern Rāba, on the S. of Gilboa.

RABBONI.—See RABBI.

RAB-MAG.—The title of Nergal-sharezer, a Babylonian official present at the taking of Jerusalem (Jer 39³, 13). For various conjectures as to the origin of the title see Hastings' DB, s.v. Tentatively adopting the oldest and most obvious account, that it means 'chief magus,' we note here that the name magus may very well have been applied to a sacred caste employed in Babylon long before it became associated with Zoroastrianism, to which the silence of the Avesta shows it was originally foreign. See MAGI.

JAMES HOPE MOULTON.

RAB-SARIS.—1. The title of an Assy. official who was sent by Sennacherib to Hezekiah to demand the surrender of Jerusalem (2 K 18¹⁷). 2. The title borne by two Bab. officials, one of whom is recorded to have been present at the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, while the other is mentioned among the officials who ordered the release of Jeremiah after the capture of the city (Jer 39³, 13). Rabsaris is the transcription, both in Heb. and Aram., of the Assy. and Bab. title rabā (or rubā-sha-rēshu, borne by a high court-official, who may perhaps have been the 'chief eunuch,' though his office cannot be determined with absolute certainty.

L. W. KING.

RAB-SHAKKH.—The title of an Assy. officer, who with the Tartan and the Rab-saris was sent by Sennacherib to Hezekiah to demand the surrender of Jerusalem (2 K 18¹⁷, is 36 f.). The word is the Heb. transcription of the Assy. rab-shaqē—a title borne by a military officer of high rank, subordinate to the Tartan. L. W. KING.

RACA.—A term occurring only in Mt 5². It is a Semitic word, probably a popular pronunciation of the Rabbinic rēqā, a noun formed from the adjective rēq 'empty.' Several instances of its use occur in the Talmud as a term of contempt applied to a person devoid of education and morals. From Mt 5² it may be inferred that it was employed as a term of abuse in the time of Christ.

While the general force of our Lord's words in Mt 5² is clear enough, the significance of the judgments referred to is obscured in the present text. A distinction has been drawn between 'Raca' as denying intellectual capacity, and 'thou fool' as denying a man's religious worth, which cannot be sustained. Our Lord's reference to the 'Council' (i.e. the supreme Jewish Court, the Sanhedrin) in v. 2, implying its possession of the power of life and death, is especially difficult. The Sanhedrin possessed no such power in fact, nor is it at all likely that our Lord would recognize the validity of such a claim on its behalf even in theory. It was after all only a provisional institution devised by the Rabbis; whereas the 'Gehenna of fire' is a Messianic judgment.

The true meaning and real antithesis emerge clearly if a slight re-arrangement of the text, first suggested by J. P. Peters (in JBL x. (1891) 131f., xv. (1896) 103; adopted in the EBI, s.v. 'Raca,' vol. iv. col. 4001), is accepted. The clause about 'Raca' should be transferred to v. 2. Read then: 'Ye have heard that it was said to the ancients, Thou shalt not murder, and whosoever murders is liable to the judgment, and whosoever says "Raca" to his brother is liable to the Sanhedrin; but I say unto you, whosoever is angry with his brother is liable to the (Divine) judgment, and whosoever says "thou fool" is liable to the Gehenna of fire.' Rabbinic law is very stringent against libellous expressions, which were to be treated as serious offences liable for punishment to the supreme court (like murder).

RAHAB

RACAL in 1 S 30²⁹ is prob. a mistake for 'Carmel' (No. 1).

RACE.—See GAMES, p. 282b.

RACES.—The following is a list of the races mentioned in the Bible, so far as they are identified. They are classified according to modern ethnological principles. In Gn 10, cities are frequently classed as tribes or patriarchal personages.

I. ARYANS (sons of Japheth, Gn 10).—1. Greeks (Ro 1¹⁴ etc.). 2. Javan (Ionian Greeks). 3. Parthians (Ac 2⁹). 4. Persians (Est 1¹⁰ etc.). 5. Medes (Madai). 6. Romans (Jn 11¹⁸ etc.).

II. HAMITES.—1. Egyptians (Mizraim). 2. Cushites (Nubians, Ethiopians). 3. Libyans (Put (Somaliland)).

III. SEMITES.—1. North Semites: (a) Babylonians (Shinar, Acad, Babel, Erech); (b) Assyrians (Asshur, Nineveh, Calah); (c) Aramæans (Syrians); (d) Canaanitish peoples—(1) Ammonites, (2) Amorites, (3) Canaanites, (4) Edomites, (5) Hivites, (6) Israelites, (7) Jebusites, (8) Moabites, (9) Phœnicians (Tyre, Sidon, Arvad, etc.). 2. South Semites: (a) North Arabs—(1) Amalekites, (2) Ishmaelites (Kedar, Nebaioth, Tema, etc.). (3) Midianites; (b) South Arabs (Sheba).

IV. UNCLASSIFIED RACES.—1. Cimmerians (Gomer, Gimiral of Assy. inscriptions). 2. Elamites. 3. Hittites. 4. Horites. 5. Philistines. 6. Tubal (the Tubali of Assy. inscriptions). 7. Meshech (Muski of Assy. inscriptions).

GEORGE A. BARTON.

RACHEL (Rahel in Jer 31¹⁵ AV, 'ewe').—The younger daughter of Laban, and favourite wife of Jacob (Gn 29²⁸⁻³⁰), who married her after her sister Leah. In the quarrel between Jacob and Laban, she, as well as Leah, took the part of Jacob (31¹⁴⁻¹⁶). When leaving her father, she stole his household divinities, the teraphim (31¹⁹)—an incident which suggests the laxity in worship and in ideas of property characteristic of the times. Her sons were Joseph and Benjamin; she died in giving birth to Benjamin.

Rachel's grave.—The location of this is disputed. It was near Ephrath. Gn 35¹⁵, 19, 20, 1 S 10², Jer 31¹⁵ indicate that it was on the N. border of Benjamin towards Ephraim, about ten miles N. of Jerusalem. In other places, however (Ru 1² 4¹¹, Mic 5²), Ephrath is another name for Bethlehem, as it is also explained in Gn 35¹⁹ 48⁷. In accordance with this latter group of passages, tradition from at least the 4th cent. has fixed the spot 4 miles S. of Jerusalem and 1 mile N. of Bethlehem. Either the northern location is correct, or there are here two variant accounts. The former view is probably to be preferred, since Rachel has no connexion with Judah. In that case 'that is Bethlehem' is an incorrect gloss. Cf. also RAMAH, 3.

GEORGE R. BERRY.

RADDAI.—The fifth son of Jesse (1 Ch 2¹⁴).

RAFTS.—See SHIPS AND BOATS.

RAGAU.—See following article.

RAGES.—The modern Rai, 6 miles S.E. of Teheran, one of the seats of the ancient Iranian civilization, but now a mass of fallen walls and stupendous ruins covered with mounds of débris. Its position near the Caspian Gates gave it great strategic importance. It was the capital of Media before Ecbatana, and has the distinction of having been the home of the mother of Zoroaster. It is frequently mentioned in the Apocrypha. In Tobit (1¹⁴ 4¹, 20 5² 6¹³ 9²) it was visited by the angel Raphael, and there he recovered for Tobias the deposit of silver which his father had placed there. In Judith (15¹⁶) it is said that in Ragau (evidently the same place) Nebuchadnezzar slew in battle 'Arphaxad' prince of the Medes. In To 6² read Ecbatana for Rages.

J. F. M'CURDY.

RAGUEL.—1. See REUEL, 2. 2. The father of Sarah, the wife of Tobias (To 3⁷, 17, 18 14¹⁵).

RAHAB ('wide').—1. The story of this woman, called a harlot, of Jericho is given in Jos 2. The two spies sent out by Joshua to view the Promised Land came first to the house of Rahab, in Jericho. The king hears of it, and bids Rahab bring them forth; but she asserts that they have left her house and that she does not know where they have gone; she had, however, previously hid them among stalks of flax upon the roof. After their pursuers have left, Rahab comes to them, professes her belief in Jahweh, and adjures them to spare her and her kinsfolk when the attack on Jericho is made; this they promise shall be done; and after arranging that a scarlet thread is to be hung from her window, in order to denote which house is to be spared when the sack of the city takes place, the two spies escape from her house by a rope (Jos 2). The promise is duly kept, and Joshua spares her when the city is burned (6²²⁻²⁵). In Mt 1⁵ Rahab is mentioned in the genealogy of our Lord.

2. A name for the Dragon, applied also to Egypt. This name is not the same as that just considered, which is written Rachab in Hebrew, while this is written Rahab. It is the name given to a mythological monster who is frequently referred to in the Bible. In Is 30⁷ the old myth that Jahweh in the beginning subdued Rahab (= Tihom, the 'Great Deep', the Bab. Tiamat) is employed to show that Jahweh will in like manner subdue Egypt (cf. Ps 87¹), and that it is therefore vain for Judah to trust to it. The words in RV, 'Rahab that sitteth still,' imply that Rahab had been subjugated, but not annihilated, i.e. it was believed that Rahab was still living somewhere in the depths of the sea; the final destruction is referred to in Rev 21¹ 'And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth are passed away; and the sea is no more.' The next reference to Rahab is in Is 51⁹⁻¹⁰, a very important passage, which shows distinctly that Rahab, the Dragon, the sea or the 'Great Deep' (Tihom), are all names for one and the same monster. The belief is also expressly stated that in 'the days of old' there was a conflict between Jahweh and Rahab, and that the latter was overcome. Further references to the Rahab-myth are to be found in Ps 89⁹⁻¹⁰, Job 9¹³ 26¹⁰⁻¹¹; it is important to note how in all these passages the myth is treated as well known, it is taken for granted that the reference is perfectly understood. [See, further, DRAGON, LEVIATHAN, SEA.] W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

RAHAM.—A descendant of Caleb (1 Ch 24⁴).

RAHEL.—See RACHEL.

RAIMENT.—See DRESS.

RAIN.—The Palestine year is divided roughly into two parts—the rainy and the dry. The first rains after the summer begin to fall in November, though showers in October are not unknown; and the weather continues intermittently wet until the following March, or sometimes till April. As a rule the first rainfalls, which are accompanied by heavy thunderstorms, are followed by comparatively fine weather, broken by occasional wet days, after which, towards the end of the rainy season, there are again heavy successions of rain-storms. The agricultural value of this division is obvious, and it is recognized by the expressions 'former' and 'latter' rains which we meet with in the Biblical writings. The first rains soften the iron-bound soil, baked hard, so to speak, by the summer heat, and so make it fit for ploughing; the comparatively fine intervals give the husbandman time to sow; and the second showers water the seed. The average annual rainfall in Jerusalem is about 28 inches, though this is subject to much variation. In the winter of 1904-1905 nearly 40 inches fell. Such very wet winters are nearly always followed by an epidemic of malaria in the succeeding summer.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

RAINBOW.—In Gn 9¹¹⁻¹⁷ (P) the rainbow appears as the token of the covenant between God and Noah. As the covenant is universal, so is its sign. The Heb. of v. 13 is ambiguous as to whether the rainbow is conceived of as created for the first time (see RVm). Though from a scientific point of view this is absurd, it may well have been part of the primitive tradition. Perhaps, however, all that is meant is that the rainbow received a new significance as the symbol of mercy. Its appropriateness is obvious: the storm passes, and the sun casts its beams over the still clouded sky, marking its return by one of the most beautiful phenomena of nature. So God renews His favour after He has hidden His face for a season. But there may be a further mythological significance. The rainbow may be J's war-bow (Ps 71¹ Hab 3⁹⁻¹¹) which He has laid aside; the Heb. word is the same. So 'it is to the Hindu the bow of Rama, and to the Finn the bow of Ternes the Thunderer, who slays with it the sorcerers who hunt after men's lives' (Tylor, Primitive Culture, i. p. 298). It is, indeed, prominent in all mythology. To the Greek it is a portent, or Iris, the messenger of the gods; in the Icelandic Edda it is the bridge connecting heaven and earth (cf. Wagner, Rheingold). It is uncertain whether it is alluded to in the Babylonian narrative of the Flood (see Driver, ad loc.). In Sir 43¹¹ the rainbow is one of the wonderful works of God; in 50⁷ it is a type of the glory of Simon. In Ezk 1²⁸ it surrounds the throne of God; so Rev 4³. If there is a reference to the Genesis narrative, it will be the symbol of mercy, possibly typified also by the 'emerald' to which it is compared, assuming that a green stone is meant (see Swete, ad loc.). But instead of the word for 'bow' found in the LXX, 'Iris' is substituted in Rev 4³, as in 10¹. Here evidently it is simply part of the picture, unless there is an allusion to the Greek conception of Iris as the messenger of the gods.

RAISINS (tsimmūqim, Nu 6⁵ [EV 'dried grapes'], 1 S 25¹⁸ 30¹², 2 S 16¹, 1 Ch 12¹⁶; āshīshim, Hs 3¹ RV, etc.; see FLAGON).—Raisins are now, as of old, prepared in great quantities in the Holy Land; the bunches are dipped in a strong solution of potash before being dried. Es-Salt, across the Jordan, has long been famous for the excellence of its stoneless raisins.

RAKEM.—See REKEM, 3.

RAKKATH.—A 'fenced city' of Naphtali (Jos 19³⁶). The later Rabbis placed it at or near Tiberias.

RAKKON.—This name in Jos 19³⁶ is prob. due to a textual error—a dittography from the latter half of Me-jarkon.

RAM.—1. An ancestor of David (Ru 4¹², Mt 1³ 4; in Lk 3³² Arni). In 1 Ch 2⁹ he is called the brother, but in vv. 27-28 the son of Jerahmeel. 2. The family to which Elihu belonged (Job 32²). Some have supposed that Ram is a contraction for Aram.

RAM.—See SHEEP, and (for battering-ram) FORTIFICATION AND SIEGE-CRAFT, 6 (c).

RAMAH.—The name of several places in Palestine, so called from their 'loftiness,' that being the radical meaning of the word. These are as follows:—

1. A city of Naphtali (Jos 19³⁶) not otherwise known, perhaps Rāmeḥ between Akka and Damascus, 8 miles W.S.W. of Safed. 2. A city of Asher (Jos 19²⁹) not elsewhere mentioned, and identified not improbably with kāmia, near Tyre. 3. A city of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁵) between which and Bethel was the palm of Deborah (Jg 4⁵); one of the alternatives which the Levite of Bethlehem had to choose for a lodging on his fatal journey (Jg 19¹²); yielded with Geba 621 men to the post-exilic census of Ezra (Ezr 2²⁶); re-settled by Benjamites (Neh 11²³). Its place is indicated between Geba and Gibeon in Isaiah's picture of the Assyrian advance (10²⁹). A tradition placed here the site of Rachel's tomb; this explains the allusions in 1 S 10², Jer 31¹⁵ (quoted in Mt 2¹⁸). Here Jeremiah was loosed from his chains (40¹). The name, and not improbably the site, of this place is preserved by a little village on a hillside north of Jerusalem known as er-Rām, which answers the geographical requirements of these incidents.

RAMAH (RAMOTH) OF THE SOUTH

Near it are some remarkable ancient monuments, known locally as 'The Graves of the Children of Israel,' which possibly are the 'tomb of Rachel' of the ancient tradition. This town was probably the home of Shimei, the Ramathite, David's vine-dresser (1 Ch 27²⁷). 4. A place in the district called Ramathaim-zophim (1 S 1¹), a (corrupt) name prob. = 'the two heights of the Zuphites.' The latter ethnic can hardly be dissociated from the name of the great high place of Mizpah (Neby Samuel). Its chief distinction is its connexion with Samuel. It was 'in the hill-country of Ephraim,' but might have been over the S. border of the tribe. Here Elkanah lived, and here was the headquarters of Samuel throughout his life (1 S 1¹⁹ 2¹ 7¹⁷ 8⁴ 15³⁴ 16¹³ 19¹³⁻²³ 20¹ 25¹ 28³). This is probably the Ramah fortified by Baasha against the Judahite kingdom (1 K 15¹⁷, 2 Ch 16¹), rather than the Benjamite Ramah: the latter being actually within Judahite territory would not have been accessible to him. This Ramah appears also in 1 Mac 11²⁴ as Ramathaim. No satisfactory identification of the Ephraimite Ramah has yet been proposed. It may be identical with No. 3. Rām-Allah, a large village about 12 miles N. of Jerusalem, would fairly well suit the requirements of the history, but there are no definite indications of antiquities there. 5. By the name Ramah allusion is made to Ramoth-gilead (wh. see) in 2 K 8²⁹ and the parallel passage 2 Ch 22⁵. 6. Ramath-lehi, the scene of Samson's victory over the Philistines with the jawbone (Jg 15⁷), is unknown. See LEHI. Ramah here is probably a common noun, and we ought to render it 'the height of Lehi.' 7. Ramath-mizpeh (Jos 13³⁰). See MIZPAH, No. 4. 8. Ramah (or Ramoth) of the South (Jos 19⁸). A town in the tribe of Judah, given to Simeon; to which David sent the spoil of Ziklag (1 S 30²⁷). It is quite unknown.

RAMIAH.—One of the sons of Parosh who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁵ [1 Es 9²⁶ Hiermas]).

RAMOTH.—1. A Gershonite Levitical city in Issachar (1 Ch 6⁵⁸ (73)), apparently = Remeth of Jos 19²¹ and Jarmuth of Jos 21²⁹. 2. For 'Ramoth of the south' see RAMAH, No. 8. 3. For 'Ramoth in Gilead' (Dt 4², Jos 20³ 21³⁰, 1 Ch 6⁶⁶ (86)) see RAMOTH-GILEAD.

RAMOTH-GILEAD, or 'Ramoth in Gilead' (cf. RAMAH, 5), was one of the cities of refuge (Dt 4⁴², Jos 20⁴), assigned to the Merarite Levites of Gad (Jos 21³⁸, 1 Ch 6⁶⁰). It was in the administrative district of Solomon's lieutenant Ben-gaber (1 K 4¹³); the scene of Ahab's last fight with the Syrians (1 K 22, 2 Ch 18) and of another battle with them fought by Ahab's son Jehoram, where he was wounded (2 K 8²⁸⁻²⁹, 2 Ch 22³); the place where Elisha's messenger anointed Jehu (2 K 9¹⁰). That it was a place of some sanctity is probable from its name ('the high places of Gilead'), and arguments, not altogether conclusive, have been offered in favour of its identification with Mizpeh, the place of the reconciliation of Jacob and Laban.

The attempt has plausibly been made to identify it with Gerasa, the modern Jerash—an extensive town in the ancient territory of Gilead, of unknown origin, whose ruins are still among the most striking east of the Jordan. For this identification several forcible arguments can be brought forward. An identification with another place Reimun, rests solely on the superficial similarity of the name, which is always an unsafe guide. Es-Salt is another suggestion. On the whole, however, Jerash is perhaps the most probable, though final decision must, as usual, be left to the test of excavation.

RAPHAEL ('God has healed') is the good angel of Tobit. In 3¹⁷ he is sent to heal Tobit, by restoring his sight; to give Sarah, daughter of his kinsman Raguel, to his son Tobias for wife; and to prevent the demon Asmodeus from adding him to the seven husbands he has already killed. In 5¹⁶ he appears as 'brother Azarias' to accompany Tobias on his journey to Media. Tobit despatches them with the parting 'May [God's] angel go with you' (v. 16, cf. v. 21), and they start with their dog (a favourite subject with the great painters). In 6²⁰ he directs Tobias to take the heart, liver, and gall of a fish, manages the marriage, binds the demon, fetches money from Rages, and heals Tobit. 12²²⁻²⁹ gives his description of himself, a passage which probably became the groundwork of later speculations. (1) He is one of the seven 'angels of the presence' (Lk 1¹⁹, Rev 8² [14⁷], Enoch 90). So in Enoch 20¹ he is one of the 'watchers,' the 'angel of the spirits of men.' The conception is usually traced to Persian influence; cf. the seven 'princes of light' of Zoroastrianism. (2) He is an intermediary, bringing the memorial of prayers before God (Rev 8³). The doctrine of the Divine aloofness made it hard to conceive that man could have direct access to the ear of God, any more than a subject could enter into the presence of an Oriental monarch, or that He could interfere directly in the petty affairs of men. See ANGELS. (3) He is also a guardian angel, being present at Tobit's good deeds, and the companion of Tobias. The long-maintained disguise is a unique feature; the 'eating and drinking' is explained as an illusion (12¹⁹). (4) He is true to his name, 'the healer'; cf. Enoch 10⁷, where he is ordered to bind Azazel (so 54), and heal the earth which the angels have defiled; and 40⁸, where he is 'set over the diseases and wounds of the children of men.' (5) In Enoch 22 he is a guide in Sheol; in 32, in Paradise.

RAPHAH.—See REPHALAH, 4.

RAPHAM.—An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8³).

RAPHON.—A city of Bashan (1 Mac 5³⁷), the Raphana of Pliny (HN, v. 16); the site has not been recovered.

RAPHU.—The father of the Benjamite spy (Nu 13⁹).

RASSES.—A people subdued by Holofernes (Jth 2²⁴).

RATHUMUS.—See RETHUM, 2.

RAVEN (ʿoreb, Arab. ghurāb).—An 'unclean' bird (Lv 11¹⁵, Dt 14¹⁴), numbers of which may always be seen gathered, together with the dogs, around the carrion thrown out into the valley of Hinnom (cf. Pr 30¹⁷). Its glossy plumage is referred to in Ca 5¹; it often dwells in the wilderness (Is 34¹¹), and yet God cares for and watches over it (Job 38⁴⁰, Ps 147⁹, Lk 12²⁴). The name ʿoreb is doubtless generic, and includes all the eight species of the Corvidæ known in Palestine.

RAVIN.—The vb. 'to raven,' i.e. prey upon, and the subst. 'raven' or 'ravin,' i.e. prey, both occur in AV. We find also the adj. 'ravening' (Ps 22³, Mt 7¹¹) as well as the form 'ravenous' (Is 35⁹ 46¹, Ezk 39⁴). 'Ravenging' is used as a subst. in Lk 11³⁰ 'Your inward part is full of ravenging and wickedness' (RV 'extortion').

RAZIS.—The hero of a narrative in 2 Mac 14²⁷.

RAZOR.—See HAIR and KNIFE.

REAH

REAH.—1. A Calebite family (1 Ch 4²), called in 2nd Harosh (wh. see). 2. A Reubenite family (1 Ch 5⁹). 3. A Nethinim family name (Ezr 2⁴⁷ = Neh 7⁵⁰ = 1 Es 5³¹ Jairus).

REAPING.—See AGRICULTURE, 3.

REBA.—One of the five kinglets of Midian slain by Moses (Nu 31⁵, Jos 13²⁴).

REBEKAH (in Ro 9¹⁰ Rebecca).—The daughter of Bethuel, the son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, and his wife Milcah (Gn 22²⁴). She was also the sister of Laban and became the wife of Isaac. The well-known story of the facts leading up to the marriage of Isaac and Rebekah is told in Gn 24, and gives valuable information as to early marriage customs. Isaac is not consulted. Abraham's servant Eliezer (Gn 15²) is sent to seek for a wife among his master's kinsfolk. The servant proceeds to the 'city of Nahor' (Haran), and, arriving at the gate of the city, waits by the well till the women come out to draw water (v. 11). He prays that God may prosper him and give him a sign by which he may recognize the woman Providence has set apart for Isaac. Rebekah comes out and offers to draw water for the stranger and his camels. The servant loads her with gifts, and her family, led by her brother Laban, being convinced of Abraham's wealth, and recognizing the will of Heaven in the selection, agrees to the marriage. Rebekah returns with the servant and becomes Isaac's wife (v. 67).

In Gn 25²¹ we are told that Rebekah, like many other favourite wives of the OT (e.g. Sarah, Rachel, Hannah), was at first barren, but in answer to Isaac's prayer Jacob and Esau were born (Gn 25²⁴⁻²⁶). Before their birth Rebekah received the oracle from Jehovah, that two nations were in her womb and that the elder should serve the younger. No doubt this story is a late Jewish legend, arising from the desire to find the history of the two peoples Israel and Edom foreshadowed in the lives of their progenitors.

Rebekah again comes before us during Isaac's sojourn in Gerar (Gn 26⁶⁻¹¹). Fearing lest the beauty of his wife might excite the desire of the king of Gerar and so lead to his own death, Isaac passed her off as his sister—a course of action which led him into difficulties with Abimelech (Gn 26⁹).

The destiny of Jacob, her favourite son, was strongly influenced by his strong-minded mother. She was the author of the treacherous plan by which Jacob deprived Esau of his father's blessing (Gn 27). She advised him to flee from his home to her brother Laban (Gn 27⁴³⁻⁴⁵). In Gn 28¹⁴, however, the motive of the journey is that he might take a wife from the family of his mother, in contrast to Esau, who had grieved his parents by taking a wife from among the Canaanites (Gn 26³⁴, 35). Rebekah died before Jacob's return from Haran, and her burial at Machpelah is mentioned in Gn 49³¹. The death and burial of Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah, who had followed her from Haran (24⁶⁹), are reported to have taken place after Jacob had returned to Canaan (Gn 35⁸).

The character of Rebekah has a peculiar charm and fascination. Appearing first as a pure, unselfish, loving girl, she becomes a woman of great strength of mind and depth of character. She is clever, active, energetic. She can make plans and carry them out, give orders and expect them to be obeyed, but her masterful spirit cannot brook opposition or contradiction. Esau's wives vex her beyond measure. When she loves, she loves with all her soul, and will spare no pains, consider no consequences, or grudge any sacrifice for those she loves. 'Upon me be thy curse, my son' (Gn 27¹³), is her answer to Jacob when he fears that a curse will fall on his deception. Although that curse fell and her beloved son had to flee and she saw his face no more, yet we forget the scheming, plotting woman in the loving wife and self-sacrificing mother. W. F. BOYD.

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM.—See CUSTOM(s), TRIBUTE.

RECHAB, RECHABITES.—1. Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, appears in 2 K 10¹⁶⁻²³ as a fervent supporter of Jehu's attack on the house of Ahab and his endeavour to root out the idolatrous worship which that dynasty had allowed. That his influence was a matter of some importance is clear from the prominent place which the new ruler gave him (2 K 10¹⁶, 23). The principles which actuated him are to be gathered from Jer 35, where his descendants refuse to drink wine because he had bidden them abstain from it, build no houses, sow no seed, plant no vineyard, but dwell in tents all their days. He evidently held that civilization and settled life inevitably led to apostasy from Jahweh, the ancestral Deity of his tribe. And the peril was a very real one, because of the inveterate popular belief that the local baals were the dispensers of all blessings pertaining to field and vineyard (Hos 2¹⁰⁻¹²). Hence it seemed to more than one of the prophets that the early, simple period of the nation's life, ere it became immersed in the Canaanite civilization, was preferable to all later developments (Jg 2¹, Hos 10¹). Again, the self-restraint of the Rechabites reminds us of the Nazirite vow (see NAZIRITE). But the latter did not include so many taboos. It permitted the cultivation of land and the building of houses. It was not binding on an entire clan. A genuine tradition is probably embodied in the Chronicler's statement (1 Ch 2⁴⁸), that the clan of the Rechabites was connected with the Kenites, and this would square admirably with the view that the Jahweh-religion was communicated to Israel by Kenite influence. Subsequently to Jeremiah we do not find more than two Biblical allusions to the clan in question, and one of these is doubtful. Neh 3¹⁴ reports that Malchijah, the son of Rechab, the ruler of part of Beth-haccerem, assisted in re-fortifying Jerusalem. But if he was a Rechabite by descent, he must have abandoned their principles. The men whom Jeremiah approached were but temporary sojourners, driven into the city through dread of the invader. This Malchijah was doubly a townsman, living in a country town, and interested in the metropolis. The title of Ps 71 in the LXX is: 'Belonging to David. Of the sons of Jehonadab and of the earliest captives, as though the exiles and the Rechabites agreed in appropriating this poem of sorrow and hope. Finally, it may be noted that later Rabbis found the fulfilment of Jer 35¹⁰ in those marriages of Rechabite maidens into priestly families, from which later priests sprang. Hegesippus relates that one of the Rechabite priests interceded in vain for the life of James the Just (Euseb. HE ii. 23).

RECONCILIATION.—The word 'reconciliation,' with its cognates, is a Pauline one, and is not found in the Gospels, or other NT writings. The chief passages in which it and related terms are employed are Ro 5¹⁰, 11 (RV), 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²⁰, Eph 2¹⁶, Col 1²⁰, 21. In He 2¹⁷, where the AV has 'to make reconciliation for the sins of the people,' the RV reads, more correctly, 'to make propitiation.' OT usage, where the word occasionally tr. 'reconcile' (Lv 6³⁰ etc.) is again more correctly rendered in RV 'make atonement,' throws little light on the NT term. The effect of propitiation is to remove the variance between God and man, and so bring about 'reconciliation.' The means by which this result is accomplished in the NT is the reconciling death of Christ (Col 1²⁰⁻²²). On the special questions involved, see art. ATONEMENT and REDEMPTION.

Perhaps better than any other, this term brings out in vivid form St. Paul's conception of the gospel. As proclaimed to men, the gospel is a message of 'reconciliation' (2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²⁰). It is a misunderstanding of the Apostle's meaning in such passages to suppose that the need of reconciliation is on man's side only, and not also on God's. Man, indeed, does need to be reconciled to God, from whom he is naturally alienated in his mind in evil works (Col 1²¹). 'The mind of the flesh is enmity against God' (Ro 8⁷), and this enmity of the carnal heart needs to be overcome. On this side, the 'ministry of reconciliation' is a beseeching of men to be reconciled to God (2 Co 5²⁰). But the very ground on which this appeal is based is that 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses' (v. 19). It is an essential part of the Apostle's teaching that sinners are the objects of a Divine judicial wrath (Ro 1¹⁸). They lie under a condemnation that needs to be removed (3¹⁰). They are described as 'enemies' in two passages (5¹⁰ 11²⁵) where the word is plainly to be taken in the passive sense of objects of wrath (cf. in Ro 11²⁸, the contrast with 'beloved'). It is this barrier to God's reconciliation with men that, in the Apostle's doctrine, Christ removes by His propitiatory death (Ro 3²⁵, Col 1²⁰). The ground on which men are called to be reconciled to God is: 'Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf; that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5²¹). Believers 'receive' a reconciliation already made (Ro 5¹¹ RV). The gospel reconciliation, in other words, has a twofold aspect—a Godward and a manward; and peace is made by the removal of the variance on both sides. See art. above referred to. JAMES ORR.

RECORDER.—See KING, 2 (6) (c).

RED.—See COLOURS, 3.

RED HEIFER.—The ashes of a 'red heifer'—more correctly a red cow—added to 'running water' formed the most powerful means known to the Hebrews of removing the defilement produced by contact with a dead body. The method of preparing the ashes and the regulations for the application of the 'water of impurity' (see below) are the subject of a special section of the Priests' Code (Nu 19). It will be advisable to summarize the contents of the chapter, in the first place, and thereafter to inquire into the significance of the rite in the light of recent anthropological research.

1. The chapter above cited consists of two parts; the first part, vv. 1-13, gives instructions for the preparation of the ashes, and (vv. 11-13) for the removal by their means of the defilement contracted by actual contact with the dead body. The second part, vv. 14-22, is an expansion of vv. 12¹, extending the application of 'the water of impurity' to uncleanness arising from a variety of sources connected with death.

The animal whose ashes acquired this special virtue had to be of the female sex, of a red, or rather reddish-brown, colour, physically without blemish, and one that had never borne the yoke. The duty of superintending the burning, which took place 'without the camp,' was entrusted to a deputy of the high priest. The actual burning, however, was carried through by a lay assistant, which fact, taken along with the detail (v. 8) that every particle of the animal, including the blood, was burned, shows that we have not to do here with a ritual sacrifice, as might be inferred from the EV of v. 9. The word there rendered 'sin-offering' properly denotes in this connexion (cf. 8⁷) 'a purification for sin' (Oxf. Heb. Lex. 310^a; cf. SACRIFICE, § 14). The priest's share in the ceremony was confined to the sprinkling of some of the blood 'toward the front of the tent of meeting' (v. 4 RV), in token of the dedication of the animal to J', and to the casting into the burning mass of a piece of cedar wood and a bunch of hyssop bound with a piece of scarlet cloth (such, at least, is the regulation of the Mishna treatise dealing with this subject).

A third person—the priest and his assistant having themselves become 'unclean' through contact with these sacred things (see below)—now gathered the ashes and laid them up 'without the camp in a clean place,' to be used as occasion required. The special name given to the mixture of 'running water' (v. 1⁷, lit. 'living water,' i.e. water from a spring, not a cistern) and the ashes is properly 'water of impurity' (v. 9. 13. 20. 21—so RVm; Amer. RV 'water for impurity'; EV water of separation), i.e. water for the removal of impurity or uncleanness. This powerful cathartic was applied to the person or thing to be cleansed, either by being thrown over them (see Gray, Com. on v. 12), or by being sprinkled with a sprinkler of hyssop (v. 18). This was done on the third and seventh days, after which the defiled person washed his person and garments, and was then restored to the privileges of the cult and the community. The only other reference to 'the water of impurity' is in the late passage, Nu 31²³.

2. The clue to the significance of the rite above described is found in the primitive conception of uncleanness, as this has been disclosed by modern anthropological research (see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN). In all primitive societies a dead body in particular is regarded as not only unclean in itself, but as capable of infecting with uncleanness all who come in contact with it or are even in proximity to it. The Semites shared these ideas with primitive communities in every part of the world. Hence, although the literary formulation of the rite of the Red Heifer in Nu 19 may be late, the ideas and practices thereof are certainly older than the Hebrews themselves.

While the central idea of the rite—the efficacy of ashes as a cathartic, due probably to their connexion with fire (cf. Nu 31²³, and Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, 101 n.)—has its parallels elsewhere, the original significance of several of the details is still very obscure. This applies, for example, to the red colour of the cow, and to the addition to her ashes of the cedar wood and hyssop and scarlet' (for various suggestions see, in addition to Gray, op. cit., Hastings' DB iv. 208 ff.; Bewer in JBL xxiv. (1905) 42 ff., who suggests that the cow may have been originally a sacrifice to the dead).

The value of the chapter for the student of Hebrew ritual lies in the illustration it affords of the primitive conceptions of uncleanness, especially of the uncleanness of the dead, and of the 'contagiousness of holiness,' the nature of which has been so clearly expounded by Robertson Smith (see RS² 446^f. 'Holiness, Uncleanness, and Taboo'). The ashes of the red heifer and the water of impurity here appear, in virtue of their intense 'holiness,' as 'a conducting vehicle of a dangerous spiritual electricity' (Farnell, op. cit. 95), and have the same power as the dead body of rendering unclean all who come in contact with them (see vv. 25. 21^f. and art. CLEAN AND UNCLEAN).

There are no inventions in ritual, it has been said, only survivals, and in the rite under review we have one of the most interesting of these survivals. The remarks made in a previous article (ATONEMENT (DAY OF)) are equally applicable to the present case. As re-interpreted by the compilers of the Priests' Code, the rite conveys, in striking symbolism, the eternal truth that purity and holiness are the essential characteristics of the people of God. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

RED SEA.—The body of water, over 1000 miles in length, which divides Africa from Arabia. The Biblical interest of the name centres at its northern end in its two projections, the Gulf of Suez, running north-west, and the Bay of Akabah almost due north. The former once extended much farther to the north, along the route of the present Suez Canal. Anciently it was known as the Gulf of Heroöpolis, running as far north as the Bitter Lakes. In this region it is probable that the passage of the sea described in Ex 14 took place, though it has been located by some at the present Suez, and by others still farther south.

This primitive extension of the gulf to the north the region of weeds, probably accounts for its name, Yam Suph, 'sea of weeds' (Ex 10¹⁹ 15¹), which was later applied also to the eastern extension, the Bay of Akabah (Nu 21⁴), to the entire body of water now known as the Red Sea, stretching from the Ras Mohammed southward to the straits, and perhaps even to the Persian Gulf (Ex 23³). No satisfactory explanation of the term 'red' (Gr. Erythra, Lat. Rubrum) has been found.

Biblical history is concerned with the western gulf (Suez, 130 m. long) only in connexion with the Exodus. Those who locate Mt. Sinai in the peninsula between the two gulfs, either at Mt. Serbal or at Jebel Musa, trace the route of the wanderings down the eastern shore of this water as far as Ras Abu Zenimeh, or (with Shaw, Pococke, etc.) as far as Tor, and then through the mountain wadis to Sinai. Those who locate the mountain of the Law farther north in the region north of Akabah, trace the wanderings directly eastward from the sea (Jg 11⁶).

The Bay of Akabah, 90 m. long, lies in the southern end of the long trench which extends from the Red Sea proper northward to the Lebanons, the upper portion of which is occupied by the Jordan and the Dead Sea. Between the latter and the Bay of Akabah lies the Arabah. At the northern end was an important maritime highway in the reign of Solomon. At the harbour of Ezion-geber (near to, or perhaps the same as, Elath), at its northern end, Solomon built his navy, with the help of Phœnician seamen (1 K 9²⁵), and sent out expeditions to India. Jehoshaphat was less successful (1 K 22⁴⁹).

H. L. WILLETT.

REDEEMER, REDEMPTION.—Redemption means in strictness deliverance by payment of a price or ransom, hence, metaphorically, at any great cost or sacrifice; but in the OT, outside the Law (especially in Deut., Psalms, Isaiah), is often used also of deliverance simply, as from oppression, violence, sickness, captivity, death—redemption by power. The typical redemption in the OT was the deliverance of Israel from Egypt (cf. Is 51⁹⁻¹¹).

Two words, with their derivatives, are used in the OT to express the idea. The one, gō'el (from which gō'el, 'redeemer'), is used technically of redemption of an inheritance, of tithes, and the like; in a wider sense it is a favourite term in the later Psalms and Deutero-Isaiah. The other, pādāh, is frequent in Deut. and in the earlier Psalms. The gō'el is the kinsman who has the right to redeem; the term is used also of the 'avenger of blood' (Nu 35¹² etc.); elsewhere, as in Job 19²⁵, Ps 139¹⁴ etc., but especially in Deutero-Isaiah, it denotes Jehovah as the vindicator, deliverer, and avenger of His people (cf. Is 40¹⁴ 43¹⁴ etc.). The NT, likewise, employs two words—one agorazō, 'to buy or purchase' (1 Co 6²⁰ 7²³, 2 P 2¹, Rev 5⁹ 14³ 4⁴; St. Paul uses a compound form in Gal 3¹³ 4⁴); the other, and more usual, lutroumai (from lutron, 'a ransom'), and its derivatives. The special Pauline word for redemption is apolutrōsis (Ro 3²⁴ 8²³, 1 Co 1³⁰, Eph 1⁷ etc.). In Ro 11²⁶ 'Deliverer' is used for the OT 'Redeemer' (Is 59²⁰).

In pious circles in Israel the coming Messianic salvation was viewed as a 'redemption' (Lk 24²¹), in which, possibly, political deliverance was included, but in which the main blessings were spiritual—knowledge of salvation, remission of sins, holiness, guidance, peace (Lk 17⁷⁻⁹). In Christ's own teaching the political aspect altogether disappears, and the salvation He brings in is something wholly spiritual. He connects it with His Person, and in certain well-known passages with His death (Jn 3¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 6⁵¹⁻⁵⁶, Mt 20²⁸ || and 26²⁸⁻²⁹ || etc.). In the Apostolic teaching (Acts, Paul, Peter, Heb., Rev.) Christ's work is distinctively a 'redemption.' Redemption, moreover, is not used here simply in the general sense of deliverance, but with definite emphasis on the idea of purchase (Ac 20²⁸, 1 Co 6²⁰, Eph 1⁷, 1 Ti 2¹, 1 P 1¹⁸ 1¹⁹, Rev 5⁹ etc.). This glances back to Christ's own saying that He came 'to give his life a ransom (lutron); cf. antilutron in 1 Ti 2⁶ for many' (Mt 20²⁸). Further, 'ransom,' 'price,' 'purchase,' 'redeem,' are not to be taken simply figuratively, in the sense that Christ has procured salvation for us at the cost of great suffering, even of death, to Himself. This is true; but the consensus of Apostolic teaching gives a much more definite interpretation to the language; one in accordance with Christ's own intimation. His death was an expiatory sacrifice by which those who avail themselves of it are literally redeemed from the wrath of God that rested on them, and from all other effects of sin. It is St. Paul who works out this idea most systematically (cf. Ro 3²⁴⁻²⁵, 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²¹, Gal 3¹⁰⁻¹³ 4⁴, 5, Tit 3¹⁴ etc.), though all the NT writers share it. The immediate effect of Christ's redeeming death is to free from guilt and annul condemnation (Ro 8¹ 3²³⁻²⁴), but it carries in its train deliverance from sin in every form (from sin's dominion, from the tyranny of Satan, from an evil world, from 'all iniquity,' Ro 6, Gal 1⁴, Tit 2¹⁴, He 2¹⁴ etc.); ultimately from death itself (Ro 8²³). It not merely redeems from evil, but puts in possession of the highest possible good—'eternal life' (Ro 6²³, Eph 1⁵ etc.). It is a redemption in every way complete. See, further, artt. ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION, RECONCILIATION, SALVATION.

REED.—1. qāneh, tr. 'reed,' 1 K 14¹⁵, 2 K 18²¹, Is 36⁸ 42³; 'stalk,' Gn 41⁵ 22; 'sweet cane' (RVm 'calamus'), Is 43²⁴, Jer 6²⁰; 'calamus,' Ca 4¹⁴, Ezk 27¹⁹; 'spearmen,' Ps 68³⁰ (AV, but RV 'reeds'); also metaphorically used for a 'bone,' Job 31²; the arm of 'a balance,' Is 46⁸; and 'branches' of a candlestick, Ex 25³¹ 32. The qāneh is probably the familiar qasab (Arundo donax), which flourishes on the banks of all the streams and lakes of the Jordan Valley. Miles of it are to be seen at the 'Ain Feshkiah' oasis on the Dead Sea shore, and at the Huleh marshes. It is a lofty reed, often 20 feet high, brilliantly green in the late summer, when all around is dry and bare; but dead-looking, from a distance, in the spring, when it stands in full flower and the lofty stems are crowned by beautiful silken pannicles. In the district mentioned the reeds are cleared from time to time by fire, that the young and tender shoots may grow up to afford fodder for cattle. The covert of the reeds is often the only possible shade (Job 40²¹). The bruised reed, which, though standing, a touch will cause to fall and lie bedraggled on the ground, is a familiar sight (2 K 18²¹, Is 36⁸, Ezk 29⁶⁻⁷). A reed forms a most convenient measuring-rod, being straight and light (Ezk 40⁸ 1, Rev 11¹ etc.). In certain passages where qāneh is tr. 'calamus,' or 'sweet cane,' some imported aromatic cane or bark is meant. For the use of reeds as pens, see WRITING, 6.

2. ārōth, Is 19⁷ (AV 'paper reeds,' RV 'meadows'). See MEADOW.

3. igammim, lit. 'pools' (see POOL), is in Jer 51² tr. 'reeds.' For bulrushes see RUSH.

4. āchū, Job 8¹¹ EV 'flag,' RVm 'reed-grass.' See MEADOW.

5. ēbek, Job 9²⁶ (RVm 'reed'). The reference is to light skiffs of papyrus. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

REELALAH.—See RAAMIAH.

REELIAS, 1 Es 5⁴, corresponds in position to Bigvai in Ezr 2², Neh 7⁷; the form of the name may be due to a duplication of Reeliah in the same verse of Ezra.

REFINER, REFINING.—The ancient Egyptians purified gold by putting it into earthen crucibles with lead, salt, a little tin, and barley bran, sealing the crucibles with clay, and then exposing them to the heat of a furnace for five days and nights. Refining silver by cupellation is a very old process. The silver mixed with lead is put into a crucible made of bone earth, and placed in a reverberatory furnace. As the oxide of lead forms, it is blown off by bellows, and towards the end of the process the thin covering of oxide becomes iridescent and soon disappears, and the pure bright surface of the silver flashes out. This process of refining silver is referred to in Jer 6²³. The reference in Mal 3¹. Is to the purifying influence of affliction on the people of God; their sinful impurities gradually disappear, and at last the Divine image is reflected from the soul, as the face of the refiner from the surface of the purified silver.

REFUGE, CITIES OF.—1. Origin of the right of asylum.—The city of refuge was the product of two primitive religious ideas that were employed to neutralize one another,—the sacredness of blood or life and the sacredness of locality; both were based on the presence of the Divine in the blood and the locality. There was a community of blood or life between the god and his people that made it an unpardonable offence to slay one of his people; it mattered not whether the slayer was within or without his people, whether the deed was intentional or accidental. A wrong had been done that could be atoned for only by blood (Robertson Smith, RS, [1907] p. 32 ff.). On the other hand, the god chose certain places for his manifestation, and there it was customary for his people to meet and worship him. Within the precincts claimed by his presence all life was sacred, and so it came about that even a murderer, if he escaped to the haunts of a god, would be safe from those to whom he had forfeited his life, so long as he remained within their sacred limits (ib. p. 148 f.). The murderer thus escaped the penalty of his wrong, but he remained an ineffective unit for his tribe; immediately he left the asylum of the god he was at the mercy of the avenger of blood, and so both tribe and individual were in a measure punished. This primitive usage still prevails in savage communities, and has been widened by extending the privilege of asylum to places occupied by former kings and to the graves of former rulers (Frazer, Fort. Review, 1899, pp. 650-654).

2. Development of asylum in OT.—In this absolute form the right of asylum is not recognized anywhere in the OT. It is extended only to one who has without intention committed homicide (Ex 21¹³). One who has treacherously sullied his hands with blood can find no refuge at the altar of God; he may be taken from it to death (Ex 21¹⁴), or he may even be struck down at the altar, as was the fate of Joab (1 K 2³⁰. 31. 34). The community came between the fugitive and the avenger of blood, and determined whether he should be handed over to death. This was likely the result of the fusion of different tribes and the necessity of recognizing one common authority. We can trace three stages of development of this right of asylum in the OT.

(1) Every altar or sanctuary in the land could extend its protection to one who had without intention taken the life of another. He had to justify his claim to protection by showing to the authorities of the sanctuary that his deed was unpremeditated. But after the fugitive had submitted satisfactory evidence, he was allowed to remain within the sacred precincts. He could not, however, return home, and had evidently to pass the remainder of his life in the refuge to which he had fled. He could not appease the avenger by money. His want of prudence must entail some punishment, and so he could not pass beyond the city boundaries without risk of death at the hands of the avenger of blood. What provision was made for his maintenance is not revealed, but very likely he had to win his subsistence by his work. Whether his family could join him in his asylum is a question that is also unanswered. This is the stage of development in Ex 21¹³. 14, 1 K 1¹⁰ 2³⁴. It is not at all likely that Joab's death was brought about at the altar in Jerusalem because of some exceptional authority exercised over it by the king. Joab evidently knew he could be put to death there (1 K 2³⁰).

(2) When the provincial high places and altars were suppressed by Josiah in B.C. 621, the right of asylum there fell with them, and provision had to be made for the continuance of ancient usage on a modified basis. Very likely there was less need for it, as the power of the Crown had been growing. Cities of refuge, situated at convenient distances, were set apart for the manslayer (Dt 19²⁻⁷), and it may even be that the roads thither were specially kept and marked to make escape easy (Dt 19³; but cf. Steuernagel, Deut. p. 71 f.). The fugitive had to justify his claim to protection by showing to the elders of the city whither he had fled his innocence of murderous motives. Any one who failed to convince them of the validity of his defence was handed over to the elders of his own city, and they in turn surrendered him to the avenger of blood. Practically, then, the community administered justice, but when the death penalty was to be exacted, it was exacted not by the community, but by the avenger of blood in accordance with primitive usage (Dt 19¹². 13).

(3) In post-exilic times the cities of refuge established under the Deuteronomic Code remained, and the judicial procedure followed was very much the same, only the community—presumably at Jerusalem—and not the elders of the city of refuge (Nu 35¹². 24. 25) was to determine the guilt or the innocence of the fugitive. Jos 20⁴, however, contemplates a provisional inquiry by the elders of the city before protection is granted. The law was mitigated so far that the unwitting manslayer was no longer doomed to spend all his days there but was free to return to his home on the death of the high priest of the time (Nu 35²⁵. 28, Jos 20⁶). This points to the post-exilic origin of this modification. The high priest was then the only constituted authority that Jewish law could recognize.

3. Number of cities of refuge.—The statements bearing on the number of the cities of refuge are conflicting (Nu 35¹¹. 12-15, Dt 4⁴⁻⁶ 19⁷⁻¹⁰, Jos 20². 7. 8; cf. Driver Deut. pp. 78, 233; Gray, Num. p. 469). Ultimately there were six, but at first there appear to have been only three (Dt 19²⁻⁷). They were established first in the time of Josiah when the boundaries and the population of the Jewish State would be comparatively small and Jewish authority did not likely cross the Jordan to the east. In such conditions three cities would be ample. But when in post-exilic times the Jews covered a wider area, there would naturally be need for more cities; and so we find the number in Numbers and Joshua stated at six, and additions made to the text in Dt 4⁴⁻⁶ and 19⁸ to suggest that the number six had been contemplated from the beginning. These six cities were Kedesh, Shechem, and Hebron on the west,—all well-known sanctuaries from early times,—and Golan, Ramoth, and Bezer on the east. Of the situation of these last we know nothing definitely; even the site of Ramoth, to which reference is made elsewhere in the OT (1 K 4¹³ 22³⁸), is a subject of doubt (see G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 587; Driver, Deut. xviii, xix), but they probably shared the sacred character of the cities on the west.

REFUSE.—The vb. 'to refuse' has lost much of its vigour. In AV it often means 'to reject.' Thus Ps 118²² 'The stone which the builders refused.' Cf. Tindale's trans. of Mt 24⁴⁰ 'Then two shall be in the felds, the one shall be received, and the other shall be refused.'

REGEM.—The eponym of a Calebite family (1 Ch 2⁴⁷). REGEN-MELECH.—One of the deputation sent to the prophet Zechariah (Zec 7²).

REGENERATION.—In the language of theology, 'regeneration' denotes that decisive spiritual change, effected by God's Holy Spirit, in which a soul, naturally estranged from God, and ruled by sinful principles, is renewed in disposition, becomes the subject of holy affections and desires, and enters on a life of progressive sanctification, the issue of which is complete likeness to Christ. The term, however, to which this word corresponds (Gr. palingenesia), occurs only twice in the NT (Mt 19²⁸, Tit 3⁵), and in the first instance denotes, not the renewal of the individual, but the perfected condition of things at the Parousia (cf. Ac 3²¹, 2 P 3⁴; see RESTORATION). In the other passage (Tit 3⁵), the expression 'the washing [laver] of regeneration' connects 'the renewing of the Holy Ghost' with the rite of baptism, which is its outward symbol and seal (see below). The doctrine, nevertheless, is a thoroughly Scriptural one, and the change in question is expressed by a great variety of terms and phrases: 'born,' 'born anew,' 'a new creation,' 'renewed,' 'quickened,' etc., to which attention will immediately be directed. The fundamental need of regeneration is recognized in the OT as well as in the NT (e.g. Ps 51¹⁰⁻¹¹), though, necessarily, the prophecies speak more frequently of national renewal (Jer 31³¹⁻³², 32²⁸⁻²⁹, Ezk 36²⁵⁻²⁶, Hos 6¹⁻³ etc.) than of individual.

The classical passage on the need of regeneration is Jn 3³⁻⁷. Spiritual life, it is taught, can come only from a spiritual source, and man, naturally, has not that life (v. 6). Hence the declarations: 'Except a man be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God'; 'Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. . . . Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born anew' (vv. 3, 5). The miracle is wrought by the Spirit of God, whose action is sovereign (v. 5). Many do marvel, like Nicodemus, at the strangeness and universality of this demand of Christ; yet the strangeness will disappear, and the need of a supernatural agent to effect the change will be felt, if due consideration is given (1) to the vastness of the change, and (2) to the condition of the human nature in which the change is to be made.

(1) It is sufficient, to show the vastness of this change, to reflect that here, and elsewhere, regeneration means nothing less than a revolution of such a kind as results in the whole man being brought round from his ordinary worldly way of feeling, and thinking, and willing, into harmony with God's mind and will; truly brought round to God's point of view, so that he now sees things as God sees them, feels about things as God feels about them, judges of things as God judges of them, loves what God loves, hates what God hates, sets God's ends before him as his own. Who can doubt, if this is the nature of the change, that it does not lie in man's own powers to produce it; that it can be effected only through a higher power entering his being, and working the change?

(2) The need of a supernatural agency in the change is further evident from the condition of the human nature in which the change is wrought. The testimony of Scripture is uniform that man has turned aside from God (Ps 14¹⁻³, Ro 3⁹⁻¹⁰), and that his nature has undergone a terrible depravation (Gn 6⁵ 8²¹, Ps 51⁵, Is 1²⁻⁴, Ro 7¹⁴⁻¹⁵, Eph 2¹⁻³ 4¹⁷, 1⁸ etc.); that the bent of the will is away from God (Ro 8⁷, 9); that the love of God has been replaced by love of the world, and the self-seeking principles connected therewith (1 Jn 2¹⁵⁻¹⁶, cf. Jn 5²²⁻²⁴); that the better nature is in bondage to a law of sin, which works lawlessness in thought, feeling, and desire (Ro 7²²⁻²³, 1 Jn 3⁴ RV). Is it not obvious, leaving out of account altogether the darker forms in which evil manifests itself, that this is a condition of soul which only a Divine power can rectify?

Nothing, therefore, is more plainly taught in Scripture than that this spiritual change we call regeneration is one which nothing short of Divine power can effect. It is spoken of as a being born of God (Jn 1¹², 1¹³ 3³, 1 Jn 3⁹ etc.); as a new creation (2 Co 5¹⁷); as a being raised from the dead (Eph 2⁵⁻⁶). It is compared to that great work of the omnipotence of God in raising Christ Himself from the dead (Eph 1¹⁹⁻²² 2¹⁻⁶). It is a complete renewal, transformation, of the inner man (Ro 12³, Eph 4²², Col 3¹⁰, Tit 3⁵, 1 P 1²², 2²). Yet, while so distinctively a supernatural work, it is made equally clear that it is not a magical work; not a work bound up with rites and words, so that, when these rites and ceremonies are performed, regeneration is ipso facto effected. This is the error of sacerdotalism, which binds up this spiritual change with the rite of baptism. It would be wrong to say that baptism has no connexion with the change, for it is often brought into most intimate relation with it (Ro 6⁴, Tit 3⁵, 1 P 3²¹; perhaps even in Christ's words, Jn 3⁵; with the historical examples of the connexion of the receiving of the Spirit with baptism, Ac 2³⁸ 10²⁻⁴ etc.). Baptism is connected with regeneration as outwardly representing it, and being a symbol of it; as connected with profession (1 P 3²¹), and pledging the spiritual blessing to faith; but it neither operates the blessing, nor is indispensable to it, nor has any virtue at all apart from the inward susceptibility in the subjects of it. In some cases we read of those on whom the Spirit of God fell, that they were baptized afterwards (Ac 10⁴⁴, 48), and in all cases faith is presumed to be already present before baptism is administered; that is, the inward decisive step has already been taken.

On the other hand, when we look to the means—the instrumentality—by which the Holy Spirit effects this change, we find it always in Scripture declared to be one thing, namely, the word. This is what is meant by saying that regeneration is effected, not magically, but by the use of rational means. It is connected with the outward call of the gospel (hence the older divines were wont to treat of this subject under the head of 'vocation,' or 'effectual calling'). We speak, of course, only of adults, of those who are capable of hearing and understanding the call, and are far from limiting the grace of God in infants, or others whom this call does not or cannot reach. What is affirmed is, as regards those who have come to years of intelligence, that God's dealing with them is through the word, and this is the constant representation. The OT equally with the NT extols the saving, converting, quickening, cleansing, sanctifying power of the word of God (e.g. Ps 19⁷⁻⁹, 119). Jesus declares the word to be the seed of the Kingdom (Lk 8¹¹). He prays: 'Sanctify them in the truth; thy word is truth' (Jn 17¹⁷). Conversion, regeneration, sanctification, are connected with the word (Ac 11¹⁴⁻²¹, Eph 1¹³, Col 1⁵, 1 Th 2¹³, 2 Th 2¹³, Ja 1¹⁸, 1 P 1²²⁻²³ [Begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God, etc.]).

If this is the nature, generally, of regeneration, then it has what may be termed a psychology; that is, there is a process which the mind goes through in the experience of this spiritual change. The Spirit of God, doubtless, has innumerable ways of dealing with human souls; still, if we look closely, it will be found that there are certain elements which do in some degree enter into all experience in regeneration, and furnish, so far, a test of the reality of the change. There is first, of necessity, the awakening of the soul out of its customary spiritual torpidity—out of that deep insensibility to spiritual things in which ordinarily the natural mind is held (Eph 5¹⁴, cf. Ro 14¹¹⁻¹²). Especially there comes into view here the peculiar awakening of the soul through the conscience, which takes the form of what we call conviction of sin towards God (cf. Ac 16²⁹⁻³⁰). Probably no one can undergo this spiritual change without in some degree being brought inwardly to the realization of his sinful condition before God, and to the sincere confession of it (Ps 51⁴). The law of God has its place in producing this conviction of sin; but law alone will not produce spiritual contrition. See REPENTANCE. For this there is needed the exhibition of mercy. Hence the next stage in this spiritual process is that described as enlightenment—growing enlightenment in the knowledge of Christ

This also, like the preceding stages, is a Divine work (Jn 16¹⁴, 18, 2 Co 4⁶). Even with this, however, the work of regeneration is not complete. The will of God for man's salvation has not only to be understood, it has also to be obeyed. There is the will to be laid hold of—the will, the centre and citadel of the being. So the work of the Holy Spirit is directed, finally, to the renewing of the will. It is directed to the renewing of the will, first of all, in the form of persuasion, for the Holy Spirit does none of His work by violence. Everything that God accomplishes is accomplished in accordance with the nature He has given us; but God most graciously, most lovingly, brings His persuasions to bear upon our wills, and by the power of appropriate motives draws us to the acceptance of Christ (Jn 6⁴⁴). With this there goes what, in the next place, may be called the potentiation of the will—the enabling of, or imparting to it the power needful in order to lay hold on Christ with full and fast faith (Eph 4¹⁵). Last of all, this work of regeneration is completed when the soul is brought to the point of absolute surrender of itself to Christ—when, drawn and persuaded, and at length enabled by the Spirit, it yields itself up entirely to Christ as its Saviour, and lays hold on Christ for a complete salvation. There is now union with Christ by faith, and, with that, entrance into the life—the experience—of the newborn child of God. 'If any man is in Christ, he is a new creature; the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new' (2 Co 5¹⁷). JAMES ORR.

REHABIAH.—A Levitical family (1 Ch 23¹⁷ 24²¹ 26²⁵).

REHOB.—1. A town at the northern end of the valley of the Jordan (Nu 13²¹, 2 S 10⁸), most probably the same as Beth-rehob, of which the exact site is unknown. 2, 3. Two Asherite towns, neither of which has been identified (Jos 19²⁸ 21³¹, 1 Ch 6⁷⁵, Jos 19³⁰, Jg 1¹¹). 4. The father of Hadadezer (2 S 3³, 12). 5. A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10¹¹).

REHOBBOAM, son of Solomon, is said to have reigned seventeen years. The statement that his mother was Naamah, the Ammonitess (1 K 14²¹), has nothing improbable about it. The LXX may even be right in calling her a daughter of Nahash, the Ammonite king. In the history of Rehoboam the chief point is his indiscreet treatment of the tribes at his accession—treatment which resulted in the revolt of the best part of the nation and the establishment of a rival kingdom (1 K 12). The coherence of the tribes was evidently imperfect under Solomon. Ephraim, which had always been conscious of its own strength, was not minded to recognize the young king without some concessions on his part. For this reason Rehoboam went to Shechem to be crowned. Here the hereditary chiefs demanded that he should lighten the yoke. In this they had reference particularly to the forced labour exacted by Solomon. Rehoboam's arrogant answer is well known, and the result.

It was natural that an effort should be made to reduce the rebel tribes to subjection. But Rehoboam seems not to have had either adequate resources or military capacity. The brief notice that there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam continually is all that we are told. Besides this, the Biblical author describes the religious condition of the people in this reign in dark colours. This condition, however, is no more than prevailed under Solomon. The chief event in the secular history of the time was the invasion of the country by Shishak, king of Egypt. This monarch claims to have reduced the whole country to subjection, probably reviving ancient claims to suzerainty. The author of our Books of Kings is chiefly concerned at the Egyptian's plundering the Temple (1 K 14²⁶), while the Chronicler (2 Ch 12) as usual is ready to make an edifying story out of the incident. It would interest us to know whether Egypt maintained its claims on the successors of Rehoboam, but on this point we are left in the dark.

H. P. SMITH.

REHOBOTH.—1. A well dug by the servants of Isaac and finally conceded to him, after two others, dug also by them, had become a subject of quarrel with Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gn 26²⁵). Several identifications have been proposed, of which the most probable is that made by Palmer with er-Ruhaibeh, about 20 miles S. of Beersheba. 2. The name of a king of Edom in Gn 36³⁷, where he is called 'Rehoboth of the River.' 'The River' here may not be, as usually, the Euphrates, but the 'River of Egypt' (see EGYPT [RIVER OF]).

J. F. M'CURDY.

REHOBOTH-IR (lit. 'broad places of the city').—One of the four cities in Assyria built by Nimrod (Gn 10¹⁰). It immediately follows Nineveh, and might mean a suburb of that city, originally separate from it, but later annexed and containing some of its most spacious streets or market-places. A suitable identification has been found in the Assy. rebtu Nind ('broad places of Nineveh'), mentioned by king Esarhaddon (B.C. 681–668). This is the exact equivalent of the Biblical name. In taking it over, 'the city' was substituted for 'Nineveh.'

J. F. M'CURDY.

REHUM.—1. One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community (Ezr 2²; in Neh 7⁷, perhaps by a copyist's error, Nehum; in 1 Es 5⁸ Roimus). 2. 'The chancellor' (Ezr 4⁸, 9, 17, 23; in 1 Es 2¹⁸ Rathumus). See BEEL-THETHMUS. 3. A Levite who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3¹⁷). 4. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²⁸ (29)). 5. The eponym of a priestly family (Neh 12³). See HARIM, 2.

REI ('J' is a friend').—The name is given to one of the supporters of Solomon at the time of Adonijah's attempt to secure the throne (1 K 1⁸). He is mentioned along with Shimei, and was likely an officer in the royal guard. These troops seem to have had an enormous influence in determining the succession to the throne.

The reading, however, is not above suspicion, and Jos. (Ant. vii. xiv. 4) reads 'Shimei, the friend of David,' and thus gets rid of Rei as a personal name (so Lucian). Several attempts have been made to identify him with other figures, as Ira or Jair (Winckler, Gesch. ii. 247) or Raddai (Ewald, Gesch. iii. p. 266 note). W. F. BORD.

REINS.—See KIDNEYS.

REKEM.—1. One of the five kinglets of Midian slain by Moses (Nu 31⁸, Jos 13²¹). 2. A Calebite family (1 Ch 2⁴³). 3. A clan of Machir (1 Ch 7¹⁶ [AV and RV Rakem, but this is simply the pausal form of the Heb. name]). 4. An unidentified city of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁷).

RELIGION.—The word 'religion,' wherever it occurs in AV, signifies not the inner spirit of the religious life, but its outward expression. It is thus used of one form of religion as distinguished from another; as in 2 Mac 14²⁸, where the same word is translated in the middle of the verse 'Judaism,' and in the end of it 'the religion of the Jews.' It is also used by St. James (1²⁶, 27) to contrast moral acts with ritual forms.

REMALIAH.—The father of Pekah (2 K 15²⁶, 16¹, 4, 2 Ch 28⁸, Is 7¹⁸, 8³).

REMETH.—See RAMOTH, 1.

REMANT.—See ISRAEL, p. 387^b.

REMPHAN.—See REPHAN.

REPENTANCE.—Repentance, in the sense of turning for a purpose, is frequently predicated of God in the OT (Gn 6⁶, 7, Ex 32¹⁴ etc.). Repentance for sin is commonly expressed by 'turn' or 'return' (e.g. Dt 4³⁰, Is 55⁷, Ezk 3⁷, Hos 14²). Repentance has a prominent place in the NT, alone (Mt 4¹⁷, Lk 15⁷, Ac 2³⁴ etc.), or in conjunction with faith (Mk 1¹⁵, Ac 20²¹ etc.), as an indispensable condition of salvation. The word ordinarily used (metanoia) means literally 'change of mind.' The change, however, is one in which not the intellect only, but the whole nature (understanding, affections, will), is involved. It is such an altered view of God and sin as carries with it heartfelt sorrow for sin, confession of it, and decisive turning from it to God and righteousness (Lk 15¹⁷ 18, Ro 6¹⁷ 18, 2 Co 7¹⁰ 11 etc.). Its reality is tested by its fruits (Mt 3⁸, Lk 6⁴³⁻⁴⁴). From this 'godly sorrow', which works 'repentance unto salvation' (2 Co 7¹⁰ 11), is distinguished a 'sorrow of the world' which 'worketh death' (v. 10), i.e. a sorrow which has no relation to God, or to the intrinsic evil of sin, but only to sin's harmful consequences. There may be keen remorse, and blaming of one's self for one's folly, yet no real repentance.

Disputes have arisen in theology as to the priority of faith or repentance, but unnecessarily, for the two, rightly viewed, are but the positive and negative poles of the same state of soul. There can be no evangelical faith which does not spring from a heart broken and contrite on account of sin; on the other hand, there can be no true repentance which has not the germ of faith in God, and of hope in His mercy, in it. The Law alone would break the heart; the Gospel melts it. Repentance is the turning from sin; Gospel faith is the turning to Christ for salvation. The acts are inseparable (Ac 20²¹). JAMES ORR.

REPHAEL.—A family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26⁷).

REPHAH.—An Ephraimite family (1 Ch 7²⁴).

REPHAIAH.—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 3²¹). 2. A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4²). 3. A descendant of Issachar (1 Ch 7⁷). 4. A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 9¹³); called in 8²⁷ Raphah. 5. One of those who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3⁹).

REPHAIM.—A name given in several Biblical passages to some pre-Israelitish people. In Gn 14⁵ they are said to have dwelt in Ashteroth-karnaim. Gn 15²⁰ classes them with Hittites and Perizzites (similarly Jos 17¹⁵). Dt 20¹ 20 calls certain peoples 'Rephaim' whom the Moabites and Ammonites called respectively 'Emim' and 'Zamzummin'. Dt 31¹ says that Og, king of Bashan, alone remained of the Rephaim (so also Jos 12¹³ 14), while Dt 3¹¹ says that Argob was a land of Rephaim. A valley near Jerusalem was also called the 'Vale of Rephaim' (see 2 S 5¹⁸ 22, 23¹³, 1 Ch 11¹⁵ 14, Is 17³). Because Dt 20¹ counts them with the Anakim, who were giants, and 2 S 21¹⁶⁻²² says that the sons of a certain Lapha (see RVin) were giants, it has been supposed by some that Rephaim means 'giants', and was given to a race as their name by their neighbours because of their stature. Cf. art. GIANT.

The word rēphā'im in Hebrew means also 'shades' or disembodied spirits. At least it is used to describe the dead, as in Ps 88¹⁰. Schwally is probably right, therefore (Leben nach dem Tode, 64 ff. and ZATW; xviii. 127 ff.), in holding that the word means 'shades', and that it was applied by the Israelites to people who were dead and gone, and of whom they knew little.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

REPHAN (AV Remphan).—A word which replaces Chun of the Hebrew text of Am 5², both in the LXX and in the quotation in Ac 7¹⁸. The generally accepted explanation of this word is that Rephan (the preferable form) is a corruption and transliteration of Kewan (Kaiwan, Kaawan—see CHUN)—r having somehow mistakenly replaced k, and w (the Hebrew wau or vau) having been transliterated ph (the Gr. φη).

W. M. NESBIT.

REPHIDIM.—A stage in the Wanderings, between the wilderness of Sin and the wilderness of Sinai (Ex 17¹ 8 19; cf. Nu 33¹⁴). Here water was miraculously supplied, and Israel fought with Amalek. Those who accept the traditional Sinai generally place Elim in Wady Gharandel, and Rephidim in Wady

Feirdān, about four miles N. of Mt. Serbal (Palme, Desert of the Exodus, Index). The tribesmen would naturally wish to defend the springs in the valley against such a host as Israel. Moses might have surveyed the conflict from the height of Jebel Tahūneh, on the N. of the valley. Only we should hardly expect the Amalekites so far to the south. If the scholars who place Sinai east of the Gulf of 'Akabah, identifying Elath and Elim, are right, then Rephidim must be sought somewhere in that district. (Sayce, HCM, p. 269.) W. EWING.

REPROBATE.—The Heb. word so rendered in Jer 6³⁰ (AV; RV 'refuse') has its meaning explained by the context. 'Refuse silver shall men call them, because the Lord hath rejected them.' Like metal proved to be worthless by the refiner's fire (v. 29), they are thrown away (cf. Is 12²). In the NT, in accordance with the meaning of the Gr. word (adokimos), 'reprobate' is used of that which cannot abide the proof, which, on being tested, is found to be worthless, bad, counterfeit, and is therefore rejected. 'A reprobate mind' in Ro 1²⁸ (with tacit reference to the previous clause, 'they did not approve to have God in their knowledge') is, as the context shows, a mind depraved and perverted by vile passions. To such a mind God abandoned those who wilfully exchanged His truth for a lie (v. 28). In 1 Co 9²⁷, St. Paul declares that he 'buffets' his body and 'brings it into bondage,' lest, having preached to others, he himself should be rejected (reprobate). The figure is that of an athlete who, through remissness in training, falls in the race or fight (for the opposite figure, cf. 2 Ti 2⁴). In 2 Co 13⁷, the word ('reprobates') occurs three times, in each case as opposed to genuine, true. Christ is in them, except they be reprobates, i.e. false to their profession, hence rejected by God. Let them 'prove' themselves by this test (v. 8). St. Paul trusts that they will know that he abides this test (v. 8), but let them think of him what they will, if only they themselves do what is honourable (v. 7). 'Reprobate' here is contrasted with what is 'approved,' 'honourable'; it is identified with 'doing evil.' In 2 Ti 3⁸, certain are described as 'corrupted in mind, reprobate concerning the faith,' where both moral corruption and false speculation as the result of this corruption seem intended. They fall, brought to the test of 'sound' or 'healthful' doctrine (1¹² 14 43). Similarly Tit 1⁸ speaks of those who, denying God by their works, are 'unto every good work reprobate.' Their hypocrisy is brought home to them by their wicked lives. 'Professing that they know God,' they are proved by their works to be counterfeits, imposters. The word occurs, finally, in He 6⁸, where those whom it is impossible 'to renew again to repentance' are compared to ground which, receiving the rain oft upon it, and being tilted, brings forth only thorns and thistles, and is 'rejected.' From all this we may conclude that 'reprobate,' generally, denotes a moral state so bad that recovery from it is no longer possible; there remains only judgment (cf. He 6⁸). It is only to be added that the term has no relation in Scripture to an eternal decree of reprobation; at least, to none which has not respect to a thoroughly bad and irrecoverable condition of its objects. Cf. PREDESTINATION. JAMES ORR.

RESAIAH.—See RAAMIAH.

RESEN.—The last of the four cities built by Asshur, or, according to the RV, by Nimrod, and described as lying between Nineveh and Calah (i.e. Kouyunjik and Nimroud), on the E. bank of the Tigris (Gn 10¹²). From its position the site referred to should be at or near the present Selamtyeh, which lies between the two points named. Resen seemingly represents the Assyrian place-name Rēsh-ēni, 'fountain-head,' but is probably not to be confused with the Rēsh-ēni mentioned by Sennacherib in the Bavian inscription, which is regarded being the modern Rās el-'Ain a little N. of Khorsabad. That the words 'the same is a great city' should refer to Resen alone seems unlikely—more probably Nineveh. Nehoboth-ir, and Calah are included, the two latter forming, with Resen, suburbs of the first.

T. G. PINCHES.

RESH.—The twentieth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 20th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

RESHEPH.—An Ephraimite family (1 Ch 7²⁵).

REST.—The conception of rest as a gift of God runs through the Bible, the underlying idea being not idleness, but the freedom from anxiety which is the condition of effective work. It is promised to Israel in Canaan (Ex 33¹⁴, Dt 3²⁰), and Zion is the resting-place of J^r (Ps 132¹⁴), the Temple being built by 'a man of rest' (1 Ch 22²); a contrast is implied with the desert wanderings in Nu 10³³⁻³⁶. At the same time no earthly temple can be the real resting-place of J^r (Is 66¹, Ec 7¹²). The rest of the Sabbath and the Sabbatical year are connected with the rest of God after creation (Gn 2², Ex 20¹¹, Lv 25¹; see art. SABBATH). The individual desires rest, as did the nation (Ps 55³); it is not to be found in ignoble ease (Gn 40¹⁰ Issachar), but in the ways of God (Ps 37⁷, Jer 6¹⁶); it is the gift of Christ (Mt 11²⁸). Sinners fail to find it (Is 28¹² 57²⁰), as Israel failed (Ps 95¹¹). He 4 develops the meaning of this failure, and points to the 'sabbath rest' still to come. This heavenly rest includes not only freedom from labour, as in OT (Job 3¹³⁻¹⁷ [in Ps 16⁹, see RV]), but also the opportunity of continued work (Rev 14¹³). C. W. EMMET.

RESTITUTION.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, 8.

RESTORATION.—In a variety of phrases—'regeneration' (palinogenesis, Mt 19²⁸), 'restitution of all things' (Ac 3²¹), 'summing up all things in Christ, the things in the heavens, and the things upon the earth' (Eph 1¹⁰), 'new heavens and a new earth' (2 P 3¹³, Rev 21¹), 'make all things new' (Rev 21⁵)—the NT points forward to a perfected condition which shall supervene upon the present imperfect condition of mingled good and evil (cf. Mt 13³⁹, 40, 42, 49), including a renewal of nature, the quelling of all evil (Ph 2¹⁰⁻¹¹), and restoration of order and harmony in the universe, with Christ as Head. The hope is connected with OT prophecy (Ac 3²¹, 2 P 3¹³), and the transformation itself is invariably associated with the Parousia (cf. Mt 19²⁸ etc.). The question of chief interest is, how far these predictions of a coming 'restitution' (apokatastasis) of all things, point forward to a future universal salvation. Gladly as one would read this meaning into them, sober exegesis shows that they will not bear so large an interpretation. The passage which speaks of 'restitution' tells also of those who will not hearken, and shall be destroyed (Ac 3²³). The Parousia, when the new state of things is represented as introduced, is always connected in the NT with an awful judgment. St. Paul speaks of all things being summed up in Christ, of Christ subduing all things to Himself, etc. (Eph 1¹⁰, 1 Co 15²⁴⁻²⁸, Ph 2¹⁰⁻¹¹); but unbiased study of the passages and their context shows that it is far from the Apostle's view to teach an ultimate conversion or annihilation of the kingdom of evil. It must be owned, however, that the strain of these last passages does seem to point in the direction of some ultimate unity, be it through forcible subjugation or in some other way, in which active opposition to God's Kingdom is no longer to be reckoned with. JAMES ORR.

RESURRECTION.—1. IN OT.—In our study of the OT doctrine of the resurrection we recognize the need for taking into consideration the chronological order of the different documents of which it is composed. No other belief, perhaps, presents a history into which the process of slow and halting development enters so visibly and consistently. That the later orthodox Jews advocated the existence in their earlier Scriptures of the principles which give vitality and a rational basis to this doctrine, is seen in their satisfaction with the answer of Jesus to the Sadducean cavils of His day (see Mk 12²⁸; cf. Lk 20²⁸, Mt 22²⁸). The gradual awakening of human consciousness in this respect is the best attestation to the Divine self-accommodation to the needs and limitations of the race. Beginning with the vague belief in the existence of a germinal principle of Divine life in man (cf. Gn 2⁷), the latest passages of the OT dealing with the subject embody a categorical assertion of the resurrection of individual Israelites (cf. Dn 12^{2f.}). Between these two utterances we have the speculations of Psalmists and Prophets, while death became gradually shorn of many of its terrors and much of its power. The common Jewish belief in the time of Jesus finds expression in the words of Martha concerning her brother Lazarus (Jn 11²⁴), while this formed one of the deep lines of religious cleavage between the Pharisees and the Sadducees (Ac 23^{6a}; cf. Jos. BJ II. viii. 14; Schürer, HJP II. ii. 13).

A peculiar feature of Jewish thought as to human life, marking it off clearly from some of the ethnic speculations and philosophic conceptions, consists in their habit of regarding the body as essential to man's full existence. The traditions embodied in the stories of the translations of Enoch and Elijah (Gn 5²⁴, 2 K 2¹¹) receive their explanation on the assumption that in this way alone would they be enabled to enjoy the continuance of a full and complete life beyond the grave. It was this idea also that gave such a strong feeling of the incompleteness of the existence in Hades, and inspired the Psalmist's assurance, 'Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption' (Ps 16⁹, cf. Job 14¹³⁻¹⁹ 19^{2f.}).

The first specific mention of the hope of a resurrection is found in Hosea, where the prophet's words are rather of the nature of an aspiration than the distinct announcement of a future event (6², cf. 13¹⁴). This is, however, the expression not of an individual who looks forward to being raised from the dead, but of one who sees his nation once more quickened and 'brought up again from the depths of the earth' (Ps 71²⁰; cf. Kirkpatrick, The Psalms, ad loc.). A similar hope finds expression in Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones (Ezk 37¹⁻¹⁴). A distinct advance on these utterances is found in the post-exilic prophecy, Is 26¹⁹, where the prophet breathes a prayer for the resurrection of the individual dead. When this passage is contrasted with the confident assertion of v. 14 it is seen that as yet there was no thought of a resurrection save for the Israelite. The same restriction is also found to exist at the later date, when the Book of Daniel was written. In this book there is a clear, unambiguous assertion of the resurrection of individuals, and at the same time a no less clear announcement that there is a resurrection of the wicked as well as of the righteous (Dn 12²). It is true that these words not only have no message of a resurrection hope for nations other than Israel, but even limit its scope to those of that nation who distinguish themselves on the side of good or of evil (cf. Driver, 'Daniel,' ad loc., in Camb. Bible). At the same time it is easy to see that a great stride forward had been taken already, when the atrocities of Antiochus Epiphanes brought religious despair to the hearts of all true Israelites, and roused the fervid patriotism of Judas Maccabæus and his followers.

2. In the Apocrypha.—The development of this doctrine in the deuterocanonical and apocryphal literature of the Jews presents a varied and inharmonious blend of colours. Inconsistencies abound, and can be explained only on the ground that each writing was influenced by the individual experience as well as by the theological idiosyncrasies of its author.

Sirach.—The oldest of the deuterocanonical books is that of ben-Sira, and in his work we look in vain for the idea of a resurrection, either national or individual. On the other hand, the eschatological conceptions of this author do not seem to advance beyond those of Ecclesiastes (cf. Sir 17³⁰).

Book of Enoch.—Very different from the foregoing are the ideas prevalent in this composite apocalyptic writing. The oldest portion contains an elaborate theory of Sheol, and teaches the resurrection of all righteous Israelites, and so many of the wicked as have escaped 'without incurring judgment in their lifetime' (22^{10f.}). The sinners who have suffered here 'will not be raised from thence' (22¹³), inasmuch as retribution, in part at least, has overtaken them. Another writer of a somewhat later date speaks of the resurrection of righteous Israelites only. These shall be raised, after judgment and retribution have been meted out to sinners, to share in the glories of the Messianic Kingdom (90²⁹⁻³³). A similar opinion is expressed in another part of this writing. None but the righteous shall rise (91¹⁰); but the author seems to interpret the resurrection as that of the spirit only, and not of the body (103^{1f.}).

The most important and best known section of the Book of Enoch (chs. 37-70), which is known as the Similitudes, contains an explicit assertion of a general resurrection (51¹). Whether, however, the writer intended to convey the idea of a resurrection of the Gentiles is somewhat doubtful. The words of this passage, if taken literally, would certainly convey the impression that a universal resurrection is meant. At the same time we must remember that this thought would be quite contrary to the whole habit of Jewish eschatological thinking, and would stand unique in Jewish pre-Christian literature. (For discussions of this question see the admirable critical edition of the Book of Enoch by R. H. Charles, passim.)

Psalms of Solomon.—These are probably the product of the 1st cent. B.C. Here, too, a resurrection of the righteous alone is taught (3¹⁴ 13⁹, cf. 4⁶). Moreover, no resurrection of the body is mentioned explicitly, though it would be rash to assume from his words that the author did not hold this doctrine.

2 Maccabees.—A very definite doctrine of the resurrection is taught in this book, though the author expressly denies its applicability to the Gentiles (7¹⁴, cf. 2 Es 7^{11f.}). The resurrection of the body is strongly held, as affording a powerful incentive and a glorious hope for those who underwent a cruel martyrdom (14⁶ 7^{11f.}, cf. 7⁹ 14). At times the writer seems to be contravening the denial of a resurrection, as when he stops to praise the action of Judas in offering sacrifices and prayers for those who had fallen in battle, on the ground that he did so because 'he took thought for a resurrection' (12⁴³). If there were no resurrection of the dead, such a course of action would be superfluous and idle (12⁴⁴).

Book of Wisdom.—It is only necessary to say of this writing that it is an Alexandrian work, written about the beginning of the Christian era, and that according to it the body is an incubus dragging the soul, which is destined for incorruption (22³ 3¹), earthwards (9¹⁸ [cf. art. 'Wisdom, Book of,' in Hastings' DB iv. 930 f.]).

3. Position of the doctrine at and immediately subsequent to the time of Jesus Christ.—It might be said, and said with justice, that the foregoing views were representative, not of contemporary popular beliefs and ideas, but of conceptions prevalent among the educated and thinking classes. It is reasonable, however, to expect that by the time of Jesus these lines of thought would have penetrated to the masses, with such modifications as they were likely to assume in and during the process. This expectation is found to be in harmony with what we observe to have actually existed; for, with one or two exceptions, when He felt called on to make a specific declaration (cf. Mk 12¹⁸⁻²⁷ = Mt 22²³⁻³² = Lk 20²⁷⁻³⁸, Jn 5^{28f.}), Jesus everywhere in His teaching assumed the truth of, and belief in, the resurrection of the dead. We know that materialistic views or this doctrine were held side by side with the more spiritual ideas so prominent in the Book of Enoch (cf. 51⁴ 104⁴ 62^{16f.} etc.).

In the Apocalypse of Baruch, for example, the questions were asked, 'In what shape shall those live who live in thy day?' 'Will they then resume this form of the present, and put on these entravelling members, which are now involved in evils, and in which evils are consummated, or wilt thou perchance change these things which have been in the world, as also the world?' (49^{21f.}). To these the answer is given, that the bodies of the dead shall be raised exactly as they were when committed to the ground in order that they may be recognized by their friends (50²⁸). After this object has been achieved, a glorious change will take place: 'they shall be made like unto the angels, and be made equal to the stars, and they shall be changed into every form they desire, from beauty into loveliness, and from light into the splendour of glory' (51¹⁰, cf. Mk 12²⁵ = Lk 20³⁶ = Mt 22³⁰). Even in Rabbinical circles sensuous conceptions were frequent, so that even the clothes in which one was to be buried became a subject of anxious care (see The Apoc. of Baruch ed. R. H. Charles, notes on chs. 50-51, and Introd. p. lxxx).

At this period, too, the ideas of a universal and of a first and a second resurrection were held and taught (Apoc. Bar 30²⁻⁵, 2 Es 7²⁸ 31-37). For our purpose it is not necessary to do more than refer to the Hellenistic or Pythagorean speculations of the Essenes to which Josephus makes reference (see BJ ii. viii. 11; Schürer, HJP ii. iii. 205). The only form of Judaism which contained principles of continuity and life was represented by Pharisaism. The view of this, the most religious and the most orthodox of the Jewish sects, with regard to the resurrection, limited it to the righteous, for whom they postulated a new and a glorified body (see BJ ii. viii. 14, cf. Ant. xviii. i. 3). While this doctrine of a personal resurrection seems to have made much more headway in the Judaism of this age than the other ideas referred to above, it also clearly appears that the limitation of its scope to the righteous was more universally held than its extension to the wicked, in spite of the teaching in Daniel (12²), Apoc. of Baruch (30²⁻⁵), and 2 Esdras (7²⁸⁻³⁷). Moreover, a difference of opinion continued to exist as to the time when it was supposed to take place, some writers placing it immediately before (cf. En 51^{1f.}) and others immediately after the close of the Messianic era (cf. En 91¹⁰ 92¹, Apoc. Bar 40-42, 2 Es 4¹, Ps-Sol 3¹⁶ 13⁸ etc.).

4. Teaching of Jesus.—(a) The Synoptics.—Many of the passages in which Jesus' teaching on the resurrection is recorded by the Synoptists might be interpreted as leaving no room for the doctrine that the wicked shall rise again from the dead. The most conspicuous, perhaps, of these is that incorporated in the Lukan narrative of His controversy with the Sadducees (Lk 20^{36f.}). The form of the expression 'the resurrection from the dead,' as has been pointed out, 'implies that some from among the dead are raised, while others as yet are not' (see Plummer, 'St. Luke' in ICC, ad loc.). The other expression, 'sons of the resurrection,' is remarkable for a similar reason. There seems to be an implied antithesis between those whose sonship results in immortality and those who can have no such hope (cf. Plummer, op. cit. Lk 20³⁶ n.). Other instances, which might be considered as lending countenance to this view, speak of the 'resurrection of the just' (Lk 14¹⁴), and contain promises of restoration in the glory of His Kingdom to 'his elect' (Mk 13²⁷ = Mt 24³¹). When, on the other hand, we take a general survey of the eschatological teaching of Jesus, we find that the doctrine of a general bodily resurrection occupies a very assured position even in the Synoptic records. Not only do we find, as already noted, that His teaching on this subject, as against Sadducean negations, was pleasing in Pharisaic circles (cf. Lk 20³⁹), but He is also seen to refer to this question in terms of current Jewish orthodoxy. The future life is personal in the fullest ense, and it is not incorporeal, for 'many shall come from the east and the west and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 8¹¹, cf. Lk 13²⁹).

(b) The Fourth Gospel.—The Johannine record of Jesus' eschatological teaching reveals a profounder view of the resurrection life than that contained in the Synoptics, for it is there dealt with as a spiritual process intimately connected with the quickening life which is 'given to the Son' (Jn 5²⁶; cf. 17² 14). When Martha expresses her assurance that her brother 'shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day' (Jn 11²⁴), Jesus at once lays broader and deeper the foundations upon which this belief is to rest for the future. While tacitly acquiescing in her conviction as a 'sure and certain hope,' He establishes an organic relationship, immediate and spiritual, between Himself and those committed to Him. This living relationship, in which all believers share, contains the germ of that resurrection life which springs into being at present, and will be perfected at 'the last day' (Jn 11²⁵, cf. 6⁴⁰ 44 51 30).

It is true that Jesus seems to have given no thought to the difficulty of conceiving a resurrection of the wicked on the ground that all resurrection life has its origin in Himself; at the same time no doubt can be reasonably entertained that He looked for the resurrection of all men (see Jn 12⁴⁸; cf. those passages which speak of the body being cast with the soul into Gehenna, Mt 10²⁸ 52²¹). Perhaps He considered that a sufficient explanation consisted in asserting the omnipotence of 'the Father' after the manner of the OT; 'The Father raiseth the dead and quickeneth them' (Jn 5²¹; cf. Dt 32³⁹, 2 Co 1⁹). In the Lukan version of Jesus' argument with the Sadducees we may understand a reference to the idea of the resurrection of all men based on the truth that 'all live unto him' (Lk 20³⁸, cf. a slightly different expression in Ac 17²⁸).

It may be pointed out here that Jesus seems to have made no attempt to answer the often debated question of the curious as to the nature of the resurrection body. He compared the condition of those who had arisen to that of the angels (Mk 12²⁶), a comparison which is noteworthy for what it implies as well as for the reserve which Jesus used when speaking on this subject. At the same time, we must remember that certain incidents in the post-resurrection life of Jesus on earth appear to have been designed to meet what is legitimate in speculation of this kind. He was anxious to prove that His was a bodily resurrection (Lk 24⁴², Jn 20²⁰; cf. Ac 10⁴¹), and that His risen body was capable of being identified with the body to which His disciples had been accustomed for so long (Jn 20²⁷). On the other hand, the conditions of His existence underwent a complete alteration. For Him now physical limitations, as regards time or space, did not exist (Mt 28², Jn 20¹⁹ 26, Lk 24⁴⁸, cf. 24³⁴); and this freedom from temporal conditions resulted in a life which transcended ordinary experience. Sometimes He remained unrecognized until a well-known characteristic phrase or act revealed His personality (Jn 20¹⁴ 21⁴, Lk 24¹⁶; cf. the author's comment 'but some doubted' in Mt 28¹⁷).

5. Apostolic teaching.—(a) The Acts.—Although the Apostles do not seem at first to have shaken themselves free from Judaistic conceptions of the Messianic Kingdom (Ac 1⁶), it is plain that they looked on the fact of Jesus' resurrection as of primary importance (see Ac 12²). At all costs this must be placed in the forefront of their evangelistic work, and the principal element of their Apostolic claims to the attention of their Jewish hearers lay in their power, as eye-witnesses, to offer irrefragable proof of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead (Ac 2²⁴ 22 31³ 41⁰ 33 53⁰ 22; cf. 10⁴¹). When we compare the fragmentary reports of Petrine teaching in the Acts with the doctrine of 1 Peter, we find that in the latter document the Apostle is no less insistent on the fact (1 P 1²¹), while he has learned to assign to it the power of penetrating the present life and renewing it 'unto a living hope' (1⁹). Christian

Baptism for him receives its spiritual validity 'through the resurrection of Jesus Christ,' which enables us to satisfy 'the appeal of a good conscience toward God' (3²¹). At the same time we must not forget that elements of this power are recognized more than once in his discourses in Acts. The Pentecostal outpouring, the work of healing, the gifts of repentance and forgiveness of sins, are all described as flowing from the risen life of Jesus (see Ac 2³⁴ 41⁰ 5³¹; cf. 5³⁰, where the angelic messenger speaks of the Apostolic teaching as having reference to 'this life').

(b) St. Paul.—When we turn to the teaching of St. Paul as it gradually comes into contact with Hellenic and Gentile thought, we find the doctrine of the resurrection assuming a new and developed prominence in connexion with the resurrection of Jesus. When addressing Jewish audiences, he emphasizes the fact that God raised up Jesus according to certain promises recorded in the OT (cf. Ac 13²¹ 26⁶), and at the same time bases his doctrine of the resurrection on its necessity, and on the relationship of Jesus and the human race. When, however, he came face to face with the Greek mind, his experience was entirely different. The philosophers of Athens met his categorical assertion of the resurrection of Jesus not merely with a refusal to credit his statement, but with a plain derision of the very idea (Ac 17³², cf. 26⁸). It was doubtless the calm mockery of the Athenian Stoics that made him feel that his mission to them was hopeless (Ac 18¹), and caused him, when writing afterwards to the essentially Greek community of Corinthian Christians, to expound fully his doctrine of the resurrection. In the first of the two letters addressed to this Church he establishes the fact of the resurrection of Jesus, by revealing its harmony with the Divine plan set forth to the Jews in the OT, and showing that it was attested by numerous witnesses of His post-resurrection existence. He next goes on to demonstrate the organic connexion between this resurrection and that of those 'who are fallen asleep in Christ' (1 Co 15¹⁶), and the necessity of accepting the doctrine as fundamentally essential to Christian belief and hope (15¹ 19, cf. He 6¹).

St. Paul's eschatological doctrine included a belief in a real bodily resurrection. This is quite certain not only from the chapter we have been considering, but also from incidental references scattered throughout his Epistles (cf. the expression, He 'shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation,' Ph 3²¹; see Ro 8⁴ 4⁴, 2 Co 5¹⁻⁸ etc.). Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the Apostle's contribution to this doctrine is contained in his conception of the nature of the resurrection body. It is evident from the analogies he employs that he intended to establish the identity of the mortal and the glorified bodies (1 Co 15³⁶⁻⁴¹). This idea he puts on a rational, though an apparently paradoxical, basis by postulating the existence of 'a spiritual body' as distinct from 'a natural body' (v⁴⁴), and at the same time by insisting on their strict continuity (cf. the repeated doubts 'it is sown' . . . 'It is raised,' v⁴²). Doubtless his presentment of this speculative and mysterious question was founded on what he had already learned regarding the nature of the traditional appearances of the risen Jesus. 'The body of his glory' (Ph 3²¹) is the ultimate attainable glory of those whose 'citizenship is in heaven' (Ph 3²⁰; cf. Col 3¹, Ro 8²⁹, 1 Jn 3², 1 Co 15⁴⁹).

Side by side with the doctrine of a literal, bodily resurrection, St. Paul's writings are rich with another conception which is more especially connected with the present life. Following the teaching of Jesus, who claimed to be the power by which resurrection life was alone possible, the Apostle declares that Christ gives this new and glorious life here and now. It is rooted, so to speak, in the earthly life of men, and its final growth and fruit are consummated hereafter (cf. Col 2¹² 3¹, Ph 3¹⁰, Ro 6⁸). This inchoative resurrection life has its origin in the spiritual union of baptized Christians with Christ (cf. Ro 6³¹, Col 2¹², Gal 3²⁷), and the tremendous possibilities of development are, according to St. Paul, due to a transcendent fellowship with the glorified Jesus (see Eph 1²⁰⁻²¹⁰, 19¹¹). His resurrection is the power by which this union, in all its aspects, is perfected (Ph 3¹⁰, cf. Ro 1⁴). It was doubtless the one-sided presentation of Pauline eschatology that led to the heresy of Hymenæus and Philletus (2 Ti 2¹⁸), and the Apostle seems to have felt the necessity of balancing his mystical interpretation by an emphatic insistence on the literal truth that the resurrection is a future objective fact in the progressive life of man.

That St. Paul held the doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked as well as of the righteous is evident not only from the words of his defence before Felix at Cæsarea (Ac 24¹⁵, cf. Lk 14¹⁴), but also from incidental remarks in his Epistles (see 1 Th 4¹⁶ and 1 Co 15²¹, where the emphasis which is laid on the first resurrection implies a second and a separate event; cf. Ac 26⁷¹ and Ph 3¹¹, where the same implication may be observed). What the connexion is, however, between these two distinct resurrections does not appear to have occurred to the Apostle's mind, and there seems to be little ground for the supposition that he believed in a distinction between them—as regards time. Indeed, the particular passage upon which millenarians rely to prove the affinity of the Pauline and Apocalyptic doctrines in this respect says nothing of any resurrection except that of 'those that are Christ's' (cf. 1 Co 15²²). The resurrection of the wicked occupies a very subordinate place in Pauline eschatology, and we need not be surprised at the scanty notice taken of it, when we remember how constantly he is pressing on his readers' attention the power by which the resurrection to life is brought about (Ro 8¹¹, 1 Co 15⁴⁶; cf. Jn 6⁴⁰, 4⁴ 5³¹ for the teaching that it is the quickening Spirit of Christ which causes the resurrection 'at the last day'). It is sufficient for him to urge men to the attainment of this resurrection which was the goal of his own aspirations (cf. Ph 3¹¹), and to warn them of the fate attendant on the rejection of Christ (note the expressions 'day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God,' Ro 2⁵; 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord,' 2 Th 1⁹; cf. 1 Th 1¹⁰, Ph 3¹⁰ etc.).

6. The Apocalypse.—The principal contribution of the apocalyptic eschatology to the doctrine of the resurrection is contained in ch. 20. Although there is no specific reference to the resurrection of the wicked, this is implied in the expression 'the first resurrection' (20⁶), as well as in the connexion established between the Resurrection and the Judgment. Rewards and punishments are meted out to all as they stand 'before the throne,' for 'death and Hades gave up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works' (v. 12¹²). What precisely is the interpretation by which the millennial reign of the martyrs and loyal followers of Jesus is to be adequately explained it is difficult to conjecture. See, further, artt. CHILIASM, MILLENNIUM.

REU.—Son of Peleg (Gn 11¹⁸⁻²¹, 1 Ch 1²⁸, Lk 3³⁸).

REUBEN.—The firstborn of Jacob by Leah, Gn 29²² (J) 35²³ (P) 46⁸ (R). The popular etymology connects the name with Leah's distress, because of Jacob's previous dislike of her. She called his name Reuben: for she said, because Jahweh hath looked upon my affliction (ra'ah be'onyi). This, however, is clearly a paronomasia, though evidently intended seriously; otherwise the passage has no meaning. The Hebrew word = 'Behold ye a son.' In Josephus the form is Rubel, and in Syriac it is Rabul. Lengthy discussions have been given of the name, and numerous theories advanced by way of solution of the problems it raises, but no conclusion that can be accepted has been reached. Cheyne regards Reubel as the correct form, and makes both it and Reuel corruptions of Jerahme'el, but this conclusion is based upon his own peculiar theories of the history of Israel and of the Hebrew text.

The remarkable thing about Reuben is that he was of so little importance in the history of Israel, and yet in all the traditions he is represented as the firstborn. He, however, lost his birthright, the reason for which is apparently given by J (Gn 35²²), viz., because he had lain with his father's concubine, Bilhah. Unfortunately, the remainder of the story, which probably told what Israel did when 'he heard of it,' has been dropped. The Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49²⁻⁴) attributes his decadence to the curse pronounced upon him for the act:

'Reuben, thou wast my firstborn,
My strength, and the first of my virility;
Over-impetuous, exceedingly passionate,
Seething like water, thou shalt not excel;
For thou didst ascend thy father's bed,
Then cursed I my couch thou didst ascend.'

[Reading the first part of the last line with Gunkel (p. 434) and the second part with LXX.]

In the 'Blessing of Moses' (Dt 33⁶) the curse has sealed his doom, and a pitiful remnant depleted in strength is all that remains:

'Let Reuben live, and let him not die,
Yet, let his men be very few.'

The meaning of this alleged incest, stated in the language of tribal history, seems to be that the Reubenites committed some outrage upon the Bilhah clans, which was resented and punished by Israel, Dan, and Naphtali and perhaps other tribes. As Dan and Naphtali were settled together in the north, it is not improbable (and there are some indications of this) that at an earlier time they may have been neighbours in the south, and there have come into conflict with Reuben.

It is worth noticing in this connexion that two of the descendants of Reuben given in the genealogy of Reuben (Gn 46⁹ etc.), viz. Hezron and Carmi, reappear as Judahites; Hezron as the grandson of Judah (Gn. 46¹² etc.) and Carmi in Jos 7¹⁻¹⁸. Moreover, Shimei is a Reubenite 1 Ch 5⁴, a Simeonite 1 Ch 4²⁷, and a Levite Ex 6¹⁷. In Jos 15⁵ P, in describing the lot of Judah, makes the north border go up by the stone of Bohan, the son of Reuben.' Either, then, as it would seem, Reuben must have first settled in the West, or else Reubenite clans migrated thither from the East. These facts are not conclusive, but they support the theory that Reuben was first settled in the West. Another explanation is given, e.g. by Stade (GVV, p. 151), to the effect that the Reuben-Bilhah story may refer to the custom in vogue among the heathen Arabs of inheriting the father's concubines with his other possessions, and that the tribe of Reuben may have held to it, being less advanced culturally than the others. In this way, therefore, it is implied, they may have brought upon themselves the displeasure of the other tribes who stood upon a higher moral plane. This is not in harmony with the tradition which makes Reuben's offence one against Israel. Besides, it is an illustration of OT writing in which the virtues of a later age are ascribed to the earlier. Bathsheba did not scruple to ask Abishag for Adonijah, and Solomon did not object on moral grounds (1 K 2).

P in his Sinai census (Nu 1²¹ 2¹¹) enumerates the tribe at 46,500 fighting men. At Moab it had decreased to 43,730 (26⁷).

Reuben is linked with Gad (Nu 32) in connexion with the conquest. The inviting pasturage of the East Jordan is said to have determined these pastoral tribes to settle on the east. Moses, however, requires of them that they shall first cross over and aid the other tribes in getting possession of their respective lots. When this was effected, we are told in Jos 22⁷, that Joshua sent them back with great riches of spoils to their tents (see GAD). Nothing is said, however, of the previous settlement of Judah; nor, indeed, are we told of that anywhere.

The territory of the tribe is said in Nu 32³⁷. 38 (P) to have included six cities, which appear to have formed a sort of enclave within Gadite territory. 'The children of Reuben built Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Kiriathaim; and Nebo, and Baal-meon (their names being changed), and Sibmah; and gave other names unto the cities which they builded.' The names given here must be the original names, as it is improbable that the author would allow the worshippers of Jahweh to couple with the names of their cities the gods Nebo and Baal. But we nowhere read of the new names. Their list of cities is increased in Jos 13⁴⁶, without regard to the above list, Kiriathaim and Sibmah being the only ones in it that are mentioned. Three cities elsewhere assigned to Gad and four assigned elsewhere to Moab are here given to Reuben.

Reuben is rebuked in the Song of Deborah, because it did not participate in the war against Sisera, in words that reflect the pastoral occupation of its people. It is there followed by Gilead (Gad). In the Mesha inscription (9th cent.), though the 'men of Gad' are referred to as having dwelt in Ataroth 'from of old,' the name of Reuben is omitted, though some of the cities ascribed to the tribe in the genealogies are said to have been taken or rebuilt. As we have seen in the above reference to the Blessing of Moses (probably about the first half of the 8th cent.), the tribe was apparently reduced at that time to an inconsiderable remnant—'men of number,' i.e. so few that they might easily be counted. It is, however, still mentioned in 2 K 10³³ as though it maintained its separate organization when Hazael of Damascus overran and smote the eastern Israelites. Its name appears more than one hundred years later, when Tiglath-pileser III. deported the tribes to Assyria in 734 (1 Ch 5²⁶). In all probability, however, it had long before ceased to exist as an independent unit (see GAD). See also THIRDS. JAMES A. CRAIG.

REUEL.—1. A son of Esau (Gn 36⁴, 10, 13, 17, 1 Ch 1³⁸, 47). 2. Ex 2¹⁴, Nu 10²⁹ (AV in the latter Raguel). See HOBAB and JETHRO. 3. The father of Eliasaph (Nu 2¹⁴; called [probably by mistaking r for d] Deuel in 11⁴ 7⁴², 47 10²⁹). 4. A Benjamite (1 Ch 9⁶).

REUMAH.—The concubine of Nahor (Gn 22²⁴).

REVELATION.—1. Meaning of revelation.—The English word, which comes from the Latin, implies the drawing back of a veil, the unveiling of something hidden. It is the almost exact equivalent of the NT word apocalypse or 'uncovering' (Rev 1¹). For our present purpose the word is specially applied to the revelation of God, the 'unveiling' of the unseen God to the mind and heart of man. The application of the word is very varied. The widest sense is that in which it is used by Gwatkin (Knowledge of God, vol. 1, p. 5): 'Any fact which gives knowledge is a revelation, . . . the revelation and the knowledge of God are correlative terms expressing two sides of the same thing.' The following specific uses of the term need consideration: (a) The revelation of God through nature. This refers to the indications of wisdom, power, and purpose in the material world around (Ro 1²⁰). (b) The revelation of God in man. This applies to the traces of God in man's conscience with its sense of obligation, in his emotional nature with its desire and capacity for fellowship, in his personality which demands personality for its satisfaction. (c) The revelation of God in history. This means the marks of an over-ruling providence and purpose in the affairs of mankind, of a Divinity that has shaped man's ends, the traces of a progress and onward sweep in history. All these aspects of revelation are usually summed up in the term 'natural religion,' and do not touch the specific meaning of revelation which is associated with Christianity. (d) The revelation of God in Judaism and Christianity. By revelation, as applied in this way, we mean a special, historical, supernatural communication from God to man. Not merely information about God, but a revelation—a disclosure of God Himself in His character and His relation to man. In addition to revelation through nature, conscience, and reason, Christianity implies a special revelation in the Person of Christ.

2. Problem of revelation.—The statement of the full content of the Christian revelation is naturally excluded from this article, but for our purpose we may say briefly that its essence is the self-manifestation of God in the Person of Christ for the redemption of mankind. Christianity is the revelation of God's grace for man through the historic Personality of Christ. The problem is to correlate this supernatural content with the historical process by means of which it has been revealed, and to do justice at once to the superhuman fact and content, and the human media and conditions of the revelation. In so doing we shall be brought face to face with the antitheses of revelation and discovery, of revelation and speculation, of revelation and evolution; and, while we recognize to the full the historical processes by which Christianity has come to us, we shall see that the gospel of Christ is not adequately accounted for except by means of a personal revelation of God, using and guiding history for the purpose, and that it cannot be explained merely in terms of history, discovery, philosophy, and evolution.

3. Possibility of revelation.—We argue this on two grounds. (a) From the Being of God. Granted a God as a Supreme Being (which for our present purpose we assume), He must necessarily be able to reveal Himself to man. Given God as personal, this includes the power of self-revelation. Belief in a Divine Being at once makes revelation possible. A bare theism has never been a permanent standing-ground, for men either have receded from it or have gone forward in the direction of the Christian revelation. (b) From the nature of man. The fact of personality, with all its possibilities, implies man's capacity for communion with a Being higher than himself, or higher than any other human personality. 'Thou hast made us for Thyself, O Lord, and our heart is restless until it rests in Thee' (Augustine).

4. Probability of revelation.—This also we argue on two grounds: (a) from the nature of God, and (b) from the needs of man. Granted a Supreme Personal Being, we believe not only in His ability, but in His willingness to reveal Himself to man. Belief in God prepares us to expect a revelation. Human personality with its capacity for God prepares us to expect a revelation, which thus becomes antecedently probable. The desire for it is an argument for expecting it. Man, as man, needs a revelation to guide him, an authority above and greater than himself in things spiritual and Divine. Still more does man as a sinner need such a Divine revelation. Amid the sins and sorrows, the fears and trials, the difficulties and perplexities of life, man needs some Divine revelation that will assure him of salvation, holiness, and immortality. No one can say that the light of nature is sufficient for these needs, and that therefore a revelation could add nothing. Most men would agree that there is at least room for a revelation in view of the sin and suffering in the world. Our deepest instincts cry out against the thought that sin is final or permanent, and yet it is equally clear that nothing but an interposition from above can deal with it. It is impossible to conceive of God leaving man to himself without a definite, clear, and sufficient manifestation of His own character. His will, His love His grace.

5. Credibility of revelation.—The proofs of a Divine revelation are many, varied, converging, and cumulative, (a) Speculatively, we may argue that 'the universe points to idealism, and idealism to theism, and theism to a revelation' (Illingworth, Reason and Revelation, p. 243). (b) Historically, the Christian revelation comes to us commended by its witnesses in (1) miracle, (2) prophecy, and (3) spiritual adaptation to human nature. (c) Behind all these are the presuppositions of natural religion as seen in nature, man, and history, (d) But ultimately the credibility of Christianity as a revelation rests on the Person of its Founder, and all evidences converge towards and centre in Him. Christ is Christianity, and Christians believe primarily and fundamentally in the fact and trustworthiness of Christ. Herein lies the final proof of the credibility of Christianity as a Divine revelation. If it be said that God has made other manifestations of Himself in the course of history, we do not deny it. All truth, however mediated, must necessarily have come from the primal Source of truth. The genuineness of Christianity does not necessarily disprove the genuineness of other religions as 'broken lights.' Each system claiming to be a revelation, whether partial or final, must be tested by its own evidence, and a decision made accordingly. The real criterion of all religions claiming to be Divine is their power to save. It is not truth in itself, but truth as exemplified in human life and delivering from sin, that constitutes the final proof of a religion. Not the ideal, but the ideal practically realized in human experience, is the supreme test. When this is applied, the true relation of Christianity to other systems is at once seen.

6. Methods of revelation.—(a) The Christian revelation is first and foremost a revelation of life. Christianity is primarily a religion of facts rather than of truths, the doctrines only arising out of the facts. All through the historic period God's manifestation has been given to life. Whether we think of the patriarchs, kings, and prophets of the OT, or of Christ and His Apostles in the NT, revelation has ever been connected with human life and personality. (b) But mediately it has been given in word, first oral and then written. Both in the OT and in the NT we notice first what God was and did to men, and afterwards what He said. We can and must distinguish between the revelation and the record, the former being necessarily prior to the latter, but nevertheless the revelation needed the record for accuracy and availability. At the same time it is essential to remember that Scripture is not simply a record of a revelation, but that the history itself is a revelation of God. On the one hand, the Bible is a product of the Divine process of self-manifestation; and, on the other, the Bible itself makes God known to man. Christianity, therefore, like Judaism before it, is a book religion (though it is also much more), as recording and conveying the Divine manifestation to man. A revelation must be embodied somewhere to be made available for all generations, and of the three possible media—human reason, an ecclesiastical institution, and a book,—the last-named is by far the most trustworthy as a vehicle of transmission. It matters not how God reveals Himself, so long as we can be sure of the accuracy of that which is transmitted. Christ is our supreme and final authority, and our one requirement is the purest, clearest form of His historic personal manifestation. We do not set aside reason because it is human, or an institution because it is liable to error, nor do we accept the book merely as a book; but we believe that the two former do not, and the latter does, enshrine for us the record of Christ's revelation in its best available form.

7. Development of revelation.—Revelation has been mediated through history, and has therefore been progressive. (a) Primitive revelation is the first stage. How men first came to conceive of God must remain a matter of conjecture. As there is so little known about primitive man, so also there must be about primitive religion. One thing, however, is quite clear, that the terms 'savage' and 'primitive' are not synonymous, for the savage to-day often represents a degeneration from primitive man. All analogy favours the idea that primitive revelation was such a manifestation of God when man was created as would be sufficient to maintain a true relation with Him, that at the Creation man had an immediate capacity, however immature, of entering into fellowship with God; and with this religious endowment we may assume a measure of Divine revelation sufficient to enable man to worship in an elementary way, and to keep true to God. No one is able to prove this, but there is no reason to deny its possibility or probability. Without some such assumption, all idea of revelation vanishes, and religion is resolved into merely human conceptions of God. Revelation is more than the soul's instinctive apprehension of God, for the simple reason that the instinctive apprehension itself has to be accounted for. The difficulties urged by some writers on the philosophy of religion against primitive revelation arise out of the assumption that all revelations are mere natural processes. There is no argument against primitive revelation which is not valid against all revelation, Christianity included. The power and possibility of man's self-development towards God are inconsistent with the fact of sin and man's bent towards evil. (b) OT revelation. However and whenever the OT came into existence, we cannot help being conscious of something in it beyond that which is merely human and historical. There is that in the OT characters and record which cannot be explained solely in terms of historic continuity. The OT does not merely represent an endeavour to obtain an ever worthier idea of God; it records a true idea of God impressed on the people in the course of history, under a Divine direction which we call a revelation. The OT conception of God is so vastly different from that which obtained in the surrounding nations, that unless we predicate something supernatural, there is no possibility of accounting for so marked a difference between people who were in other respects so very much alike. As Wellhausen truly says, 'Why did not Chemosh of Moab, for instance, develop into a God of Righteousness, and the Creator of heaven and earth?' It is possible to give a satisfying answer to this question only by predicating a Divine revelation in the OT. (c) The NT revelation. The historical revelation culminated in the manifestation of Jesus Christ. It was given at a particular time and place, mediated through One Person, and authenticated by supernatural credentials. In Christ the self-disclosure of God reached its climax, and the NT is the permanent witness of the uniqueness of Christianity in the world. 'God, who in ancient days spoke to our forefathers in many distinct messages and by various methods through the prophets, has at the end of these days spoken unto us through a Son' (He 1st, Weymouth). And the Person of Christ is utterly inexplicable in terms of history, or discovery, and requires the hypothesis of revelation.

This brief sketch of the historical development of revelation will enable us to understand the importance of the truth of the progressiveness of revelation. God taught men as they were able to bear it, leading them step by step from the dawn to the noonday of His self-disclosure. While each stage of the revelation was adequate for that time, it was not necessarily adequate with reference to succeeding stages. This principle of progress enables us to avoid a twofold error: it prevents us from undervaluing the OT by reason of the fuller light of the NT; and it prevents us from using the OT in any of its stages without guidance from the completer revelation of the NT. We thus distinguish carefully between the dispensational truth intended absolutely for immediate need at each stage, and those permanent elements in the OT which are of eternal validity. It is necessary to remember the difference between what is written for us and to us. All Scripture was written for our learning, but not all was written to us directly. If it be said that revelation should be universal, and not limited to one time or place or nation, the answer is that the historical method is in exact accordance with the method of communicating and receiving all our knowledge. It is obvious that in the course of history some nations and men have influenced mankind more than others, and this fact constitutes an analogy, and argues the possibility that a special revelation might also be mediated through some particular race and person. Further, by limiting revelation in this way, God took the best means of preserving the revelation from corruption. Continuous and universal tradition has very few safeguards against deterioration, as the Jewish history only too clearly shows. Our acceptance of the revelation enshrined in the NT is based on the belief that it comes through men uniquely authorized and equipped to declare God's will. Its authority depends on the fact that their special relation to Christ and their exceptional possession of the Spirit gave them the power to receive and declare God's truth for mankind. Not fitness to edify, or age, or the possession of truth, but with these, and underlying them, the presence of a Divine element in the men whose writings we possess, gives the books their authority for us as a record and vehicle of Divine revelation. This uniqueness may be seen by a simple appeal to fact. The comparison of the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic ages shows the uniqueness of the NT. Between the first and second centuries there is a chasm 'sheer, abrupt, abysmal' (Schaff), and no transition exists which was so silent, and yet so sudden and remarkable. The most beautiful product of the second century, the Epistle of Diognetus, is incomparably inferior to any book of the NT. 'There is no steeper descent in history than that which directly follows the Apostolic age. We pass at once from writings unsurpassed in creative power to writings of marked intellectual poverty, . . . the distinction commonly made between the books of the Canon and the rest is fully justified' (Gwatkin, Knowledge of God, ii. 80). This difference marks the distinction between the Spirit of God in revelation and in illumination. Since the close of the NT times there has been strictly no addition to the revelation, but only its manifold realization and application in the Christian Church and the world. It should be carefully noted that we believe in the Divine revelation contained in the Scriptures, without holding any particular theory of inspiration. The supreme question is whether they contain a revelation of Divine truth. Are they true and trustworthy for our spiritual life? If so, they are authoritative whatever may have been the precise method of their delivery. The primary question is not the method of inspiration, but the fact of authority. Yet, however difficult it may be to define its character or limits, we believe in a special inspiration of the Bible based on the authority of its authors and on their unique power to reveal God's will. This special inspiration is (1) testified to by the Scriptures themselves, (2) has ever been held in the Christian Church, and (3) constantly authenticates itself to the Christian conscience through the ages.

8. Purpose of revelation.—The essential purpose of revelation is life: the gift of the life of God to the life of man. Its practical character is stamped on every part. The 'chief end of revelation' is not philosophy, though it has a philosophy profound and worthy. It is not doctrine, though it has a doctrine satisfying and inspiring. It is not enjoyment, though it has its experiences precious and lasting. It is not even morality, though it has its ethic unique and powerful. Christianity has all these, but is far more than them all. It is the religion of redemption, including salvation from sin, equipment for holiness, and provision for life to be lived in fellowship with God and for His glory. The 'chief end' of revelation is the union of God and man, and in that union the fulfilment of all God's purposes for the world. The elements of sonship, worship, stewardship, fellowship, heirship, practically sum up the purpose of Divine revelation as it concerns man's life—a life in which he receives God's grace, realizes God's will, reproduces God's character, renders God service, and rejoices in God's presence in the Kingdom of grace below and the Kingdom of glory above.

W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS.

REVELATION, BOOK OF.—This single representative of the literature of apocalypse (Gr. apokalypsis, whence the alternating name, 'The Apocalypse') preserved in the NT belongs to a large group of Christian writings of a similar sort. It was characteristic of the early Church to build up a literature about the names of the various Apostles. Normally this literature consisted of a narrative, an apocalypse, and some form of doctrinal writing; as, for example, the Gospel of Peter, the Apocalypse of Peter, and the Preaching of Peter. With the exception of the present book, no Christian apocalypse is held to be even possibly authentic.

1. Canonicity.—The Revelation was not universally accepted by the early Church as canonical. There is no evidence of its existence worthy of consideration in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers, although it is just possible that Papias may have known of it. By the middle of the 2nd cent., however, Revelation is well known, and is declared by Justin to be by the Apostle John (Dial. lxxxi. 15). It is also used, among others, by Melito, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen, and attributed to the Apostle John by the first-named as well as by Irenæus. The fact that it appears in the Canon of the Muratorian Fragment is evidence that by the middle of the 2nd cent. it was accepted in the West. After its defence by Hippolytus its position was never seriously questioned except in the East. Jerome is, in fact, the only Western theologian of importance who doubts it, and he puts it among those books which are 'under discussion,' neither canonical nor apocryphal.

In the East, as might be expected, it was rejected by Marcion, and, because of disbelic in its Apostolic authorship, by Dionysius of Alexandria (middle of the 3rd cent.). Palestinian and Syrian authors (e.g. Cyril of Jerusalem) generally rejected it, in large measure because of the struggle with the Montanists, by whom Revelation was used as a basis of doctrine. It does not appear in the lists of the Synod of Laodicea, the Apostolic Constitutions, Gregory of Nazianus, Chrysostom, the Chronography of Nicéphorus, the 'List of the Sixty Books,' or in the Peshitta version of the NT. It was included by the Gelasian Decree at the end of the 5th cent. as canonical, and was finally recognized by the Eastern Church. Yet as late as 692 a Synod could publish two decrees, the one including the Apocalypse in the Canon, the other excluding it. It was not held in high repute by the reformers Caristadt, Luther, Zwingli, all of whom doubted its Apostolicity, or apparently by Calvin, who omitted to comment upon it. At most, the first two of these theologians were apparently inclined to recognize a division of sacred writings similar to that of Jerome.

2. Authorship.—The title, 'Revelation of John,' which occurs in several MSS, including the Codex Sinaiticus, is an obvious expression of a belief regarding authorship. This John was believed by many in the early Church to be the Apostle. Whether this view was correct or not is to-day a subject of lively debate. The book itself contains little internal evidence serving to substantiate this claim, for the author simply states that he is named John (1st 4, 9 22nd). Justin (Dial. lxxxi. 15) distinctively states that Revelation is by 'John, one of the Apostles of Christ,' and Tertullian along with the Western Church generally held to its Apostolic authorship. Eusebius, however, suggests that it may have been written by John 'the Presbyter,' mentioned by Papias but otherwise unknown. At the present time the belief is divided as to whether the author of Revelation is John the Apostle or John the Presbyter. The chief argument against the view that the author is John the Apostle lies in the differences existing between Revelation and the Gospel and the Epistles of John, both in style and in method. Notwithstanding the use of the term 'Logos' (19th), these divergences are too obvious to need specifying. If Johannine authorship be assigned the Gospel and Epistles, it is difficult to claim it for Revelation; but, on the other hand, it is difficult to believe it to be either pseudonymous or written by the mysterious John the Presbyter. As the case now stands, criticism seems to have reached an impasse, and the plain reader may best use the book in disregard of questions of authorship,—a procedure the more justifiable because its teaching is independent of personal matters.

3. Date.—Although the fixing of the date of Revelation presupposes conclusions as to its composition and purpose, it may here be said that in all probability the book reached its present form in the latter part of the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81–96).

REVELATION, BOOK OF

4. Composition.—The prevailing hypotheses may be grouped in three classes.

(1) The currently accepted view that it was written entirely by the Apostle John. Such a view is, however, open to serious objections, because of the similarities, if not identities, existing between Revelation and other apocalyptic literature of the period, as well as because of the evidences of composite character of the writing, implying sources of different origins and dates, such as the various breaks in the process of the vision (the lack of any single historical point of view is seen by a comparison of 12^a 13^a 17^a, in an effort to identify historically the two breaks, or in a comparison of 11^a-12^a with 17^a).

(2) The view that the work, while essentially a literary unit, is a Christian redaction of a Jewish writing. This view would attribute to the Christian redactor the first three chapters and important sections like 5^a-14 7^a-17 13^{11a}. 22^a-23, in addition to separate verses like 12¹¹ 14^a. & 12¹³. 15 16¹⁵ 17¹⁴ 19^a. 10. 13^b 20^a & 21^{15b-3}. The difficulties with this position are not only those which must be urged against any view that overlooks the evidences of the composite authorship of the work, but also the impossibility of showing that ch. 11 is Jewish in character.

(3) Theories of composite origin.—These are of various forms—(a) The theory according to which an original work has been interpolated with apocalyptic material of various dates (7^a-8. 9-17 11^a-12 12¹¹. 12-17 13¹⁷) and subjected to several revisions. (b) The view that Revelation is a Christian book in which Jewish apocalypses have been framed. (c) The theory according to which Revelation is composed of three sources, each of which has subdivisions, all worked together by a Christian redactor. (d) Notwithstanding the difficulty in determining the sources, critics are pretty thoroughly agreed that, as the book now stands, it has a unity which, though not inconsistent with the use of older material by its author, is none the less easily recognized. Some of this older material, it is now held, undoubtedly represents the general stream of apocalyptic that took its rise in Babylonian mythology. The structural unity of the book appears in the repetition of sevenfold groups of episodes, as well as in a general grammatical and linguistic similarity. In achieving this remarkable result, the redactor so combined, recast, and supplemented his material as to give the book an essentially Christian rather than Jewish character.

5. Analysis.—As it now stands, literary and critical analyses do not altogether coincide, but until criticism has finished its task, literary analysis must be of primary importance. Authorities here differ, but the following analysis does not differ fundamentally from that of other writers.

- i. Introduction (ch. 1).
- ii. The message of the Spirit to the Seven Churches (chs. 2, 3).
- iii. The period of struggle and misery (chs. 4-7).
- iv. The final Messianic struggle (chs. 8-14).
- v. The victory of the Messiah (chs. 15-20).
- vi. The vision of the Messianic Kingdom (chs. 21-22^a).
- vii. Epilogue (22^a-23).

6. Interpretation.—No Biblical writing, with the possible exception of the Book of Daniel, has been so subjected to the vagaries of interpreters as Revelation. (a) On the one extreme are those ('Futurists') who have seen in its pictures a forecast of universal Christian history, as well as all the enemies of Christianity, both within and without the Church. To such interpreters the book has been a thesaurus of that chiliastic doctrine which the Greek as well as the modern scientific attitude of mind has found so repugnant. (b) At the other extreme there are those interpreters who see in Revelation simply a reference to the historical conditions of the first century of the Christian era. (c) There is a measure of truth in each of these two methods, but the real method of interpretation must be independent of dogmatic presuppositions. As narrative matter must be interpreted by the general principles applicable to all literature of its class, so must Revelation be interpreted in accordance with the general principles applicable to apocalypses as a form of literary expression. The fundamental principles of such interpretation involve the recognition of the facts—(i.) that apocalypses are the outgrowth of definite historical situations; (ii.) that they attempt to stimulate faith by an exposition in symbolic terms of the deliverance which God will give His suffering people from actually existing sufferings; (iii.) that the message of deliverance gains authority because of its claim to superhuman origin reinforced by pseudonymous authorship; (iv.) that the deliverance which is thus supernaturally portrayed is dependent upon the introduction of a new age whose conditions are set miraculously by God rather than by evolving historical forces, and is not described with the same detail as are the conditions from which God is to deliver His people.

An application of these principles to the interpretation of Revelation demands (1) that an historical interpretation be given the pictures describing the miseries of the Church. The conditions of such interpretation are most naturally fulfilled in the persecution under Domitian (81-96), although there may be references to that under the dead Nero. The persecuting force is clearly Rome, as represented both by the Emperor and by Emperor-worship, whatever the origin of the pictures with which the oppression of the Church is set forth. A point of departure for the identification of the historical figures who are to be subjected to the Messianic punishment might be thought to be the number of the Beast—666—that is to say, the Emperor Nero, who was expected to return from the dead (see BEAST [IN APOC.]). Pseudo-Nero did, in fact, appear in Asia Minor in A.D. 69, and among the Parthians in 79-81 and 88. The identification, however, is not altogether satisfactory, as the Hebrew letters, whose numerical equivalents give by the process of Gematria 666, are not precisely those in Caesar Nero. If the correct reading be 616, the equivalent is Gaius Caesar. Another interpretation would make 'the Latin or the Roman Empire.' The best that can be said, however, is that if the interpretation by Gematria is unsatisfactory, the interpreter is forced back upon the general references of 'the hills,' 'the city,' and 'the horns' or kings, as a basis for regarding Rome as the great enemy of the Christian and his Church.

A further difficulty in formulating precisely the historical situation, arises from the fact that the author, though producing a book of great literary unity, has embodied sources which refer to conditions of different times. Thus 11^a-12 would naturally infer the existence of the Temple, which was destroyed in 70; ch. 13 may have come from the days of Caligula; 17¹⁰ most naturally implies some time in the reign of Nero; 17¹¹ apparently implies Domitian, the eighth emperor; 17¹² would also argue that the book was written during the period that believed in Nero redivivus. The redactor (or redactors) has, however, so combined these materials as to give a unified picture of the approaching Messianic struggle.

(2) On the other hand, the deliverance of the Church is, like all apocalyptic deliverances, miraculous, and described transcendently. Besides the martyrs, the only identification possible in this connexion is that of the conquering Lamb with Jesus the Christ. The fall of Rome is foretold definitely in ch. 17, but the seer is true to the general apocalyptic form in that he makes Rome and its religion the agents of Satan. The ultimate victory of the Church is similarly portrayed as the victory of God, and is identified with the return of Jesus to establish His Messianic Kingdom.

Such a method of interpretation, based upon general characteristics of apocalypses, preserves the element of truth in both the futurist and the historical methods of interpretation, the pictures of persecution symbolizing actual historical conditions, but the forecast of deliverance reverting to the general Messianic expectation of events lying outside of history.

The sublime theme of Revelation thus becomes evident—the victory of the Messiah over the Roman Empire, together with the miseries to be inflicted on His enemies and the blessings to be enjoyed by His followers.

7. Religious value.—If properly interpreted, Revelation is of really profound religious value. It cannot serve as a basis of theology, but, like any piece of imaginative writing, will serve to stir the emotion and the faith of the Christian. Its literary form is so remarkable, the passages descriptive of the triumph of the Messianic Kingdom are so exquisite, its religious teaching is so impressive, as not only to warrant its inclusion in the Canon, but also to make it of lasting value to the devotional life. More particularly the Letters to the Churches are of value as criticism and inspiration for various classes of Christians, while its pictures of the New Jerusalem and its insistence upon the moral qualifications for the citizens of the Messianic Kingdom are in themselves notable incentives to right living. Stript of its apocalyptic figures, the book presents a noble ideal of Christian character, an assurance of the unfailing justice of God, and a prophecy of the victory of Christianity over a brutal social order.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

REVENGE.—See AVENGER OF BLOOD, KIN [NEXT OF].

REVISED VERSION.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS, 35.

REVIVE.—In 1 K 17^a, 2 K 13^a, Neh 4^a, Ro 14^a, 'to revive' is literally 'to come to life again,' as in Shaks. 1 Henry VI. i. 1. 18—'Henry is dead, and never shall revive.' We thus see the force of Ro 7^a 'When the commandment came, sin revived, and I died.'

REZEPH.—A city mentioned in the message of the Rabshakeh of Sennacherib to Hezekiah (2 K 19^a, Is 37^a). It is the Ratsappa or Ratsapi of the Assyrian inscriptions, the modern Rasafa, between Palmyra and the Euphrates. This district belonged for several centuries to the Assyrians, and many of the tablets show it to have been an important trade-centre. Between B.C. 839 and 737 the prefects who had authority in the place were, to all appearance, Assyrians, only one, of unknown but apparently late date, having a name which may be West Semitic, namely, Abda, possibly a form of Abda or Obadiah. T. G. PINCHES.

REZIN.—From the ancient versions and the cuneiform inscriptions it is clear that the form should be Razon or Razin.

1. The last king of Damascus. Towards the close of the 8th cent. B.C. Damascus and Israel were under the suzerainty of Assyria. Tiglath-pileser III. enumerates the articles paid him in tribute by Ra-sun-nu of Damascus and Menahem of Israel (B.C. 738). PEKAH, one of Menahem's successors, joined Rezin in the attempt to throw off the yoke. Failing to secure the co-operation of Ahaz, they turned their arms against Judah (B.C. 734). 2 K 16^a mentions, among the incidents of the campaign, that Rezin 'recovered Elath to Syria, and drove the Jews from Elath.' [This statement originated in a scribal error, the r in Aram ('Syria') having been accidentally substituted for the d of Edom, and Rezin's name being added still later for the sake of completeness (cf. 2 Ch 28^a).] The two allies besieged Jerusalem, greatly to the alarm of the populace, and Isaiah strove in vain to allay the terror (Is 7–9). Ahaz implored aid from Tiglath-pileser, to whom he became tributary (2 K 16^a). On the approach of the Assyrians, Pekah was murdered by his own subjects. Damascus sustained a siege of more than a year's duration, but was eventually taken (A.C. 732), and Rezin was slain (2 K 16^a). Rawlinson found an inscription on which this was recorded, but the stone has unfortunately disappeared. It is not quite certain who 'the son of Tabeel' (Is 7^a) is. Winckler (Alttest. Untersuch., p. 741.) fails to carry conviction in his attempt to identify this man with Rezin. More probably he was the tool whom the confederates proposed to seat on the throne of Judah.

2. The 'children of Rezin' are mentioned as a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2^a, Neh 7⁶⁰). Like the Nethinim generally, they were very likely of foreign descent. In 1 Es 5^a they are called 'sons of Daisan,'—another instance of the confusion of r and d. J. TAYLOR.

REZON.—According to the Heb. text of 1 K 11²²⁻²⁵, Rezon, son of Eliada, was one of the military officers of that Hadadezer, king of the little realm of Zobah (cuneiform, Subiti), S. of Damascus and not far from the Sea of Tiberias, whom David overthrew (2 S 8³⁰). For some unknown reason he deserted Hadadezer, gathered a band of freebooters, seized Damascus, and founded there the dynasty which created the most powerful of the Syrian kingdoms. He was a thorn in Solomon's side, and his successors were bitter adversaries of Israel. Unfortunately, the text presents a suspicious appearance. Vv. 22-25^a have evidently been interpolated between 22 and 25^b, and in the best MSS of the LXX the story, with some variations, follows v. 14. In either position it interrupts the course of the narrative, and the best solution of the difficulty is to regard it as a gloss, embodying a historical reminiscence. There is not sufficient evidence for the view maintained by Thénius and Klostermann, that the name should be spelled Hezron and identified with Hezion (1 K 15¹⁸).

J. TAYLOR.

RHEGIUM (now Reggio) was an old Greek colony near the south-western extremity of Italy, and close to the point from which there is the shortest passage to Sicily. Messina (modern Messina) on the opposite side is but 6 or 7 miles distant from Rhegium. The whirlpool of Charybdis and the rock of Scylla are in this neighbourhood, and were a terror to the ancient navigators with their small vessels. Rhegium was in consequence a harbour of importance, where favourable winds were awaited. The situation of the city exposed it to changes of government. In the 3rd cent. B.C. Rome entered into a special treaty with it. In NT times the population was mixed Græco-Latin. St. Paul's ship waited here one day for a favourable south wind to take her to Puteoli. Ac 28¹³ describes how the ship had to tack to get from Syracuse to Rhegium, owing to the changing winds. A. SOUTER.

RHEIMS VERSION.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS, 29.

RHESA.—A son of Zerubbabel (Lk 3²⁷).

RHODA.—The name of the maid-servant in the house of Mary, John Mark's mother, when St. Peter came there on his release from prison by the angel (Ac 12¹³).

A. J. MACLEAN.

RHODES was one of the most important and successful cities in ancient Greece. It was founded in B.C. 408, at the N.E. corner of the island of the same name, which is 43 miles long and 20 miles wide at its widest. The situation was admirable, and the people were able to take advantage of it and to build up a splendid position in the world of commerce. It reached the summit of its success in the 2nd cent. B.C., after the settlement with Rome in 189 made it mistress of great part of Caria and Lycia. Rome's trade interests were seriously interfered with by this powerful rival, and in B.C. 166 Rome declared the Carian and Lycian cities independent, and made Delos a free port. Its conspicuous loyalty to Rome during the first Mithradatic War was rewarded by the recovery of part of its former Carian possessions. It took the side of Cæsar in the civil war, although most of the East supported Pompey, and suffered successive misfortunes, which reduced it to a common provincial town, though it remained a free city in St. Paul's time, and retained its fine harbours, walls, streets, and stores. St. Paul touched here on his way from Troas to Caesarea (Ac 21¹), as it was a regular port of call on that route. Rhodes is mentioned in 1 Mac 15²² as one of the free States to which the Romans sent letters in favour of the Jews. Ezk 27¹⁵, according to the LXX, reads 'sons of the Rhodians': this is an error; the mention of them in Gn 10⁴ (LXX) and 1 Ch 1⁷ (LXX) is probably correct. The famous Colossus was a statue of the sun-god at the harbour entrance, 105 feet high. It stood only from b.c. 280 to 224. A. SOUTER.

RHODOCUS.—A Jewish traitor (2 Mac 13²¹).

RIBAI.—The father of Ittai (2 S 23³⁰—1 Ch 11³¹).

RIBLAH.—1. An important town (mod. Ribleh) and military station on the eastern bank of the Orontes, 50 miles S. of Hamath. It is mentioned in the Bible only in the literature of the Chaldaean period, and was apparently the headquarters of Nebuchadrezzar the Great for his South-Syrian and Palestinian dominions. From this position the Phœnician cities of the coast were within easy command, as also were Coele-Syria and the kingdom of Damascus, along with the land-routes leading farther south. Here judgment was pronounced upon Zedekiah and his officers (2 K 25^{20, 22}, Jer 39^{14, 52nd}).

The statement of 2 K 23³⁴, that Pharaoh-necho put Jehoahaz in bonds at Riblah in the land of Hamath, is to be corrected by the parallel passage 2 Ch 36⁵, where the transaction is said to have taken place in Jerusalem itself. The true reading is, 'and Pharaoh-necho removed him from reigning in Jerusalem' (cf. also the LXX). It was the later action of Nebuchadrezzar with regard to Zedekiah, above referred to, that suggested the change in the text. The phrase 'in the land of Hamath' (2 K 25²⁴) is to be compared with the 'nineteen districts of LXX' enumerated in the Annals of Tiglath-pileser III.

Riblah should be read for Diblah in Ezk 6⁴. See No. 2.

2. Riblah (with the article) is, if the reading is correct, mentioned as one of the eastern boundary marks of Israel in Nu 34¹¹. The place intended was not far N.E. of the Sea of Galilee, but the exact site is unknown.

It was, of course, not the Riblah on the Orontes. It is remarkable, however, that this Riblah is mentioned in connexion with the 'approach to Hamath' (v. 8), which, as Winckler has shown, was on the S.W. of Mt. Hermon, and the centre of the kingdom of Hamath of the time of David. Cf. Ezk 6⁴ as above corrected. J. F. McCURDY.

RIDDLES.—See GAMES, and PROVERB, 2.

RIE (the AV spelling of 'rye') occurs twice (Ex 9²², Is 28²²) in AV as rendering of kussemeth, which in Ezk 4⁹ is rendered 'fitches.' In all three passages RV has 'spelt.' Whatever kussemeth was, it was neither true rye, which is a cereal unknown in Palestine, nor spelt. See FITCHES. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

RIGHTEOUSNESS.—I. In OT.—

'Righteousness,' 'righteous' (except in a few passages) stand in EV for some offshoot of the Semitic root tsdq which is met with as early as the Tell el-Amarna letters in the sense of 'to be innocent.' The Heb. derivatives are the adjective tsaddiq and the nouns tsedeq and tseddaqh (which seem to be practically indistinguishable in meaning), and the verbal forms tsaddq, tseddaq, etc. This group of words is represented in EV in about 400 passages by 'righteousness,' 'righteous,' etc.; in the remainder, about one-fifth of the whole, by 'just,' 'justice,' 'justify,' 'right.' Whether the primary notion was 'straightness' or 'hardness' is uncertain, and quite immaterial for the present inquiry.

The material can be conveniently arranged under two heads: (1) righteousness in common speech; (2) righteousness in religious terminology. The order is not without significance. It has been justly remarked that the development of the idea of righteousness in OT moves in the opposite direction to that traversed by the idea of holiness. Whilst the latter starts from the Divine and comes down to the human, the former begins with the human and ascends to the Divine.

1. Righteousness in common speech.—(a) It is perhaps safest to begin with the forensic or juristic application. The plaintiff or defendant in a legal case who was in the right was 'righteous' (Dt 25¹, Is 50⁸); and his claim resting on his good behaviour was 'righteousness' (1 K 8³²). A judge who decided in favour of such a person gave 'righteous judgment,' lit. 'judgment of righteousness' (Dt 16¹⁸), judged 'righteously' (Dt 1¹⁷). The Messianic King, who would be the ideal judge, would be 'swift to do righteousness' (Is 16⁵), would 'judge the poor with righteousness' (11⁴), and would have 'righteousness for the girdle of his loins' (v. 9). A court of justice was, in theory, 'the place of righteousness' (Ec 3¹⁶). The purified Jerusalem would be 'a city of righteousness' (Is 1²⁶). On the other hand, corrupt judges 'cast down righteousness to the earth' (Am 5⁷), and 'take away the righteousness of the righteous from him' (Is 5²³). (b) From the forensic use is readily developed the general meaning 'what is right,' 'what ought to be' [some scholars invert the order of a and b, starting with the idea of 'rightness']. In Pr 16⁸ we read: 'Better is a little with righteousness (i.e., a little got by right conduct) than great revenues with injustice.' Balances, weights, and measures which came up to the required standard were 'just balances,' etc., lit. 'balances of righteousness' (Lv 19³⁶), whilst their converse were 'wicked balances,' lit. 'balances of wickedness' (Mic 6¹¹) or 'balances of deceit' (Am 8⁵). (c) Righteous speech also, i.e. truthful speech, came under the category of 'righteousness.' 'Righteous lips,' lit. 'lips of righteousness,' 'are the delight of kings' (Pr 16⁹).

2. Righteousness in religious terminology.—(a) For the ancient Hebrew, 'righteousness' was especially correspondence with the Divine will. The thought of God, indeed, was perhaps never wholly absent from his mind when he used the word. Note, for this conception of righteousness, Ezk 18⁵⁻⁹, where 'doing what is lawful and right (tseddaqh)' is illustrated by a number of concrete examples followed up by the general statement, 'hath walked in my statutes and kept my judgments to deal truly.' The man who thus acts, adds the prophet, is 'just,' rather 'righteous' (tsaddiq). The Book of Ezekiel has many references to righteousness thus understood.—(b) As the Divine will was revealed in the Law, 'righteousness' was thought of as obedience to its rules (Dt 6²⁵). Note also the description of a righteous man in Ps 1 (cf. v. 1¹ with v. 5⁶ and v. 6⁵). The expression was also used of obedience in a single instance. Restoring a pledge at sun-down was 'righteousness' (Dt 24¹⁴). The avenging deed of Phinehas was 'counted to him for righteousness' (Ps 106³¹). So we find the word in the plural: 'The Lord is righteous: he loveth righteous deeds' (Ps 117 RVm).—(c) In most of the passages quoted, and in many places in Ezk., Job, Prov., and Eccles., the righteousness of the individual is referred to; but in others Israel (Ps 14⁵ 97¹¹ 118²⁰ etc., Is 41⁸⁻¹¹, and other parts of Denitro-Isalah, Hab 1¹² etc.), or a portion of Israel (Is 51^{1, 7} etc.), is represented as 'righteous.'—(d) Since righteousness is conformity to the Divine will, and the Law which reveals that will is righteous in the whole and its parts (Ps 119^{7, 82, 78, 177} etc.), God Himself is naturally thought of as essentially righteous (Dt 32⁴ where 'just' = 'righteous'; Jer 12¹, Is 42¹, Ps 7⁹ 100¹¹ 102¹). His throne is founded on righteousness and judgment (Ps 89^{14, 40}), and all His ways exhibit righteousness (Ps 145¹⁷). As, however, Israel was often unrighteous, the righteousness of Jehovah could then be revealed to it only in judgment (Is 1²⁷ 51⁶ 10²²). In later times it was revealed in judgment on their heathen oppressors (Ps 40¹, 98² etc.).—(e) So in a number of passages, especially in Is 40-66, 'righteousness' is almost synonymous with justification, salvation (Is 45⁸ 46¹ 51¹⁰, 58⁸ 59⁹ 61¹¹ 62¹; many passages in Psalms [22¹ 24⁵ etc.], Mal 4² [Heb 3¹⁰]). For more on this subject cf. art. JUSTIFICATION.

II. In NT.—

The Greek equivalents of tsaddiq, tsedeq, etc., are dikaio (81 times), 'righteous,' 'just'; *dikaio*s (5 t.), 'justly'

'righteously'; dikaioσynē (92 t.), 'righteousness'; dikaioō (39 t.), 'justify'; dikaïōma (10 t.), 'righteousness' (4 t. [AV] 'righteous act', 'judgment', 'ordinance', 'justification'); dikaïōsis (2 t.), 'justification'; dikaïokrisia, 'righteous judgment' (Ro 2^s).

In the teaching of Jesus (Mt 5^s. 10. 20 61. 33 21^{ss}, Jn 16^s. 10), and in NT generally, 'righteousness' means, as in OT, conformity to the Divine will, but with the thought greatly deepened and spiritualized. In the Sermon on the Mount righteousness clearly includes right feeling and motive as well as right action. In Mt 6¹ (where dikaioσynē is unquestionably the true reading) there may be an echo of the later meaning acquired by tsēdāqāh, its Aramaic equivalent, the beginnings of which can be traced in LXX (Dt 6^{ss} and 8 other passages) and the Heb. Sirach about B.C. 200 (34 40¹⁷)—'benevolence', 'almsgiving.' If, as cannot be reasonably doubted, the Sermon on the Mount was originally in Aramaic, the word for 'righteousness' can hardly have been used in such a connexion without a side glance at a common popular application of it. Still, it is not safe to find more than a hint or echo.

In Mt 31^s, Zahn has observed, dikaioσynē seems to be used in the sense of dikaïōma, 'ordinance.' In the Pauline Epistles, where dikaioσynē and dikaioō are most frequently used (85 times out of 131), the former in a considerable number of cases describes not the righteousness required by God, but the righteousness bestowed by God and accepted by faith in Christ (Ro 11⁷ etc.).

For fuller treatment cf. art. JUSTIFICATION.

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

RIMMON (god).—Rimmon is the Hebraized form of Rammān, the Bab. air-, weather-, and storm-god assimilated by popular etymology to the word for 'pomegranate.' He is mentioned, however (in 2 K 51^s), not as a Palestinian or Babylonian, but as a Syrian, deity, who was honoured as the chief god of Damascus. Elsewhere there are many indications that the chief Aramaean divinity was called by that people not Rimmon or Rammān, but Hadad (wh. see). Rammān (meaning the thunderer) was, in fact, indigenous in Babylonia, where he played a great mythological and religious rôle, in his twofold aspect of a beneficent deity, as the giver of rain, and of a maleficent, as the maker of storms and the wielder of the thunderbolt. His symbol was the axe and a bundle of lightning-darts. He was thus in some features the analogue of Zeus or Jupiter and Thor.

In Assyria, both the Aram and the Bab. forms of the name were current (see HADAD). The currency of the latter among the Hebrews (as Rimmon) is to be attributed to the long Babylonian occupation of Palestine before Aramaean times. The same combination as the Assyrian is indicated in the Biblical Hadad-rimmon (wh. see).

J. F. McCURDY.

The emblem of Rammān was the bull, and the widespread cult of the air-god may have had something to do with nationalizing the worship of Jahweh as represented by that animal. Cf. also the name Tab-rimmon.

J. F. McCURDY.

RIMMON.—1. A Beerothite (2 S 42 4. 9). 2. The rock whither the remnants of the Benjamites fled (Jg 20^s 21^{ss}). It has been identified with a lofty rock or conical chalky hill, visible in all directions, on the summit of which stands the village of Rumḥān, about 3 miles E. of Bethel. 3. A city in the south of Judah, towards the border of Edom, Jos 15^{ss}; in 19⁷ counted to Simeon; in Zec 14^s named as lying to the far south of Jerusalem. See, further, EN-RIMMON. 4. In Jos 19^{ss} one of the boundaries of Zebulun is given as 'Rimmon which stretcheth to the Nē'āh' (AV wrongly 'Remmon-methoar to Neah'). In 1 Ch 6⁷⁷ [Heb 6^{ss}] the name appears as Rimmono, and in Jos 21^{ss} as Rimmonah (for which, by a textual error, MT has Dimnah). This Rimmon is the modern Rumḥāneh, north of Nazareth.

RIMMONAH, RIMMONO.—See RIMMON, No. 4.

RIMMON-PEREZ.—A 'station' (unidentified) of the children of Israel (Nu 33¹⁰⁴).

RING.—See ORNAMENTS, 2, 4. In Ca 5⁴ RVm 'cylinder' is preferable to EV 'ring,' the comparison being probably with the fingers of the hand.

RINGSTRAKED.—See COLOURS, 6.

RINNAH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 42^{ss}).

RIPHATH.—One of the sons of Gomer (Gn 10^s, The parallel passage 1 Ch 1^s, by a scribal error, reads Diphath).

RISSAH.—A 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 33¹¹).

RITHMAH.—A 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 33¹⁸).

RIVER.—For the meaning and use of āphāq, ye'ōr, and nachal, sometimes rendered 'river,' see art. Brook. yābāl (Jer 17^s), ābāl (Dn 8² 3. 9), are from the root yābal, 'to flow.' peleg, 'division,' signifies an artificial water-channel, used for irrigation (Ps 1^s etc.), by which the water from cistern or stream is led to the various parts of field, garden, or orchard requiring moisture. It is used poetically of the stream bringing the rain from the great storehouses on high (Ps 65^s). te'ālāh (Ezk 31^s) is properly a 'channel' or 'conduit' (so 2 K 18¹⁷ 20^{ss}, Is 7^s 36^{ss}, also Job 38^{ss} RV). The usual word for river in OT is nāhār (Job 40^{ss}, Ps 46^s etc.). It is often used of rivers that are named: e.g. the rivers of Eden (Gn 2¹⁰ etc.), the Euphrates (Gn 15¹⁸ etc.), the rivers of Damascus (2 K 5^{ss}). The Euphrates is called 'the river' (Gn 31^{ss} etc.), and 'the great river' (Gn 15¹⁸, Dt 1⁷), a title given also to the Tigris (Dn 10⁴). Aram-naharaim (Ps 60 [title], also Heb. Gn 24¹⁰, Dt 23^s), 'Aram of the two rivers,' is Mesopotamia. The word appears to have been used like the Arab. nahr, only of perennial streams. It is applied, indeed, to the Chebat (Ezk 1^s) and the Ahava (Ezr 8^{ss}), while in Ps 137^s, Nah 2⁷, Ex 7¹⁹ 8^s, canals seem to be intended. But in all these cases they were probably not mere temporary conduits, but had become established as permanent sources of supply, so that, as with Chebat and Ahava, they might have names of their own. The NT word is potamos (Mk 1^s etc.).

In the fig. language of Scripture the rising of a river in flood signifies the furious advance of invading armies (Jer 46⁷ 47^s, Is 8⁷). The trials of affliction are like the passage of dangerous fords (Is 43^s). The river is significant of abundance (Job 29^s etc.), and of the favour of God (Ps 46^s). To the obedient peace is exhausted as a river (Is 48¹⁸ 30^{ss}). Prevailing righteousness becomes resistless as an overflowing stream (Am 5^{ss}).

Palestine is not rich in rivers in our sense of the term. The Jordan is perhaps the only stream to which we should apply the name. Apart from the larger streams, the wādī of the mountain is sometimes the nahr of the plain, before it reaches the sea, if in the lower reaches it is perennial. Bearing the name nahr in modern Palestine, there are: in the Philistine plain, the Sukreir and the Rūbān; to the N. of Jaffa, el-'Aujā, el-Fālik, Eskanderāneh, el-Mejjūr, ez-Zerkā, and ed-Difleh; to the N. of Carmel, el-Muqatta' (the ancient Kishon), Na'mein (the Belus), and Mejsūh. The streams that unite to form the Jordan in the N. are Nahr el-Hasbān, Nahr el-Leddān, and Nahr Bānās. The only nahr flowing into the Jordan from the west is the Jalūd, near Beisān. From the east Nahr Yarmūk drains the Jaulān and Haurān, and at its confluence with the Jordan is almost of equal volume. Nahr ez-Zerkā is also an important stream, draining a wide region.

The rivers are crossed to-day, as in ancient times, almost entirely by fords. When the rivers are in flood, tragedies at the fords are not infrequent. The rivers that open into the Mediterranean have their main fords at the mouth. The sand washed up by the waves forms a broad bank, over which the water of the stream spreads, making a wide shallow. W. EWING.

RIVER OF EGYPT.—See EGYPT [RIVER OF].

RIZIA.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7^{ss}).

RIZPAH.—Daughter of Aiah, concubine of Saul, seized by the ambitious Abner after he had placed Ishbosheth (Ishbaal) on the throne. When accused by the king, Abner, who was the real ruler of Israel, promptly proffered the Northern Kingdom to David (2 S 3¹⁻⁴). A three years' famine was divined to be due to the displeasure of Jehovah at the slaughter of the Gibeonites by Saul. When David inquired what expiation he should make, the Gibeonites refused money compensation, but demanded descendants of Saul to expose before Jehovah. The king gave them two of Rizpah's, and three of Michal's (Merab's) sons, who were slain and exposed on Mount Gibeah (2 S 21¹⁻¹⁴). Rizpah spread sackcloth on the rock,—a sign that the land repented,—and watched the dead till the anger of Jehovah relented and the rain came. Her vigil ended, she was at liberty to perform the rite of burial. J. H. STEVENSON.

ROADS AND TRAVEL.—See TRADE AND COMMERCE. 'Byways' in Jg 5⁸ should rather be 'round-about ways.' In Jer 18¹⁸ 'bypaths' (RV) are opposed to the old tracks.

ROBBERS OF CHURCHES.—See CHURCHES [ROBBERS OF].

ROBE.—See DRESS.

ROCK represents various Heb. words, which, generally speaking, have the same ideas as the Eng.—strength, security, height, etc. (cf. Stanley, SP, Appendix). The rocks named in OT are Oreb (Jg 7²⁶, Is 10²⁶), Etam (Jg 15⁸), Rimmon (20⁴ 21¹³), the crags Bozez and Seneh (1 S 14⁴), Sela-hammahlekoth (23²). In 2 K 14⁷, Is 16¹ 42¹¹ 'the Rock' (RV 'Sela') is a proper name, Sela or Petra, the rock-city par excellence; in Jg 1³⁰ (RVm 'Sela') the identification is doubtful; es-Safieh, 'a bare and dazzling white sandstone promontory 1000 ft. high,' near the south of the Dead Sea, is probably intended. Rocks were the haunt of the eagle (Job 39²⁸), of the wild goat (v. 1), or the coney (Pr 30²⁶); cf. Ps 104¹⁸. Pr 30¹⁹ refers to the mysterious gliding of the serpent over a rock; Am 6¹², to the proverbial impossibility of horses running over crags. Dt 32¹³ emphasizes the fact that in Palestine even the rocks are the home of bees (Ps 81¹⁶, Is 7¹⁹), and the rocky soil produces olives (Job 29⁶). Besides this natural marvel, we have the miracles of Ex 17⁶, Nu 20⁸ etc. In 1 Co 10⁴ St. Paul follows a wide-spread Jewish haggadāh, which can be traced to the 1st century A.D., according to which the rock (perhaps originally the well) followed Israel; when the Tabernacle was pitched, the water gushed out afresh, the princes singing the song of Nu 21¹⁷. The epithet 'spiritual' does not deny the literal reality of that to which it refers; the manna was literal to St. Paul, and the water and rock must have been so too. He sees in the literal fact a foreshadowing of the Christian sacraments. Further, he identifies the rock with Christ, implying His pre-existence and care for His people; cf. Philo's identification of it with the Wisdom and Word of God.

Rocks, particularly the soft sandstone of Edom, were primitive dwelling places (Job 24⁸ 30⁶; cf. cave-dwellers of Dt 2¹²), and were used for sepulchres (Is 22¹⁶, Mk 15⁴⁶). Job 19²⁴ refers to the permanence of the rock inscription; 28⁹ (a somewhat unusual word, 'flinty rock' RV) to mining. In Jg 6³⁰ 13¹⁸ the rock is a natural monolithic altar; in 6³⁰ tr. 'strong-hold' with RV. Rocks as dangers to ships are mentioned in Ac 27²⁹, and metaphorically in Jude 12 RV [but RVm and Bigg retain 'spots' of AV, which has the support of the parallel 2 P 2¹⁴]. The barrenness and desolation of a rock is the point of Ezk 26¹⁻¹⁴, with a pun on Tyre (=rock); cf. the unfruitful 'rock' (Lk 8⁸), or 'rocky places' (Mt 13⁸ RV) of the parable of the Sower; i.e. rock with a thin layer of earth. The rock meets us continually as a place of refuge, literal or metaphorical (Nu 24²¹, 1 S 13⁶, Is 2¹⁴, Jer 48³ 49¹⁸, Ob 1); cf. 'feet on rock' (Ps 27¹ 40²) in Is 32² it is a shade from the heat. And so it is a frequent title for God, as the unvarying strength and support of His people (Dt 32⁴, [6 times], Ps 18² etc., Is 17¹⁰ 30²⁹, Hab 1¹²). It is often represented by 'God,' and vague terms ('help,' etc.) in the ancient versions, as well as AV and Pr. Bk. (e.g. Ps 95¹). A sufficient explanation of the use is found in the natural scenery of Palestine. It is doubtful how far 'Rock' (Zur) was a definite name for God. It has been found in compounds in two S. Arabian inscriptions, and occurs in the proper names of Nu 1⁸, 10³⁸. 'Great Rock' is a common title of Asshur and Bel in Assyria. In Dt 32²¹, Is 31⁷ the title is given to heathen gods, but in the latter passage the word sela is used. And the fact that this word is freely employed in this connexion side by side with zur rather contradicts the supposition that the latter was technically a proper name. Convulsions of nature and the power of God are connected with breaking the rock (1 K 19¹¹, Job 14¹⁸, Jer 23²⁹, Nah 1⁸, Mt 27⁵¹), and in Jer 5² it is a symbol of obstinacy. In Mt 7²⁴ it represents the sure foundation; cf. Mt 16¹⁸ and art. POWER OF THE KEYS, p. 742^b. The name 'Peter' is a tr. of the Aram. Cephas, the Heb. form of which is used Jer 4², Job 30⁶ (see art. PETER). For the 'rock of offence or stumbling,' see Is 8¹⁴ 28¹⁶, Ro 9³³, 1 P 2⁸. Precipitation from a rock was a form of execution (2 Ch 25¹³ [? 2 S 21⁶ 19], cf. Lk 4²⁹). C. W. EMMET.

ROCK BADGER (Lv 11¹⁸ RVm) is Hyraz syriacus. See CONEY.

ROD.—The rods, sticks, staves, and clubs carried or otherwise used by the Hebrews were probably as varied in size and shape as those in use among the inhabitants of Palestine at the present day, of which a minute description, with illustrations, is given by Baldensperger in PEFSI, 1905, 55 ff. No hard-and-fast distinction can be made out between the matteh, the shēbet, and the maqāl—all three rendered in EV by 'rod' or 'staff.' The context must generally decide which of the two is the better rendering. For example, the twigs which Jacob peeled in the device recorded in Gn 30²⁷ are true rods; but in 32¹⁰ the same word (maqāl) is properly rendered 'staff.' On the other hand, Moses' 'rod' (so EV) is rather his shepherd's 'staff' (Ex 4² etc.).

For the rod as an instrument of punishment, shēbet is more frequently employed than matteh, as Pr 10¹³ 13²⁶, although both are not seldom employed in parallel lines (Is 10²⁴ 30¹⁰ etc.). The former also denotes the shepherd's club (described and figured in Hastings' DB iv. 291^a, PEFSI, 1905, 36), as in Ps 23⁴, Lv 27³² etc. (EV 'rod'). See also SCEPTRE. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

RODANIM.—See DODANIM.

ROE, ROEBUCK.—1. zēbī and zēbī yāhā.—See GAZELLE. 2. yā'ālāh, Pr 5¹⁹, RV 'doe'; see 'Wild Goat' in art. GOAT. 3. 'ōpher, Ca 4⁸ 7², AV 'young roe,' RV 'fawn.' 4. yachmūr (lit. 'red'), Dt 14⁵, 1 K 4²³, AV 'fallow deer,' RV 'roe-bucks.' The true fallow-deer is the ayyāl or hart; see HART. In the LXX yachmūr is tr. boubalos, the bubale; but it is much more probable that it is the roebuck (Cervus capreolus), still called the yachmur by some Arabs. It is a gazelle-like animal with three-branched upright horns. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ROGELIM.—The native place of Barzillai the Gileadite (2 S 17²⁷ 19³¹). The exact site is unknown.

ROHGAH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7⁷⁴).

ROMUS (1 Es 5³).—See REHUM, 1.

ROLL.—See WRITING, 6.

ROMAMTI-EZER.—A son of Heman (1 Ch 25¹ 11).

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Time, occasion, and character.—The letter to the Romans belongs to the central group—which includes also Galatians, and the two letters to the Corinthians—of St. Paul's Epistles. Marcion's order—Gal., Cor., Rom.—is not unlikely to be the order of writing. A comparison of the data to be found in the letter, with statements in Acts, suggests that Rom. was written from Corinth at the close of the so-called third missionary journey (i.e. the period of missionary activity described in Ac 18²²⁻²¹). After the riots in Ephesus (Ac 19²³⁻⁴⁰) St. Paul spent three months in Greece (20³), whither Timothy had preceded him. He was thus carrying out a previous plan somewhat sooner than he had originally intended. Ac 19²¹⁻²² informs us that the Apostle wished to make a tour through Macedonia and Achaia, and afterwards, having first visited Jerusalem once more, to turn his steps towards Rome. From the letter itself we learn that he was staying with Gaius (16²³), who is probably to be identified with the Gaius of 1 Co 1¹⁴. At the time of writing, Paul and Timothy are together, for the latter's name appears in the salutation (16²¹). Sosipater, whose name also appears there, may be identified with the Sopater mentioned in Ac 20⁴. Phœbe, the bearer of the letter, belongs to Cenchreae, one of the ports of Corinth. The allusions in the letter all point to the stay in Corinth implied in Ac 20. Above all, the letter itself, apart from such important passages as 1^{10, 11} and 15²²⁻³⁰, is ample evidence of St. Paul's plans to visit Rome,—the plans mentioned in Ac 19²¹⁻²². It is then more than probable that the letter was written from Corinth during the three months' stay in Greece recorded in Ac 20³.

A comparison of Ro 15²²⁻³⁰ with Ac 19²¹⁻²² brings out one of the most striking of Paley's 'undesigned coincidences.' The parallel references to Jewish plots in Ro 15³¹ and Ac 20³ are also noteworthy. It should, however, be mentioned that if on critical grounds ch. 16 has to be detached from the original letter, and regarded as part of a lost letter to the Ephesians, much of the evidence for the place and date of Romans is destroyed, though the remaining indications suffice to establish the position laid down above.

The date to which the letter is to be assigned depends on the chronology of St. Paul's life as a whole. Mr. Turner (Hastings) DB, s.v. 'Chronology of NT' suggests A.D. 55-56. But for further treatment of this subject, readers must consult the general articles on CHRONOLOGY OF NT AND PAUL.

The immediate occasion for the letter is clearly the prospective visit to Rome. St. Paul is preparing the way for his coming. This explains why he writes to the Romans at all; it does not explain why he writes the particular letter we now possess. A shorter letter would have been sufficient introduction to his future hosts. How are we to account for the lengthy discussion of the central theme of the gospel which forms the larger part of the letter? Some suspect a controversial purpose. The Church at Rome contained both Jews and Gentiles; through Priscilla and Aquila and others St. Paul must have known the situation in Rome; he could, and doubtless did, accommodate his message to the condition of the Church. The objections he discusses may be difficulties that have arisen in the minds of his readers. But the style of the letter is not controversial. St. Paul warns the Romans against false teachers, as against a possible rather than an actual danger (16¹⁷⁻²⁰). Similarly, the discussion of the reciprocal duties of strong and weak (ch. 14) is marked by a calm conciliatory tone which suggests that the writer is dealing with problems which are probable rather than pressing. In fact, St. Paul seems to be giving his readers the result of his controversial experiences in Corinth and Galatia, not so much because the Church in Rome was placed in a similar situation, as because he wished to enable her members to profit from the mistakes of other Churches. If the letter is not controversial, it is not, on the other hand, a dogmatic treatise. Comprehensive as the letter is, it is incomplete as a compendium of theology. The theory that St. Paul is here putting his leading thoughts into systematic form 'does not account for the omission of doctrines which we know Paul held and valued—his eschatology and his Christology for instance' (Garvie). Romans is a true letter, and the selection of topics must have been influenced by the interest of the Church to which he was writing.

But apart from the position of the Roman Christians, and apart from the wish of the Apostle to prepare the way for his visit to them, the form and character of the letter were probably determined by the place Rome held in the Apostle's mind. St. Paul was proud of his Roman citizenship. He was the first to grasp the significance of the Empire for the growth of the Church. The missionary statesmanship which led him to seize on the great trade-centres like Ephesus and Corinth found its highest expression in his passionate desire to see Rome. Rome fascinated him; he was ambitious to proclaim his gospel there, departing even from his wonted resolve to avoid the scenes of other men's labours.

It should be noted that the Church at Rome was not an Apostolic foundation. The Christian community came into existence there before either St. Paul or St. Peter visited the city.

He explains his gospel at some length, because it is all-important that the capital of the Empire should understand and appreciate its worth. He is anxious to impart some spiritual gift to the Roman Christians, just because they are in Rome, and therefore, lest Jewish plots thwart his plans, he unfolds to them the essentials of his message. Indeed, his Roman citizenship helped to make St. Paul a great catholic. The influence of the Eternal City may be traced in the doctrine of the Church developed in Ephesians, which was written during the Roman captivity. The very thought of Rome leads St. Paul to reflect on the universality of the gospel, and this is the theme of the letter. He is not ashamed of the gospel or afraid to proclaim it in Rome, because it is as world-wide as the Empire. It corresponds to a universal need: it is the only religion that can speak to the condition of the Roman people. It is true he is not writing for the people at large. His readers consist of a small band of Christians with strong Jewish sympathies, and perhaps even tending towards Jewish exclusiveness. His aim is to open their eyes to the dignity of the position, and to the world-wide significance of the gospel they profess.

Jülicher further points out that Rome was to be to St. Paul the starting-point for a missionary campaign in the West. Consequently the letter is intended to win the sympathy and support of the Roman Church for future work. It is to secure fellow-workers that the Apostle explains so fully the gospel which he is eager to proclaim in Spain and in neighbouring provinces.

2. Argument and content.—Romans, like most of the Pauline letters, falls into two sections: doctrinal (chs. 1-11) and practical (chs. 12-16). In the doctrinal section, it is usual to distinguish three main topics: justification (chs. 1-4), sanctification (chs. 5-8), and the rejection of the Jews (chs. 9-11). It is not easy to draw any sharp line between the first two. The following is a brief analysis of the argument:—

The salutation is unusually long, extending to seven verses, in which St. Paul emphasizes the fact that he has been set apart for the work of an Apostle to all the Gentiles. Then follows a brief introduction. The Apostle first thanks God for the faith of the Roman Christians, and then expresses his earnest desire to visit them and to preach the gospel in Rome. For he is confident—and here he states his central theme—that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation for all men, if they will only believe (1¹⁷).

Salvation for all through the gospel—that is the thought to be developed. And first it is necessary to show that such a saving power is a universal need. The evidence for this is only too abundant. Nowhere have men attained God's righteousness: everywhere are the signs of God's wrath. The wilful ignorance which denies the Creator has led to the awful punishment of moral decay with which St. Paul had grown sadly familiar in the great cities of the Empire. Indeed, so far has corruption advanced that the consciences of many have been defiled. They not only commit sin without shame; they openly applaud the sinner (vv. 18-20). Nor can any one who still perceives this failure hold himself excused. The very fact that he recognises sin as such, condemns him in so far as he commits it. His keener conscience, if it leaves him unrepentant, will evoke the heavier penalty. God will judge all men according to their deeds. Both Jew and Gentile will be judged alike, the conscience in the Gentile corresponding to the Law in the case of the Jew (21-16). This passage is usually referred to the Jews, whose habit of judging and condemning others is rebuked in Mt 7. It may have a wider application. The remainder of the chapter deals with the Jews. The principle of judgment according to deeds will be applied without distinction of persons. The privileges of the Jew will not excuse him in the eyes of God. Neither the Law nor circumcision will cover transgression. The true Jew must be a Jew inwardly: the actual Jews have by their crimes caused the name of God to be blasphemed. A Gentile who does not know the Law and yet obeys it is better than the Jew who knows and disobeys (21-28). But is not this condemnation a denial of the Jews' privileges? No, the privileges are real, though the Jews are unworthy of them; and the mercy of God is magnified by their ingratitude. Yet even so, if God's mercy is brought to the light by their sin, why are they condemned? The full discussion of this difficulty is reserved to chs. 9-11. Here St. Paul only lays down the broad truth that God must judge the world in righteousness, and apparently he further replies to Jewish objectors by a tu quoque argument. Why do they condemn him if, as they say, his lie helps to make the truth clearer? (3-8). St. Paul now returns to his main point, the universality of sin, which he re-states and re-enforces in the language of the OT. The whole world stands guilty in the sight of God, and the Law has but intensified the conviction of sin (3-20).

To meet this utter failure of men, God has revealed in Christ Jesus a new way of righteousness, all-embracing as the need. Here too is no distinction of persons; all have sinned, and salvation for all stands in the free mercy of God, sealed to men in the propitiatory sacrifice of His Son, whereby we know that our past sins are forgiven, and we enter the new life, justified in the sight of God. The righteousness of God is thus assured to men who will receive it in faith. Faith is not defined, but it seems to mean a humble trust in the loving God revealed in Jesus. There can no longer be any question of establishing a claim on God by merit, or of superiority over our fellows. All need grace, and none can be saved except by faith. Jew and Gentile here stand on the same level (3²¹⁻²⁰).

Does not this righteousness through faith make void the Law? St. Paul scarcely answers the general question, but at once goes on to prove that the father of the race, Abraham, was justified by faith, i.e. by humble trust in God, in whose sight he could claim no merit. His trust in God was reckoned unto him for righteousness. His blessedness was the blessedness of the man whose sins are hidden. St. Paul here introducing the only beatitude found in his letters. This blessing came to Abraham before circumcision, on which clearly it did not depend. Similarly, the promise of inheriting the earth was given to him apart from the Law, and the seed to whom the promise descends are the faithful who follow their spiritual ancestor in believing God even against nature, as Abraham and Sarah believed Him. Surely it was for our sakes that the phrase 'was reckoned unto him for righteousness' was used in the story of Abraham. It enables us to believe in salvation through our faith in Him who raised Jesus from the dead (3²¹⁻⁴²).

At this point opens the second main stage in the doctrinal section of the letter. The fact of justification by faith has been established. It remains to say something of the life which must be built on this foundation. Jesus has brought us into touch with the grace of God. His death is the unfailing proof of God's love to us sinful men. What can lie before us save progress to perfection? Reconciled to God while yet enemies, for what can we not hope, now that we are His friends? Christ is indeed a second Adam, the creator of a new humanity. His power to save cannot be less than Adam's power to destroy. Cannot be less? Nay, it must be greater, and in what Jülicher rightly calls a hymn, St. Paul strives to draw out the comparison and the contrast between the first Adam and the Second. Grace must reign till the kingdom of death has become the kingdom of an undying righteousness (5¹⁻²¹).

Does this trust in the grace of God mean that we are to continue in sin? Far from it. The very baptismal immersion in which we make profession of our faith symbolizes our dying to sin and our rising with Christ into newness of life. If we have become vitally one with Him, we must share His life of obedience to God. The fact that we are under grace means that sin's dominion is ended. If we do not strive to live up to this we fail to understand what is involved in the kind of teaching we have accepted. If we are justified by faith, we have been set free from sin that we may serve God, that we may win the fruit of our faith in sanctification, and enjoy the free gift of eternal life (6¹⁻²²). The new life likewise brings with it freedom from the Law; it is as complete a break with the past as that which comes to a wife when her husband dies. So we are redeemed from the Law which did but strengthen our passions (7¹⁻⁶). Not that the Law was sin; but as a matter of experience it is through the commandment that sin deceives and destroys men (7⁷⁻¹²). Is, then, the holy Law the cause of death? No, but the exceeding sinfulness of sin lies in its bringing men to destruction through the use of that which is good. And then in a passage of intense earnestness and noble self-revelation St. Paul describes his pre-Christian experience. He recalls the torturing consciousness of the hopeless conflict between spirit and flesh, a consciousness which the Law only deepened and could not heal. The weakness of the flesh, sold under sin, brought death to the higher life. But from this law too, the law of sin and of death, Christ has set him free (7¹³⁻²⁵). For the Christian is not condemned to endure this hopeless struggle. God, in sending His Son, has condemned sin in the flesh. The alien power, sin, is no longer to rule. The reality and the strength of the Spirit of God have come into our lives with Jesus, so that the body is dead, to be revived only at the bidding of the indwelling Spirit (8¹⁻¹²). We are no longer bound to sin. God has put it into our hearts to call Him 'Abba, Father.' We are His little ones already. How glorious and how certain is our inheritance! That redemption for which creation groans most surely awaits us, far more than recompensing our present woes; and patience becomes us who have already received the first-fruits of the Spirit. The Spirit of God prays for us in our weakness, and we know that we stand in God's foreknowledge and calling. All must be well (8¹²⁻³¹). And then in a final triumph-song St. Paul asks, 'If God be for us, who can be against us?' The victory of the Christian life requires a new word: we are more than conquerors. Nothing can separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord (8³¹⁻³⁷).

Almost abruptly St. Paul turns to his third main question. The rejection of the Jews, by which the grace of God has come to the Gentile, grieves him to the heart. How is God's treatment of the Jews to be justified? There was from the first an element of selectiveness in God's dealings with the race of Abraham. The promise was not the necessary privilege of natural descent. It was to Isaac and not to Ishmael, to Jacob and not to Esau (9¹⁻¹³). God's mercy is inscrutable and arbitrary but it must be just. Whom He wills, He pities: whom He wills, He hardens. If it be said, 'Then God cannot justly blame men; how can the clay resist the potter?', St. Paul does not really solve the problem, but he asserts most emphatically that God's right to choose individuals for salvation cannot be limited by human thought (9¹⁴⁻²¹). The justice of God's rejection of the Jews cannot be questioned a priori. But what are the facts? The Jews, in seeking to establish their own righteousness, have failed to find the righteousness of God. They have failed, because the coming of Christ puts an end to legal righteousness, a fact to which Moses himself bears testimony. They ought to have realized this, and they cannot be excused on the ground that they have had no preachers. They are responsible for their own rejection: they have heard and known and disobeyed (9^{22-10²}). But though God has the right to reject His people, and though the Jews are themselves responsible for their refusal to accept the gospel, yet St. Paul cannot believe that it is final. Even now a remnant has been saved by grace; and the present rejection of Israel must have been intended to save the Gentiles. What larger blessing will not God bestow when He restores His people? The Gentiles must see in the fall of Israel the goodness of God towards themselves, and the possibilities of mercy for the Jews. This is enforced by the illustration of the wild olive and the natural branches (11¹⁷⁻²⁴). The Jews are enemies now, in order that God may bless the Gentiles. But they are still beloved, for the sake of the fathers. No, God has not deserted His people. If they are at present under a cloud, it is God's mercy and not His anger that has willed it so. And the same unsearchable mercy will one day restore them to His favour (11²⁵⁻²⁹).

With the thought of the infinite mercies of God so strikingly evidenced, St. Paul begins his practical exhortation. Self-surrender to God is demanded as man's service. 'Thou must love Him who has loved thee so.' A great humility becomes us, a full recognition of the differing gifts which God bestows on us. A willingness to bear wrong will mark the Christian. He must be merciful, since his confidence is in the mercy of God. The conclusion of ch. 11 underlies the whole of ch. 12. St. Paul goes on to urge his readers to obey the governing powers; to pay to all the debt of love, which alone fulfils the Law; to put off all sloth and vice, since the day is at hand (ch. 13). The duties of strong and weak towards each other will call for brotherly love. We must not surrender the principle of individual responsibility. Each standeth and falleth to the Lord. We have no right to judge, and we must not force our practices on our fellows. On the other hand, we must not push our individual liberty so far as to offend our brothers. Let us give up things we feel to be right, if we cause strife and doubt by asserting our liberty. The strong must bear the infirmities of the weak. Even Christ pleased not Himself. May we find our joy and peace in following Him! (14-15¹⁹).

St. Paul then concludes by explaining why he was so bold as to write to them at all, and by unfolding his plans and hopes for the future (15¹³⁻²³). The last chapter contains a recommendation of Phœbe who brings the letter, and a number of detailed salutations to individual members of the Church, and to some house-churches. A brief warning against teachers who cause division, greetings from St. Paul's companions, and an elaborate doxology bring the letter to a close (ch. 16).

The theology and leading ideas of the letter cannot be treated here. In a sense, however, the importance of Romans lies rather in its religious power than in its theological ideas. The letter is bound together by St. Paul's central experience of the mercy of God. In God's grace he has found the strength which can arrest the decay of a sinful, careless world. In God's grace he has found also the secret of overcoming for the man who is conscious of the awfulness of sin, and of his own inability to save his life from destruction. The problem of the rejection of the Jews is really raised, not so much by their previous privileges as by God's present mercy. St. Paul cannot be satisfied till he has grasped the love of God, which he feels must be at the heart of the mystery. The reality and nearness of God's mercy determine the Christian character and render it possible. It is noteworthy that, though St. Paul seldom refers to the sayings of Jesus, he arrives at the mind of Christ through the gospel of the grace of God. A comparison of the Sermon on the Mount with Ro 12-14 makes the antithesis, 'Jesus or Paul,' appear ridiculous. Above all, the glowing earnestness with which in chs. 4-8 he seeks to share with the Roman Christians—(note the use of 'we' throughout that section)—the highest and holiest inspirations he has learnt from Christ, reveals a heart in which the love of God is shed abroad. As Deissmann suggests, we do not recognize the special characteristic of St. Paul if we regard him as first and foremost the theologian of primitive Christianity. Romans is the passionate outpouring of one who has come into living touch with his heavenly Father.

3. Some textual points; integrity and genuineness.—

The omission in manuscript G of the words en Rōmē in 17¹³ is an interesting indication of the probability that a shortened edition of Romans, with the local references suppressed, may have been circulated in quite early times. The letter to the Ephesians seems to have been treated in the same way. This shorter edition may have concluded at 14²³, where the final doxology (16²⁵⁻²⁷) is placed in several MSS (ALP, etc.). But the shifting position of this doxology in our authorities perhaps indicates that it is not part of the original letter at all (see Denney, in the EGT). But there is further evidence to show that some early editions of the letter omitted chs. 15 and 16. Marcion apparently omitted these chapters. Tertullian, Irenæus, and Cyprian do not quote them. There is also some internal evidence for thinking that ch. 16 at least may be part of a letter to Ephesus. The reference to Epanetus in 16⁵ would be more natural in a letter to Ephesus than in a letter to Rome. In view of Ac 18² it is difficult to suppose that Aquila and Priscilla had returned from Ephesus to Rome. Moreover, it is not likely that St. Paul would have so many acquaintances in a church he had not visited. On the other hand, none of these considerations affects or explains ch. 15, and the two chapters cannot be separated very easily. Further, Sanday and Headlam have collected an imposing array of evidence to prove the presence at Rome of persons with such names as are mentioned in ch. 16 ('Romans' in JCC xxxiv f.). The question must still be regarded as open.

But while there is some probability that ch. 16 is part of a distinct letter, the theories of dismemberment, or rather the proofs of the composite character of Romans advanced by some Dutch scholars, cannot be considered convincing. The views of the late Prof. W. C. van Manen have received perhaps undue attention, owing to the fact that the art. on 'Romans' in the EBI is from his pen. His criticism was certainly arbitrary, and his premises frequently inaccurate. Thus he quotes with approval Evanston's statement that there is no reference in Acts to any project of St. Paul's to visit Rome—a statement made in direct contradiction of Ac 19²¹ (EBI, vol. iv. col. 4137). The year A.D. 120 is regarded as the probable date of Romans, in face of the external evidence of 1 Clement (ib. col. 4143). The general argument against the genuineness of Romans, which weighs most with van Manen, lies in the fact that 'it has learned to break with Judaism, and to regard the standpoint of the law as once for all past and done with.' This is 'a remarkable forward step, a rich and far-reaching reform of the most ancient type of Christianity; now, a man does not become at one and the same moment the adherent of a new religion and its great reformer' (ib. col. 4138). Of this disproof of Pauline authorship it is quite sufficient to say with Prof. Schmiedel, 'Perhaps St. Paul was not an ordinary man.' Indeed, Prof. Schmiedel's article on 'Galatians' (ib. vol. ii. col. 1620f.) is a final refutation of the Dutch school represented by van Manen. They have advanced as yet no solid reason for doubting the genuineness of Romans. H. G. Wood.

ROME.—The beginnings of Rome are shrouded in obscurity. The city was situated on the left bank of the Tiber, about 18 miles from its mouth. The original Rome was built on one hill only, the Palatine, but the neighbouring hills were successively included, and about the middle of the sixth century B.C., according to tradition, a wall was built to enclose the enlarged city. The whole circuit of this wall was about 5 miles, and it was pierced by nineteen gates. Within these was a large area of vacant spaces, which were gradually built on later, and at the beginning of the Empire (roughly middle of 1st cent. B.C.) not only was the city congested with buildings, but large areas without the wall were also covered with houses. The Roman Forum, an open space measuring over 300 ft. in length, and about 150 ft. in breadth, was the centre of political, legal, and commercial life. At one end was the rostra or platform, from which speeches were delivered to the public; at the other end were shops. It was flanked by the senate-house and law-courts. On the top of the Capitoline Hill was the Capitolium, or great temple dedicated to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, and on the Palatine Hill the principal residence of the Emperor, and the Temple of Apollo, containing the public libraries, Greek and Latin. In the Imperial period four additional fora were built, devoted entirely to legal, literary, and religious purposes—the Forum Iulium begun by Julius Caesar, the Forum Augustum built by Augustus, the Forum Transitorium completed by Nerva, and the Forum Traiani built by Trajan—the most splendid work of Imperial times. Various estimates of the population of Rome in the time of Christ have been given: 2,000,000 seems not unlikely. All nationalities in the Empire were represented—among them many Jews, who were expelled by Claudius in A.D. 50, but returned at his death four years later. The slave population was very large.

The Romans began as one of the members of the Latin league, of which, having become presidents, they eventually became masters. After conquering Latium they were inevitably brought into conflict with the other aces of Italy, over most of which they were sovereign about the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C. The extension of Roman territory steadily continued until, in the time of Christ, it included, roughly, Europe (except the British Isles, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and Russia), the whole of Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and the north-west of Africa.

The Roman State was at first ruled by kings, but these gave place to two rulers, known later as consuls. Their powers were gradually circumscribed by the devolution of some of their duties on other magistrates. The period of steady accession of territory was coincident with a bitter struggle between the patrician and the plebeian classes, both of which comprised free citizens. The contest between the orders lasted for about two centuries, and at the end of that period all the offices of State were equally open to both. This was not, however, the establishment of a real democracy, but the beginning of a struggle between the governing class and the mass of the people, which eventually brought the Republic to an end. The civil wars, which during the last century of its existence had almost destroyed it, had shown clearly that peace could be reached only under the rule of one man. The need of the time was satisfied by Augustus, who ruled as autocrat under constitutional forms: the appearance of a republic was retained, but the reality was gone, and the appearance itself gradually disappeared also. For the city of Rome the Empire was a time of luxury and idleness, but the provinces entered upon an era of progressive prosperity. The Emperor was responsible for the government of all provinces where an army was necessary (for instance, Syria), and governed these by paid deputies of his own. The older and more settled provinces were governed by officials appointed by the senate, but the Emperor had his financial interests attended to by procurators of his own even in these. Under the Empire the provinces were much more protected against the rapacity and cruelty of governors than in Republican times. The Emperors themselves stood for just as well as efficient administration, and most of them gave a noble example by strenuous devotion to administrative business.

The resident Romans in any province consisted of (1) the officials connected with the Government, who were generally changed annually; (2) members of the great financial companies and lesser business men, whose interests kept them there; (3) citizens of coloniae (or military settlements), which were really parts of Rome itself set down in the provinces; (4) soldiers of the garrison and their officers; (5) distinguished natives of the province, who, for services rendered to the Roman State, were individually gifted with the citizenship. Such must have been one of the ancestors of St. Paul. The honour was not conferred on all the inhabitants of the Empire till 212 A.D., and in NT times those who possessed it constituted the aristocracy of the communities in which they lived.

The Romans have left a great legacy to the world. As administrators, lawyers, soldiers, engineers, architects, and builders they have never been surpassed. In literature they depended mainly on the Greeks, as in sculpture, music, painting, and medicine. In the arts they never attained more than a respectable standard.

appears to have been a bulbed flower. The RV¹¹ suggests 'autumn crocus' (Colchicum autumnale); on the other hand, many good authorities suggest the much more striking and sweeter-scented plant—the narcissus, which is a great favourite to-day in Palestine. Two species are known—N. tazetta and N. serotinus In Wis 2⁹, Sir 24¹ 39¹² 50⁸ we have mention of rhodon (Gr.). Whether this is, as Tristram maintains, the Rhododendron or the true rose is uncertain; both occur in parts of Palestine. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

ROSH.—1. A descendant of Benjamin (Gn 46²¹ [text doubtful]). 2. In Ezk 38²¹ 39¹ the word Rosh is thought by many interpreters to refer to a people, otherwise unknown, but coupled with Meshech and Tubal (wh. see). It is possible, however, that the word meaning 'head' is used as a preposition 'over,' so that the phrase here applied to Gog (wh. see) simply means, 'prince over Meshech and Tubal'; cf. AvM. J. F. It has been conjectured that these two are the same person, that Simon's widow (?) had emigrated to Rome with her two sons, where they became people of eminence in the Church, and that this is the reason why the brothers are mentioned by St. Mark, who probably wrote in Rome.

RUHAMAH.—The second child (a daughter) of Gomer, Hosea's wife, was called Lo-ruhamah, 'unpitied' (Hos 1⁶ ⁸). The name was given symbolically to indicate that God had ceased to pity Israel, and given her over to calamity. The return of God's mercy is indicated in Hos 2¹ 'Say ye unto your brethren, Ammi (i.e. 'my people,' in opposition to Lo-ammi, 'not my people'); and to your sisters, Ruhamah (i.e. ye are 'pitied'). A similar play on the word is found in Hos 2²³ 'I will have mercy on "her that had not obtained mercy" (Lo-ruhamah).'

RUSH, RUSHES.—1. gōme, Ex 2³ (EV 'bulrushes' RVm 'papyrus'), Job 8¹¹, Is 18² (AV 'bulrushes,' RV 'papyrus') 35⁷. This was probably the once famous plant the papyrus (Cyperus papyrus, Arab. babr), which now flourishes in the Huleh swamps. The bulrush (Scirpus maritimus) and other species may have been included in the Heb. name gōme. 2. agmōn, Job 41² (AV 'hook,' RV 'rope,' RVm 'Heb. a rope of rushes') 41²⁰ (AV 'caldron,' RV 'burning' rushes'), Is 9¹⁴ 19¹¹ 58⁵ (AV 'bulrush'). There are some twenty kinds of rushes in Palestine, but it is impossible to fit the references to any one kind, and, indeed, some kind of 'reed' (wh. see) is quite as probable, especially in Is 58^o.

RUTH (meaning uncertain).—A woman of Moab, who, like her mother-in-law Naomi, and her sister-in-law Orpah, was left a widow. On Naomi desiring to return to her own people in Bethlehem-Judah—which she had left with her husband owing to a famine—Ruth refused to leave her, and the two returned together to Bethlehem. Here she became the wife of Boaz, and bore him Obed, who became the father of Jesse; she therefore figures in the genealogy of Christ (Mt 1^o). See, further, the next article. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

RUTH (Book of).—1. Contents.—The book is really the narrative of a family story, told in a charmingly idyllic way. The fact of most far-reaching interest which it contains is that the Moabitess Ruth, i.e. one who is non-Israelite, is represented as the ancestress of the house of David; this is very important, as testifying to a spirit which is very different from ordinary Jewish exclusiveness, and as far as the OT is concerned can be paralleled only by the Book of Jonah. A point of subsidiary but yet considerable interest in the book is its archæology; the notices concerning the laws of the marriage of next-of-kin (24^o 4th), and of the method of transferring property (47^o 5), and of the custom of the formal ratification of a compact (41^o 12), are all evidently echoes of usages which belonged to a time long anterior to the date at which the book was written, though in part still in vogue.

2. Date.—The language of the book has an 'Aramaicizing tendency'; it implicitly acknowledges itself to have been written long after the time of the events it professes to describe (1^o 47); in the Hebrew Canon it is placed among the Hagiographa; these considerations lead to the conclusion that the book must be of late date. That it is post-exilic cannot admit of doubt; but to assign to it a date more definite than this would be precarious. This much, at least, may be said: the third portion of the Hebrew Canon was completed, at the earliest, after the close of the 3rd cent. B.C. Now it is not likely that a book which purported to contain a fuller genealogy of David than that of 1 Samuel would have been long in existence without being admitted into the Canon. W. O. E. SABBATH—1. Origin of the Sabbath.—The name 'Sabbath' (Heb. shabbāth, from a verb shābath, meaning 'to desist') might be applied to any sacred season as a time of cessation from labour, and is so used of the Day of Atonement, which was observed annually on the tenth day of the seventh month (Lv 16th 23rd). But in usage it is almost confined to the day of rest which closed each week of seven days, the cycle running continuously through the calendar without regard to the month or the year. The origin of this institution, and its early history among the Israelites, are involved in much obscurity. That it has affinities with certain Babylonian observances is obvious; but the differences are very marked, and a direct dependence of the one on the other is difficult to understand. It is known that in two months (possibly in all) the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days (those in which the moon enters a new phase), and also the 19th (the [7×7th=] 49th from the beginning of the previous month), were regarded in Babylonia as unlucky days, on which certain actions had to be avoided by important personages (king, priest, physician). The name shabbatu has also been found in the inscriptions, where it is explained as ām nāḥ libbi = 'day of the appeasement of the heart' (of the deity).—In the first instance, therefore, a day of prayer or atonement. But that the five unlucky days mentioned above were called shabbatu has not been proved, and is, indeed, rendered improbable by the more recent discovery that shabbatu was a name for the day of the full moon (the 15th of the month). When we turn to the early references to the Sabbath in the OT, we find a state of things which seems at first sight to present a parallel to the Babylonian usage. It is a singular fact that except in the expansions of the Fourth Commandment in Ex 20th 8-11 and Dt 5th 12-15 (which are evidently no part of the original Decalogue), there is nothing in the pre-exilic literature which explicitly indicates that the word 'Sabbath' denoted a weekly day of rest. In the kernel of the Decalogue (Ex 20th, Dt 5th), the observance of the Sabbath is enjoined; but neither the manner of its observance nor the period of its recurrence is prescribed. Where, on the other hand, the weekly rest is inculcated (Ex 23rd 34th), the name 'Sabbath' does not occur. In the prophetic and historical books 'Sabbath' and 'new moon' are associated in such a way as to suggest that both were lunar festivals (Am 8th, Ho 2nd, Is 1st, 2 K 4th); and the attempt has been made to trace the transition from the Babylonian institution to the Hebrew Sabbath by the hypothesis that originally the Sabbath in Israel was the feast of the full moon, just as in Babylonia. This theory, however, is little but an ingenious paradox. It is arbitrary to deny the antiquity of Ex 23rd or 34th; and if the word 'Sabbath' is not found in these passages, yet the related verb shābath is used in both, as is rarely the case except in connexion with the Sabbath. Moreover, the way in which the Sabbath is isolated from all other sacred seasons (Decalogue, 2 K 11th, 16th) goes far to show that even in the pre-exilic period it was a festival sui generis, and had already acquired something of the prominence which belonged to it in later times. How little force there is in the argument from the connexion of 'new moon' and 'Sabbath' may be seen from Is 66th, Col 2nd. The most reasonable conclusion is that the weekly Sabbath is everywhere presupposed in the OT, and that, if it be connected historically with Babylonian institutions, the development lies behind the range of Israelite tradition, and in all probability was a feature of Canaanitish civilization when the Hebrews settled in the country. It must be remembered, however, that the hypothesis of a Babylonian origin does not exhaust the possibilities of the case. Although a regularly recurring day of rest is neither necessary nor possible for pastoral nomads, it is quite conceivable that some form of Sabbath observance, depending on the phases of the moon, was practised by the Hebrews in the desert, and that the transformation of this primitive lunar festival into the Sabbath as we find it in the OT was due to the suppression of its superstitious associations under the influence of the national religion of Israel.

2. Religious significance of the Sabbath.—The distinctive characteristics of the Hebrew Sabbath were mainly these two: it was, first, a day sacred to Jahweh, and second, a day of rest. In the earlier period cessation from labour may have been merely a consequence of the festal character of the day; although the reinforcement of the ceremonial sanction by humanitarian motives in the legislation (Ex 23¹², Dt 5¹⁴) shows that already the religious mind of the nation had grasped the final justification of the Sabbath as an institution made for man, and not one for which man was made. This conception of the Sabbath underwent a radical modification in the age of the Exile. It is hardly accurate to say that the change was entirely due to the fact that the Sabbath was one of the few religious ordinances by which the Israelite in a foreign land could mark his separation from heathenism. The idea of the Sabbath as a covenant between Jahweh and Israel, which is elaborated in Ezekiel and the code called the Law of Holiness, is foreshadowed in Dt 5¹⁵; and even the more imposing conception of it as a memorial of the Creation finds expression in Ex 20¹¹, which is quite possibly of older date than the Priestly account of Creation in Gn 1. The truth is that in this, as in many other cases, the real turning-point was not the deportation of the people but the suppression of the popular ritual by Josiah's reformation. None the less it is important to observe that, for whatever reason, a profound transformation of the character of the Sabbath emerges in writings of the Exilic and post-exilic period. The obligation of rest, from being a necessary concomitant of acts of worship, or a means to a higher end, becomes an end in itself, a form of self-denial, pleasing to the Deity as an act of implicit obedience to His positive command. The whole of the subsequent legislation proceeds from this point of view. In Ezekiel and the Law of Holiness the Sabbath (as has just been observed) is conceived as an arbitrary sign of the covenant between Jahweh and Israel, and of the individual's fidelity to that covenant. The Priestly Code not only exalts the Sabbath by basing its sanction on the example of the Creator (Gn 2²⁻³, Ex 31¹⁷), but seeks to enforce its observance by the imposition of the death penalty (Ex 31¹⁴, Nu 15³²⁻³⁵), and sets the example of guarding its sanctity by prohibitive regulations (Ex 35²). The memoirs of Nehemiah reveal at once the importance attached to the Sabbath as a mark of the distinction between the faithful Jews and their heathen neighbours (10¹⁴ 13¹⁵), and the stern determination which was necessary to compel obedience (13¹⁷⁻¹⁸). In post-exilic prophecies there are several allusions to Sabbath observance as a supreme religious duty, and a condition of the fulfilment of the Messianic expectations (Jer 17¹⁹⁻²⁰, Is 56²⁻⁶, 58¹³⁻¹⁴, 66²³). At the commencement of the Maccabean revolt, regard for the Sabbath was so ingrained in the mind of the people that strict Jews allowed themselves to be slaughtered by their enemies rather than use arms for their own defence (1 Mac 2^{25ff.}); though after one incident of this kind the maxim was laid down that defensive operations in war were legitimate on the Sabbath (v. 41).

3. The Sabbath in the NT.—The Gospels show that by the time of Christ the casuistry of the scribes had hedged round the Sabbath with many of those petty and vexatious rules which are preserved in the Rabbinical literature, and which completely eviscerated the institution of any large principle of religion or humanity. Accordingly the Sabbath law was (next to His own Messianic claims) the chief subject of contention between our Lord and the Pharisees (see Mt 12^{1ff.}, Lk 13^{1ff.}

SABBATICAL YEAR

14^{1ff.} Jn 5^{1ff.} 7²³ 9^{1ff.} etc.). As regards our Lord's own attitude, it is enough to say that it combined reverence for the ordinance, in so far as it served religious ends (Lk 4^{1ff.} etc.), with a resolute vindication of the principle that 'the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath' (Mk 2²⁷). Similarly, in the Pauline Epistles the Sabbath is relegated, either inferentially (Ro 14^{5ff.}, Gal 4^{9ff.}) or expressly (Col 2^{16ff.}), to the category of things morally indifferent, with regard to which each man must follow the dictates of his conscience. It is significant also that the decree of the Council of Jerusalem does not impose the observance of the Sabbath on the Gentile Churches (Ac 15²⁹). On the later Christian observance of the first day of the week, and its assimilation to the Jewish Sabbath, see LORD'S DAY.

SABBATICAL YEAR (including year of Jubilee).—

1. OT references.—In a consideration of the regulations connected with the Sabbatical and Jubilee years, it is of the greatest importance to keep distinct the various stages of the Jewish legislation on the subject. The various ordinances differ greatly in character and detail; and in order to comprehend this diversity it is necessary to assume as granted the main conclusions of OT criticism, and to admit at any rate that a separation in time and difference in spirit characterize the several parts of the 'Mosaic Law.'

Exodus. In 23¹⁰⁻¹¹ an entire cessation of all field-work is ordered to take place in every 7th year. This is said to be dictated by a regard for the poor and the beasts of the field. In effect the gift of one year's produce to the poor is prescribed, that the landless may receive the usufruct of the soil. In 21²⁻⁶ it is laid down that a Hebrew slave can be kept in bondage only for six years. After this period he was automatically emancipated, though his wife and children must remain in servitude, if he had married after his term of service began. But provision was made for cases where a slave might desire to remain in this condition. A public ceremony took place which signified his acceptance of the position in perpetuity. Nothing is here said which leads us to suppose that there was one simultaneous period of emancipation all over the country, and no reference is made to redemption of land or remission of debts.

Deuteronomy. In 15¹⁻³ the 7th year is assigned as the period at which all the liabilities of a Jew were suspended (or possibly, as Josephus supposes, entirely cancelled); this provision was to be of universal operation. 15¹²⁻¹⁸ repeats the ordinances of Ex 21 with regard to the emancipation of slaves; here again no simultaneity of redemption can be inferred. 31¹⁰⁻¹² prescribes that the Law is to be read every 7th year (the 'year of release') at the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. Neh 8¹³⁻¹⁸). Nothing is said in Deuteronomy about a possible redemption of land.

Leviticus. In 25¹⁻⁴⁶ provision is made for a seventh-year fallow; but there is no mention of the poor. The reason assigned is that the land, being Jehovah's land, must keep Sabbath, i.e. the Sabbath principle is extended to cover nature as well as man. We also find here the jubilee ordinances. After 49 years had elapsed, every 50th year was to be inaugurated as a jubilee by the blowing of the trumpet on the Day of Atonement. All slaves were to be emancipated (this may be a modified substitute for the earlier provisions with regard to emancipation after 7 years); no mention is made of the possibility of perpetual slavery, but it is ordained that the Hebrew slave of a foreigner may be redeemed by a relative, all Jews being essentially Jehovah's servants. The land was to lie fallow, and providential aid is promised to ensure sufficiency of produce during the period of three years when no harvest could be gathered, viz. the 40th year, which would be a sabbatical fallow, the year of jubilee, and the following year, when tillage would be resumed. Here also we find elaborate directions for the redemption of land in the jubilee year. They may be thus summarized: (1) No landed property may be sold, but only the usufruct of its produce up to the next jubilee, and the price must be calculated by the distance from that period. (2) A kinsman may redeem land thus mortgaged, or (the meaning may possibly be) exercise a right of pre-emption upon it. (3) The mortgager may redeem at the selling price, less the yearly proportion for the time elapsed since the sale. (4) House property in walled towns (not in villages) may be sold outright, and is redeemable only during one year. Such property was presumably regarded as human and artificial, whilst all land was essentially the property of Jehovah. (5) The Levitical possessions were redeemable at any time, and did not come under the jubilee provisions. (6) Nothing is said in Lev. as to the remission of debts, but there is a general prohibition of usury. (7) In Lv 27¹⁸⁻²⁵ a field devoted to Jehovah must be valued at once at a fixed rate, and might be redeemed at this price, plus a fine of 20 per cent., up to the year of jubilee. If not redeemed by then it became sacred property; no redemption of it was thereafter possible.

2. Purposes of the Sabbatical rules.—The purposes underlying the ordinances above catalogued may be classified under 4 heads: but it is practically impossible to assign any certain priority of time to any one of the classes. (a) The periodical fallow. This is a very common provision in agriculture, and the seven years' period is still observed in Syria. Since the fallow year was not at first everywhere simultaneous, the earlier historical books are silent about it; and indeed it cannot have been generally observed. For the 70 years' captivity and desolation of the land was regarded as making up for the unobserved Sabbaths of the land (2 Ch 36²¹, cf. Lv 26³⁴⁻⁴³). The reference in Neh 10³¹ may be to the periodical fallow or to the remission of debts. But 1 Mac 6⁴⁹⁻⁵² shows that the fallow year was observed later. (b) The emancipation of slaves (cf. Jer 34⁸⁻⁹). Such a provision must have been very difficult to enforce, and we find no other possible reference to it. (c) The remission or suspension of debts. The only reference is the dubious one in Neh 10³¹. (d) The redemption of real property. The kind of tenure here implied is not uncommonly found in other countries, and Jer 32⁶⁻⁷, Ru 4, Ezk 7¹² show that something akin to it did exist in Palestine (cf. also Ezk 46¹⁷). But that it was in no sense universal may be inferred from Isaiah's and Micah's denunciations of land-grabbing: on the other hand, 1 K 21³⁻⁴ furnishes an instance of the inalienability of land. Cf. LEVITICUS, p. 543^b.

In general we have no sign that the sabbatical and jubilee provisions were ever strictly observed in Biblical times. Their principles of rest and redemption, though never practised as a piece of social politics, were preached as ideals, and may have had some effect in discouraging slave-owning, land-grabbing, and usury, and in encouraging a more merciful view of the relations between Jew and Jew. Thus Is 61¹⁻² is steeped in the jubilee phraseology, and Christ adopted this passage to explain His own mission (Lk 4¹⁸⁻¹⁹).

SABI (1 Es 5²⁸) = Shobai, Ezr 2², Neh 7⁴.

SABIAS (1 Es 1⁹) = Hashabiah, 2 Ch 35⁹.

SABIE.—The children of Pochereth-hazzebaim, Ezr 2⁷, Neh 7⁵⁹, appear as 'the sons of Phacereth, the sons of Sabie' in 1 Es 5²⁴.

SABTA, SABTAH.—In the genealogical list of Gn 10⁷ a son of Cush, named between Havilah and other Arabian districts. It was probably a region on or near the east coast of Arabia, but in spite of several conjectures it has not been identified with any historical tribe or country. The relationship with Cush is to be accounted for on the ground that the Cushites were held to have extended across the Red Sea from Nubia north-eastward over the great peninsula. J. F. McCurdy.

SABTECA.—The youngest son of Cush according to Gn 10⁷. The only identification at all plausible has been made with Samydake on the E. side of the Persian Gulf. But this is improbable, since that region did not come within the Cushite domain, as judged by the names of the other sons of Cush. Possibly Sabteca is a miswriting for Sabtah (wh. see). J. F. McCurdy.

SACAR.—1. The father of Ahlam (1 Ch 11²⁸ = 2 S 23³¹ Sharar). 2. A family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26⁴).

SACKBUT.—See MUSIC, etc., § 4 (c).

SACKCLOTH.—The sackcloth of OT was a coarse dark cloth made on the loom from the hair of goats and camels. In the extant literature it is almost always associated with mourning for the dead (Gn 37³⁴, 2 S 3³¹ and oft.); and especially with the public expression of humiliation and penitence in view of some national misfortune, present or impending (1 K 21²⁷, Neh 9¹, Jon 3⁵ etc.). For other tokens of grief and penitence, associated with the donning of sackcloth, such as ashes or dust on the head, and the rending of garments (this being a later substitute for their entire removal), see MOURNING CUSTOMS. In such cases the person or persons concerned are generally said to 'gird' themselves with sackcloth, or to have sackcloth about their loins, from which it is evident that the sackcloth was worn in the form of a loincloth or waistcloth, tied in the ancient manner in a knot in front (cf. Is 20² 'loose the sackcloth,' lit. 'untie the knot'). It was worn by women as well as by men (Is 32¹¹, Jth 9¹). The putting of it upon cattle, however, as mentioned in Jon 3⁸ and Jth 4¹⁰, and even upon an altar (4¹¹), is, from the nature of the passages cited, rather a literary than a historical extravagance.

In this custom most modern scholars recognize an illustration of conservatism in religious practice. The waistcloth is known to have been the oldest article of dress among the Semites (see DRESS, § 2), and as such it appears to have been retained in mourning customs and in humiliation before God, and perhaps in the exercise of the cultus, long after it had ceased to be the only garment of the people. The ihram or waistcloth still worn by the Moslem pilgrims during their devotions at the sacred shrine at Mecca, has often been cited as a modern parallel.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SACRAMENTS.—1. The term.—Although applied by common consent to certain institutions of the NT, the word 'sacrament' (Lat. sacramentum) is not a Scriptural one. In classical Lat. sacramentum (fr. sacrare, 'to consecrate') is used esp. in two senses: (a) passively, as a legal term, to denote a sum of money deposited by the parties to a suit, which was forfeited by the loser and appropriated to sacred uses; (b) actively, as a military term, to denote the oath taken by newly enlisted soldiers. When it came to be applied to Christian uses, the word retained the suggestions of both of those earlier employments. A sacrament was something set apart for sacred purposes; it was also, in certain cases, of the nature of a vow of self-consecration, resembling the oath of the Roman soldier (cf. Tertullian: 'We were called to the warfare of the living God in our very response to the sacramental words,' ad Mart. iii.). But the application and history of the word in the Christian Church were determined chiefly by the fact that in the Old Lat. and Vulg. VSS it was repeatedly employed (mysterium, however, being employed more frequently) to render the Gr. mysterion, 'a mystery.' [Thus Vulg. tr. St. Paul's 'This mystery is great' (Eph 5²³) by 'Sacramentum hoc magnum est';—a rendering that had not a little to do with the subsequent erection of marriage into a sacrament.] This identification of the idea of a sacrament with that of a mystery was carried still further by Tertullian, and was greatly fostered by the fact that about this time a tendency was rapidly growing in the Church to an assimilation of Christian worship to the Mystery-worship of the Græco-Roman world (see art. MYSTERY). Tertullian (end of 2nd cent. and beginning of 3rd) is the first writer to apply the name 'sacrament' to Baptism, the Eucharist, and other rites of the Christian Church.

When Pliny (c. A.D. 112), in his account of the worship of the Christians of Bithynia, describes them at their morning meetings as 'binding themselves by a sacramentum to commit no kind of crime' (Ep. x. 96), it has been suggested by some that he was using the word in the Christian sense, and was referring either to the baptismal vow or to participation in the Eucharist. The fact, however, that we do not find such a use of the word, even in Christian writers, for nearly a century afterwards makes this extremely unlikely; and the probability is that Pliny intended it in the old Roman sense of an oath or solemn obligation.

2. Nature and number.—(1) Though used especially of Baptism and the Eucharist, the application of the term by Christian writers was at first exceedingly loose, for it was taken to describe not only all kinds of religious ceremonies, but even facts and doctrines of the Christian faith. The vagueness of prevailing notions is illustrated by Augustine's remark that 'signs pertaining to things Divine are called sacraments,' and by his well-known definition of a sacrament as 'the visible form of an invisible grace.' It is otherwise illustrated by the fact that Hugo of St. Victor (12th cent.) enumerates about 30 sacraments that had been recognized in the Church. The Council of Trent defined the nature of a sacrament more closely, by laying it down that not all signs of sacred things have sacramental value, and that visible forms are sacraments only when they represent an invisible grace and become its channels. It further delimited the sacramental area by re-enacting in its 7th session (1547) a decision of the Council of Florence (1439) in which effect was for the first time authoritatively given to the suggestion of Peter Lombard (12th cent.) and other Schoolmen that the number of the sacraments should be fixed at 7, namely, Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony—a suggestion that was evidently influenced by the belief that 7 was a sacred number.

(2) In the Reformed Churches criticism of this scheme was based on the fact that it proceeds on no settled principle. The number 7 is perfectly arbitrary; while the definition of a sacrament is still so vague that anything but an arbitrary selection of particulars is impossible. While, therefore, the Reformers retained the term 'sacrament' as a convenient one to express the general idea that has to be drawn from the characteristics of the acts classed together under this name—a term, moreover, that is sanctioned by the usage of the Church from the days of Tertullian—they found the distinguishing mark of a sacrament in the fact of its being instituted by Christ Himself and enjoined by Him upon His followers. And as Baptism and the Lord's Supper are the only two rites for which this can be claimed, it follows that there are only two sacraments in the proper sense of the word. The uniqueness that belongs to these as resting upon Christ's personal appointment and being bound up with His own words (Mt 28¹⁹, Mk 16⁷; Mt 26²⁸⁻²⁹), 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁵) justifies us in separating them from all other rites and ceremonies whatsoever, however seemingly and suggestive any of these may appear to be, and raises them to the dignity of forming an integral part of the historical revelation of God in Christ, and so of being not signs merely, but in very truth, in Augustine's phrase, 'the word made visible.' A justification of this segregation of Baptism and the Lord's Supper from all other rites, and their association together under a common name, is furnished in the NT by Ac 2⁴¹, 42 and 1 Co 10¹⁻⁴. A further justification may perhaps be found in the fact that St. Paul traces an analogy between Circumcision and the Passover—the two most distinctive rites of the Old Covenant—on the one hand, and Baptism (Col 2¹¹) and the Lord's Supper (cf. 1 Co 5⁷ with 11²⁶) respectively, on the other.

3. Efficacy.—According to the Roman view, sacraments are efficacious ex opere operato, i.e. by a power inherent in themselves as outward acts. The Reformed doctrine, on the other hand, maintains that though they are Divinely appointed channels of the heavenly grace, their benefits to the recipient are contingent upon subjective spiritual conditions, and above all upon the exercise of faith in Christ Himself. See, further, BAPTISM, CONFIRMATION, EUCHARIST, LAYING ON OF HANDS. J. C. LAMBERT.

SACRIFICE AND OFFERING.—1. TERMINOLOGY OF SACRIFICE.—(a) General. Since every sacrifice was an offering, but all offerings were not sacrifices, this preliminary study of the usage of these two important terms in our EV may start from the more comprehensive 'offering.' It is true that in the majority of the occurrences of 'offering,' both in AV and in RV, it is simply a synonym of 'sacrifice' (cf. German Opfer). This is the case more particularly in the extensive nomenclature of the various sacrifices, as 'burnt offering,' which also appears in AV as 'burnt sacrifice,' 'meal (AV meat) offering,' etc. (In AV and RV the names of the sacrifices are printed separately, in Amer. RV they are more correctly joined by a hyphen, burnt-offering, etc.) As will presently appear (§ 2), the compound expression in such cases represents but a single word in the original, which is the technical term for the particular sacrifice.

In the remaining occurrences, however, 'offering,' or its synonym 'oblation,' is used in a more extended application to denote a gift offered to God, as opposed to a secular gift, in the form of a present, bribe, or the like, to a fellow-creature. Such 'holy gifts' (Ex 28³⁸) or offerings may be divided into three classes, namely, (1) altar-offerings, comprising all such offerings as were brought into contact with the altar (cf. Mt 23¹⁹), mostly for the purpose of being consumed thereon; (2) the stated sacred dues, such as tithes, first-fruits, etc.; and (3) special votive offerings, e.g. those specified in Nu 7. In this comprehensive sense of the term, 'offering,' or—as almost uniformly in RV—'oblation,' corresponds to the Heb. qorban, a word peculiar to Ezekiel and the priestly legislation. It is the corban of Mk 7¹¹, 'that is to say, Given to God' (RV; AV 'a gift'), and means 'something brought near,' i.e. to the altar, or at least presented at the sanctuary, in other words, a present to God. The term, as has been said, appears late in the history of OT sacrifice (Ezk 20⁴⁰) and the various strata of P passim, the nearest corresponding term in the older literature being minchah, for which see § 2.

The classification of OT offerings above suggested serves, further, to bring into relief the relation of 'sacrifice' to 'offering.' The former may be defined as an offering which is consumed, in whole or in part, upon the altar, or, more briefly, as an altar-offering. It is in this more restricted sense of altar-offering that 'sacrifice' and 'offering' are employed synonymously in our English nomenclature of sacrifice.

But there is still another use of these terms in which they are not synonymous but contrasted terms. In the sacrificial system of OT, altar-offerings—'sacrifices,' in the sense above defined—are of two kinds, animal offerings and cereal offerings, using the latter term a fortiori for all non-bloody altar-offerings, including not merely cereal oblations in the strict sense (flour, cakes, etc.), but also offerings of wine, oil, and the indispensable salt. Now the characteristic and significant Heb. designation of an animal, or, as it is often termed, a bloody, offering is zebach, lit. 'slaughter,' from the verb zābach, originally to slaughter generally, then specially to immolate the sacrificial victim, to sacrifice—hence also the word for 'altar,' mizbēach, lit. the place of slaughter (for sacrifice). The complement of zēbach in this sense of animal sacrifice is minchāh, in the later specialized sense of cereal offering (see, further, for both terms, § 2), so that 'sacrifice and offerings' came to denote the whole category of altar offerings (Ps 40⁸, 1 S 2⁹, Am 5²⁵—also 1 S 19²¹ 'sacrifice and oblation'). In this sense, also, they are to be understood in the title of this article. The results now reached may be thus summed up: 'sacrifice' is used as a convenient term for both kinds of OT altar-offerings, but in the EV, and in strict usage, it corresponds to the Heb. zēbach, which is always used of animal sacrifice, while 'offering' is used in three different senses—for all sacred gifts (qorban), for such gifts only as 'came up' upon the altar, and, finally, in the special sense of cereal offering.

2. TERMINOLOGY OF SACRIFICE.—(b) Special. To the foregoing study of the more general terms may now be added a brief review of the more specific renderings of the names of the principal altar-offerings, reserving for later sections the examination of their characteristic features. Following the order of the manual of sacrifice, Lv 1-5, we have (1) the burnt offering,—so RV uniformly. AV also 'burnt sacrifice'—Heb. ʾōlāh, lit. 'that which goes up' (on the altar). The name is supposed to point to the feature by which the ʾōlāh was distinguished from all other sacrifices, viz., the burning of the whole victim as a holocaust upon the altar. This characteristic is more explicitly brought out by the rare designation (2) kātil, the 'whole burnt offering' of Dt 33¹⁰ RV (AV 'whole burnt sacrifice') and Ps 51¹⁹. 'Whole offering' would be a more exact equivalent of (1) and (2).

(3) Meal offering (RV) and meat offering (AV) are the equivalents of minchāh in its restricted sense of cereal or vegetable offering, as already explained. The Heb. word 'does not express the neutral idea of a gift, but denotes a present made to secure or retain goodwill' (Driver, art. 'Offering,' in Hastings' DB iii. 587), such as Jacob's 'present' to Esau (Gn 32¹⁴ 18), and the 'presents' which subjects were expected to offer to their sovereigns (1 S 10²⁷). From the latter usage there is but a step to the further sense of an 'offering' to the Divine sovereign. In the older literature, minchāh, as a present or offering to J', includes both animal and cereal offerings, as in the case of the 'offering' brought by Abel and Cain respectively (Gn 4^{4ff}). In the later Priests' Code, however, minchāh is restricted to the cereal offering. For this the 'meal offering' of RV is better than the older rendering, 'meat' being now obsolete in the sense intended, but is still not sufficiently comprehensive; hence cereal offering or cereal oblation is the rendering now generally preferred. With the cereal offering may be taken (4) the drink offering, first met with in Gn 35⁴.

(5) Peace offering (RVm thank offering).—The meaning of the special name of this sacrifice (shelem Am 5²², elsewhere always plural shelemim) is still uncertain,—a fact reflected in the alternatives of RV. Most scholars, following the LXX, connect the word with shālōm, 'peace,' as reflecting the harmonious relations of worshipper and worshipped brought about by the sacrifice. Others, with greater probability, would derive the name from another meaning of the same root—'to recompense, repay, pay one's vows' (see Pr 7¹⁴). On this view, recompense offering is perhaps as good a rendering as any, and leaves (6) thank offering (2 Ch 29³¹, tōdāh, lit. 'thanksgiving,' hence the expression 'a sacrifice of thanksgiving,' Am 4⁶, Ps 50¹⁴ 23 RV) for an important variety of the recompense offering (cf. Lv 7¹² RV 'the sacrifice of his peace offerings for thanksgiving'). Other two varieties, named together Lv 7¹⁶, Nu 15⁴ etc., are

(7) the votive offering (EV 'vow'), defined in the latter passage as 'a sacrifice to accomplish a vow, and (8) the freewill offering (RV), which explains itself.

The probable meaning of the difficult terms rendered (9) sin offering, and (10) trespass (AV) or guilt (RV) offering will be more profitably discussed when the precise nature and object of these offerings are under consideration (§ 14 f.). All the various offerings (1) to (10) are explicitly or implicitly included in a favourite term of the Priestly legislation, namely (11) ʾishshēh, fire offering, in EV 'the offering (or sacrifice) made by fire.' The fire offering is also mentioned in Dt 18¹ and 1 S 2²⁴ (a Deuteronomic passage).

Two other significant terms may be taken together, namely, the heave offering and the wave offering. The former is the rendering, in this connexion, of (12) terūmah, which etymologically signifies not something 'heaved up' (so Ex 29²⁷), but rather 'what is lifted off' a larger mass, or separated from it for sacred purposes.' The Heb. word is used in a variety of applications—gifts of agricultural produce, of the spoils of war, etc., and in these cases is rendered 'offering' or 'oblation' (see Driver, DB iii. 588, and Com. on Deut. 142, who considers 'that "contribution" is perhaps the English word which . . . best suggests the ideas expressed by the Heb. terūmah'). In connexion with sacrifice, however, it denotes certain portions 'taken or lifted off' from the rest and assigned to the priests as their due, in particular the 'heave thigh' (Lv 7³⁴ RV), or 'the thigh of the heave offering' (Ex 29³²). 'Heave offering' accordingly in the sacrificial terminology is the equivalent of 'priest's portion' (cf. Lv 6¹⁷, where, however, a different word is used).

(13) With the terūmah is closely associated the tenūphāh or wave offering. The Heb. word denotes a movement to and fro, swinging, 'waving,' the priest lifting his share of the victim and moving it to and fro in the direction of the altar, thus symbolizing the presentation of the part of J', and J''s return of it to the priest. It is applied specially to the breast of the sacrificial victim, hence termed 'the breast of the wave offering' (Ex 29³¹), or more tersely 'the wave breast' (Lv 7³⁴ 10¹¹). Further, like terūmah, tenūphāh is also used in the more general sense of 'offering' (Ex 35²²; cf. Nu 8¹⁴ 15 of the Levites, where the change from 'offering' (AV) to 'wave offering' (RV) is not an improvement).

(14) The last entry in this vocabulary of OT sacrifice is reserved for the obscure term ʾazkārāh, memorial offering, applied especially to the handful of the cereal offering burnt by the priest upon the altar (Lv 2² 3 11 etc., EV 'memorial'). According to the usual, but uncertain, derivation of the term (zākar 'remember'), the ʾazkārāh is understood as an offering designed to bring the offerer to J''s remembrance.

3. SACRIFICE AND OFFERING IN THE PRE-EXILIC PERIOD.—The history of OT sacrifice, like the history of the religion of Israel of which it is the most characteristic expression, falls into two main divisions, the first embracing the period from Moses to the end of the monarchy (n.c. 586), the second the period from the Babylonian exile to the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70. For the latter period we have the advantage of the more or less systematic presentation of the subject in the various strata of the complex legislation of P (esp. Lv 1-7); for the former we must have recourse to the numerous references to sacrifice in the non-Priestly sources of the Pentateuch, in the early narratives of the historical books, and in the writings of the pre-exilic prophets.

Now, according to J, sacrifice as an institution is as old as the human race itself (Gn 4^{4ff}). In this significant narrative, sacrifice appears as the spontaneous expression of man's need of God, who 'made of one every nation of men . . . that they should seek God, if haply they might feel after him and find him' (Ac 17²⁶ RV).

Our study of the terminology of sacrifice has shown that the dominant conception of sacrifice in the OT from first to last is that of a gift, present, or offering. The object of the gift, reduced to its simplest terms, may be said to be threefold—to secure and retain the favour of J', to remove His displeasure incurred, and to express gratitude for benefits received. In this, Hebrew sacrifice differed from sacrifice elsewhere, even in the lowest religions, only in respect of the deity to whom it was offered.

The sacrificial worship of the earlier differs from that of the later period mainly in the greater freedom as regards the occasion and in particular the place of sacrifice, in the greater simplicity of the ritual, and in the joyousness of the cult as compared with the more sombre atmosphere of the post-exilic worship, due to a deepened sense of sin and the accompanying conviction of the need of expiation.

As regards, first of all, the place of sacrifice, every village appears to have had its sanctuary or 'high place' with its altar and other appurtenances of the cult, on which the recent excavations have thrown so much new and unexpected light (see HIGH PLACE). Not that sacrifice could be offered at any spot the worshipper might choose; it must be one hallowed by the tradition of a theophany: 'in every place where I record my name I will come unto thee and I will bless thee' (Ex 20²⁴ RV). With the abolition of the local sanctuaries by Josiah in B.C. 622–21, the Temple at Jerusalem became and henceforth remained, the only legitimate place of sacrifice, as required by the legislation of Deuteronomy (12²²).

The occasions of sacrifice were manifold, and in the days of the local sanctuaries, which practically means the whole of the period under consideration, these occasions were naturally taken advantage of to an extent impossible when sacrifice was confined to the Temple of Jerusalem. Only a few of such occasions, whether stated or special, can be noted here. Of the regular or stated occasions may be named the daily sacrifices of the Temple—a burnt offering in the morning followed by a cereal offering in the afternoon (2 K 16¹⁵, cf. 1 K 18²³), which, however, may refer to one or more of the large sanctuaries of the Northern Kingdom, e.g. Bethel or Samaria, the 'yearly sacrifice' of the various clans (1 S 20⁴), those at the recurring festivals, such as the new moon and the three agricultural feasts (Ex 23¹⁶⁻¹⁸, 34²²⁻²³), at which the oldest legislation laid down that 'none shall appear before me empty' (23¹⁸, 34²³), that is, without an offering in token of gratitude and homage. Still more numerous were the special occasions of sacrifice—the installation of a king (1 S 11¹⁵, the arrival of an honoured guest, family events such as the weaning of a child, a circumcision, a marriage, the dedication of a house (Dt 20⁵): no compact or agreement was completed until sealed by a sacrifice (Gn 31⁵⁴ etc.); at the opening of a campaign the warriors were 'consecrated' by a sacrifice (1 S 13⁹⁻¹⁰, Is 3¹ RV). One of the most fruitful occasions of sacrifice was undoubtedly the discharging of a vow, of which those of Jacob (Gn 28²⁰⁻²²), Jephthah (see 5), Hannah (1 S 1¹¹), and Absalom (2 S 15⁷) may be cited as typical specimens, just as in Syria to-day, among fellahin and bedouin alike, similar vows are made to the welwa of the local shrines by or on behalf of sick persons, childless women, or to avert or remove plague or other threatened calamity.

4. THE VARIETIES AND MATERIAL OF SACRIFICE IN THIS PERIOD.—Three varieties of sacrifice are met with in the older Hebrew literature, viz. the burnt offering, the 'peace' offering, and the cereal or 'meal' offering. The two former, appearing sometimes as 'burnt offerings and sacrifices' (Ex 18¹³, Jer 7²² etc.), sometimes as 'burnt offerings and peace offerings' (Ex 24⁵, 1 S 13⁹ etc.), exhaust the category of animal sacrifices, the special 'sin' and 'guilt' offerings being first definitely named by Ezekiel (see §§ 13–15). The typical animal offering in the pre-exilic period is that now termed 'sacrifice' (zebach) simply, now 'peace offering' (Am 5²³) to differentiate it more clearly from the burnt offering, now still more explicitly 'sacrifice of peace offerings' (perhaps rather 'of recompense,' shildmim, § 2). Almost all the special offerings and most of the stated ones were of this type. Its distinguishing feature was the sacrificial meal, which followed the sacrifice proper. After the blood had been returned to the Giver of life (we have no details as to the manipulation of the blood in the earliest period, but see 1 S 14²²⁻²⁴), and the fat burned upon the altar (1 S 2¹⁵; cf. Is 1¹¹), the flesh of the victim was eaten at the sanctuary by the sacrificer and his family (1 S 13⁷⁻⁹) or, in the case of a communal sacrifice, by the representatives of the community (9²²⁻²³). The last passage shows that a special 'guest-chamber' was provided at the 'high place' for this purpose.

The underlying idea of this, by far the commonest form of sacrifice was that of sharing a common meal with the deity. The worshippers were the 'guests' (Zeph 1⁷) of God at His sanctuary, and as such secure of His favour. To this day among the Arabs 'the act of eating together is regarded as something particularly solemn and sacred,' and, as is well known, creates a solidarity of interest between guest and host, and imposes upon the latter the duty of protecting his guest so long as, in Arab phrase, 'his salt is in his belly' (see Jausen, Coutumes des Arabes [1908], 86–88). This idea of table communion, as it is termed, is accordingly one which may be reckoned a common possession of the Semitic stock. Even to St. Paul the eating of meat that had been sacrificed to heathen deities appeared as an act of 'communion (AV 'fellowship') with demons' (1 Co 10²⁰ Amer. RV). References to this solemn—one might almost say sacramental—eating of the sacrifice are too frequent to require citation, but we may recall the favourite expression of Deuteronomy, 'ye shall eat (and drink) before the Lord your God' (12⁷ etc.), often followed by the equally characteristic 'ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God.' Here we meet with the dominant note of Hebrew worship in this period, the note of joyousness above referred to—an element which not infrequently led to the excesses deplored by the prophets.

Much less frequent in the older documents is the mention of the burnt offering, more precisely the 'whole' offering (see above, § 2). The fact that the whole was consumed upon the altar enhanced its value as a 'holy gift,' and accordingly we find it offered when the occasion was one of special solemnity (Gn 8²⁰, 1 K 3⁴ etc.), or was otherwise extraordinary, as e.g. 1 S 6¹⁴. In most cases the burnt offering appears in conjunction with the ordinary 'sacrifice' above described (Ex 18¹³, 1 S 6¹⁷, 2 S 6¹⁷, 2 K 16¹³⁻¹⁴; cf. Is 1¹¹, Jer 7²² 13²⁴).

Apart from the special offering of the first-fruits, the cereal or meal offering (AV 'meat offering' § 2) is rarely mentioned as an independent offering in this period, but is frequently named along with the two more important offerings discussed above, as Jg 13²³, Am 5²², Jer 14¹² (with the burnt offering), 1 S 2³⁴, Is 19²³ (EV 'oblation'), and often. 'When the Hebrew ate flesh, he ate bread with it and drank wine, and when he offered flesh on the table of his God, it was natural that he should add to it the same concomitants that were necessary to make up a comfortable and generous meal' (RS² 222). The various forms which the meal offering might assume are attested for a later period by Lv 2, for which see § 11. One form occurring there is undoubtedly ancient, viz. parched ears of corn (2¹⁴; cf. Food, § 2).

Another very ancient form of offering, although not an altar-offering in the strict sense (yet strangely reckoned among the fire offerings, Lv 24⁹), is that named the presence bread (EV 'shewbread'), which perpetuates the primitive idea of an offering as a meal for the deity (1 S 21⁴⁻⁶, 1 K 7⁴⁹). The mention in a later passage of 'the flagons thereof and the bowls thereof to pour out withal' (Ex 25²⁹, see, further, SHEWBREAD) shows that, as for an ordinary meal, the 'holy bread' was accompanied by a provision of wine, in other words by a drink offering. This species of offering occurs as an independent offering only in Gn 35¹⁴. The skins of wine mentioned in 1 S 12¹⁴ 10³ doubtless served in part for a drink or 'wine offering' (Hos 9⁴), in part, like the accompanying flour and loaves, for the sacrificial meal. More explicit reference to the wine of the drink offering as an accompaniment of animal sacrifice is found in Dt 32²⁸ (cf. the early reference, Jg 9¹³, to wine 'which cheereth God'). For the ritual of the later drink offering, see § 11. It is significant of the predominant part played by the drink offering in early Babylonian ritual, that the word for libation (nîqu) has there become the usual term for sacrifice (KA²⁷ 595).

A brief reference must suffice for oil in early ritual (Gn 28¹⁴, Jg 9⁹, Mic 6⁷—for the later ritual, see § 11). A water offering appears only in the isolated cases 1 S 7⁷, 2 S 23¹⁶, but emerges as an interesting survival in the rites of the Feast of Tabernacles (wh. see). Honey, although offered among the first-fruits (2 Ch 31¹⁴), was excluded, along with milk, from the altar (Lv 2¹¹), on the ground that both were liable to fermentation (see also LEAVEN).

6. MATERIAL AND RITUAL OF SACRIFICE IN THIS PERIOD.—From the details just given it is evident that 'among the Hebrew offerings drawn from the vegetable kingdom, meal, wine, and oil take the chief place, and these were also the chief vegetable constituents of man's daily food' (RS² 219). The same remark holds good of the animal sacrifices, which were drawn chiefly from 'the herd,' i.e. neat cattle, and from the 'flock,' i.e. sheep and goats. Excluded from the altar, on the other hand, were not only all unclean animals, but also game and fish, which, not being reared by man, were probably regarded as God's special property, and therefore inadmissible as a present from man. This idea that only what was a man's 'very own' constituted an appropriate sacrifice is reflected in David's words to Araunah, 2 S 24²⁴ (offerings 'which cost me nothing' RV). Males of the various species,—a heifer is mentioned in connexion with ordinary sacrifice only 1 S 16² (Gn 15⁹, Dt 21¹⁵, 1 S 6¹⁴ do not belong to this category),—and of these, yearlings, as in the later legislation, were doubtless the commonest victims, although we read of 'a bullock of three years old' (1 S 12¹⁴, see RVm; Jg 6²⁵ is corrupt, 'seven years old').

The question of human sacrifice cannot be passed over, even in this brief sketch of a vast subject. The recent excavations at Gezer and elsewhere (see HIGH PLACE, § 3) have revealed the surprising extent to which this practice prevailed among the Canaanites (cf. 2 K 3²⁷), and well-attested instances are recorded even among the Hebrews (Jg 11³⁰⁻⁴⁰, 1 K 16³⁴ RV, for which see HOUSE, § 3), apart altogether from the child sacrifices to Molech. Indeed, the familiar story of Abraham's frustrated sacrifice of Isaac is now regarded as a polemic against this inhuman custom, which certainly had no sanction in the religion of OT.

As regards the ritual of sacrifice in this period, we have little information, 1 S 2¹³⁻¹⁶ being the only passage that touches definitely on this subject. This much is certain, that much greater latitude prevailed while the local sanctuaries existed than was afterwards the case; and also, that the priest played a much less conspicuous part in the rite than he does in the developed system of the Priests' Code. The chief function of the priest in the earliest times was to give 'direction' (ûrah) by means of the oracle, and to decide in matters pertaining to the sphere of 'clean and unclean.' The layman—as father of the family or head of the clan, still more the anointed king—offered his sacrifice without the intervention of the priest. The latter, however, as the custodian of the sanctuary, was entitled to his due (see 1 S l.c., Dt 18²). At the more frequented sanctuaries—Jerusalem, Bethel, Beersheba, etc.—a more or less elaborate ritual was gradually evolved, for which the priest, as its depository, became indispensable.

But even from the first the deity had to be approached with due precaution. The worshippers 'sanctified' themselves by ablutions (1 S 16⁹), and by washing (Ex 19¹⁰) or changing their garments (Gn 35²); for only those who were ceremonially 'clean' could approach the altar of J^h. The sacrificer then entered the high place and immolated the sacrificial victim, originally, it would appear, upon the altar itself (Gn 22⁹, 1 S 14³¹), so that the blood ran over it; later, near to the altar, care being taken that the blood was caught and poured out at its base. The victim was next cut up and the fat of the viscera removed. In the case of an ordinary sacrifice (zebach), to judge from 1 S 2¹⁶, the flesh was boiled for the sacrificial meal, and not until the latter was ready was the fat, J^h's special portion, burned upon the altar. By this simultaneous consumption of the sacrifice the table-fellowship of J^h and His guests was more strikingly realized, the latter 'eating and drinking before the Lord,' as the 'sweet smoke' (qêdôreth) ascended from the altar, an 'odour of soothing' (EV 'sweet savour') unto the Lord.

While the normal attitude of the worshippers on such occasions was one of rejoicings, as became those who, by thus renewing their covenant relation to J^h in the way appointed, felt themselves secure of His favour and protection, a more serious note, implying a sense of alienation and the need of propitiation, is not infrequently found even in pre-exilic sacrifice, as will appear in a later section (§ 13).

6. THE DEVELOPED SACRIFICIAL SYSTEM OF THE POST-EXILIC PERIOD—ITS GENERAL FEATURES.—In an earlier section it was shown how intimately connected with the everyday life of the family were the free, joyous sacrifices at the local sanctuaries. The abolition of the latter by Josiah, in accordance with the demands of Deuteronomy (for the justification of this measure, see HIGH PLACE, § 6), marks an epoch in the history of OT sacrifice. Hitherto every slaughter of a domestic animal for the entertainment of a guest, or to celebrate a family 'event,' was a form of sacrifice (for a remarkable list and description of such 'immolations' as practised by the Arabs of Moab at the present day, see Jausen, Coutumes des Arabes au pays de Moab [1908], 337-363). Henceforward this was no longer so. The restriction of legitimate sacrifice to the one distant sanctuary at Jerusalem meant in practice the divorce from common life of the principal rite of religion. The Temple, from being only one, although certainly the most important, of the local sanctuaries of Judah, became the one national sanctuary; the cultus assumed an official character, while its dignity was enhanced by the presence of a numerous priesthood and a more elaborate ritual. Sacrifice, in short, lost its former spontaneity and became a statutory obligation. The Jewish nation had taken the first step towards becoming the Jewish Church.

A still more potent factor, making for change, soon appeared in the shape of the crushing calamity of the Exile. Then, at last, the words of the prophets came home to men's hearts and minds, and it was recognized that the nation had received the due reward of its deeds. A deepened sense of sin and a heightened conception of the Divine holiness were two of the most precious fruits of the discipline of the Exile. The confident assurance of J^h's protection and good-will, which marked the relations of worshipper and worshipped in the days of Israel's prosperity, had passed away. In its place arose a conviction of the need of expiation and propitiation—a conviction reflected in the whole sacrificial system, as gradually systematized and elaborated, on the basis of the usage of the Temple, by successive generations of Priestly writers from Ezekiel onwards. In its fully developed form, as we find it in the middle books of the Pentateuch, we see how the cultus as a whole has become the affair of the community: the old sacral units, the family and the clan, have disappeared.

Great—one is tempted to say, the main—stress is now laid on the technique of sacrifice, on the proper observance of the prescribed ritual: the slightest want of conformity thereto invalidates the sacrifice; the old latitude and freedom are gone for ever. The necessary corollary is the enhanced status and importance of the priest as the indispensable intermediary between the worshipper and the Deity. Beyond immolating the victims, the laity are no longer competent to perform the sacrificial rites. The relative importance of the two older animal sacrifices, the olah and the zebach, is now reversed. The typical sacrifice is no longer the latter with its accompanying meal, but the 'continual burnt offering,' an act of worship performed every morning and evening in the Temple in the name of the community, whose presence is unnecessary for its due performance. Still more characteristic of the later period, however, is the emergence of special propitiatory sacrifices (piacula)—the allied sin offering and guilt offering. The older varieties of sacrifice, although still retaining their propitiatory efficacy, are no longer sufficient to express and adequately to satisfy the new consciousness of man's sinfulness, or, more accurately expressed, of God's exacting holiness.

7. THE FIVE KINDS OF ALTAR-OFFERINGS IN P.—The numerous altar-offerings mentioned in the various strata of the Priestly legislation are divided by Josephus into two classes: (i) those offered 'for private persons,' and (ii) those offered 'for the people in general,'—a classification corresponding to the Roman sacra privata and sacra publica (Ant. iii. ix. 1). The public sacrifices were either stated or occasional, the former and more important group comprising the daily burnt offering (see § 10) and the additional sacrifices at the stated festivals—Sabbath, New Moon, New Year, the three great feasts, and the Day of Atonement.

Since it is impossible within present limits to attempt to enumerate, much less to discuss, the multifarious varieties and occasions of public and private sacrifices, it will be more convenient to follow, as before, the order of the five distinct kinds as given in the systematic manual, Lv 1-7. These are (1) the burnt offering, (2) the cereal or meal (AV 'meat') offering, (3) the peace offering and the two propitiatory sacrifices, (4) the sin offering, and (5) the guilt (AV 'trespass') offering. Arranged according to the material of the offering, these fell into two groups represented by the terms 'sacrifice' and 'offering' (§ 1); in other words, into animal and vegetable or cereal offerings (including the drink offering). The four animal or bloody offerings may be classified according to the destination of the flesh of the victim, thus (cf. the relative §§ below)—

(i) The flesh entirely consumed upon the altar—the burnt or whole offering.

(ii) The flesh not consumed upon the altar—the peace offerings and the two propitiatory offerings.

The second group may again be subdivided thus—

(a) The flesh apart from the priest's dues, assigned to the offerer for a sacrificial meal—the peace offering.

(b) The flesh assigned to the priests to be eaten within the sanctuary—the guilt offerings and the less important of the sin offerings.

(c) The flesh burned without the sanctuary—the more important sin offerings.

8. THE MATERIAL OF SACRIFICE IN P.—'Holy' and 'most holy.'—The material of all these remains the same as in the pre-exilic period (§ 5), with the addition of pigeons and turtle-doves to meet the needs of the poor, but the victim for each special kind of sacrifice, and its qualifications, are now definitely prescribed. As regards neat and small cattle, the victims must be males for the most part, entire and without blemish (see Lv 22 for list of imperfections—an exception, however, was made for the freewill offering, v. 22). For the peace offering both sexes were equally admissible (31), and a female victim is specially prescribed for the less important sin offerings (42^a, 42^b). The animals were eligible for sacrifice from the eighth day onwards (22²⁷), but the typical sacrifice was the yearling. For the material of the cereal offering see below.

Here may be noted an interesting contrast between such offerings as were regarded as merely 'holy' and those reckoned 'most holy.' The limits of the former category are somewhat vague, but it certainly included firstlings and first-fruits, the tithe and the portions of the peace offerings falling to the priests, whereas the shewbread (Lv 24⁹), the sacred incense (Ex 30³⁸), the meal offering (Lv 23), and the sin and guilt offerings (62^a, 29 71^a, 5) are all classed as 'most holy.' One practical effect of the distinction was that the 'most holy things' could be eaten only by the priests, and by them only within the Temple precincts (61^a, 29, Nu 18¹⁰; cf. Ezk 42¹³, 46²⁰). As charged with a special potency of holiness, which was highly contagious, the 'most holy things'—there were many other entries in the category, such as the altar and the high priest's dress—rendered all who came in contact with them 'holy,' in modern phrase 'taboo' (Lv 6¹⁸, 27). The 'holy things,' on the other hand, might be eaten by the priests and their households, if ceremonially clean, in any 'clean place,' i.e. practically in Jerusalem (10¹⁴, 22², 10-16, Nu 18¹¹⁻¹²).

9. THE RITUAL OF POST-EXILIC SACRIFICE.—This is now, like all else, matter of careful regulation. The ritual, as a whole, doubtless continued and developed that of the pre-exilic Temple, where the priest had long taken the place of the lay offerer in the most significant parts of the rite. After the offerer had duly 'sanctified' himself as explained in § 5, and had his sacrifice examined and passed by the Temple officials, the procedure comprised the following 'actions':—

(1) The formal presentation of the victim to the priest officiating at the altar.

(2) The semikhah or laying on of hands; the offerer leaned his right hand—in the later praxis, both hands—upon the head of the victim, in token of its being withdrawn from the sphere of the 'common' and transferred to the sphere of 'holy things' (cf. for the two spheres, 1 S 21⁴), and of his personal assignation of it to the Deity. There is no suggestion in this act of the victim being thereby made the substitute in a penal sense of its owner and donor (see the Comm., and, for recent discussions, the ref. in DB Ext. Vol. 720^o).

(3) The immolation of the victim, on the north side of the altar (Lv 1¹¹, 62^a), by severing the arteries of the neck. In private sacrifices this was always done by the person presenting them.

(4) The manipulation of the blood by the priest. This, the central action of the whole rite, varied considerably for the different sacrifices. After being caught by the priest in a large basin, the blood was in most cases tossed against the sides of the altar ('sprinkle' of EV, Lv 1³, 32 etc.), is misleading, being the proper rendering of a different term occurring 4⁸, 10⁴, and elsewhere). Generally it may be said that the more pronounced the propitiatory character of the sacrifice, the nearer the blood was brought to the presence of the deity (see § 14), the climax being reached in the blood-rite of the Day of Atonement (16¹⁴, see ATONEMENT [Day of]).

(5) The skinning and dismemberment of the animal, including the removal of the internal fat, as specified 3^a, 4 and 48¹. The hide fell to the officiating priest, except in the case of the sin offering, when it was burned with the flesh (Ex 29¹⁴).

(6) The arrangement of all the pieces upon the altar in the case of the burnt offering, of the specified portions of 'the inwards' in the case of the others; and finally—

(7) The burning—lit. the turning into 'sweet smoke'

—of these upon the altar of burnt offering, the fire on which was kept continually burning (Lv 6¹³).

Of these various elements of the ritual, those requiring contact with the altar as a 'most holy thing,' viz. (4), (6), and (7), represent the priest's, the rest the layman's, share in the rite of sacrifice.

10. The burnt offering (Lv 1¹⁻⁷ 6⁸⁻¹³, Ex 29¹⁵⁻¹⁸).—The first place in the manual of sacrifice, Lv 1-7, is occupied by the sacrifice which alone was entirely consumed upon the altar, hence the older and more correct designation 'whole offering' (§ 2)—a feature which constituted it the typical honorific sacrifice, the fullest expression of homage to J^h on the part alike of the community and of the individual. The victim from the flock and the herd was always a male—yearling bull, ram, or he-goat. The turtle-dove and the young pigeon of the poor had their special ritual (14¹⁻¹⁷). The most important of the stated sacrifices in the period under review was the 'continual burnt offering' (Ex 29¹⁵⁻⁴², Nu 28¹⁻⁸), so called because it was presented every morning and evening along with a cereal oblation by the particular 'course' of priests on duty in the Temple. The victim was a yearling lamb, which was offered on behalf of the whole community of Israel throughout the world. An interesting survival of the primitive anthropomorphic conception of sacrifice, as affording a complete meal to the deity, is seen in the provision that every burnt offering (as also every peace offering) must be accompanied by both a meal offering and a drink offering (see next §).

11. The meal (AV meat) offering (Lv 2. 6¹⁴⁻²², Nu 15¹⁻¹⁶ etc.).—As pointed out in an early section, the term minchâh, which originally was applicable both to an animal and to a cereal offering, is in the later legislation limited to the latter species. As such it appears in a large variety of forms, and may be either an independent offering, as contemplated in Lv 2, or, as in most cases, an accompaniment of the burnt and peace offerings (Nu 15¹⁻¹⁶). One of the oldest forms of the minchâh was, undoubtedly, the 'meal offering of first-fruits,' as described Lv 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶; another antique form survived in the unique offering of barley meal in the jealousy offering (Nu 5⁸). As an ordinary altar-offering the minchâh consisted of 'fine flour,' and was presented either cooked or uncooked, as prescribed in detail in Lv 2¹⁻⁷. In the latter case the flour was placed in a vessel and mixed with oil, the equivalent of our butter in matters culinary. The dough was then covered with frankincense, when it was ready for presentation at the altar. The priest took off all the frankincense, then removed a handful of the dough, which he put into another vessel, added salt, the unfailing accompaniment of every species of altar-offering (2¹³, Mk 9⁴), and the frankincense, and proceeded to burn the whole upon the altar. The portion burned was termed the 'azkârâh' (§ 2), or 'memorial' (so EV from Vulg. memoriale). The remainder of the offering fell to the priests, by whom it was eaten as 'a thing most holy' (§ 8). The priests' own meal offerings, on the other hand, were wholly burned (Lv 6²³).

In Nu 15¹⁻¹⁶ and elsewhere, minute instructions are given as to the precise amounts of fine flour, oil, and wine which should accompany the burnt and peace offerings (cf. Ezk 46¹⁴ and the tabular comparison of the quantities in the two passages in Gray, 'Numbers' [ICC], 170). These were regulated by the importance of the animal sacrificed, the drink or wine offering (Hos 9⁴), for example, being uniformly $\frac{1}{2}$ hin for a bullock, $\frac{1}{3}$ hin for a ram, and $\frac{1}{4}$ hin for a lamb,—the hin may be taken approximately as 12 pints.

No instructions have been preserved as to how the wine was to be offered, but from later evidence it appears that, like the blood, it was 'poured out at the foot of the altar' (Sir 50¹³; cf. Jos. Ant. III. ix. 4). For the importance of incense in the later ritual, see INCENSE.

12. The peace or thank offering (Lv 3¹⁻¹⁶ 7¹¹⁻²¹.

25-34 17¹⁻⁹ 22²¹⁻³³ etc.). The latter rendering, which is that of RVm. is nearer what we consider to be the meaning of the original term, 'sacrifice of recompense' (§ 2). Its distinguishing feature continued to be the sacrificial meal which followed the actual sacrifice. Three varieties are named—(a) the thanksgiving offering (7¹³ 15 îdâhâh, also rendered 'thank offering' in the narrower sense, 2 Ch 29³¹), in recognition of some special mercy; (b) the votive offering (EV 'vow,' Lv 7¹⁶), in discharge of a vow; and (c) the freewill offering, a spontaneous and unprescribed recognition of God's goodness. The last was clearly of less importance than the others, since for it alone imperfect victims were admitted to the altar (22²⁹). As a fourth variety may be reckoned (d) the priests' installation offering (Ex 29¹⁹⁻²⁸).

The modus operandi was essentially the same as for the burnt offering,—female victims, however, being admitted equally with males. Special instructions are given as to the removal of the fat adhering to the inwards (see the coloured illustrations in SBOT, 'Levit.,' in loc.), along with the 'caul of the liver,' i.e. the caudate lobe (G. F. Moore; see EBI lv. col. 4206, and the ref. in Oxf. Heb. Lex. 1124^b), and the two kidneys. The parts falling to the priests, the breast and the right hind leg,—these varied at different times, cf. Dt 18³ with Ex 29²⁶, Lv 7³¹.—were symbolically presented to and returned by J^h, by being 'waved' towards the altar (see § 2 for this ceremony, and for the expressions 'heave thigh' and 'wave breast'). The fat was then salted and burned, while the remainder of the flesh furnished the characteristic meal. Both sexes, if ceremonially clean, might partake of this meal, but only on the day of the sacrifice or the day following (Lv 7¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 19⁴⁻⁵). The flesh of the special thanksgiving offering (îdâhâh), however, had to be eaten on the day it was offered (7¹⁵ 22²⁹).

13. THE SPECIAL PROPITIATORY SACRIFICES.—The sin offering and the guilt offering.—One of the characteristic features of the later period, as has already been pointed out, is the stress laid on the propitiatory aspect of sacrifice. It is not, of course, to be supposed that this element was absent in the earlier period. Such passages as 1 S 3¹⁴ 26¹⁹, 2 S 24²⁵, Mic 6⁶, 7 and others prove the contrary, even were it not the fact that the idea of propitiating the unseen powers is one lying at the root of all sacrifice (see above, § 3). But, as shown by the passages now cited, expiation and propitiation were sought through the medium of the ordinary sacrifices. The special propitiatory sacrifices with which we have now to deal probably made their appearance in the dark days which preceded the fall of the Jewish monarchy, although, so far as our literary evidence goes, Ezekiel is the first to differentiate them by name, as the chattâ'th (sin) and the 'âshâm (guilt), from the older types of offering (40³⁹ 42¹³ etc.).

The study of these newer sacrifices is complicated, in the first place, by the divergent regulations found in the different sections of the completed Pentateuch, which seem to reflect the practice of different periods, or perhaps the views of different schools; and, in the second place, by the consequent difficulty of detecting a clear line of demarcation between the two allied offerings (see § 15). From the point of view of ritual, the chief points of difference are these: (1) In the guilt offering the manipulation of the blood agrees with that prescribed for the older sacrifices; in the sin offering, on the other hand, the blood ritual is more complicated and varies in intensity according to the theocratic and social position of the offerer. This feature alone is sufficient to distinguish the sin offering as par excellence the sacrifice of expiation and atonement. (2) For the guilt offering the victim is uniformly a ram ('the ram of atonement,' Nu 5⁹); for the sin offering the victim varies according to the same principle as the blood ritual, the higher the position of the offerer in the theocratic community the more valuable the victim. On the other hand, both agree as compared with the older sacrifices: (1) in the disposal of the flesh of the sacrifice in so far as it was neither entirely burned on the altar as in the whole offering, nor assigned to the offerer for a sacred meal as in the peace offering, but was otherwise disposed of (see next §§); and (2) in the absence of the cereal and wine offerings which were the regular accompaniments of the other animal sacrifices.

14. The sin offering (Lv 4¹⁻¹³ 6²⁴⁻³⁰, Ex 29¹¹⁻¹⁴, Nu 15²²⁻²⁹ etc.).—Leaving aside the question of the relation of these sections to each other as to origin and date—all-important as this is for the evolution of the sin offering—we find from a comparison of Lv 4. 5⁷⁻¹³, the most systematic as it is probably the latest exposition of the subject, with other sections of the code where this special sacrifice is required, that the latter was the prescribed medium of expiation for two main classes of offences. These are (1) sins committed in ignorance or by inadvertence (4¹³ 13. 22, Nu 15²⁴⁻²⁹) as opposed to sins committed 'with an high hand' (v. 30 RV), i.e. in conscious and wilful defiance of the Divine law, for which no sacrifice could atone; (2) cases of defilement or uncleanness, contracted in various ways and having no connexion with 'sin' in the modern sense of a breach of the moral law, such as the defilement of childbirth and of leprosy, the uncleanness of the altar and the like.

At this point it will repay us to examine the origin of the term chattā'th, omitted from § 2, as likely to afford a clue to the true significance of the sacrifice. Derived from the verb signifying 'to sin' in the sense of 'to miss (the mark or the way)', chattā'th denotes sin then a sacrifice for sin. It may be questioned, however, whether this transference of meaning was as direct as is usually implied. The intensive stems of the root-verb are repeatedly used in the 'privative' sense best expressed by 'to unsin' (Germ. entsündigen) by some rite of purification, as Lv 8⁶, Ezk 43²⁰⁻²², of 'unsinning', i.e. purifying or purging the altar; Nu 19¹³, of 'unsinning' a person defiled by contact with a corpse; 8² 'the Levites unsinned themselves' (RV purified themselves from sin) and washed their clothes, 'where the 'sin' of RV refers only to ceremonial uncleanness. From this use of the verb, chattā'th itself acquired the secondary sense of 'purification,' e.g. Nu 8⁷ (AV rightly 'water of purifying'—RV 'expiation') and 19¹⁷, where the red heifer and her ashes are described as a chattā'th, that is, as the means of removing the uncleanness caused by the dead. It follows from the above that 'purification offering' better expresses to the modern mind the purposes of the chattā'th than does 'sin offering,' with its misleading associations.

These considerations lead us directly to the heart of the sacrificial doctrine, if the term may be allowed, of Ezekiel and the Priests' Code. Sacrifice is the Divinely appointed means by which the ideal holiness of the theocratic community is to be maintained. God's all-devouring holiness requires that the people shall keep themselves free not only from moral imperfection, but also from every ceremonial defilement that would interrupt the relations between them and God. In the sphere of morals only 'unwitting faults' are contemplated, for 'these are the only faults of which the redeemed and restored people will be guilty' (A. B. Davidson), and, in so far as the ritual of the sin offering provides for their expiation, these sins of inadvertence are conceived as defiling the sinner who, because of his uncleanness, becomes a source of danger to the community. From this point of view the gradation in the victims prescribed first becomes intelligible; for the higher the theocratic rank of the sinner, the greater, according to the antique view of the contagion both of holiness and of uncleanness, was his power of contamination. It is to be noted, finally, that the order is first the removal of the defilement by means of the sacrifice, and then the Divine forgiveness of his sin as a moral offence (see Lv 4²⁰ 22. 31. 32).

Returning to Lv 4¹⁻¹³, we find that, apart from the gradation of the prescribed victims already referred to, the distinguishing feature in the ritual of the sin offering is the more intense application of the blood. In this respect two grades of sin offering are distinguished, a higher and a lower. In the higher grade, which comprises the offering of the high priest and that of the 'whole congregation,' the blood is carried by the officiating priest into the Holy Place of the Tent of Meeting—and practice the Temple. There some of it is sprinkled with the finger seven times before the veil, and some applied to the horns of the altar of incense, while the rest is poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering. The victim in both cases is a young bull, the flesh of which is so sacrosanct that it has to be burned without the camp.

In the lower grade, part of the blood was smeared upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, while the rest was poured out, as before, at its base. It is interesting to note, as bearing on the evolution of the ritual, that in a presumably older stratum of P (Ex 29¹¹⁻¹⁴), the blood ritual, even for the high priest's offering, does not exceed that of the lower grade of Lv 4. The flesh of the latter, which was also 'most holy,' was eaten by the priests within the sanctuary (6²⁴⁻³⁰). To meet the requirements of the poor man, provision was made for the admission of 'two turtle-doves or two young pigeons,' and in cases of extreme poverty of 'the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour' (about 7 pints), offered without oil and without incense (5¹¹⁻¹³).

If the conclusion reached above be accepted, that the chattā'th is essentially a sacrifice of purification, it is evident that the victim cannot be regarded here, any more than in the other sacrifices, as the substitute for the offerer, presumed to have incurred the penalty of death (see, further, for the doctrine of the pena vicaria, § 16).

15. The guilt or trespass offering (Lv 5^{14-6⁷} 7²⁻⁷, Nu 5⁶⁻⁸).—

The Heb. word ʾāshām signifies generally a wrong done to another and the guilt thereby incurred, and specially the property of another wilfully withheld (Nu 5⁷⁻⁹). In the earlier period it came to denote also the gift (1 S 6¹⁷) or money payment (2 K 12¹⁶) by which, in addition to restitution, it was sought to make amends for the wrong; in the later period, finally, ʾāshām is the sacrifice which accompanied the act of restitution.

The references in the Pentateuch to the guilt (RV) or trespass (AV, RVm) offering are not entirely consistent in their representation of its nature and purpose. The guilt offering of the leper, for example (Lv 14¹⁰), can scarcely be distinguished from the sin offering (cf. 5¹⁷⁻¹⁹). Taking the most explicit of the passages, however, Lv 6¹⁻⁷, we see that the guilt offering deals with the misappropriation of the property of another. In 5¹⁴⁻¹⁶ this misappropriation takes the form of unwittingly withholding part of the sacred dues, 'the holy things of the Lord.' In both cases the offender has to restore the property or due withheld, together with a fine amounting to one-fifth of its value as compensation for the loss sustained, and to offer a sacrifice as expiation of his breach of faith (5¹⁸, EV 'trespass'). Provision is also made for a public confession (Nu 5⁷). The victim in these typical cases is invariably a ram, and the ritual is that of the ordinary sacrifices, except that the flesh can be eaten, like that of the lower grade of sin offerings, only by the priests 'in a holy place.'

For the various occasions on which one or more of the five varieties of sacrifice above enumerated had to be offered, see, among others, the following articles:—ATONEMENT [DAY OF], CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, COVENANT, FEASTS, NAZIRITE, TITHE, VOW, etc.

16. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF SACRIFICE IN OT.—The origin and significance of sacrifice is a problem on which students of religion are still greatly divided. So far as the OT student is concerned, the question of origins does not necessarily arise, for the institution of sacrifice had already a long life behind it when the Hebrew tribes first entered upon the stage of history. One fact, at least, seems to be well established. The ancestors of the Hebrews, like the Arabs of the present day, had no 'offerings made by fire,' but were content to pour the blood over the sacred stone without burning any part of the flesh. (For the view that the Hebrews of the historic period still retained a recollection of this older custom, see Kittel, Studien zur heb. Archäologie [1908], 96-108.) For the rest the wisest word recently spoken on this subject is that of the late Professor Stade (Bibl. Theol. d. AT, 156): 'The sacrificial worship of ancient Israel is a very complicated phenomenon, which has grown up out of different conceptions and customs, and is by no means to be derived from a single fundamental idea (aus einem Grundgedanken).' Let us proceed to illustrate this word of wisdom.

(a) In the whole period covered by the OT literature, sacrifice, as the terminology proves (see § 1), was thought of as a gift or present to God. The motives which prompted the gifts are nowhere stated in so many words, but may be clearly inferred. In the earliest period, at least, the gifts are offered, now as to an earthly ruler in token of homage, now as an expression of gratitude for benefits received; again, particularly in the very numerous cases of vows, with a view to obtain a coveted boon, for among the Hebrews as among the Greeks it was believed that 'gifts persuade the gods, gifts the revered kings.' We are not surprised, therefore, to find in the oldest Hebrew law-codes the command that none shall appear before Jⁿ 'empty,' that is, without a gift (Ex 23¹⁰ 34²⁰). From first to last, the OT witnesses to this 'conviction that the gift of piety really produces a gratifying, propitious, and in the end conciliatory effect on God' (Schultz, 'Significance of Sacrifice in OT,' AJTh iv. 284).

The form which these 'gifts of piety' assumed was chiefly that of food. The Hebrew offered to God of the things with which his own table was furnished, and these only of the best. This naïve conception of sacrifice as 'the food (EV 'bread') of God' is still found as an interesting survival in the later literature (Ezk 44⁷, Lv 3¹¹ 21⁴ etc.). Cf. 'my food' (Nu 28⁹), 'the table of the Lord' (Mal 1⁷⁻¹²), and the institution of the shewbread. In the historical period, as we have seen, this food of God was always 'etherealized' by being converted into 'sweet smoke' upon the altar; it thus became, in the recurring phrase, 'a soothing odour (EV 'a sweet savour') unto the Lord.' Cf. 1 S 26⁹ 'let him accept (lit. smell) an offering' (as a propitiation).

(b) But this antique conception of sacrifice as the food of the deity by no means exhausts its significance to the Hebrew mind. The typical sacrifice in the pre-exilic period was the peace offering, of which the characteristic feature was the common meal which followed the actual sacrifice. The OT is silent regarding the significance to the Hebrew worshipper of this part of the sacrificial worship. Robertson Smith, as every student knows, would have us see in this 'act of communion in which the god and his worshippers united by partaking of the flesh and blood of a sacred victim' (RS 226 f., and passim), the unconscious survival of the sacramental eating of their god by the members of the totem clan of pre-historic days. This is not the place to enumerate the difficulties of this theory when applied to Semitic sacrifice, the absence of convincing proof of the existence of totemism in the Semitic field being not the least of these.

It is more natural, as suggested above (§ 4), to recognize in the Hebrew sacrificial feast a transference to the sphere of religion of the Semitic idea of the friendship and fellowship which are formed and cemented by partaking of a common meal. By thus sharing, as the guests of God, the common meal of which the worshipped and the worshippers partook within the sanctuary, the latter renewed the bond which united them to their covenant God; they 'ate and drank before the Lord' in full assurance of the continuance of all the blessings which the covenant relation implied.

(c) In the later period of Jewish history, this conception of sacrifice as a table-communion with the deity receded in favour of another to which less prominence was given in the early period, and in which, as has been pointed out (§ 14), sacrifice was regarded as the most important of the Divinely appointed means by which the ideal relation of a holy God to a holy people was to be maintained unimpaired. For inadvertent omissions and transgressions, and for all cases of serious ceremonial defilements, which interrupted this ideal relation, sacrifice in all its forms—not the special propitiatory offerings merely—is said to 'make atonement.'

The Heb. is kippur, of which the original signification is still uncertain. But whether this be 'to cover' or 'to wipe off,' it gives little help in deciding the special meaning of the word in the terminology of sacrifice. There it is used in neither of the senses given above, but always in close connexion with the verbs signifying 'to purify' (tihar) and to 'unsin' (chittu)—terms belonging specially to the terminology of purification (see § 14). Applied to material objects, such as the altar kippur is little more than a synonym of tihar and chittu; applied to persons, it is the summary expression of the rites by which the offender against the holiness of God is made fit to receive the Divine forgiveness and to be re-admitted to the fellowship and worship of the theocratic community. The agent is the priest, who performs the propitiatory rites on behalf of the offender. The words in italics, clumsy though they are, fairly express the meaning of this much discussed term of the Heb. ritual (see, further, Driver's exhaustive study under 'Propitiation' in Hastings, DB iv. esp. p. 131, on the difficulty of finding a satisfactory English rendering). See, further, the small print in § 14.

Now, although it is true, as G. F. Moore reminds us (EBi iv. 4220), that 'the whole public cultus is a means of propitiating God and obtaining remission for sin and uncleanness' (Ezk 45¹⁵⁻¹⁷), it is equally true that the propitiatory efficacy of sacrifice is represented by the Priestly writers as especially bound up with the blood of the sacrificial victim. When we ask the question, In virtue of what property does the blood make atonement?, we find the answer incidentally in the oft-quoted passage Lv 17¹¹. We say incidentally, because v. 11 really contains the answer to an entirely different question—Why is blood taboo as an article of food? Now the verse runs in RV: 'For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh atonement by reason of the life' (that is in it). Strictly speaking, therefore, it is not the blood but the life that is in it that is the medium of propitiation. Beyond this we cannot go in our search for the explanation of the 'how' of atonement on OT ground.

Along other and extra-Biblical lines students have diligently sought for the ultimate basis of this efficacy of blood. It is doubtless to be connected with 'the almost universal belief that blood is a fluid in which inheres a mysterious potency, no less dangerous when misused than efficacious when properly employed' (G. F. Moore, EBi iv. 4218; cf. Trumbull, The Blood Covenant, passim; and Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, 94 f.). Just because of its 'mysterious potency,' and its association with 'the great primeval mysteries of life and death' (Farnell), blood was felt to be too sacred, and indeed too dangerous (see 1 S 14²⁴⁻²⁷), to be used otherwise than as the proper due of the Author of all life. It was at once the most persuasive of gifts at His altar, and the most potent cathartic by which the sinner was purged of uncleanness and sin.

The traditional view that the blood of the sacrifice atoned for the sins of the offerer, because the victim suffered the death which the sinner had incurred, is now rarely maintained. This theory of a pæna vicaria is untenable for these among other reasons: (1) The sins for which the OT sacrifices made atonement were not such as involved the penalty of death (§ 14). (2) Had the guilt of the offerer been transferred to the victim by 'the laying on of hands'—for the meaning of this rite, see § 9—the flesh of the sacrifice would have been in the highest degree unclean, and could not have been eaten by either priests or people. (3) The idea that the Divine forgiveness was procured by the blood of the victim as its owner's substitute is excluded by the admission, for the propitiatory sacrifice par excellence, of a bloodless offering in the shape of an oblation of flour (§ 14, end). Nevertheless, although the doctrine that the death of the victim was a vicarious punishment for the sin of the offerer is not to be found in the legislation itself, the thought was one that could scarcely fail to suggest itself to the popular mind—a conclusion to which it was doubtless assisted by the representation of the vicarious sufferings of the Servant in Is 53.

Summing up the conclusions of this section on the significance of sacrifice in OT, we find it represented in all periods as a gift, mainly of homage to the Divine Sovereign, in the earlier period also as a rite of table communion with the covenant God of Israel, and finally in the later period as pre-eminently the appointed means of purification and expiation as the preliminary to forgiveness, in other words of atonement.

Of the ultima ratio of sacrifice no explicit statement is found in OT. The explanation of the Priestly writers would doubtless have been—'God hath so appointed it.' Beyond this we cannot go. The 'conclusion of the whole matter' may therefore be given in the words of Jesus ben-Sira: 'See that thou appear not in the presence of the Lord empty; for all these things are to be done because of the commandment' (35^a). The final ground of the sinner's pardon and restoration is thus not the preceding sacrifice but the free grace of a merciful and loving God. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SADDUCEES.—Probably the name 'Sadducee' is derived from the name Zadok, a notable priest in the time of David and Solomon (2 S 8¹⁷ 15^a, 1 K 1¹⁴). His descendants long played the leading part among the priests, so that Ezekiel regarded them as the only legitimate priests (Ezk 40^a 43¹⁹ 44¹⁵ 48¹¹). The name indicates the fact that is most decisive for the right understanding of the Sadducees. About the year 200 B.C., when party lines were beginning to be drawn, the name was chosen to point out the party of the priests. That is not saying that no priest could be a Pharisee or a Scribe. Neither is it saying that all the priests were Sadducees. In our Lord's time many of the poor priests were Pharisees. But the higher priestly families and the priests as a body were Sadducees. With them were joined the majority of the aristocratic lay families of Judæa and Jerusalem. This fact gives us the key to their career. It is wrapped up in the history of the high priesthood. For two centuries after the Exile the high priesthood earned the right to the leadership of the Jewish nation. But in our Lord's time its leadership lay far back in the past. Its moral greatness had been undermined on two sides. On one side it had lost touch with what was deepest in the being of the Jews. For the most part this was due to its aristocratic bias. The Levitical priesthood was a close corporation. No man not born a priest could become a priest. More and more, as the interests of the nation widened and deepened, the high priesthood failed to keep pace. Its alliance with the aristocratic families made things worse. The high priesthood and the people drifted apart. No great institution can do that and remain great.

From another side also—the political—the high priesthood was undermined. Owing to the mixture of Church and State the high priests were necessarily in politics all the time. Consequently the historical process, which ended by incorporating Palestine in the Roman Empire, sucked out of the high priesthood all the moralizing influences involved in the handling of large affairs. So, undermined on two sides, the high priesthood lost the right to lead. And the party built up around it—the Sadducees—became the party of those who cared more for their own well-being and for the maintenance of things as they were than for the Kingdom of God.

When we turn to the tenets of the Sadducees, it is still the contrast with the Pharisees that puts them in an intelligible light. Pharisaism, with all its faults, was the heart and soul of the nation, the steward of its treasures—the Holy Scriptures—the trustee of its vitalizing hope. The Sadducees stood for the tenaciously conservative tendencies in the nation. They lay under the curse which rests upon all aristocracies, the inability to realize that the best things must grow. They denied the Pharisaic doctrine of the resurrection of the body (Mk 12¹⁸, Mt 22²³, Lk 20²⁷, Ac 23⁸). The NT is a better guide in this field than Josephus, who affirms (BJ 11. viii. 14, Ant. xviii. i. 4) that they denied the immortality of the soul. Josephus overstated things in his desire to make the Jewish parties look like the philosophical schools of Greece. The Sadducees did not deny the immortality of the soul. But they lingered in the past, the period when the belief in immortality was vague, shadowy, and had not yet become a working motive for goodness. They did not accept the developed faith in immortality which was part and parcel of the Pharisaic teaching regarding the Kingdom of God. And this meant that their nation had outgrown them. The Sadducees also denied the Pharisaic doctrine regarding angels and ministering spirits (Ac 23⁸). Then by they maintained a certain sobriety. They even emancipated themselves from a considerable amount of superstition bound up with Pharisaism. But they paid for it by a wholly disproportionate sacrifice of vital piety.

From this sketch we can see why our Lord had almost no dealings with the Sadducees during His ministry. His interests were with the common people. This brought Him into continual conflict with the Pharisees. It was not until His popularity seemed to threaten the peace of Jerusalem that the high priest, with the Sadducees at his back, was moved to decisive action. We can also see why the Apostolic Church, in her first years, had most to fear from the Sadducees (Ac 4 and 5). See also artt. PHARISEES, SCRIBES. HENRY S. NASH.

SAFFRON (Ca 4¹⁴).—The Heb. karkôm is identical with the Arab. kurkum or za'farân, (whence is derived the Eng. 'saffron'), the name of a variety of crocus (Crocus sativus), of which the yellow styles and stigmas are used for dyeing and for flavouring food. A similar dye, also called saffron, is more commonly derived from the florets of the Carthamus tinctorius (Compositæ) cultivated everywhere in Palestine for this purpose.

SALAMIEL.—An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8¹).

SALAMIS, which must not be confused with the scene of the great battle between Xerxes and the Greeks in B.C. 480, was the first place visited by Paul and Barnabas on the first missionary journey (Ac 13⁸). It existed as early as the 6th cent. B.C. as an important Greek town on the E. coast of Cyprus. In Roman times it remained a flourishing commercial city, and the eastern half of the island was governed from there. There were very many Jews in Cyprus. Christianity was early preached there (Ac 11¹⁹, 20), and among early converts were Mnason (Ac 21¹⁶) and Barnabas (Ac 4³⁶).

A. SOUTER.

SALASADAI.—An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8¹).

SALATHIEL.—1. (1 Es 5⁴, 48, 49, 62) = Shealtiel (wh. see). 2. Another name of Esdras (2 Es 3¹).

SALECAH (Dt 3¹⁰, Jos 13¹¹ 12¹, 1 Ch 5¹¹) was the most easterly of the towns claimed by Israel. It was assigned to the tribe of Gad, and is always described as being on the eastern frontier of Bashan. But it is better indicated less theoretically as being in the extreme south-east of the Hauran. On account of its commanding position it has always been of strategic importance; but it was probably never permanently occupied by any of the Israelitish people. It was a Nabatæan and Roman stronghold, and a station on the great trade and military road from Gadhara and Edrei eastward through the desert to the Persian Gulf. It is now inhabited by Druses, and bears the name Salkhad.

J. F. McCurdy.

SALEM (1 Es 8) = Shallum, Ezr 7²; called also Salemas (?) 2 Es 1¹.

SALEM.—1. A place mentioned only in Gn 14¹⁸ as the kingdom of the mysterious Melchizedek (wh. see). It is natural to identify it with Jerusalem (wh. see), especially since the Tell el-Amarna tablets show that Urusalim existed as a name for that city even before the Israelite immigration. But the only real links between 'Salem' and 'Jerusalem' are two in number: (1) the mention of the 'King's Vale,' where, apparently, Melchizedek met Abram, which seems to be the place where Absalom reared his memorial (2 S 18¹⁸); it would presumably be somewhere near Jerusalem, but, pace Josephus, this is not certain. (2) The allusion to Jerusalem by the name Salem in Ps 76². This poetical abbreviation, however, which occurs nowhere else, may have been suggested by Salem in the ancient record, just as was the name Moriah (wh. see), and the reference to Melchizedek in Ps 110⁴. There is some similarity between the name of Melchizedek and that of the Jebusite king Adonizedek (Jos 10¹), but upon the whole the identification of Salem with Jerusalem is rather shadowy. Jerome records another tradition, connecting Salem with Salim (Salutias) in the Jordan Valley, where there is a tell with the tomb of 'Sheik Selim.' 2. The Valley of Salem (Jth 4¹), possibly the Jordan Valley, or a part of it. 3. The LXX reads Salem for Shiloh in Jer 41⁵. This must be a Salem near Shechem, if this reading is to be followed. There is a place called Salim, east of Nâblus.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

SALEMAS (2 Es 1¹) = Shallum, Ezr 7², called also Salem (?) in 1 Es 8¹.

SALIM, near to which was Enon (Jn 3²³), lay on the west of Jordan (cf. 12 S 3³⁸ 10⁴⁰). Enon is placed by the Onomasticon eight Roman miles south of Scythopolis (Beisân), 'near to Salim and Jordan.' This points to the neighbourhood of the ruin Umm el-'Amdân, with Tell er-Ridhigah on the north, where the tomb of Sheik Selim probably preserves the ancient name. Enon, 'place of springs,' we may find in the seven copious fountains near by. In Christ's time the district belonged probably to Scythopolis, not to Samaria. The difficulties of other suggested identifications can be got over only by doing violence to the text (Cheyne, EB, s.v.), or to the sense. W. EWING.

SALDMOTH (1 Es 8³) = Shelomith, Ezr 8¹⁰.

SALLAI.—1. A Benjamite, Neh 11⁸. 2. A priestly family, Neh 12²⁰; called in v. 7 Sallu.

SALLU.—1. A Benjamite family (1 Ch 9⁷, Neh 11⁷). 2. See SALLAI, 2.

SALLUMUS (1 Es 9³⁰) = Shallum, Ezr 10³⁰; called Salum, 1 Es 5³⁸.

SALMA.—See SALMON.

SALMAI.—A family of Nethinim, Neh 7⁶, called in Ezr 2⁴ Shamlai, in 1 Es 5³⁰ Subai.

SALMANASAR (2 Es 13⁴⁰) = Shalmaneser (wh. see).

SALMON, or SALMA.—The father of Boaz (Ru 4¹⁰ 21), and therefore in the direct line of the ancestry of our Lord (Mt 1⁴, Lk 3³²). If the Salma of 1 Ch 2²⁶ 44 is the same person, he was the 'father' or founder of Bethlehem, but it is to be noticed that that Salma is reckoned as one of the sons of Caleb the son of Hur.

SALMONE.—A promontory at the N.E. end of Crete, now Cape Sidero. St. Paul's ship, after reaching Cnidus with difficulty, was met by a powerful N.W. wind, which forced the captain to alter the course. Off Salmone (Ac 27⁷) he decided to work his way westward under the lee of Crete. A. SOUTER.

SALOAS (1 Es 9²²) = Elasah, Ezr 10²².

SALOM.—Greek form of Shallum (Bar 1⁷).

SALOME.—1. The daughter (unnamed in NT) of Herodias who danced before Herod and received as a reward the head of John the Baptist (Mt 14³⁻¹¹, Mk 6¹⁷⁻²⁹). 2. One of the women who were present at the crucifixion (Mk 15⁴⁰) and who afterwards visited the sepulchre (16¹). By comparing Mk 15⁴⁰ and Mt 27⁶⁸ it has been almost certainly concluded that Salome was the wife of Zebedee, who also figures in the incident Mt 20²⁰⁻²³. The conjecture that Salome was the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus has no adequate support. W. F. BORD.

SALT.—Salt is rightly included by ben-Sira among 'the chief of all things necessary for the life of man' (Sir 39³ RV). The Hebrews of the Southern Kingdom, at least, had access to inexhaustible stores of salt both in the waters of the Dead Sea,—hence named in OT 'the Salt Sea' (Dt 3¹⁷ etc.)—whence it could easily be obtained by evaporation, and in the deposits of the Jebel Usdum at its south-western extremity. References to saltpits or saltpans, or to both, are found in Zeph 2⁶, 1 Mac 11³⁵. One hundred pounds of water from the Dead Sea are said to yield 24½ lbs. of salt, compared with 6 lbs. obtained from the same quantity of water from the Atlantic.

In addition to its daily use as a condiment in the preparation of food (cf. Job 6⁶), and its important place in the sacrificial ritual, salt was employed by the Hebrews in an even greater variety of ways than it is among ourselves. New-born infants, for example, were rubbed with salt (Ezk 16⁶)—a practice in which a religious, rather than a hygienic, motive may be detected. A grain of salt placed in the hollow of a decayed tooth was considered a cure for the universal evil of toothache (Mishna, Shabbath, vi. 5). In other treatises of the Mishna we find frequent references to the use of salt for salting fish, for pickling olives, vegetables, etc. The salting of meat for preservation is referred to in the 'Epistle of Jeremy' (Bar 6²⁸). The modern Jewish custom of laying all meat in salt for the purpose of more thoroughly draining it of the blood was doubtless observed in Bible times. In Palestine, under the Seleucids, salt formed a government monopoly (1 Mac 10³⁹ 11³), as it did in Egypt under the Ptolemys.

As regards the presence of salt in the ritual of sacrifice, the words of Mk 9⁴⁹ AV, 'every sacrifice shall be salted with salt, although omitted by RV following the best authorities, are nevertheless true to fact. The legislation of the Priests' Code, at least, expressly ordains: 'with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt' (Lv 2¹³)—a passage which expressly specifies that the cereal or vegetable offerings (the 'meal offerings' of RV) had to be salted as well as the more important and more evident animal or flesh sacrifices (cf. Ezk 43²⁴). A special 'salt chamber' is mentioned among the chambers adjoining the Priests' Court in the description of Herod's Temple given in the Mishna. The sacred incense, also, had to be 'seasoned with salt' (Ex 30³⁵ RV), as was also the case with the shewbread, according to the better Gr. text of Lv 24⁷. The original idea in this extended ritual use of salt was doubtless this—that just as salt was an indispensable accompaniment of man's daily food, so it could not be absent from the 'food of God,' as the sacrifices are termed in Lv 21¹⁷.

In the developed priestly legislation, however, there can be little doubt that the presence of salt had a symbolic significance. From its use as a preservative, reflected in our Lord's figure, 'Ye are the salt of the earth' (Mt 5¹³) and as an antidote to decay, it is natural that salt should become a symbol of permanence, and even of life as opposed to decay and death. 'Salt,' it has been said, 'seems to stand for life in many a form of primitive speech and in the world's symbolism' (Trumbull, Covenant of Salt). From this symbolical standpoint we probably reach the true explanation of the striking expression 'a covenant of salt' (Nu 18¹⁹, 2 Ch 13³), which denotes a covenant that is inviolable and valid in perpetuity. The presence of salt, therefore, with every sacrifice may have come to symbolize the irrevocable character of J's covenant with Israel (cf. G. B. Gray's Com. on Nu 18¹⁹).

This seems preferable to the usual explanation which connects the expression in question with the well-known code of Arab hospitality, by which a traveller in the desert, and even an enemy, if he has once partaken of an Arab's hospitality, has a right to his host's protection; since this 'ordinance of salt' as it is termed, is valid only for a limited period (see Jaussen, Coutumes des Arabes [1908], 87 f.). On the other hand, the obligations which the partaking of one's hospitality imposes on a guest are emphasized in the words of Ezr 4¹⁴ 'because we eat the salt of the palace' (RV).

In marked contrast to the above-mentioned employment of salt as a symbol of life, stands its parallel occurrence as a symbol of barrenness, desolation, or death (Dt 29²³ and elsewhere). By this aspect of the symbolism of salt it has been usual to explain the treatment meted out by Abimelech to the city of Shechem in the early narrative, Jg 9⁶: 'He beat down the city and sowed it with salt.' It is more in harmony, however, with the fundamental conception of the ban (see BAN) to regard the strewing of the site of the city with salt as symbolizing its complete dedication to J' (see the parallels adduced in EBI iv. col. 4249 f.).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SALT, CITY OF.—A city of Judah (Jos 15⁶¹, 62). It may be inferred to have occupied some position on the western shore of the Dead Sea, between En-gedi and Khashm Usdum (the salt mountain).

SALT SEA.—See DEAD SEA.

SALT, VALLEY OF.—The scene of memorable victories of David over the Edomites (2 S 8¹⁴, 1 Ch 18¹²), and, at a later period, of Amaziah over the same enemies (2 K 14⁷, 2 Ch 25¹¹). It may be identified with the plain extending from the southern end of the Dead Sea to the foot of the cliffs which cross the valley from side to side and form the southern margin of the Ghor.

SALTWORT (Job 30⁴ RV).—See MALLOWS.

SALU.—The father of Zimri (Nu 25⁴, 1 Mac 2²⁸).

SALUM (1 Es 5²⁸) = Shallum, Ezr 2²²; called Sal-lumus, 1 Es 9²⁵.

SALUTATION (or greeting) is a serious matter in the East; some knowledge of immemorial practice is necessary in dealing with Orientals. The subject salutes his king by prostration; the humble his superior by touching the ground with his hand, and then his lips and brow. The young salutes the aged, the rider the footman, etc. In crowded streets only men of age, rank, and dignity need be saluted (Mt 23⁷ etc.). Common forms of salutation are, 'Peace be upon you'; response, 'And upon you'; 'May your day be happy'; response, 'May your day be happy and blessed'; and, in the highway, 'Blessed be he that cometh' (Jg 18¹⁵, Mt 10¹², Lk 24³⁸, Ps 118²⁶, Mt 21⁹ etc.). Salutations are frequently prolonged, and repeated inquiries after health and welfare extremely tedious (1 K 4³⁹, Lk 10⁴). See also GENTURES, K138.

W. EWING.

SALVATION, SAVIOUR.—'Salvation' is the generic term employed in Scripture to express the idea of any gracious deliverance of God, but specially of the spiritual redemption from sin and its consequences predicted by the OT prophets, and realized in the mission and work of the Saviour Jesus Christ.

1. In the OT.—The root meaning of the principal OT words for 'save,' 'salvation,' 'saviour' is, to be broad, spacious; salvation is enlargement. As illustrations of this OT meaning of salvation may be taken the words of Moses at the Red Sea, 'Stand still, and see the salvation of Jehovah' (Ex 14¹³)—'He is become my salvation' (15²); or the avowal of the psalmist, 'This poor man cried, and Jehovah heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles' (Ps 34⁹). Jehovah is said to have given 'saviours' to Israel in the time of the Judges (Neh 9²⁷). Victory in battle is 'salvation' (Ex 14¹⁴, 1 S 14⁴⁶, Ps 20 etc.). Salvation, or deliverance, of this kind is sometimes national, but sometimes also individual (cf. of David, 2 S 22, Ps 18). Such external deliverances, however, it is to be observed, are never divorced from spiritual conditions. It is the righteous or penitent alone who are entitled to look to God for His saving help; no others can claim Him as the rock of their salvation (Ps 131-3, cf. 4). When, therefore, the people had turned their backs on Jehovah, and abandoned themselves to wickedness, salvation could come only through a change of heart, through repentance. The chief need was to be saved from the sin itself. In the prophets, accordingly, the perspective somewhat changes. External blessings deliverance from enemies, return from exile, are still hoped for, but the main stress is laid on a changed heart, forgiveness, restoration to God's favour, righteousness. In the pictures of the Messianic age, it is these things that come to be dwelt on (cf. Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴, Ezk 36²⁶⁻²⁸, Hos 14 etc.). As the idea of salvation becomes more spiritual, it likewise becomes more universal; the Gentiles are to share its blessings (Is 45²³, 2⁴ 49⁶⁻¹² 60¹⁻¹²).

The teaching of the prophets bore fruit in the age preceding the advent of Jesus in deepening ideas of the future life, of resurrection and a future perfected state of the connexion of prosperity with righteousness—though mostly in the sense of outward legal obedience, the very error against which the prophets declaimed—and in more concrete representations of the Messiah. But there never failed a godly kernel, who cherished more spiritual hopes, and waited in patience and prayer for 'the consolation of Israel' (Lk 2²⁸).

2. In the NT.—In the NT the word 'salvation' (σῶτηρ, from σῶ, 'saviour') is sometimes applied to temporal benefits, like healings (e.g. Mt 9²² 'thy faith hath made thee whole,' lit. 'saved thee'), but most generally it is employed as a comprehensive term for the spiritual and eternal blessings brought to men by the appearance and redeeming work of Jesus Christ. The name Jesus was given Him because 'it is he that shall save his people from their sins' (Lk 1⁷); He is distinctively the 'Saviour' (Lk 2¹¹); His work on earth was 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19¹⁰); His death and resurrection were a means to salvation (Ro 5⁹⁻¹⁰); He is exalted 'to be a Prince and a Saviour' to give repentance and remission of sins (Ac 5³¹); 'in none other is there salvation' (4¹²). In Apostolic usage, therefore, salvation is the all-embracing name for the blessings brought by the gospel (cf. 'the gospel of your salvation,' Eph 1¹³; 'the word of this salvation,' Ac 13²⁶; 'repentance unto salvation,' 2 Co 7¹⁰ etc.). To expound fully the contents of this term, accordingly, would be to expound the contents of the gospel. Enough here to say that it includes deliverance from all sin's evils, and the bestowal of all spiritual blessings in Christ (Eph 1³). It begins on earth in forgiveness, renewal, the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, enlightenment, guidance, strengthening, comfort; and is perfected in the blessedness and glory, in which body and soul share, of the life everlasting. The fact never to be forgotten about it is, that it has been obtained at the infinite cost of the redeeming death of God's own Son (cf. Rev. 5⁹). For further elucidations, see ART. ATONEMENT, MEDIATOR, REDEMPTION.

SAMAIAI.—1. (1 Es 1⁹) = Shemaiah, 2 Ch 35⁸. 2. (1 Es 8¹¹) = Shemaiah, Ezr 8¹². 3. (1 Es 8⁴) = Shemaiah, Ezr 8¹².

SAMARIA

SAMARIA.—A city built on a hill purchased by Omri, king of Israel, from a certain Shemer, and by him made the capital of the Israelite kingdom (1 K 16²⁴). We gather from 1 K 20²⁴ that Ben-hadad i., king of Syria, successfully attacked it soon afterwards, and had compelled Omri to grant him favourable trade facilities. Ahab here built a Baal temple (1 K 16²⁵) and a palace of ivory (22²⁹). Ben-hadad ii. here besieged Ahab, but unsuccessfully, and was obliged to reverse the terms his father had exacted from Omri. Jehoram attempted a feeble and half-hearted reform, destroying Ahab's Baal-pillar, though retaining the calf-worship (2 K 3²) and the asherah (13⁹). The city was again besieged in his time by Ben-hadad ii. (2 K 6. 7). After this event the history of Samaria is bound up with the troublesome internal affairs of the Northern Kingdom, and we need not follow it closely till we reach b.c. 724, when Shalmaneser iv. besieged Samaria in punishment for king Hoshea's defection. It fell three years later; and Sargon, who had meanwhile succeeded Shalmaneser on the Assyrian throne, deported its inhabitants, substituting a number of people drawn from other places (2 K 17). In b.c. 331 it was besieged and conquered by Alexander, and in b.c. 120 by John Hyrcanus. Herod carried out important building works here, large portions of which still remain. He changed the name to Sebaste in honour of Augustus. Philip preached here (Ac 8⁵). The city, however, gradually decayed, fading before the growing importance of Neapolis (Shechem). The Crusaders established a bishopric here.

Extensive remains of ancient Samaria still exist at the mound known as Sebastyeh (Sebaste), a short distance from Nāblus. It is one of the largest and most important mounds in ancient Palestine. Excavations under the auspices of Harvard University were begun in 1908.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

SAMARITANS.—The descendants of the Cuthites, Avvites, Sepharvites, and Hamathites, established by Sargon in Samaria after he had put an end to the Israelite kingdom. They were instructed in a form of the Hebrew religion (which they grafted on to their own worship) in order to appease the 'God of the land' (2 K 17²⁴). To these colonists Ashurbanipal made considerable additions (Ezr 4⁹⁻¹⁰). The enmity between Jews and Samaritans began to make its appearance immediately after the return from the Captivity. The Samaritans endeavoured to prevent the re-building of Jerusalem (Ezr 4⁷, Neh 4⁷), and from time to time their subsequent aggressions and insults to the re-founded Jewish State are recorded by Josephus. After the battle of Issus the Samaritans offered assistance to Alexander, and were allowed to build a temple on Gerizim, where they sacrificed after the manner of the Jews—though they were quite ready to repudiate Jewish origin, rite, and prejudice whenever occasion arose (see Jos. Ant. xii. v. 5). This temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus. The disputes between the Jews and the Samaritans were at last referred to Rome (BJ ii. xii. 3-7). Throughout the Gospel history the ill-feeling is conspicuous: the Samaritans were 'strangers' (Lk 17¹⁸), and their admixture of heathen worship seems still to have persisted (Jn 4²⁰). Vespasian inflicted a crushing blow upon them by massacring 11,000 on Mt. Gerizim. From this and other sufferings later inflicted by Zeno and Justinian they never recovered. They still persist, to the number of about 150, in Nāblus. They acknowledge the Pentateuchal legislation only, and endeavour to preserve intact the Mosaic rites and ordinances.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

SAMATUS (1 Es 9²⁴) = Shallum, Ezr 10².

SAMECH.—The fifteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 15th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

SAMELIUS (1 Es 2^{16-17, 25, 30}) = Shimshai, Ezr 4⁴ etc.

SAMSON

SAMEUS (1 Es 9²¹) = Shemaiah, Ezr 10²⁴.

SAMGAR-NEBO.—One of the Babylonian princes who, at the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, in the 11th year of Zedekiah, came and sat in the middle gate (Jer 39³). There has been much discussion concerning this name, due to the varying forms of the Greek version. The most probable explanation is that of Schrader, namely, Shumgir-Nabū, a name meaning 'Be gracious, O Nebo.' As, however, Rab-saris and Rab-mag are titles, the question arises whether Samgar-nebo may not be one also. If so, it may be a corruption of sangu Nebo, 'the priest of Nebo,'—an office possibly held by Nergal-sharezzer, who, if identical with king Neriglissar, was closely connected with E-zida, the temple of Nebo at Borsippa. His daughter married a priest of E-zida in the first year of his reign.

T. G. PINCHES.

SAMLAH.—An Edomite king (Gn 36³⁶ = 1 Ch 1⁴¹).

SAMMUS (1 Es 9²⁴) = Shema, Neh 8⁴.

SAMOS was an important island in the Ægæan Sea off the coast of Ionia. It was a centre of luxury, art, and science. In b.c. 84 it was united to the province of Asia, and in b.c. 17 was made a free State by Augustus. This it was when St. Paul touched here (Ac 20¹⁵) on his way home from his third journey. There were many Jewish residents on the island, and it was one of the places addressed by the Romans in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15²³).

A. SOUTER.

SAMOTHRACE.—An island S. of Thrace and N.W. of Troas, from which place St. Paul had a straight run to it (Ac 16¹¹). The town of the same name was on the N. side of the island. The island is mountainous, and has a summit nearly a mile above the sea level. It owes its name perhaps to its resemblance to Samos (wh. see). Samothrace played little part in Greek history, but was famous as the seat of the mysterious cult of the divinities known as Cabeiri.

A. SOUTER.

SAMPSAMES.—One of the places to which the Romans wrote in favour of the Jews (1 Mac 15²³); usually identified with Samaun, a seaport town on the Black Sea. RVm, with Vulg., has Lampascus.

SAMSON (LXX and Vulg.; Heb. Shimshōn; probably derived from shemesh, 'sun,' either as a diminutive, or better 'sun-man').—Mentioned in OT in Jg 13-16, and in NT in He 11³².

1. The story need not be recapitulated, but certain details require explanation. 13² seems to be the prelude to a first exploit, now lost. 14 is not clear as it stands; probably 'his father, and his mother' in vv. 5, 6, 10a are glosses introduced to avoid the appearance of disobedience. He goes down alone, meets the lion alone, returns to his home after his visit to his bride (v. 8 'to take her' being another gloss); then after an interval he goes back to celebrate the marriage he has arranged; v. 10a is particularly absurd as it stands. The 'thirty companions' of v. 11 are the 'friends of the bridegroom,' chosen on this occasion from the bride's people (see below, § 4); the companion of v. 20 is their leader, 'the best man.' The 'linen garments' of v. 12 are pieces of fine linen, costly and luxurious (Pr 31²⁴, Is 32¹⁷); 'the changes' are gala dresses. The Philistines give up the riddle 'after three days' (v. 14), and appeal to the woman on the seventh (v. 18; LXX Syr. 'fourth'); yet she weeps for the whole week, imploring Samson to tell her (v. 17). Perhaps the figures of vv. 14, 16 are interpolations, the Philistines giving up at once. 'Before the sun went down' (v. 18) is ungrammatical in Heb., with a rare word for 'sun'; with best modern edd., read by a slight alteration 'before he went into the bridal-chamber' (cf. 15¹). In ch. 16, words, variously represented by LXX, have fallen out between v. 13 and v. 14; the sense is '... and beat them up with the pin, I shall become weak. So while he was asleep she took the seven locks and wove them into the web, and beat them tight with the pin,' etc. We are to imagine an upright loom with a piece of unfinished stuff; Dellah weaves the hair into this, and beats it tight with the 'pin.' Samson pulls up the posts of the loom by his hair which is fastened to the web. For v.²¹, cf. the blinding of captives as shown on Assyrian monuments; to be put to the mill was a frequent punishment of slaves. Nothing is known of the worship of Dagon (cf. 1 S 5); the etymology 'fish-god' and the connexion with the Assyrian god 'Dagan' are uncertain.

2. Origin and nature of the story.—(a) The narrative seems to belong entirely to J, the Judean source of the early history of Israel; there are no traces of a double source, as in other parts of Judges. It has been but slightly revised by the Deuteronomist editor. Ch. 16, though an integral part of the original cycle of stories, was apparently at one time omitted by the compiler; see the repeated note in 15²⁰ 16³¹. Perhaps it gave too unfavourable a picture of the hero's love-affairs. (b) Though it is said that Samson 'judged Israel twenty years' (15²⁰), and that he should 'begin to deliver' his nation from the Philistines (13³), there is no hint of his ever having held any official position, nor does he appear as a leader of his people; on the contrary, he is disowned by his neighbours of Judah (15¹¹). His exploits have only a local significance, and are performed single-handed in revenge for his private quarrels. The story evidently belongs to the class of popular tales, common to every country-side. Every people has its hero of prodigious strength, to whom marvellous feats are ascribed, and it becomes a hopeless task to discover the precise historical basis of the legends, which in this case are undoubtedly of great antiquity. (c) It is not necessary to look for a further explanation in the theory of a 'solar myth.' The name 'Samson,' and the existence of a 'Beth-shemesh' ('house of the sun') near his home, offer an obvious temptation to such a theory, but it is entirely unnecessary and is now generally abandoned. (d) It is more probable that in ch. 15 we find the workings of folk-etymology ('ætiological myth'), i.e. stories suggested by the fancied meaning of names. Ramath-Lehi ('the height of Lehi') is taken to mean 'the casting away of the jawbone'; En-hakkore ('Partridge spring'), 'the spring of him who called'; and incidents are suggested to explain the supposed meanings. (e) The parallels with other popular stories, especially the exploits of Hercules, are obvious, e.g. the killing of the lion, the miraculous satisfying of the hero's thirst, and his ruin at the hand of a woman. For the lion episode, cf., further, the stories of Polydamas, David (1 S 17³⁴), Benaiah (2 S 23²⁰); for the sacred hair or lock, cf. the story of Nisus. Ovid (Fasti, iv. 681-712) has a remarkable parallel to the burning of the corn by the foxes (or jackals?); at the Cerealia, foxes with lighted torches tied to their tails were let loose in the Circus; he explains the custom as originally due to the act of a mischievous boy, who burned his father's corn in the same way. The conclusion to be drawn from such parallels is not necessarily identity of origin, but the similar working of the mind and imagination under similar conditions.

3. Historical value.—Regarded as a picture of early conditions and customs, the narrative is of the greatest significance. Politically it takes us to the time when Dan, perhaps weakened by the departure of its 600 men of war (Jg 1¹⁴ 18¹), acquiesces in the rule of the Philistines; Timnah is in their hands. There is no state of war between the two peoples, but free intercourse and even intermarriage. As already pointed out, Samson is in no sense the leader of a revolt against the foreign dominion, and his neighbours of Judah show no desire to make his private quarrels an excuse for a rising (15¹¹); there is no union even between the tribes of the south. None the less, his exploits would be secretly welcomed as directed against the common foe, and remembering that Jg 17-21 is an appendix, we see how the narrative paves the way for the more defined efforts of Saul and David in 1 Samuel to shake off the foreign yoke. Socially the story gives us a picture of primitive marriage customs. Ch. 14 is the clearest OT example of a sadika marriage (see MARRIAGE, § 1). We get a good idea of the proceedings, essentially the same as in the East to-day. The feast lasts for a week, and is marked by lavish eating and drinking, songs, riddles, and not very refined merriment. The whole story gives us a valuable insight into the life of the people; we note the grim rough humour of its hero, so entirely natural (ch. 14, the three deceptions of ch. 16, 16²⁸ RVm).

4. Religious significance.—Samson is a popular hero, and we shall expect the directly religious interest of the story to be subordinate. It appears in the account of his birth, perhaps hardly a part of the original cycle, but added later to justify his inclusion among the Judges. As a child of promise, he is in a peculiar sense a gift of God, born to do a special work; an overruling providence governs his acts (14⁴ 16³⁰). The source of his strength is supernatural; at times it is represented as due to a demonic frenzy, an invasion of the spirit of J^r (13²⁵ 14⁶ 15¹⁴), but in 13. 16 it lies in his hair; he is a Nazirite of God. The rules for the Nazirite are given in Nu 6¹; those in Jg 13 are the same, with the general prohibition of 'unclean' food. The essence of the conception lay in a vow to sacrifice the hair at a sacred shrine, the life-long vow being probably a vow to do so at stated periods. The hair, like the blood, was regarded as a seat of life, and was a common offering not only among the Semites, but in all parts of the world. In Arabia the vow to leave the locks unshorn was particularly connected with wars of revenge (Dt 32⁴² RVm, Ps 68³¹). As soon as a vow was taken, the life of the votary became a continuous act of religion; particularly must the body, which nourishes the hair (now the property of the deity), be kept clean from all defilement; the taboo of the vine and its products is esp. common (cf. Am 2¹¹ 12¹). In the story itself no stress is laid on any such precautions on the part of Samson (e.g. in 14⁸ he eats from a carcass), and hence no doubt the taboos were transferred to his mother (13⁴). There is unfortunately little basis for the religious feeling with which Milton has invested the character of Samson. He is a popular hero, and the permanent value of the story is to be sought in its ethical lessons. It is true, its morality is on a low level; revenge is Samson's ruling idea, and his relations with women have been a stumbling-block to apologists. But once we recognize the origin of the story, we shall not feel bound to justify or explain away these traits, and the lessons stand out clearly. The story emphasizes the evils of foreign marriages (14³), of laxity in sexual relations, and of toying with temptation. It teaches that bodily endowments, no less than spiritual, are a gift from God, however different may be our modern conception of the way in which they are bestowed, and that their retention depends on obedience to His laws. But if Samson stands as an example 'of impotence of mind in body strong,' he also stands, in Milton's magnificent conception, as an example of patriotism and heroism in death, to all who 'from his memory inflame their breast to matchless valour and adventures high.'

SAMUEL.—The life of Samuel is viewed from widely differing standpoints in different sections of the books that bear his name. In the oldest narrative, found in 1 S 9, he appears as a seer from the land of Zuph, to whom Saul and his servant, who are seeking the lost asses of Kish, Saul's father, apply for help. Saul had hesitated about applying to the man of God, on the score of not having a gift to present, but the servant produced the fourth part of a shekel of silver with which to compensate the seer. Samuel, who had been Divinely apprised of their coming, met them while he was on his way to worship at the high place, and after they had partaken of his hospitality and passed the night with him, he nominated and anointed Saul as Israel's coming king. He further gave Saul signs by which he should know that the promises would be fulfilled, and committed him to the Spirit of God. In another narrative (chs. 1-3), which differs in point of view rather than in trustworthiness, are recited the incidents of Samuel's early life and relations to the kingdom. Hannah, his mother, the wife of Elkanah, was barren. During the celebration of the yearly feast she vows that if God will give her a son she will give him to Jehovah. Samuel is therefore the son of answered prayer, and is in due time dedicated to the Temple service at Shiloh, where he assists Eli, is warned by Jehovah of the coming destruction of Eli's house, and receives the call to the prophetic office.

After the death of Eli and the return of the ark from the Philistines, Samuel becomes 'judge' of Israel, calls the people to repentance at Mizpah, and saves them miraculously from the invading Philistines (ch. 7). He is succeeded in the judgeship by unworthy sons, and Israel, outraged at their sinfulness and worthlessness, demands a king—a proposition, in the estimation of Samuel, tantamount to a rejection of Jehovah, though no such suggestion was made when he voluntarily appointed Saul. Nevertheless he yields to their wish, but describes in sombre colours the oppressions they must endure under the monarchy (ch. 8). Accordingly the people are assembled at Mizpah, again accused of forsaking Jehovah, and Saul is selected by lot (10¹¹⁻²⁴). Samuel now makes his farewell address (ch. 12), defends his administration, warns the people, by references to their past history, of the danger of disobeying Jehovah, and compels nature to attest his words by a thunderstorm in harvest time.

The insignificant rôle played by Samuel in the first narrative cited is very noticeable when compared with the position accorded him in that which follows. In the first he is an obscure seer, and takes but a minor part in the establishment of the kingdom. In the latter he is a commanding and dominating figure. He is a judge of the people, adjudicating their affairs yearly at Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah. Saul, as well as the monarchy, is controlled and directed by him.

The narrative of Samuel's prominence is succeeded by an account (ch. 13)—from a different source—of Saul's attack on the Philistines. The story is interrupted at 13¹⁻¹⁴ by a complaint that Saul had disobeyed in offering sacrifice before the battle, although he had waited the required seven days as instructed by Samuel. It is difficult to see wherein Saul was guilty. Samuel had not appeared according to agreement. The Philistines were closing in upon Saul, his army was fast melting away, it was necessary to give battle, and it would have been considered irreligious to inaugurate the battle without sacrifice. For this rebellion Samuel informs him that his kingdom is forfeit, and that Jehovah has chosen another, a man after His own heart, to take his place.

Again Saul is instructed by Samuel (ch. 15) to destroy Amalek—men, women, children, and spoil—but he spares Agag and the best of the booty. All his excuses are rejected, and Samuel now attributes the loss of his kingdom to the new disobedience. This narrative does not seem conscious that the kingdom was already lost to Saul. The king confesses his fault, and after repeated persuasion Samuel agrees to honour him before his people by worshipping with him. Agag is then brought before Samuel, who hews him to pieces before the Lord. After this Samuel is sent to the home of Jesse to select and anoint a successor to Saul. One by one the sons of Jesse are rejected, till David, the youngest, is brought from the field, and proves to be the choice of Jehovah (ch. 16). With this significant act Samuel practically disappears. We find an account of his keeping a school of the prophets at Ramah, whither David flees to escape Saul (19¹¹⁻¹⁴). Later we have a short account of his death and burial at Ramah (25¹). There is also a mention of his death in ch. 28, and the story of Saul's application to the witch of Endor to call up Samuel from the dead. J. H. STEVENSON.

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.—1. Title.—The two Books of Samuel are really parts of what was originally one book. This is shown not only by the fact that the narrative of Book I. is continued without the slightest interruption in Book II., and that the style, tone, point of view, and purpose are the same throughout, but also by their appearance as one book bearing the simple title 'Samuel' in the oldest known Hebrew MSS. The division of the Hebrew text into two books was first made in print by Daniel Bomberg in his Hebrew Bible (2nd ed. 1517). In doing so he was in part following the text of the Septuagint and the Vulgate, in which the Books of Samuel and Kings are described as the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Books of Kingdoms (LXX), or Kings (Vulgate). The title 'Samuel,' less accurately descriptive of the contents than that of 'Kingdoms' or 'Kings,' owes its origin to the prominent place held by Samuel in 1 S 1-16. A late Jewish interpretation regarded it as declaring Samuel's authorship of the narrative; but this is impossible, in view of the fact that the history extends through the reign of David, long after the death of Samuel (1 S 25¹).

2. Contents.—The period covered by the Books of Samuel extends from the birth of Samuel to the close of David's reign, i.e. approximately from b.c. 1070 to b.c. 970. The narrative falls into three main divisions:—I.: Samuel and Saul, 1 S 1-15; II.: The Rise of David, 1 S 16-2 S 5⁴; III.: David as king of United Israel, 2 S 5-24. Division I. is made up of three sections: (1) The childhood and youth of Samuel, to the downfall of Eli's house and the captivity of the Ark (1 S 1-7¹); (2) Samuel's career as Judge, including his defeat of the Philistines, his anointing of Saul, and his farewell address (1 S 7-12); (3) Saul's reign till his rejection (1 S 13-15). Division II. likewise includes three sections: (1) David at Saul's Court (1 S 16-21¹); (2) David as a fugitive outlaw (1 S 21-2 S 1); (3) David as king in Hebron (2 S 2-5). Division III. forms three more sections: (1) establishment of Jerusalem as the religious and national capital, and a brief summary of David's reign (2 S 5-8); (2) supplementary narratives, setting forth particularly David's great sin and subsequent troubles (2 S 9-20); (3) a series of appendixes (2 S 21-24). 1 K 1-2⁴ really belongs to 2 Sam., since it relates the circumstances attending the death of David, and thus brings the narrative to its natural close.

3. Text and Versions.—The text of Samuel is the worst in the OT; only Ezekiel and Hosea can approach it in this respect. Many passages are unintelligible on the basis of the Massoretic text. The large amount of corruption may be due in part to the relatively great antiquity of the text, much of the narrative being among the oldest writings in the Hebrew Bible; and, in part, to the fact that these books were not used in the ordinary synagogue services, and so were not so carefully transmitted as they otherwise would have been. Unfortunately, the oldest existing Hebrew manuscript of Samuel dates its origin no farther back than the tenth century of our era. With each copying and recopying during the many preceding centuries fresh opportunity for error was afforded; and the wonder is not that there are so many errors, but that there are not more. In any effort to recover the original text large use must be made of the Septuagint, which is based upon a Hebrew text at least as old as the 3rd cent. b.c., and has preserved the original reading in many cases, while showing traces of it in others. The Syriac and Vulgate versions are also useful, but to a far less extent.

4. Sources and Date.—The Books of Samuel, like almost every other OT writing, are a compilation from various sources, rather than the result of a careful study of earlier sources presented in the form of a unified, logical, and philosophical statement of facts and condusions. We are here given the sources themselves, and are in large part left to draw our own conclusions. The composite character of the books is evidenced (1) by the existence of differing literary styles within them; (2) by the presence of varying and conflicting theological standpoints; (3) by the fact that they exhibit radically different attitudes towards the founding of the monarchy (cf. e.g. 1 S 8¹⁻²² and 9^{1-10, 16}); and (4) by the appearance of two or more narratives of one and the same event. In illustration of this last point we may cite (a) the three accounts of Saul's choice as king given in 1 S 9-11; (b) the two accounts of David's introduction to Saul in 1 S 16^{17ff.} and 17^{33ff.}; (c) the twofold announcement of the fate of Eli's house in 1 S 2²⁷⁻³⁶ and 3^{11ff.}; (d) the double rejection of Saul in 1 S 13⁷⁻¹⁶ and 15¹⁻³⁶; (e) the two accounts of David's flight to Achish in 1 S 21^{10ff.} and 27^{1ff.}; (f) the two narratives of David sparing Saul's life in 1 S 23^{19ff.} and 26^{1ff.}—one of the most marked examples of a doublet; (g) the differing descriptions of the death of Saul given in 1 S 31 and 2 S 1; (h) the varying traditions of Absalom's family found in 2 S 14^{25ff.} and 18^{1ff.}; (i) the inconsistency of 1 S 7^{12ff.} with 13-14; and (j) the story that Goliath was slain by David in 1 S 17, but by Elhanan in 2 S 21¹⁹. Phenomena of this kind are much more easily accounted for on the supposition that we are dealing here with the works of different hands, than on the hypothesis of a single author upon whom alone all the responsibility for the contents of the books must be placed.

This fact of composite origin is granted by all students of the Books of Samuel. In the attempt, however, to resolve the narrative into its original elements, two different schools of analysts have been formed. To the one belong such scholars as Budde, Cornill, H. P. Smith, Driver, Nowack, Stenning, and Kent; to the other, Wellhausen, Kuenen, Löhr, Kittel, Stade, and Kennedy. Budde and his followers find two main sources running through the books and covering practically the same ground, though from differing points of view. These sources, which Budde himself assigns to the same school of prophetic writers that produced the J and E narratives of the Hexateuch, are supposed to have originated from the 9th to the 8th cents. B.C.; the J source being the older of the two. These two sources were then supplemented and united by editors somewhere in the early part of the 7th cent. B.C.; and finally the books were given their present form by a Deuteronomist editor who revised the existing materials and added materials of his own some time in the Exile. Budde's distribution of the materials among the sources is as follows [figures within parentheses in J indicate later elements; in E they designate the older portions of the document]:—

J = 1 S 9¹⁻¹⁰, 10¹⁶, 10^{19-16a}, 13^{2-7a}, (7b-15a), 15b-18, (19-21) 22 14¹⁻⁴⁶, 14⁵², 16¹⁴⁻²³, 18⁸⁻¹¹, 18²⁰⁻³⁰, 19¹, 4-6, 7b-18a, 20¹⁻³, 18-39, 22¹⁻⁴, 6-10a, 11-18, 22²⁰⁻²³ 14a, 19a, 23²⁰⁻²⁴ 20, 25²⁶, 27¹⁻²⁸ 15, 28¹⁹⁻³¹ 13, 2 S 1¹⁻⁴, 11, 12, 17-21, 21-62, 8^{8-14a}, 16-18, 9¹⁻²¹ 22, 23^{7b-26}, 24¹⁻²⁶.

E = 1 S 1¹⁻⁵, 7-28, 21¹⁻²⁶, 31¹⁻¹⁰, 15-21, (41-18a, 51-71), 72-82 22, 12¹⁻²⁸, 15¹, (15²⁻²³), 15²⁴⁻³¹, (15^{32ff.}), 1 S 13¹⁻¹⁰, 13-16, 12-16, 71-72.

PRE-EXILIC EDITORS = 1 S 1⁶, 2²⁶, 4¹⁵, 22, 6^{11b}, 15, 17, 18a, 19, 8^{22b}, 9^{20b}, 9, 10^{16a}, 16b, 26-27, 11⁷, 17, 12-14¹, 13¹⁹⁻²², 16¹⁻¹⁸, 17^{12ff.}, 18^{20b}, 19²⁷ 7a, 18-24, 20⁴⁻¹⁷, 40-42, 21¹¹⁻¹⁶, 22⁴, 10b, 23^{19b}, 24^{21-23a}, 24, 25¹, 28³, 16-18, 30⁶, 18b; 2 S 1⁶, 2^{26b}, 3^{6a}, 30, 8^{6b}, 11, 12, 11^{21a}, 13^{18a}, 38a, 14²⁵⁻²⁷, 20²³⁻²⁶, 21²⁶, 26, 7, 23¹⁴, 23a.

EXILIC EDITOR = 1 S 2²⁷⁻³⁶, 31¹¹⁻¹⁴, 13¹, 14⁴⁷⁻⁴⁸; 2 S 2^{10a}, 11, 24¹, 71², 18¹⁻⁴, 14b-16, 2 S 12⁷, 8, 10-12, 24^{1a}.

OF UNCERTAIN ORIGIN = 1 S 21¹⁰; 2 S 22^{1ff.}, 23^{1ff.}.

This, which we may call the two-source theory because of the predominant place of the two main sources, is in its general features the prevailing view at the present time. In the assignment of certain passages, however, there is considerable variety of opinion, and in the identification of the two main sources with J and E, Budde and Cornill are not followed by several adherents of the two-source view.

The analysis presented by the opposing school (Wellhausen, Stade, Kennedy, et al.) differs from the foregoing chiefly (a) in denying the unity of the two sources, J and E respectively; (b) in refusing to recognize any relationship of these sources to J and E; and (c) in proposing another chronological assignment of the sources. Kennedy, e.g., the latest representative of this school, resolves Budde's J into three main elements, and dates these three documents from the middle of the 10th cent. B.C. Budde's E likewise falls into three fragments under Kennedy's examination; one of these is a life of Samuel dating from about B.C. 630; another and larger portion is from a Deuteronomist writer; and a small remainder consists of pre-exilic duplicates of some narratives appearing in Budde's J.

The precise delimitation of the various sources and the exact way in which the Books of Samuel assumed their present form must remain for the future to determine. The unmistakable fact is that these books in their present form are due to the labours of late exilic editors who wrought them out of existing documents, some of which show Deuteronomist colouring, while others come from early pre-exilic times, somewhere about B.C. 900. As compared with the Books of Kings and Chronicles, or even the Book of Judges, Samuel shows far less evidence of editorial additions and modifications. The various sources are for the most part allowed to tell their stories in their own way. There is a total absence of any such theological strait-jacket as is found in the editorial framework of the Books of Kings. We thus have in the Books of Samuel some of the finest examples of the historical writings of the Hebrews in the various stages of their development.

5. Historical value.—In estimating the historical value of the Books of Samuel, care must be taken to discriminate sharply between the books themselves and the sources which constitute them. The books themselves are the product of a long literary history, the work of various men living in widely scattered periods. They thus form a source-book, rather than a history in the modern sense. It is for this reason that they are so extremely valuable to the modern historian of Israel. For a correct picture of the times of Samuel, Saul, and David, it goes without saying that the oldest sources are the most trustworthy. Failure to paint original scenes and characters with a proper perspective increases in direct proportion to the distance of the narrator from the things he describes. Hence the later elements in these books are primarily of value not as sources of information concerning the times of the early monarchy, but as reflecting the point of view and the background of their writers. The older sources, however, coming from a period within a century or two of the events they narrate, furnish us with accurate information and are among the best historical records in the OT. They are especially rich in biographical materials. They help us to see Saul and David and their contemporaries as they really were. They give us glimpses of Samuel as the local seer, known only within the narrow limits of his own immediate district; of David as the fugitive, the freebooter, the outlaw, the idol of his men, the devoted servant of Jehovah and yet capable of the most dastardly deeds; of Saul as the brave warrior, the patriot, the religious enthusiast, the moody chieftain of his clan. These men, with Joab, Absalom, and others, live and move before our eyes.

A still further service of the Books of Samuel is in the light they throw upon the development of religious practices and ideas in Israel. Kennedy rightly says: 'The study of this book has contributed more than anything else to the more accurate views of the historical development of religious thought in OT times, which are characteristic of the present day.' The books represent from first to last a period of about five hundred years, during which time the religion of Israel was advancing by leaps and bounds under the leadership of the prophets. They contain, therefore, the record of this progress. Instances of this may be seen in the wide difference between the attitude towards foreign gods ascribed to David in 1 S 26¹⁹ (an early source), and that appearing in 12¹ (a late source); in the primitive conception of revelation presented in the story of Samuel's call (3^{10f.}); in the narratives dealing with the origin of prophecy (9^{7f.}), and the sons of the prophets (e.g. 10^{4f.}); in the use of the teraphim (19^{30f.}) and the ephod (23⁶⁻¹²); and in the advanced conception of God appearing in such passages as 2 S 7²². The Books of Samuel are thus invaluable to the historian of Israel's religious, social, and political life.

6. Purpose.—But the purpose of these books is not to serve as a bare, cold record of events and their causes; such matters are of only secondary importance; they are but means to an end. Their great purpose is to teach religion; they give sermons, not annals; they are prophecy, not history. In the Hebrew canon they occupy a place alongside of the prophetic books, and the entire division to which they belong is entitled 'the Prophets.' Just as Amos and Isaiah deal with the facts of the present, interpreting them as expressions of Jehovah's will and using them to drive home moral and spiritual truth to the hearts and consciences of their hearers, so these writers have dealt with the facts of the past. What they have given us, then, is history seen through the eyes of prophets. The horizon of the prophets, however, was filled with religion; they themselves were nothing if not religious; their whole being throbbled with the energy of religion. Consequently it is not surprising that everything in the narratives is presented from the point of view of religion, and in such a way as to count most for the furtherance of religious ideals. This is not saying that these writers consciously and deliberately changed the course of events, or shifted the emphasis from one point to another in order to accomplish their purpose; but rather that they wrote things as they themselves conceived of them, and that, being prophets, they could conceive of Israel's history in no other way than as through and through religious, as the embodiment of Jehovah's revelation of Himself and His will to His people. This is the prophets' philosophy of history, and as such must commend itself to the mind and conscience of the Christian Church. J. M. P. SMITH.

SANAAS (1 Es 5²²).—See SENAAS.

SANABASSAR, SANABASSARUS.—Variants in 1 Es 2¹² 6¹⁸. ²⁰ of the name Sheshbazzar (wh. see).

SANASIB.—A family that returned with Zerub. (1 Es 5²⁴; Ezr 2³⁰ omits).

SANBALLAT (Assyr. Sin-ballit = 'Sin, save the life').—The most inveterate of the opponents of Nehemiah. He was a native of Beth-horon, and apparently belonged to an old Bab. family holding office under the Persian government. When Nehemiah came to Jerusalem to repair the walls, he, with his allies (Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arabian), met him with derision; and after the work was well under way he stirred up the garrison of Samaria and planned an attack against the builders. This was prevented by the watchfulness of Nehemiah and the workmen. Several devices aimed against the life of Nehemiah were also thwarted by the sagacity of the latter. On Nehemiah's second visit he banished from Jerusalem Manasseh (a son-in-law of Sanballat, and grandson of Eliashib), who founded the Samaritan sect. See Neh 2¹⁰. 19 4¹⁸. 6. 13²⁸.

SANCTIFICATION, SANCTIFY.

'Sanctify' (Latin, from the Vulgate) = the native Eng. 'hallow' (i.e. make, count, keep holy), the latter word being in use somewhat the loftier. EV employs 'hallow' 35 times in OT and twice in NT (Mt 6⁹ = Lk 11²), 'sanctify' thrice as often in OT and 26 times in NT—for identical Hebrew and Greek terms. For the meaning of the root word 'holy,' see art. HOLINESS. The noun 'sanctification'—denoting first the act or process of making holy (hallowing), then the resultant state (hallowedness)—appears in 5 NT passages in the AV, giving way to 'holiness' in others (Ro 6¹⁹. 2, 1 Th 4⁷, 1 Ti 2¹⁵, He 12¹⁴) though the Greek noun is the same, where RV makes the needed correction; everywhere, except in 1 P 1², the state rather than the process is implied. To Paul belong 8 out of the 10 examples of the noun, and 11 out of the 28 examples of the verb in NT (including Ac 20²² and 26¹⁸); 7 of the latter are found in Hebrews. AV employs the synonymous 'consecrate' for 'sanctify' in 7 OT passages, which the RV emends in three instances, leaving 'consecrate' for the regular Hebrew verb in 2 Ch 26¹⁸ 20³³ 31⁶, Ezr 3⁶; the 'consecrate' of He 7²⁸ and of 10²⁰ is corrected by the RV to 'perfect' and 'dedicate' respectively.

1. In the Israelite, as in other ancient religions, that is 'holy' which is set apart for Divine use, so that the 'sanctified' is the opposite of the 'common,' secular, profane. Is 65²⁵. 66¹⁷ illustrate the application of this term in heathenism. With this broad signification it is applicable to whatever is devoted to the public service of J': to persons—priests, Nazirites, etc.; to sacrifices; to vessels, garments, buildings, days (especially the Sabbath). In Is 13³, Jl 3³, Jer 6⁴ (see RVM), even a 'war' is 'sanctified' and the warriors are J''s 'sanctified ones,' when it is put under J''s auspices (cf. the Mohammedan Yihad or Holy War); accordingly, in Nu 21¹⁴ we hear of a 'book of the wars of J'.' The numerous Levitical and other kindred uses of the verb bear this formal sense. But as 'holy' came to designate the specific character of J''—the Holy One of Israel' (see Is. passim)—in distinction from heathen gods, 'sanctify' acquired a corresponding ethical connotation; holiness came to imply a character (actual or ideal) in the holy people, accordant with its status. For Israel, being J''s servant, is 'brought near' to Him (Ex 19⁴, Dt 4⁷, Jer 2², Ps 65⁴ 73²⁶. 148⁴; contrast Ez 19¹²⁻²⁴, Jer 2¹⁸, Hos 9¹ etc.), and such proximity necessitates congeniality—that congruity of nature whereof circumcision and the ceremonial cleansings were symbolical (Ps 15. 2⁴⁻⁶; cf. Is 1⁶. 1^{6f.} 3⁸ 6³⁻⁸, Jer 4¹⁻⁴, Hab 1¹², Ezk 36¹⁶⁻²⁸, Ps 51 etc.). The refrain I AM JEHOVAH resounds through the Law of Holiness in Lv 17-26; this code blends the ritual and the moral in the holiness it demands from Israel, which is the corollary of J''s own holiness. Such is the OT doctrine of sanctification. The prophets, it is said, taught an ethical monotheism—which is to say, in effect, they ethicized holiness. The sanctification binding Israel to J'' was, in a sense, reciprocal: 'Ye shall not profane my holy name (cf. Ex 20⁷, Lv 19¹² 22³, Am 2⁷, Mal 1¹¹⁻¹²); but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel: I am J', which hallow you' (Lv 22³²); 'to sanctify' J' or His 'name' is to recognize and act towards Him as holy, to 'make him holy' in one's thoughts and attitude (see Is 8¹³; cf. 1 P 3¹⁵). This expression is characteristic of Isaiah (5¹⁶ 20²³) and Ezekiel (20⁴ 28²². 23 36²³ 38¹⁶ 39²⁷), who regard J'' as 'sanctified' when His awe-awakening judgments bring men to acknowledge His Deity and character; in this connexion 'sanctify' is parallel to 'magnify,' 'glorify,' 'exalt,' as in Ezk 36²³ 38²². J'' is even said to 'sanctify himself,' or His 'great name,' when He vindicates His holiness and 'makes' Himself 'known in the sight of many nations' for what in truth He is.

2. In the NT we must distinguish the usage of our Lord, of the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and of the Apostle Paul.

(1) Adopting the language of Lv 22³² and of the prophets, Jesus bids the disciples pray, 'Our Father . . . hallowed be thy name . . . on earth' (Mt 6⁹ = Lk 11²)—the unique example of such use of 'sanctify' in the NT, apart from the citation in 1 P 3¹⁶; elsewhere 'glorify thy name' (Jn 12²⁸ etc.). To bring about this 'hallowing' is the very work of Jesus, who for this end 'makes known' the Father's 'name' (Jn 1¹⁴. 18 14⁷⁻² 17⁶. 26⁶, Mt 11²⁷; cf. Jn 17³, 2 Co 4⁶, also Jer 9^{23f.} 31³⁴).

in (a) Jn 10³⁶ and (b) 17¹⁷⁻¹⁹ our Lord makes Himself the object of the verb,—in the second instance the subject also. (a) The Father 'consecrated' Him for His world-mission (a pre-incarnate destination; see 1¹⁸, 1 Jn 4^{9, 14}; cf. Jer 1⁹); (b) at the Last Supper the Son endorses that consecration in view of its dread issue, and proposes to share it with His disciples, as He dedicates Himself to the sacrifice of the cross. Thus in the Person of Jesus Christ sanctification assumes a new and very definite character; as Christian holiness, general consecration to the service of God becomes a specific consecration to the mission of redemption. In Mt 23¹⁷⁻¹⁹ Jesus speaks ad hominem, appealing to the axiom that 'the holy place' sanctifies whatever is devoted to it.

(2) The Epistle to the Hebrews builds upon the OT conception of holiness. Its doctrine of sanctification is found in 2¹¹ 9¹¹⁻¹³ 10¹⁰⁻¹⁴, 19-22 12¹⁴ 13¹¹⁻¹². Being 'the captain of salvation' and 'high priest' of mankind, it is the office of Jesus to 'sanctify' His brethren, i.e. to consecrate them to God's service, for which as sinners they have been disabled (5¹ 10²²). This He effects God-ward by 'making propitiation for' their 'sins' (2¹⁷), and man-ward by 'cleansing their conscience' with the virtue of 'his blood'—by removing the sense of personal guilt before God—even as the animal sacrifices 'sanctified' the Israelites 'unto the cleanness of the flesh' (9¹³⁻¹⁴), and made their ritual worship possible. The chasm which sin has opened between man and God was bridged by the mediation of Jesus Christ; no longer is he kept aloof from the Divine presence, but is bidden to 'come with boldness unto the throne of grace' (4¹⁶ 10¹⁹⁻²²). 'Once for all' this access has been secured, this qualification bestowed on 'the people' whom 'Jesus sanctified by means of his own blood' (13¹²): 'we have been sanctified' according to 'the will of God,' which Jesus embraced and whose demands He met on our behalf with perfect loyalty, in 'the offering of his body' (10¹⁰⁻¹⁰). By that 'one offering he has perfected for ever them that are sanctified'—He has assured, for all who will accept it, till the world's end, a full qualification for fellowship with God (10¹⁴). Hebrews supplies the link between the 'I sanctify myself' of Jesus, and 'that they also may be sanctified in truth' (Jn 17¹⁹). With the writer of Heb., 'cleansing' and 'sanctification' define, on the negative and positive sides, all that St. Paul means by 'justification' and 'sanctification'; only, the second term is here made more prominent and wider in meaning than with the Apostle. St. Paul sees the sinner confronted by the Law of God, guilty and impotent; his fellow-teacher sees him standing outside the temple of God, defiled and banned. Sanctification means, for the former, engagement to God's service (Ro 6¹²⁻²²); for the latter, empowerment for God's worship. That this grace imports, however, in Hebrews more than a status once conferred, is evident from 12¹⁴; it is a state to be increasingly realized, an ideal to be pursued to the end.

(3) St. Paul addresses his readers constantly as 'saints' (see art. HOLINESS); once as 'sanctified in Christ Jesus' (1 Co 1²),—a phrase synonymous with 'called saints,' i.e. made holy by God's call which they obeyed, when He summoned them into His Kingdom (cf. vv. 9, 26-28, 1 Th 1⁴ 2³). The former expression points to the completed act of God by which they have become His saints (cf. 1 Co 6¹¹, Ac 20²⁶ 26¹⁸). That sanctity, with St. Paul, is a term of relationship, not primarily of character, is evident from 1 Co 7¹⁴, where 'the unbelieving husband' or 'wife' is said to 'have been sanctified in' the Christian wedded partner, so that their offspring are 'holy': the person of the unbeliever, under the marriage-bond, is holy in the believer's eyes, as indeed every possession and instrument of life must be (see 1 Ti 4⁵). In the case of the believer himself, who 'in Christ Jesus' is brought into immediate personal contact with God (Col 3¹), destination and use imply moral condition—the 'vessels of the Lord' must be 'clean' and 'made ready for every good work' (2 Ti 2¹⁹⁻²²; cf. 1 above, touching the OT Law of Holiness); so that, while 'sanctity' does not denote character, it normally connotes this; all virtue comes under the category of that which 'becometh saints' or 'is fit in the Lord' (Eph 5³, Col 3^{12, 18} etc.). Accordingly, in 1 Th 4^{4, 7} 'sanctification' is opposed specifically to 'lust' and sexual 'uncleanness'—by contrast, probably, with the pagan 'consecration' to impure deities, as in the case of the hieroduloi of Corinth (cf. 1 Co 6¹³⁻²⁰).

Sanctification completes justification (wh. see); together, these constitute the present work of salvation, the re-instatement of the sinful man before his Maker, his instatement into the Christian standing and condition (see 1 Co 6¹¹, and the connexion between chs. 5 and 6 of Ro.). In principle the former depends on the latter, in experience they are concomitant (Ro 6^{17, 22}). They are alike acts of God, dealing with men in His grace through Christ (Ro 8^{30, 33}, 1 Th 5²³, Jn 17¹⁷; cf. Lv 22²¹). The 'anointing' and 'sealing' of 2 Co 1²¹, while referring formally to baptism, substantially describe sanctification, since God consecrates the believer for His use and marks him in baptism with His 'broad arrow.'

As the writer of Hebrews shows in his own way—see (2) above—Christ is the mediator of sanctification no less than of justification. He 'bought' men with the 'price' of His blood—the bodily 'limbs' along with the inner self—so that we are no longer 'our own' and may not 'live for ourselves,' but are, from the hour we know this, men 'living for God in Christ Jesus'; and Christ 'presents' His redeemed 'to God as holy' and makes them God's 'sure possession,' destined 'for the praise of His glory' (1 Co 6¹⁹, Ro 6¹¹⁻¹⁴ 12¹, Col 1²⁴, Eph 1¹⁴, 1 P 2⁹, Rev 1⁶ etc.). Once, in relation to the Church His bride, Christ is Himself called the 'sanctifier' (Eph 5²⁶; cf. He 13¹²). Being our Head and Representative before God, dedicating 'all his own' (Jn 17¹⁰) to the Father in the offering of Calvary, Jesus virtually accomplished the sanctification of His people, with their justification, once for all (1 Co 1³⁰). Paul's saying, 'I have been crucified with Christ' (Gal 2²⁰ 6¹⁴), implies that he has been, by anticipation, included in the perfect sacrifice; he thus unfolds the implicit doctrine of Jn 17¹⁹ and 17¹⁹⁻¹⁹ (see (1) above; cf. He 10¹⁴).

Collectively, believers were sanctified in the self-devotion of their redeeming Lord; individually, they are sanctified when they accept the Redeemer's sacrifice and personally endorse His action. From the latter point of view, sanctification is the man's own deed; he 'presents himself to God as alive from the dead' (Ro 6^{13, 14}); but the sinner is never, as in OT phrase, said to 'sanctify himself,'—though 1 Ti 4⁵ approaches this mode of statement. The Holy Spirit is, with much emphasis, identified with the work of sanctification; Christian believers are 'sanctified in the Holy Spirit' (Ro 15¹⁶, 1 Co 6¹¹; also 1 Th 4⁷, Eph 4³⁰; cf. 1 P 1² etc.). To receive 'the gift of the Spirit' and to be sanctified are the same thing; when God takes possession of the believer, his 'body' becomes a 'temple of the Holy Ghost' (1 Co 6¹⁹)—then he is a holy man; and to possess 'the Spirit' is, in effect, to have 'Christ dwelling in the heart' (Eph 3¹⁷⁻¹⁸). This twofold identity ('sanctified'—'in the Spirit'—'joined unto the Lord') holds alike of the Church and of the individual Christian (1 Co 3¹⁶, Eph 2²¹; cf. 1 P 2⁹). Faith conditions this experience (Ac 26¹⁸, Eph 1¹⁹). Like the author of Hebrews, Paul recognizes a progressive holiness based upon the fundamental sanctification of the believer, the former being the growing and finally complete realization of the latter. Holiness is the starting-point, perfect holiness the goal of the Christian course—the progress 'is a growth in holiness rather than to holiness' (Bartlett). Hence in Ro 6¹⁹⁻²² the aim of one's 'service to God' and 'righteousness' is found in 'sanctification'; and in 1 Th 5²⁴, the Apostle prays that God will 'sanctify to full completeness' his readers, who are still lacking in many respects (3¹⁰), so that their 'spirit, soul, and body in full integrity may be preserved,' and thus found 'blameless in holiness before God at the coming of our Lord Jesus' (313). This supplication touches the ideal life in Christ; but it is an ideal to the present Christian state, and is not to be relegated to the visionary or the celestial: 'Faithful is he who calleth you; who also will do it' (1 Th 5²⁴).

St. John does not employ in his Epistles either 'sanctify' or 'sanctification,' but their whole substance is there. 1 Jn 1^{6f} and 2^{1f} recall the teaching of Hebrews in speaking of 'the propitiation' made by our 'Advocate,' whose 'blood cleanses from all sin' and thus brings the sinner into 'fellowship with the Father.' Paul's doctrine of holiness is resumed in such passages as 3^{21f}, 4^{13f}, 5^{3f}, 20, setting forth union with Christ through the indwelling Spirit as the spring of a new, eternal life for the man, in the strength of which God's commandments are kept in love, sin and fear are cast out, and the world is overcome. SAND.—Minute particles of siliceous matter, mica, felspar, etc., easily rolled before the wind; hence, probably, its Heb. name, chöl. It lies in great stretches along the Palestinian and Egyptian sea-board—an apt symbol of the incalculably vast or numerous (Gn 22¹⁷ 41⁴⁰, Jer 33²² etc.). For 'sand,' in Job 29⁸, we should probably read, with RVm, 'phoenix.' However compact and firm, sand at once becomes soft at the touch of water (Mt 7²⁸ etc.). W. EWING.

SANHEDRIN.—The Gr. word synedrion (EV council) became so familiar to the Jews that they adopted it in the form of Sanhedrin, which occurs very frequently both in Josephus and in the Talmud.

1. According to Rabbinical tradition, the Sanhedrin was originally created by Moses in obedience to Divine command (cf. Nu 11¹⁶), and it is taught that this assembly existed, and exercised judicial functions, throughout the whole period of Biblical history right up to Talmudic times. That this cannot have been the case is seen already in the fact that, according to Biblical authority itself, king Jehoshaphat is mentioned as having instituted the supreme court at Jerusalem (2 Ch 19⁸); but that this court cannot have been identical with the Sanhedrin of later times is clear from the fact that, whereas the latter had governing powers as well as judicial functions, the former was a court of justice and nothing else. It is possible that the 'elders' mentioned in the Book of Ezra (5⁵, 9, 67, 14, 108) and 'rulers' in the Book of Nehemiah (21⁶ 48, 49, 12, 49, 57, 73) constituted a body which to some extent corresponded to the Sanhedrin properly so called. But seeing that the Sanhedrin is often referred to as a Gerousia (i.e. an aristocratic, as distinct from a democratic, body), and that as such it is not mentioned before the time of Antiochus the Great (B.C. 223–187), it is reasonably certain that, in its more developed form at all events, it did not exist before the Greek period. The Sanhedrin is referred to under the name Gerousia (EV senate) in 2 Mac 11⁹ 4⁹, Jth 4⁸ 11¹⁴ 15⁸ and elsewhere in the Apoc., in Ac 5²¹, and frequently in Josephus, e.g. Ant. iv. viii. 41.

The Sanhedrin was conceived of mainly as a court of justice, the equivalent Heb. term being Beth Din, and it is in this sense that it is usually referred to in the NT (see, e.g., Mt 5²² 26⁵⁹, Mk 15¹, Lk 22⁶⁶, Jn 11⁴⁷, Ac 4⁵ 5²¹ 6¹² 22³⁰ etc.). Sometimes in the NT the terms Presbyterion and Gerousia are used in reference to the Sanhedrin (Ac 5²¹ 22³⁰). A member of this court was called a douloute ('councillor'). Joseph of Arimathea was one (Mk 15⁴³, Lk 23⁵⁰). The Sanhedrin was abolished after the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70).

2. As regards the composition of the Sanhedrin, the hereditary high priest stood at the head of it, and in its fundamental character it formed a sacerdotal aristocracy, and represented the nobility, i.e. predominantly the Sadducean interest; but under Herod, who favoured the Pharisaic party in his desire to restrict the power and influence of the old nobility, the Sadducean element in the Sanhedrin became less prominent, while that of the Pharisees increased. So that during the Roman period the Sanhedrin contained representatives of two opposed parties, the priestly nobility with its Sadducean sympathies, and the learned Pharisees. According to the Mishna, the Sanhedrin consisted of seventy-one members (Sanhed. i. 6); when a vacancy occurred the members co-opted some one 'from the congregation' to fill the place (Sanhed. iv. 4), and he was admitted by the ceremony of the laying on of hands.

3. The extent of the Sanhedrin's jurisdiction varied at different times in its history; while, in a certain sense, it exercised civil jurisdiction over all Jewish communities, wherever they existed, during the time of Christ this was restricted to Judaea proper; it was for this reason that it had no judicial authority over Him so long as He remained in Galilee. Its orders were, however, very soon after the time of Christ, regarded as binding by orthodox Jews all over the world. Thus we see that it could issue warrants for the apprehension of Christians in Damascus to the synagogue there (Ac 9² 22⁶ 26¹²); but the extent to which Jewish communities outside of Judaea were willing to submit to such orders depended entirely on how far they were favourably disposed towards the central authority; it was only within the limits of Judaea proper that real authority could be exercised by the Sanhedrin. It was thus the supreme native court, as contrasted with the foreign authority of Rome; to it belonged all such judicial matters as the local provincial courts were incompetent to deal with, or as the Roman procurator did not attend to himself. Above all, it was the final court of appeal for questions connected with the Mosaic Law; its decision having once been given, the judges of the lower courts were, on pain of death, bound to acquiesce in it. The NT offers some interesting examples of the kind of matters that were brought before it: Christ appeared before it on a charge of blasphemy (Mt 26⁷, Jn 19⁷), Peter and John were accused before it of being false prophets and deceivers of the people (Ac 4⁵), Stephen was condemned by it because of blasphemy (Ac 7⁵⁷, 58), and Paul was charged with transgression of the Mosaic Law (Ac 22³⁰). It had independent authority and right to arrest people by its own officers (Mt 26⁴⁷, Mk 14⁴, Ac 4³ 5¹⁷, 18); it had also the power of finally disposing, on its own authority, of such cases as did not involve sentence of death (Ac 4³ 23, 52, 40). It was only in cases when the sentence of death was pronounced that the latter had to be ratified by the Roman authorities (Jn 18³¹); the case of the stoning of Stephen must be regarded as an instance of mob-justice.

While the Sanhedrin could not hold a court of supreme jurisdiction in the absence, or, at all events, without the consent, of the Roman procurator, it enjoyed, nevertheless, wide powers within the sphere of its extensive jurisdiction. At the same time, it had sometimes to submit to the painful experience of realizing its dependent position in face of the Roman power, even in matters which might be regarded as peculiarly within the scope of its own jurisdiction; for the Roman authorities could at any time take the initiative themselves, and proceed independently of the Jewish court, as the NT testifies, e.g. in the case of Paul's arrest (see also Ac 23¹⁵, 20, 28).

4. The Sanhedrin met in the Temple, in what was called the Lishkath ha-Gazit (the 'Hall of hewn-stones') as a general rule, though an exception is recorded in Mt 26⁵⁷, Mk 14⁵⁸. The members sat in a semicircle in order to be able to see each other; in front stood clerks of the court, and behind these, three rows of the disciples or the 'learned men.' The prisoner had always to be dressed in mourning. When any one had spoken once in favour of the accused, he could not afterwards speak against him. In case of acquittal the decision might be announced the same day, but a sentence of condemnation was always pronounced on the day following, or later; in the former a simple majority sufficed, in the latter a majority of two-thirds was required.

SARAH or SARAI.—1. 'Sara' is the form used previous to Gn 17¹⁸, and 'Sarah' afterwards, in harmony with the change of name there narrated (by P). It is probable that there is no real significance in the change, -at being an old feminine ending found in Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic, while -ah is the common feminine ending. Sarah means 'princess.' The occurrence of the name Sa-ra-a-a in an Assyrian letter (K 1274) adds no definite information. Sarah was the wife of Abraham, and also his half-sister (Gn 12¹⁸ 20¹²); her parentage is not given further. She was taken as wife by the king of Egypt and also by Abimelech king of Gerar, and afterwards restored to Abraham (12¹⁹⁻²⁰ 20). The former incident is in J, the latter in E; they may be different versions of the same story. The statement that she was at least 65 years old at this time (Gn 12⁴, cf. 17¹⁷) seems inconsistent with these incidents, and especially with the statement concerning her beauty (12¹¹). It is to be remembered, however, that the dates belong to P. Sarah was long barren, but finally Isaac was born after supernatural intervention, when she was 90 years old (21¹⁻⁷ [P]). Through jealousy Sarah illtreated Hagar, her hand-maid, the concubine of Abraham, and finally drove her away with her son Ishmael (16. 21¹⁸⁻²¹). The incident is in harmony with the regulations of the Babylonian Code of Hammurabi (§§ 144-147). Sarah died at the age of 127 (P), and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (Gn 23). In the NT she is mentioned in Ro 4¹⁹ 9⁹, He 11¹¹, 1 P 3⁶, Gal 4³¹-5¹.

SARAMEL (RV Asaramel).—An expression, 'in Asaramel,' in 1 Mac 14²⁸ in the inscription upon the memorial pillar of Simon Maccabeus. A place-name is indicated by the Greek text. This reading, however, is unsuitable, and it is best to assume, as has been proposed, that there was originally written a Heb. title of Simon, additional to 'the high-priest,' meaning 'prince of the people of God' (Sar-am-ʾēl). SARCHEDONUS (To 1²¹). = Esarhaddon (wh. see).

SARDIS was the capital of the ancient kingdom of Lydia on the western coast of Asia Minor, and in the 6th cent. B.C. one of the most powerful cities of the world. It stood on one of the alluvial hills between Mount Tmolus and the sea, about 1500 feet above and south of the great plain of the river Hermus, and was inaccessible except by a neck of land on the south. The date of its foundation must be about B.C. 1200, and the situation was ideal for an early fortified capital of a kingdom. As time advanced, extension was necessary, and a lower city was built on the west and north sides of the original city, near the little river Pactolus, and probably also on the east side. The older city now acted as acropolis, or citadel, for the later. This rich Oriental city, whose wealth depended on well-cultivated land and incessant commerce, was for centuries to the Greek the type of an Oriental despotism, under which all must sooner or later bend. Its absorption was not without its effects on the conquerors, and Sardis became the home of a newer Hellenism, different from the old.

Cresus was king of Lydia in the second half of the 6th cent. B.C., and planned a campaign against Cyrus, the Persian king. He proceeded with the greatest caution, and crossed the river Halys. There he was completely defeated. He returned to prepare a second army, but Cyrus pursued him in haste, and besieged him in Sardis before he could get it ready. The citadel was captured by means of a climber who worked his way up by an oblique crevice in the perpendicular rock. The city was similarly captured by Antiochus the Great from Achæus late in the third century B.C. The patron deity of the city was Cybele, but she is conceived as possessing different attributes from those usually associated with the name. A special characteristic was the power of restoring life to the dead. The city suffered greatly from an earthquake in A.D. 17, and received a large donation as well as a remission of five years' taxation from the Emperor Tiberius. The greatness of the city under the Roman empire was due entirely to its past reputation. The acropolis ceased to be inhabited, being no longer necessary for purposes of defence. Its use was revived in the earlier Turkish days, but for long there has been no settlement at Sardis. Its place is taken by Salikli, above 5 miles to the east.

According to the view of Sir W. M. Ramsay, Sardis is alluded to in the Apocalypse, as are all the other six churches, as a centre of influence in its district. One of the cities within its sphere was Magnesia. The letter addressed by the writer of the Apocalypse to Sardis, with which, as with the other six cities named there, he was obviously well acquainted, shows that the church at Sardis was practically dead. It had degenerated and decayed from its early promise to an extent equalled by no other city. There were in it only a few faithful souls. That there is a remarkable analogy between the history of the city and the history of the church may be seen even from the bald account of the former just given. The instability of the city in history finds its parallel in the immorality of the church members. Most of the Christians had fallen back to the pagan level of life. The few noble ones shall have their names enrolled in the list of the citizens of heaven. The letter doubtless had a good effect. Christianity survived at Sardis. It was the capital of the province Lydia, instituted about A.D. 295. The bishop of Sardis was metropolitan of Lydia, and sixth in order of precedence of all the bishops subject to the patriarch of Constantinople. Not far from Sardis there dwells in the present day a people whose customs differ so much from those of Mohammedanism that it is probable they would become Christian if they dared. A. SOUTER.

SARGON (Is 20¹).—The father of Sennacherib and successor of Shalmaneser IV., king of Assyria (B.C. 722-705). Samaria was captured early in his reign, and Sargon carried away 27,200 of the chief inhabitants, the city being placed under Assyrian governors.

Sargon's advent to the throne marked a change of dynasty, and he had to subdue insurrection right and left. Merodach-baladan, once king of the Chaldean State of Bit-Yakin, seized Babylon, and was supported by the Elamites. Sargon defeated the latter, but was obliged to leave Merodach-baladan undisturbed for twelve years, while he subdued the northern rivals of Assyria, Armenia and its neighbours. In b.c. 720 he faced a combination of the W. States under Ilu-bihdi, who drew Hamath, Arpad, Damascus, and Palestine into revolt. This was soon put down, Hamath was colonized by Assyrians, and the Philistines and Egyptians were defeated at Raphia. Then Carchemish was captured and absorbed into the empire (b.c. 717). But Sargon's greatest difficulty was with Armenia, and the rebellions it perpetually stirred up. He was, however, successful in the end, and subdued all the region S. of the Caucasus and parts of Cilicia, as well as parts of Media. In b.c. 711 an Assyrian army was sent against Palestine, where Merodach-baladan had been intriguing and had drawn Hezekiah into the conspiracy. Ashdod was captured, and Judah, Moab, and Edom submitted. Merodach-baladan was expelled from Babylon (b.c. 709), and then chased from Bit-Yakin, whither he had retreated. Sargon was welcomed as the deliverer of the native Babylonians, and became king of Babylon. He sent his statue to be erected at Idalion, in Cyprus. In b.c. 708 Commagene was annexed. Sargon was killed b.c. 705,—how or where is not yet clear. He founded a magnificent city at Dūr-Sargon, the modern Khorsabad.

SATAN.—1. In the OT.—The term Satan is Hebrew and means 'adversary.' In the earlier usage of the language it is employed in the general sense of 'adversary,' personal or national: (cf. e.g. Nu 22⁷, 2 S 19², 1 K 5¹ 11² etc.). In such passages no trace of a distinct being designated 'Satan' is to be seen. Such a being meets us for the first time in the OT in the prologue (chs. 1 and 2) of the Bk. of Job, in the person of one of 'the sons of God' who bears the title of 'the Satan.' Here Satan appears as a member of the celestial council of angelic beings who have access to the presence of God. His special function is to watch over human affairs and beings with the object of searching out men's sins and accusing them in the celestial court. He is thus invested with a certain malevolent and malignant character; but it is to be observed that he has no power to act without the Divine permission being first obtained, and cannot, therefore, be regarded as the embodiment of the power that opposes the Deity. In Zec 3¹ essentially the same view of 'the Satan' is presented. But in 1 Ch 21¹ ('And Satan stood up against Israel, and moved David to number Israel') the personality of this being is more distinct: he appears now as 'Satan' (a proper name without the article), the tempter who is able to provoke David to number Israel. This is the Chronicler's (4th or 3rd cent. b.c.) reading of the incident which in the earlier narrative (2 S 24¹) is ascribed to the direct action of God Himself. Here (in Chron.) the work of Satan is apparently conceived of as more or less independent of, and opposed to, the Divine action.

2. In the extra-canonical literature of the OT.—In the later (apocryphal) literature of pre-Christian Judaism the dualistic tendency becomes more pronounced—a tendency powerfully affected by Persian influence, it would seem, which is also apparent in the development of an elaborate Jewish angelology and demonology. This is most clearly visible in the apocalyptic literature. In the oldest part of the Bk. of Enoch (chs. 1-36), dating, perhaps, from about b.c. 180, the origin of the demons is traced to the fall of the angelic watchers, the 'sons of God' who corrupted themselves with the 'daughters of men' (Gn 6¹). It was from the offspring of these sinful unions—the 'giants' or nephilim—that the demons were sprung. Of these demons the Asmodeus of the Bk. of Tobit (3⁸, 17) seems to have been regarded as the king (Bab. Pes. 110a). The name Asmodeus (or in Heb. Ashmedai) has plausibly been connected with the ancient Persian Aeshma dæva, i.e. 'the covetous or lustful demon'; in its Hebrew form it suggests the meaning 'destroyer' or 'bringer of destruction,' and this demon may be intended by 'the destroyer' of Wisdom 18² and by the Apollyon ('=Destroyer') of Rev 9¹¹. In the latest part of the Bk. of Enoch, however, the so-called 'Similitudes' (chs. xxxvii-ixxi), which perhaps dates from about b.c. 64, 'the fallen watchers' (and their descendants) are carefully distinguished from the Satans, who apparently belong to 'a counter kingdom of evil' which existed before the fall of the watchers recorded in Gn 6¹, the latter, in consequence of their fall, becoming subject to the former. Apparently these 'Satans' are ruled by a single chief, who is styled 'Satan' in one passage (Enoch 54⁴). 'Their functions were threefold: they tempted to evil (69⁴); they accused the dwellers upon earth (40⁷); they punished the condemned. In this last character they are technically called "angels of punishment"' (53³ 56¹ 62¹ 63¹) (Charles).

In the Bk. of Wisdom (24¹: 'by the envy of the devil death entered into the world') we already meet with the identification of the Serpent of Gn 3 with Satan, which afterwards became a fixed element in belief, and an allusion to the same idea may be detected in the Psalms of Solomon 4¹, where the prosperous wicked man is said to be 'like a serpent, to pervert wisdom, speaking with the words of transgressors.' The same identification also meets us in the Book of the Secrets of Enoch (? 1st cent. A.D.), where, moreover, satanology shows a rich development (the pride, revolt, and fall of Satan are dwelt upon). Cf. art. FALL.

The secondary Jewish (Rabbinical) Literature which is connected with the text of the OT (esp. the Targums and the Midrashim) naturally reflects beliefs that were current at a later time. But they are obviously connected closely with those that have already been mentioned. The Serpent of Gn 3 becomes 'the old serpent' who seduced Adam and Eve. The chief of the Satans is Sammael, who is often referred to as 'the angel of death'; and in the Secrets of Enoch he is prince of the demons and a magician. It is interesting to note that in the later Midrash one of the works of Messiah ben-Joseph is the slaying of Sammael, who is 'the Satan, the prime mover of all evil.' In the earlier literature his great opponent is the archangel Michael. The Rabbinic doctrine of the 'evil impulse' (yetsar ra), which works within man like a leaven (Berak. 17a), looks like a theological refinement, which has sometimes been combined with the popular view of Satan (Satan works his evil purpose by the instrumentality of the 'evil impulse').

3. In the NT.—In the NT, Satan and his kingdom are frequently referred to. Sometimes the Hebrew name 'Satan' is used (e.g. Mk 3²⁶ 4¹ etc.), sometimes its Greek equivalent (diabolos; cf. our word 'diabolical'), which is translated 'devil,' and which means 'accuser' or 'calumniator.' In Mt 12²⁴, 27 (cf. 10²³) Satan is apparently identified with Beelzebub (or Beelzebul, and is occasionally designated 'the evil one' (Mt 13¹⁹, 25 etc.; so, perhaps, also in the Lord's Prayer: 'deliver us from the evil one'). Some scholars are of opinion that the name Beelzebub means not 'fly-god' but 'enemy' (i.e. the enemy of God). He is called the 'prince of the devils (or demons)' in Mt 12²⁴, just as Sammael, 'the great prince in heaven,' is designated the 'chief of Satans' in the Midrash.

The demonology that confronts us in the NT has striking points of contact with that which is developed in the Enochic literature. The main features of the latter, in fact, reappear. The 'angels which kept not their first estate' (Jude¹, 2 P 2⁴) are the angelic watchers whose fall through lust is described in Enoch 6-16. Their punishment is to be kept imprisoned in perpetual darkness. In Enoch the demons, who are represented as the evil spirits which went forth from the souls of the giant offspring of the fallen watchers, exercise an evil activity, working moral ruin on the earth till the final judgment. In exactly the same way the demons are described in the NT as disembodied spirits (Mt 12²⁴⁻²⁶, Lk 11²⁴⁻²⁶). The time of their punishment is to be the final judgment (cf. Mt 8²⁹: 'Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?'). They belong to and are subject to Satan. As in the Book of Enoch, Satan is represented in the NT as the ruler of a counter-kingdom of evil (cf. Mt 12²⁶, Lk 11¹⁸ 'if Satan cast out Satan, how shall his kingdom stand?'); he led astray angels (Rev 12⁹) and men (2 Co 11³); his functions are to tempt (Mt 4¹⁻¹², Lk 22³¹), to accuse (Rev 12¹⁰), and to punish (1 Co 5⁵: impenitent sinners delivered over to Satan for destruction of the flesh). It should be added that in the Fourth Gospel and Johannine Epp. the lesser demonic agencies disappear. Opposition is concentrated in the persons of Christ and the devil. The latter is the ruler of this world (Jn 16¹¹), and enslaves men to himself through sin. The Son of God is manifested for the express purpose of destroying the devil's works (1 Jn 3⁹).

Both in St. Paul (cf. Ro 16²⁰, 2 Co 11²⁻³) and in the Apocalypse Satan is identified with the Serpent of Gn 3. It is also noteworthy that St. Paul shared the contemporary belief that angelic beings inhabited the higher (heavenly) regions, and that Satan also with his retinue dwelt not beneath the earth, but in the lower atmospheric region; cf. Eph 2², where 'the prince of the power of the air'—Satan (cf. also Eph 6¹² and Lk 10¹⁸ 'I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven'). For Satan's rôle in the Apocalypse see art. ESCHATOLOGY. Cf. also art. DEVIL.

4. The attitude of our Lord towards the Satan-belief.

—Our Lord, as is clearly apparent in the Synoptic tradition, recognized the existence and power of a kingdom of evil, with organized demonic agencies under the control of a supreme personality, Satan or Beelzebub. These demonic agencies are the source of every variety of physical and moral evil. One principal function of the Messiah is to destroy the works of Satan and his subordinates (Mk 13²⁴⁻²⁵, 31¹²⁻¹³ etc.). Maladies traced to demonic possession play a large part in the Synoptic narratives (see DEVIL, POSSESSION). In the expulsion of demons by His disciples, Jesus sees the overthrow of Satan's power (Lk 10¹⁸). The evil effected by Satanic agency is intellectual and moral as well as physical (Mk 4¹⁵, Mt 13¹⁹⁻²³; cf. 2 Co 4⁴). That our Lord accepted the reality of such personal agencies of evil cannot seriously be questioned; nor is it necessary to endeavour to explain this fact away. The problem is to some extent a psychological one. Under certain conditions and in certain localities the sense of the presence and potency of evil personalities has been painfully and oppressively felt by more than one modern European, who was not prone to superstition. It is also literally true that the light of the gospel and the power of Christ operate still in such cases to 'destroy the works of darkness' and expel the demons. G. H. Box.

SATCHEL.—See BAG.

SATHRABUZANES (1 Es 6². 7. 27 7¹)—Shethar-bozenai, Ezr 5⁸. 6⁶. 12.

SATRAPS.—RV tr. of 'āchashdarpēntm, Ezr 8³⁶, Est 3¹² 8⁹ 9⁴ (AV lieutenants), Dn 3². 1. 27 6¹². (AV princes). The term stands for the Pers. kshatrapdvan (= 'protectors of the realm'). The satrap was the governor of a whole province, and he held the position of a vassal king. His power, however, was checked by the presence of a royal scribe, whose duty it was to report to the 'great king' on the administration of the province.

SATYR.—The Heb. word sā'ir means primarily 'he-goat,' but the plur. sē'irim is tr. in Lv 17⁷ and 2 Ch 11¹⁵, AV 'devils,' RV 'he-goats'; in Is 13²¹ 34¹⁴ EV 'satyrs,' RVm 'he-goats.' Probably too in 2 K 23⁸ shē'irim ('gates') should be sē'irim, and tr. as in Lv 17⁷. In these passages some 'hairy' demon is to be inferred to whom 'sacrifices' were made (Lv 17⁷), 'high places' erected (2 K 23⁸), and 'priests' set apart (2 Ch 11¹⁵). The association of these creatures with the mythological Lilith (wh. see) in Is 34¹⁴ is specially noticeable.

SAUL.—1. Son of Kish, a Benjamite, the first king of Israel. We first meet him about to abandon the search for his father's asses, when his servant suggested consulting Samuel. As it was customary to bring a present to a seer, and the wallet was empty, Saul hesitated till the servant produced the fourth part of a shekel of silver to give to the man of God. The seer, divinely prepared for their arrival, met them as he was on his way to the high place to sacrifice. A banquet was made ready, and special honour paid to Saul by Samuel. The seer told the seekers that the asses had been found, and broached the matter of the kingdom to Saul, and anointed him as he was leaving. Saul was given certain signs in attestation of Samuel's message, and after leaving the seer's house, where he and his servant spent the night, he met a band of prophets, and soon was prophesying among them, to the marvel of his acquaintances (1 S 10¹⁰). This narrative gives no hint that the people asked for a king, or that his selection would be displeasing to either Samuel or Jehovah.

The account is interrupted at 10¹⁷ by one of a different temper. The people demand a king, which Samuel interprets to be a rejection of Jehovah, their true king, and Saul, after protest, is elected by lot at Mizpah. He remained quietly at home till Nahash's cruel demand that the men of Jabesh-gilead should surrender to him, and each one lose the right eye, roused him. He was ploughing in the field when the news reached him, and immediately sacrificed the oxen, sending out parts of the sacrifice to his brethren with the command that they should follow him. When the army was mustered he marched to Jabesh-gilead and administered a crushing defeat to Nahash, after which his grateful countrymen made him king at Gilgal (ch. 11). A still greater necessity for a king appears in the encroachments of the Philistines. Saul and Jonathan, his son, were encamped in Michmash and Gibeah (Geba), when Jonathan smote the 'garrison' (?) of the Philistines in Geba, thus precipitating the struggle. The plan of the Philistines was to send out plundering parties, and Jonathan threw the whole camp into confusion by surprising one of its guerrilla headquarters (13²⁻³ 14¹⁻⁴). When Saul heard of the flight of the enemy he inquired of the oracle what to do, but the rout was so apparent that he joined pursuit without the answer. The destruction of the enemy would have been greater had not Saul put a taboo on food. In the evening the famished warriors fell upon the cattle, and ate without sacrificing till the reported impiety reached the ears of Saul, who legitimated the meal by sacrificing at a great stone. As he failed to receive an answer from the oracle, when he inquired whether he should pursue the Philistines farther, Saul concluded that some one had maned. An inquiry was taken to the oracle, and the fault was found to lie with Jonathan, who confessed to having tasted honey. He was, however, delivered by the people from the penalty, for Saul had sworn that he should die (14¹⁷⁻¹⁸).

This narrative (chs. 13, 14) is interrupted at 13¹⁻¹⁸ by an account which represents Samuel as taking issue with Saul for sacrificing at the end of an appointed period of seven days, and announcing his rejection (see art. SAMUEL, p. 823). We have from another source (ch. 15) a story of the encounter with Amalek, against whom Samuel sent Saul with instructions to destroy men, women, children, and spoil. Saul, however, spares Agag, and part of the booty. This is now assigned as the reason for his rejection. Saul acknowledged his fault, but begged Samuel to honour him before the people by sacrificing with him. In his impotency he lays hold of Samuel's garment, which is rent, and becomes the symbol of the kingdom wrested from Saul. Samuel relents and worships with him.

The second stage of Saul's life concerns his relations with David. Saul is advised to employ music as a relief from a deep-seated mental trouble, called 'an evil spirit from the Lord.' David, a skilled harper and celebrated soldier, is engaged. Saul loves him, and makes him his armour-bearer (16¹⁴⁻²²). The Philistines again assemble, this time at Socoh; Goliath issues his challenge, but no one responds. The lad David, who had come to the camp to visit his brethren, learns of the proffered reward, meets the boaster in single combat, and kills him. In this story Saul seems weak, irresolute, and unacquainted with David (ch. 17). David's growing popularity and prowess lead Saul to attempt his life. Michal, Saul's daughter, is offered to him in marriage in return for one hundred Philistines. The hazard involved failed to accomplish his death. Then David's house is surrounded, but Michal manages David's escape through a window (18¹⁻⁹, 20¹⁻¹⁷). Merab, Saul's elder daughter, was also offered to David, but withdrawn when he should have had her. This seems to be an effort to explain why David did not receive Saul's daughter after he had slain the giant. David flees to Ramah, and Saul, seeking him there, is seized with the prophetic frenzy and rendered powerless (19¹⁸⁻²⁴). David again flees, and receives help from the priests at Nob. So enraged was Saul that he ordered the slaughter of the entire priesthood there (chs. 20-21). Saul had David all but captured in the hills of Ziph, when a raid of the Philistines called him away (23¹⁴⁻²⁹). Twice Saul was in the power of David, who refused to harm the Lord's anointed (chs. 24, 26).

The circumstances connected with Saul's death are told in a dramatic way. The Philistines had gathered together at Aphek, while Saul held the fateful plains of Megiddo at Jezreel. Answer came from neither prophet nor priest. Then in despair he applied to the necromancer at Endor, but received only a hopeless message. The battle joins; Saul's sons are slain; sore pressed, he calls on his armour-bearer to slay him, but being refused he falls upon his sword and dies. The following day the Philistines severed the heads of Saul and his sons, and exposed the bodies on the walls of Beth-shan, whence the grateful Jabesh-gileadites brought them away by night (chs. 28, 31). An Amalekite, who brought the story of Saul's death to David, claimed that he himself slew him, and was promptly executed by David (2 S 1¹⁻¹⁰).

SAVIAS (1 Es 8²) = Uzzi, Ezr 7⁴.

SAVIOUR.—See SALVATION.

SAVOUR.—The word 'savour' is used in AV literally for taste, as Mt 5¹³ 'If the salt have lost his savour,' and for smell, as 2 Es 2¹³ 'an ointment of sweet savour.' It is also used figuratively in the sense of reputation, Ex 5⁸ 'Ye have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh' (lit. 'our smell to stink' as Avm).

The verb 'to savour' is either 'to taste or smell of,' as in Pref. to AV 'to savour more of curiosity than of wisdom'; or 'to seek out or to search by tasting or smelling,' used fig. in Mk 8²¹ 'Thou savourest not the things that be of God.'

SCALL.—See MEDICINE, p. 600^a.

SCAPE-GOAT.—See AZAZEL, ATONEMENT [DAY OF].

SCARLET.—See COLOURS, § 4.

SCEPTRE, as tr. of shēbet, may stand either for a short ornamental sceptre such as appears in some representations of the Assyrian king, or for a long staff reaching to the ground, which characterizes some portrayals of the Persian monarchs. The long sceptre is simply an ornamented staff, the short one is a development of the club or mace. On Gn 49¹⁰ see LAWGIVER and SHILOH. On the difficulty of approaching the presence of the Persian kings referred to in Est 4¹¹, cf. also Herod. iii. 118, 140.

SCÉVA.—At Ephesus, where St. Paul worked 'special powers' (Ac 19¹¹⁻¹⁷), certain itinerant Jews (RV 'strolling' perhaps conveys too much the idea of 'vagabond') endeavoured to exorcise evil spirits by naming over them the name of Jesus. Among them were seven sons of one Sceva, a Jewish 'chief priest' (probably one of the high-priestly family). In v.¹⁶ the demoniac overcomes 'both of them' (RV). Sceva himself is not said to have been present. The incident led to many conversions, and several brought and destroyed their books of magic.

There is a difficulty in the text. Seven sons are mentioned in v.¹⁴, and these are reduced to two in v.¹⁶. Perhaps St. Luke is here abbreviating a written source which detailed the incident more fully, and explained that two out of the seven sons tried to exorcise this particular demon. Inferior MSS (followed by AV) substitute 'them' for 'both of them,' and the Bezan Codex (D) omits the word 'seven' altogether, calls Sceva merely 'a priest,' and adds other phrases which are expansions of our text. But these seem to be but explanations of a difficult original text; and the RV is probably correct. The word 'seven' could never have been inserted if it were not St. Luke's.

Prof. Ramsay thinks that the whole passage is unworthy of Luke (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 272f.). But it is unsafe to judge first-century thought by that of our own day. The Apostolic age firmly believed in possession by evil spirits; and there is really nothing in this chapter unlike what we read elsewhere in NT.

SCHISM.—See HERESY.

SCHOOL, SCHOOLMASTER.—'School' occurs in EV only in Ac 19⁹ for the lecture-room of an Ephesian rhetorician (cf. EDUCATION, p. 204*); 'schoolmaster' only in Gal 3²⁴. *AV, for which RV has 'tutor.' The original is paidagōgos, lit. 'child-conductor,' 'pedagogue'—an old and trusty slave, who accompanied the Greek child to and from school and 'was bound never to lose sight of him, to carry his lyre and tablets, and to keep him out of mischief' (Gardner and Jeavons, Manual of Gr. Antiq. 303). He had nothing to do with the teaching, as is suggested by both the English renderings. The same word is rendered 'Instructors' in 1 Co 4¹⁸ AV (RV, as before, 'tutors'). In AV the latter word is found only in Gal 4² as the tr. of an entirely different word, correctly rendered 'guardians' by RV. For the duties of guardians in Gr. law see op. cit. 552 f. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SCHOOLS.—See EDUCATION.

SCIENCE.—The word 'science' occurs in AV only twice (Dn 14, 1 Th 6²⁰), and in both places it simply means 'knowledge'; as in Barlowe's Dialogue, p. 100.

'There is no truthe, no mercye, nor scyence of god in the yerth.'

SCIMITAR.—See FAUCHION.

SCORPION ('aqarāb [Arab. same name], Dt 8¹⁴, Ezk 2²; skorpios, Lk 10¹⁹ 11¹², Rev 9¹⁰ 19).—The scorpion belongs to the Arachnidae or spider family. It occurs plentifully in Palestine, ten species being known; it is nocturnal in its habits, and kills small insects, spiders, etc., for food by means of the poisonous sting at the end of its tail. The effect of the poison on human beings is severe pain, and sometimes collapse and even death, the latter in young children only. The 'scorpions' of 1 K 12¹¹, 14, 2 Ch 10¹¹, 14 are clearly used only figuratively. It is possible, but hardly likely (see Hastings' DCG, art. 'Scorpion'), that the language of our Lord in Lk 11¹² is suggested by the egg-like form of the 'scorpion' when at rest. More probably He has in mind some such form of proverb as was current among the Greeks: 'Instead of a perch, a scorpion.'

SCRIBES.—Sometimes a phrase gives the key to a great history. Such is the case here. 'The scribes of the Pharisees' (Mk 2⁶) points us to the inseparable connexion between the Pharisees and the Scribes. In other places in the Gospels they are also grouped together (Mt 12³⁸, Lk 6⁷, Mk 7⁹). If we would understand the Scribe or Lawyer, we must set him against the background of Pharisaism (see art. PHARISEES).

For every community that carves out for itself a great career the supreme problem is law and its administration. Now, after the Exile, the task being to hold together the parts of a nation widely scattered and lacking the unifying power of a common and sacred fatherland, the Mosaic Torah, the Divine Law for Israel, became, in course of time, the moral and spiritual constitution of Israel, its code of duty, the fabric of its right. The Torah is the informing principle of the community. To grasp this principle and apply it to the changing conditions and questions of the nation's life was the supreme need of the time. This need was analogous to the similar need of any great State. And it always necessitates, as at Rome, a great body of lawyers. A fundamental need gives rise to an authoritative function, and the function creates for itself the agents to exercise it. So, in course of time, appears in Judaism a new type, the Scribe. There is, however, a peculiarity in the case of the Scribe that sets him apart from the Roman lawyer or the modern judge. The Torah which he interpreted and applied was a good many things in one. It was the text-book of a society which was both Church and State; it was at once the constitution and the catechism of the Jews. So the mastery and administration of it developed in the Scribe a variety of functions which with us are parcelled out among preacher, scholar, lawyer, and magistrate. It is easy to see that history owed him a fortune. He came to occupy a great position in the Jewish community. By the 1st cent. he had forced his way into that aristocratic body, the Sanhedrin (Gamaliel in Ac 5; Nicodemus in Jn 3 and 7). He sat in 'Moses' seat' (Mt 23¹). He had the power of 'binding and loosing,' i.e. of publishing authoritative judgments upon the legality and illegality of actions.

We see here a situation which had the making of great men in it. To grasp and administer the Mosaic Law, to 'sit in Moses' seat' and become the trustee of the supreme interests of a great people,—there can be no better school. Naturally, there were many noble Scribes, men whose character and learning were commensurate with their task. Such were Hillel and Sham-mai, elder contemporaries of our Lord. Such also was the Gamaliel at whose feet St. Paul sat (Ac 22³), and who spoke, with noble feeling, against the persecuting zeal of the Sadducees (5³⁴⁻⁴⁰). As a class, too, they had their noble side. Their work, both educational and judicial, was gratuitous. They were to receive no pay. Probably this rule grew out of the idea of an impartial judge (Ex 23⁸, Dt 16¹⁹). Of course, there must have been many exceptions. Yet the mere idea was ennobling, and must have served to enkindle devotion. But, on the other hand, their position encouraged vast pride and vanity. They stood on their prerogatives as 'Teachers.' They loved the title of 'Rabbi.' So our Lord, when He bids His disciples refuse such title (Mt 23⁷⁻¹⁰), has the Scribes in mind.

This leads us to the deeper defect of the Scribes as a class. All their training went to unfit them for understanding our Lord. As we have seen, the situation of the Jews in the centuries after the Exile called for a new type of man. The prophet passed off the stage. The Scribe or Lawyer took his place. In the 1st cent. of our era he had become antipathetic to Prophetism. So he had no sympathy with John the Baptist, and to the meaning of the creative force in spiritual things brought into history by the Saviour he was totally blind. Hence our Lord's fearful denunciation of the Scribes (Mt 23). See also art. PHARISEES and SADDUCEES.

SCRIP.—See BAG.

SCRIPTURE.—1. The word 'Scripture' (Lat. scriptura, 'a writing,' 'something written') is used for the Bible as a whole, more often in the plural form 'Scriptures,' and also more properly for a passage of the Bible. It appears as tr. of the Greek graphē, which is used in the singular for a portion of the OT (e.g. Mk 12¹⁰), and also for the whole OT (Gal 3²²), and more frequently in the plural (hagiographai). The specific idea of Scripture contains an element of sanctity and authority. Thus it becomes usual to refer to Holy Scripture, or the Holy Scriptures (en graphais hagiatis, Ro 1²).

2. This specific conception of Scripture as distinguished from ordinary writing is due to the reception of it as a record of the word of God, and is therefore associated with inspiration. The earliest reference to any such record is in the narrative of the finding of the Book of the Law by Hilkiah the scribe in the time of Josiah (2 K 22⁵). Since this book is now known to have been Deuteronomy or part of it, we must reckon that this was the first book treated as Scripture. Still greater sanctity was given to the enlarged and more developed Law in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, and from that time the whole Pentateuch, regarded as the Law given by God to Moses, is treated as especially sacred and authoritative. The special function of the scribes in guarding and teaching the Law rested on this Scriptural character attached to it, and in turn rendered it the more venerable as Scripture. Later the reception of the Hagiographa and the Prophets into the Canon led to those collections being regarded also as Scripture, though never with quite the authority attached to the Law.

The Rabbis cherished great veneration for Scripture, and ascribed to it a mechanical inspiration which extended to every word and letter. Philo also accepted plenary inspiration, finding his freedom from the bondage of the letter in allegorical interpretations.

Unlike the Jerusalem Rabbis, in this respect followed by most of the NT writers, who quote the various OT authors by name, Philo quotes Scripture as the immediate word of God, and in so doing is followed by the author of Hebrews. Thus, while St. Mark says, 'as it is written in Isaiah, the prophet' (Mk 1²), and St. Paul, 'David saith' (Ro 11⁹), in Hebrews we read, 'He (i.e. God) saith' (He 1⁷), 'the Holy Ghost saith' (3⁶), or, more indefinitely, 'it is said' (3¹¹), which is quite in the manner of Philo. Still, the technical expression 'It is written' (gegraptas) is very common both in the Gospels and in St. Paul's Epistles. As a Greek perfect, it has the peculiar force of a present state resulting from a past action. Thus it always conveys the thought that Scripture, although it was written long ago, does not belong to the past, but is in existence to-day, and its inherent present authority is thus emphasized as that of a law now in force. The impersonal character of the passive verb also adds dignity to the citation thus introduced, as something weighty on its own account.

3. No NT writings during the Apostolic age are treated as Scripture—a title, with its associated authority, always reserved by the Apostles for the OT. There is an apparent exception in 2 P 3¹⁶, where the Epistles of 'our beloved brother Paul' are associated with 'the other scriptures'; but this is a strong argument in favour of assigning 2 Pet. to a late period in the second century. Apart from this, we first meet with the technical phrase 'it is written' attached to a NT passage in Barn. iv. 4; but here it is a Gospel citation of a saying of Christ: 'As it is written, Many are called but few chosen.' Thus the authority of Christ's words leads to the record of them being cited as Scripture. In Polycarp (Phil. xii. 1) we have the title 'Scripture' applied to the source of a NT quotation, but only in the Latin tr. (his scripturis). In 2 Clem. ii. 4 a saying of Christ is cited as Scripture. But, apart from these rare instances, no writer previous to the second half of the second century appears to the NT as technically Scripture. Clement of Rome, Barnabas (with the one exception referred to) Hermas and even Justin Martyr use the title for the OT only. Theophilus of Antioch (c. 180) cites passages from St. Paul as 'the Divine word' (ad auto. iii. 14). Irenaeus (180), on the other hand, constantly treats NT passages as the word of God and authoritative Scripture. For an explanation of this remarkable development, see CANON OF NT.

SCURVY.—See MEDICINE, p. 599.

SCYTHIANS.—A wandering race of the Indo-European stock who lived between the Danube and the Don, and spread over the territory between the Caucasus and the Caspian. They were a cruel and savage people, of huge build. The Athenians employed them as police. In Col 3¹ they are mentioned as a degree worse than barbarians. The latter word simply connoted those who spoke neither Greek nor Latin. A. SOUTER.

SCYTHOPOLIS.—See BETH-SHEAN.

SEA in Scripture generally means the Mediterranean, where the context introduces no distinction by which the particular sea is defined, e.g. in Nu 33⁶, Jos 24¹¹, etc. The Great Sea is the Mediterranean (Nu 34⁶, Ezk 47¹⁰ etc.). 'The Sea of the Arabah' is the Dead Sea (2 K 14²⁵ etc.). The 'Sea of Chinnereth' is the Sea of Galilee (Nu 34¹¹ etc.). The 'Sea of the Philistines' is the Mediterranean off the Philistine coast (Ex 23¹). Yām Sāph, 'Sea of Weeds' (Ex 10⁵ etc.), is identical with 'the Red Sea' of He 11²⁹, Jth 5¹² etc., and is always so translated. The Nile, as in modern Arabic (el Bahr), is called 'the sea' (Is 18² etc.), so also the Euphrates (Is 21¹, Jer 51²⁵). 'The sea' of Jazer is a scribal error (Jer 48²²; cf. Is 16⁹). yām, 'sea', is the usual word for 'West'; the Mediterranean forming the W. boundary of Palestine (Gn 12⁸ etc.). The phrase 'from sea to sea' (Am 8¹² etc.) probably signified the ends of the earth. The influence of the Babylonian myth of the conflict of the gods with the primeval sea may be traced in certain Scripture representations of the sea (Job 7¹² etc.). See art. 'Cosmogony' in Hastings' DB. Tēhōm (EV 'deep') of Gn 1² etc. resembles the Bab. Tiāmat. By the dismemberment of this monster the ordered world is produced (Gn 1⁶). The turbulent and dangerous character of the sea is often referred to in Scripture (Ps 46³, 89¹, Is 17¹, Jer 49²³ etc.). From the sea came up the monsters of Daniel's vision (7²); so also in the Apocalypse (13¹). If in the literature of the Hebrews there is manifest a certain horror of, and shrinking from, the sea, which seem strange to a seafaring people we must remember that, as a nation, Israel never knew the sea; nor need we wonder if, viewed from their mountain heights, stretching vast and mysterious into the far horizons, it seemed to them the very home of storms and vague terrors. So when the Jewish seer depicts the future home of the blessed there is 'no more sea' (Rev 21¹). Cf. DUALISM, 1. RAHAB, 2. W. EWING.

SEA OF GLASS.—One of the features of the heavenly landscape described in Rev 4⁶ 15². By its side stood those who had been victorious in the struggle with the beast, singing to the glory of God. Its location was apparently before the throne of God. Just what the symbolism here intended is, it is difficult to state. The probability is, however, that there is no distinct symbolism whatever, but that the reference is rather to the brilliancy of the waters as one element in the supremely beautiful land of heaven. SEAH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, II.

SEAL, SIGNET.—The existence of seals is attested for the early dynasties of Egypt, and for an equally remote period in the history of Babylonia. The first mention of a seal in the OT is in connexion with the patriarch Judah, who fared forth with his staff in his hand and his seal hung round his neck by a cord (Gn 38¹⁸ RV), precisely as was the custom of every Babylonian gentleman in the days of Herodotus (i. 195). The seals hitherto found in Palestine show little initiative on the part of the Hebrews in this branch of the fine arts, the great majority plainly showing the predominant influence of Egypt, or to a less extent of Babylonia.

As regards material, almost every variety of precious stone was used for this purpose, although ordinary limestone, and even baked clay, were used by those who could afford nothing better. An almost equal wealth of form is attested by the extant seals. Thus the scarab and the scaraboid forms were distinctive of Egypt, as the cylinder was of Babylonia. Other seals, again, were conical in shape, while the square form is not unknown.

Most of the extant seals bearing evidence of a Hebrew origin, however, are oval in outline. This was also the usual form for seals intended to be set in the bezel of a ring. In this case it was customary to wear the ring on one of the fingers of the right hand (Jer 22²⁴; cf. Gn 41⁴²). The distinctively Jewish type of seal is marked by two features: (a) the absence of figures, Divine or human, in the field, and (b) the presence of two parallel lines, set close together, which cross the field longitudinally, and divide the inscription into two parts. The legend, as a rule, contains the name of the owner, preceded by the preposition signifying 'belonging to'—thus '[the property] of X, the son of Y,' or 'of M, the daughter of N,' for women also had their seals. Many seals, however, whose owners, to judge from their names, were Hebrews, bear figures and symbols in the field, one of them showing the earliest example of the so-called 'shield of David.'

Another of this class is the finest known specimen of a Hebrew seal. It is of jasper, and oval in shape; the greater part of the field is occupied by a lion, of the most delicate workmanship in the Babylonian style, while above and below is the legend: '[The property] of Shema, the servant [i.e. court official] of Jeroboam.' This seal was discovered in 1904 during the German excavations on the site of the ancient Megiddo, and is fully described by Kautsch in MNDPV 1904, i. 14, 81–83; cf. Lidsbarski, Ephemeris f. Sem. Epigraphic, ii. 140 ff., where other seals are also discussed; and PEFS 1904, 287 ff., with reproductions of the size of the original and enlarged. It is impossible to decide whether or not the Shema of the Megiddo seal is identical with the original owner of another seal of the same severe type above described, the legend of which runs: '[the property] of Shema, the servant of the king.'

A series of excellent reproductions of typical seals found in Palestine is given by Benzinger in his Heb. Arch. [1907], 82, 179 f., 225-230, while a collection of twenty seal inscriptions, dating from 9th-6th cent. B.C., with ample references, will be found in Lidzbarski's Altsemit. Texte, part i., 10 f.

The engraving of seals was done by means of a graver with a diamond point (Jer 17¹). Ben-Sira (c. B.C. 180-175) makes honourable mention of them 'that cut gravings of signets' (Sir 38²⁷ RV).

As regards the varied uses of the seal in antiquity, one of the most important was to authenticate written documents (1 K 21⁸, Jer 32^{10f.}), after the manner of a modern signature (cf. Neh 10¹). A roll or other document intended for preservation was sealed up before it was parted with (Dn 12⁹); the seals, accordingly, had to be broken before it could be read (Rev 6³ etc.). In the ordinary business of life sealing was continually employed as a precaution against a deposit of any sort being tampered with by unauthorized persons. Wine jars, for example, invariably had their stoppers covered with soft clay, on which the owner impressed his seal. Such impressions are referred to in Job 38¹⁴.

Newberry in his Scarabs illustrates the Egyptian (and doubtless Hebrew) practice of sealing doors by means of a piece of string attaching the door to the jamb, and sealed with a clay seal. Darius' 'den of lions' (Dn 6¹⁷) and the sepulchre of our Lord (Mt 27⁶⁶) were both in all probability sealed in this way by means of a cord which passed over the stone covering the entrance, and was sealed at either end by a lump of clay impressed with one or more seals (cf. Dn. l.c.).

From the universal use of the seal in ratifying and authenticating documents, and safeguarding deposits, the writers both of the OT and of the NT have derived a rich variety of figures. Thus, in Dn 9²⁴, sealing is a figure for the ratification of prophecy; in Jn 6²⁷ the figure is based on the public acknowledgment of the seal as one nowadays acknowledges one's signature. St. Paul's converts, again, are the 'seal' of his Apostleship (1 Co 9²), in other words, they authenticate his status and mission as a true Apostle. As a document or vessel, finally, is sealed up until the time for opening it arrives, so the Christian believer is sealed by the Holy Spirit 'unto the day of redemption' (Eph 4³⁰; cf. 1¹³, 2 Co 1²). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SEAMEW.—See CUCKOW.

SEA-MONSTER.—See DRAGON, LEVIATHAN, RAHAB, SEA.

SEBA.—The eldest son of Cush in Gn 10⁷ (1 Ch 1⁹), named along with Sheba in Ps 72¹⁰, and with Egypt and Cush in Is 43³ 45¹⁴. In the latter passage its people are referred to as of high stature. A comparison with Is 18² points to a supposed connexion with the tall Cushites or Nubians, though there is no evidence which directly associates either the people or the country with Nubia proper, in the region of the Nile. More specific seem to be the references by Strabo and Ptolemy to a seaport Saba and Sabat, near the modern Mawsowa on the west of the Red Sea. This location, nearly opposite the ancient Sheba, gives some colour to the hypothesis that Seba is an African differentiation of Sheba (wh. see), the latter being naturally the parent community. J. F. MCCURDY.

SEBAM.—A place in the east-Jordan territory of Reuben (Nu 32⁹). In all the other passages (Nu 32¹⁸, Jos 13¹¹, Is 16⁸, Jer 48²⁷) the name appears in the fem. form Sibmah. The 'vine of Sibmah' is mentioned by Isaiah and Jeremiah as one of the possessions of Moab on which destruction was to fall. The place has been located near Heshbon. H. L. WILLETT.

SECACAH.—A town mentioned (Jos 15⁴⁷) among the possessions of Judah 'in the wilderness' (midbār). It was probably in the rocky district above the W. shore of the Dead Sea. H. L. WILLETT.

SECHENIAS.—1. 1 Es 8²⁰—Shecaniah, Ezr 8². 2. 1 Es 8²²—Shecaniah, Ezr 8⁴.

SECOND COMING.—See PAROUSIA.

SECT.—See HERESY.

SECU.—A place name which appears only in the late narrative of 1 S 19²² in connexion with Ramah, Samuel's home, and especially with the 'great cistern' or 'well of the threshing-floor.' Perhaps the name represents a word in the original best rendered 'the height,' referring to the highest part of the town of Ramah. H. L. WILLETT.

SECUNDUS.—A man of Thessalonica who accompanied St. Paul on his journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20⁴), perhaps as a delegate to carry alms from his city. The Greek of the verse is obscure, but the meaning probably is that Aristarchus and Secundus and those mentioned afterwards went direct to Troas from Corinth and waited there for the Apostle, who came with Sopater by way of Macedonia. See SOPATER. A. J. MACLEAN.

SECURE.—To be secure, in the language of AV, does not mean to be free from danger; it means not to anticipate danger. Thus, Jg 8¹¹ 'Gideon smote the host, for the host was secure.' The vb. 'to secure' occurs in Mt 28¹⁴ 'And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you,' where the Greek means literally make you free from care, i.e. make it all right for you.

SEDEKIAS.—1. An ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1¹) 2. 1 Es 1⁶, Bar 1¹—Zedekiah (wh. see), king of Judah.

SEDUCTION.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

SEED, SEEDTIME (Heb. zera'; Gr. sperma, sporos, spora).—1. Literal.—(a) Vegetable (Gn 1¹¹ 8²⁷ etc.). See AGRICULTURE, § 1. (b) Animal (Lv 15¹⁰⁻¹³ etc.). 2. Metaphorical.—(a) Offspring, race, family (Gn 3¹⁶ 9¹² etc.; Mk 12²⁶, Lk 1³⁴, Jn 7⁴ etc.). In NT it is especially frequent in the phrase 'the seed of Abraham'—a favourite Pauline equivalent for 'Israel' (cf. Ro 1¹, 2 Co 1¹²). In Gal 3¹⁶ St. Paul argues from the use of the sing. 'seed' instead of the plur. 'seeds' in Gn 13¹⁴ 17⁸, that the Messiah in person is denoted and not Abraham's progeny in general. As a proof the argument has no force, for the same word zera' occurs in the sing. form in every passage in the OT where it expresses the idea of offspring. It is a verbal subtlety due to the Apostle's Rabbinical training. But the argument as a whole is independent of this grammatical refinement. St. Paul's meaning is that the Messiah was clearly in view in the promises made to Abraham. Israel was the type of Christ, and in Him the seed of Abraham was summed up. From this follows that further extension of the fig. 'seed of Abraham' to denote those united to Christ by faith (Gal 3⁷⁻²⁹), the spiritual Israel or 'Israel of God' (Ro 2²⁹, Gal 6¹⁶). (b) Vital energy. In 1 Jn 3⁹ 'seed' denotes the indwelling principle of the Divine life by which the Christian is kept from sin. J. C. LAMBERT.

SEER.—See pp. 413*, 757^b.

SEETHE.—This verb, which means to boil, occurs occasionally in AV, especially in the command (Ex 23¹⁸ etc.), 'Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk.' The past tense was sod, as Gn 25²² 'Jacob sod pottage'; and the past part. sodden, as La 4¹⁰ 'The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children.'

SEGUB.—1. The youngest son of Hiel who re-built Jericho (1 K 16³⁴). He died, or was possibly sacrificed by his father, when the gates were set up. See HOUSE, p. 369*. 2. Son of Hezron (1 Ch 2²¹).

SEIR.—1. The name of a mountainous district east of the 'Arabah, peopled by the Edomites. It was originally occupied by Horites or 'cave-dwellers' (Gn 14⁶). Mt. Seir is practically synonymous with

SEIRAH

Edom (cf. Gn 32¹ 'the land of Seir, the field of Edom'). 2. 'Mt. Seir' mentioned in Jos 15¹⁰ among the points defining the boundaries of Judah. The name may still be preserved in that of the ruins at Sarts, S'AW, of Kiriath-jearim.

SEIRAH.—The place to which Ehud escaped after killing Eglon, king of Moab (Jg 3²⁰); unidentified.

SELA means 'rock,' 'cliff,' or 'crag,' and as a common noun is of frequent occurrence in Hebrew. In three or four passages (Jg 1², 2 K 14⁷, Is 16¹, and, according to some, Is 42¹¹) the word appears to be a proper name. In Jg 1² a site near the southern end of the Dead Sea is required by the context. Such a site would also satisfy the requirements of 2 K 14⁷ and Is 16¹. But it is not improbable that more than one place was known as 'the Cliff (or Crag)'. It is therefore not impossible, though far from certain, that the Sela of 2 K 14⁷ (cf. JOKTHEEL) and Is 16¹ is, as RVm in the latter passage suggests, and as many have held, the place known later as Petra (which also means 'rock'). Petra lay about 50 miles nearly due south of the Dead Sea, in a valley 'enclosed on every side by nearly perpendicular rocks of considerable height' and 'composed of sandstone of many different colours.' It was the capital of the Nabatæans from the close of the 4th cent. B.C. to the beginning of the 2nd cent. A.D. (when it became a Roman province), and during that period a busy commercial centre. For some description of the buildings of Petra and the rock architecture which have given the city great fame, see Bædeker's Palestine, p. 206, and the literature there cited. 'The general character of the buildings at Petra is that of the debased Roman style of the 3rd and 4th centuries A.D.' Apart from the Biblical statements enumerated above, the history of Petra before the Nabatean period is unknown.

G. B. GRAY.

SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH.—A rock or cliff in the wilderness of Maon, at which Saul 'returned from pursuing after David' (1 S 23²⁹). The site is uncertain.

SELAH.—A Heb. liturgical-musical term of uncertain meaning. It occurs (a) in the OT, (b) in the Psalms of Solomon, and (c) in the Jewish (Synagogue) Liturgy.

In the OT the term occurs 74 times altogether in the Heb. text, viz. 71 times in the Psalter, and 3 in the Prayer of Habakkuk (Hab 3). In the Gr. tr. of the OT (the LXX) the Gr. equivalent (diapsalma) does not always appear in the same places as in the Heb. text; the number of occurrences is also rather larger in the LXX. Possibly in some cases 'Selah' has fallen out of the Massoretic text accidentally. In the Psalms of Solomon 'Selah' occurs twice (17² and 18¹⁰), and in the oldest parts of the Jewish Liturgy (apart from the canonical Psalms, which are incorporated in it) 5 times (3 in the 'Eighteen Blessings' and 2 in the morning Benedictions preceding the Shema).

Various explanations have been proposed as to the etymology and meaning of the term. Perhaps the least improbable of these is that which regards it as a liturgical direction intended to indicate the place for lifting up the voices in a doxology at the close of a section; such a doxology might have been sung at the end of a psalm or section of a psalm which liturgically was separated from the following (cf. the use of the 'Gloria' at the end of Psalms or [in the case of the 119th] at the end of sections of the Psalm in Christian worship). Or it may have been a direction to the orchestra—'Lift up! loud!'—to strike in with loud music (after the soft accompaniment to the singers' voices) during a pause in the singing. Other theories, such as that it represents a Heb. transliteration of a Greek word (e.g. psalle) or an abbreviation of three words, have little probability. The meaning of the LXX rendering (diapsalma) is as uncertain as that of the Heb. word itself.

G. H. BOX.

SELED.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 20³⁰).

SELF-SURRENDER

SELYMIA.—One of Ezra's swift scribes (2 Es 14²⁰).

SELYMIAS (1 Es 9²⁴)—Shelemiah, Ezr 10²³.

SELEUCIA, on the coast of Syria, at the mouth of the river Orontes, was the port of the great Antioch. It was strongly fortified. Situated on the S. side of Mt. Pieria, and on the level ground at its foot, it was protected on three sides both naturally and by fortifications. It was captured by Ptolemy Euergetes (1 Mac 11⁵), and afterwards recovered (in B.C. 219) by Antiochus the Great. Its greatness increased in Roman times. Then it was a 'free city.' Commercially its importance in the Levantine trade was of the highest. Extensive remains of the ancient city exist. A. SOUTER.

SELEUCUS.—1. Seleucus I. (Nikator), originally a cavalry officer of Alexander the Great, became satrap of Babylon on the death of the king. After some vicissitudes his position there was securely established in B.C. 312, from which date the Seleucid era was reckoned (1 Mac 1¹⁰). The battle of Ipsus, B.C. 301, made him master of Syria and great part of the East. He founded Antioch and its fortified port Seleucia (1 Mac 11⁵), and is said by Josephus (Ant. xii. iii. 1) to have conferred on the Jews the privileges of citizenship. He is the 'one of his [i.e. the king of Egypt's] princes' (Dn 11¹⁹). He died B.C. 280.—2. Seleucus II. (Callinicus, B.C. 246–226), son of Antiochus Soter, is entitled the 'king of the north' in the passage (Dn 11^{7,2}) which alludes to the utter discomfiture of the Syrian king and the capture of Seleucia.—3. Seleucus III. (Ceraunus, B.C. 226–223), 'one of his [Seleucus II.'s] sons' (Dn 11¹⁹), was murdered during a campaign in Asia Minor: the struggle with Egypt was continued by his brother Antiochus (Dn 11^{19,10}).—4. Seleucus IV. (Philopator; but Jos., Ant. xii. iv. 10, calls him Soter), son of Antiochus The Great, reigned B.C. 187–176. He it was who despatched Heliodorus to plunder the Temple (2 Mac 3^{1–40}, cf. Dn 11²⁰).—5. Seleucus V. (B.C. 125–124) and VI. (B.C. 95–93) are not of importance to the Biblical student. The four first-named belong to the 'ten horns' of Dn 7²⁴. J. TAYLOR.

SELF-CONTROL.—See TEMPERANCE.

SELF-SURRENDER.—1. The military metaphor underlying the idea of 'surrendering oneself' is suggestive. The keys of the citadel of self are handed over to the rightful Lord, whose most powerful weapons of attack have been the entreaties of His love. The surrender is not for demolition, but for restoration in beauty and strength. It is a voluntary act, implying the 'presenting' of ourselves unto God, and involving the 'presenting' of our 'members as instruments of righteousness unto God' (Ro 6¹⁹, cf. 12¹). A similar conception finds expression in the Gr. word (hypotassethai) which RV tr. 'to be subject to,' lit. 'to set oneself under.' The proof that in 'the mind' the ruling element is not 'flesh' but 'spirit' is the absence of hostility to God; this state of 'life and peace' is the result of 'subjecting oneself to the law of God' (Ro 8⁴; cf. 10⁴, Ja 4⁷). In He 12⁹ this unreserved surrender of ourselves to God is represented as the only worthy recognition of His absolute claims, and as, therefore, thoroughly consistent with a due regard to the development of our own personality. To 'be in subjection to the Father of spirits' is indeed to 'live.' 'Such absolute subjection is crowned by the highest blessing. True life comes from complete self-surrender' (Westcott, Com., in loc.).

2. It depends upon the point of view whether the Christian ideal of life is described as the life of self-surrender or as the life of self-development. Repentance and faith are alike acts in which, at one and the same time, self-will is surrendered and the higher self is realized.

'Our wills are ours, we know not how,
Our wills are ours to make them Thine.'

Our self-surrender is the condition of the Divine co-operation; His working in us 'both to will and to do' enables us to respond to the exhortation: 'work out your own salvation' (Ph 2¹²). 'Every real sacrifice is at the same time self-preservation, namely, preservation of the ideal self' (Paulsen, System of Ethics, p. 248). 'To yield oneself up as the organ of a higher spirit which disposes of us as may be fit constitutes the mystic ideal of perfect life' (Martineau, Types of Ethical Theory, ii. 273). The open secret of that life is revealed in St. Paul's profound words: 'I have been crucified with Christ, and it is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2²⁰). J. G. TASKER.

SEMACHIAH.—A Korahite family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26⁷). Perhaps the same name should be substituted for Ismachiah in 2 Ch 31¹⁴.

SEMEI (1 Es 9²²) = Shimei, Ezr 10²².

SEMEIAS (Ad. Est 11²) = Shimei, Est 2⁴.

SEMEIN.—The father of Mattathias (Lk 3²⁸).

SEMEIS (1 Es 9²²) = Shimei, Ezr 10²².

SENAAH.—The children of Senaah, or more correctly Hassenaah, were a clan or family who, according to Ezr 2²⁴, Neh 7²⁴, 1 Es 5²² [Sanaas], were among the exiles of the first Restoration under Zerub., and had a share in re-building the walls (Neh 3²). They are elsewhere unknown, unless they should be identified with Hassenuah, a clan of Benjamin (1 Ch 9⁷, Neh 11²). The latter would then be the correct reading. Other conjectures are less probable. J. F. McCURDY.

SENATE is the tr. of Gr. gerousia in Ac 5²¹, where 'all the senate of the children of Israel' is intended to explain the preceding 'council' (synedrion). See SANHEDRIN. It is the Jewish 'senate' that is meant likewise in 2 Mac 11⁴, 4⁴. The Roman senate is alluded to in 1 Mac 8¹⁷.

SENEH.—One of the steep cliffs forming the walls of the gorge of Michmash, where Jonathan's exploit occurred (1 S 14¹¹). The name may signify 'tooth,' though this is uncertain. The precise cliffs, called respectively Senah and Bozez, are not identified.

H. L. WILLETT.

SENIER.—The name of Hermion among the Amorites, according to Dt 3², but in Ca 4² and 1 Ch 5²² distinguished from Hermion. It was famous for its large fir-trees (Ezk 27²). This Amoritic name was, naturally enough, the one in vogue among the Babylonians and Assyrians. In Deut. it appears, like Hermion and Sirion, to designate the whole of Anti-Lebanon. When taken more strictly, it stood, we may assume, for the northern portion. The Arab geographers gave the name to that part of the range lying between Baalbek and Homs.

J. F. McCURDY.

SENNACHERIB (Assyr. Sin-akh-er-ba, i.e. 'Sin [the Moon-god] has increased the brothers'), son of Sargon, succeeded him on the throne of Assyria, on the 12th of Ab, b.c. 705. He was at once faced by troubles in Babylon, where Merodach-baladan had re-established himself. Sennacherib expelled him and placed Belibni of the Babylonian seed royal on the throne as a vassal king. After wars against the Kassites and Elamites in b.c. 701, Sennacherib set out to reduce the West to order. The king of Tyre fled to Cyprus, Sidon and the rest of Phœnicia were taken or submitted, and placed under a king Ethbaal. Ashdod, Ammon, Moab, Edom sent tribute. Ashkelon and Ekron were captured, and Hezekiah had to restore Padi to the throne of Ekron after keeping him some time in prison. The Egyptians and their allies who had moved to support Hezekiah were defeated at Eltekeh. Then Sennacherib devastated Judea, capturing 46 cities and 200,150 prisoners. Hezekiah seems to have attempted to bribe him to retreat, sending immense tribute to Sennacherib while he was besieging Lachish. Lachish fell, and the Tartan, the Rab-shakeh and Rab-saris were sent to demand the surrender of Jerusalem (2 K 19³²). The miraculous dispersion of his army compelled Sennacherib to retreat without accomplishing the capture of Jerusalem. There is some reason to think that the Biblical accounts refer partly to a second campaign of Sennacherib after b.c. 690. His annals, however, do not extend so far. Troubles in Babylonia led him to recall Belibni and set his own son Ashur-nadin-shum on the throne. He then had once more to expel Merodach-baladan from Lower Babylonia. Building a fleet on the Tigris and Euphrates, he pursued the Chaldaean to the mouth of the Eulæus, and there captured and destroyed the Chaldaean stronghold, thus invading Lower Elam. He was too far from his base, and the Elamites fell on his rear and captured Babylon, carried off Ashur-nadin-shum to Elam, making a Chaldaean Nergal-ushêzib king in his stead; b.c. 694. The Assyrians soon re-asserted their supremacy, but a fresh rebellion placed a Babylonian on the throne of Babylon. In b.c. 691 Sennacherib brought both Elamites and Babylonians to bay at Khalule. Two years later he invaded Elam. In b.c. 689 Babylon was captured and razed to the ground. From that time till b.c. 681, when Sennacherib was murdered (2 K 19³⁷), we have no history of his reign. His great achievement was the creation of Nineveh as a metropolis of the Empire. He built the great palace of Kouyunjik and the great wall of Nineveh. Cf. ADRAMMELECH. C. H. W. JOHNS.

SEORIM.—The name of the fourth priestly course (1 Ch 24⁴).

SEPARATION, WATER OF.—See RED HEIFER.

SEPHAR.—Mentioned as a boundary of the descendants of Joktan in Gn 10³⁰. The most probable identification is that with Zafar, the ancient capital of the Himyarites, which is probably the seaport of Hadramaut of the same name (see HAZARMAVETH).

J. F. McCURDY.

SEPHARAD.—A country in which was a community of exiles from Judah in the days of the prophet Obadiah (Ob²⁰). It is probably to be understood as Sparda (Çparda), a Persian province of Asia Minor, not definitely treated in its earliest use, but in the time of the Seleucids employed for Asia Minor as a whole. Cf. OBADIAH, p. 664^b.

J. F. McCURDY.

SEPHARVAIN.—1. A city mentioned in 2 K 18¹⁸ (Is 36¹⁹) and 19¹² (Is 37¹²) as among those captured by the Assyrians, all apparently in Syria. Probably it answers to the Shabara'in named in the Babylonian Chronicle as taken just before the fall of Samaria. Sibraim of Ezk 47¹⁶ may then be the same city. 2. A word of exactly the same form as the above occurs in 2 K 17²⁴⁻²⁵ as the name of a place whose inhabitants were deported to Samaria. The context favours the supposition that the famous city Sippar in North Babylonia is intended. Probably the similarity between the words led some early copyist to write Sepharvaim by mistake. J. F. McCURDY.

SEPTUAGINT.—See GREEK VERSIONS OF OT, § 1.

SEPULCHRE.—See TOMB.

SERAH.—A daughter of Asher (Gn 46¹⁷, Nu 26⁴⁶ (20), 1 Ch 7²⁰).

SERAIAH.—1. (2 S 8¹⁷) See SHAVSHA. 2. High priest in the reign of Zedekiah. He was put to death, with other distinguished captives, by order of Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, 2 K 25¹⁸⁻²¹, Jer 52²¹⁻²⁷. He is mentioned in the list of high priests, 1 Ch 6¹⁴. Ezra claimed descent from him, Ezr 7¹ (1 Es 8¹ Azarias, 2 Es 1¹ Saraias). His name occurs also in 1 Es 5⁵ Saraias. 3. One of 'the captains of the forces' who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 K 25²², Jer 40⁶). 4. Second son of Kenaz father of Joab, and brother of Othniel (1 Ch 4¹³, 14). 5. Grandfather of Jehu, a prince of Simeon (1 Ch 4²⁸). 6. One of the twelve leaders who returned with Zerubabel, Ezr 2²—Neh 7⁷ Azariah, 1 Es 5⁵ Saraias.

SERAPHIM

7. A priestly clan (Neh 10¹¹ 12¹², 1 Es 5⁸ = 1 Ch 9¹¹ Asariah). 8. One of those sent to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36²). 9. Son of Neriah and brother of Baruch (Jer 51⁵⁹⁻⁶⁰). He held the office of sar menāchāh (AV 'a quiet prince,' mg. 'or prince of Menucha or chief chamberlain'; RV 'chief chamberlain,' mg. 'or quartermaster').

SERAPHIM.—The seraphim are mentioned only in a single passage of Scripture (Is 6²). In his inaugural vision, Isaiah sees these supernatural creatures grouped about Jehovah's throne in His heavenly palace. The prophet furnishes no elaborate description of the form of these beings, and apparently assumes that his readers will be able to fill in what he omits; but he does make clear that they are six-winged creatures. With one pair of wings they hover around Jehovah's throne; and with the other two they cover their faces and their feet,—actions symbolical of humility and adoration. The seraphim are arranged in an antiphonal choir, singing the Trisagion, and their chorus is of such volume that the sound shakes the foundations of the palace. In the prophet's vision they have human voices and hands (v. 6), but it cannot be asserted with equal certainty that they possess human bodies. The prophet leaves us in no doubt about the function of these creatures. They are ministers of Jehovah, occupied in singing the praises of their Sovereign, and in protecting Him from the approach of sin and evil. The seraphim may be traced in the imagery and symbolism of the NT Apocalypse, where the four living creatures, in both their function and their form, are a combination of the seraphim with the cherubim of Ezekiel's vision (cf. Is 6², Ezk 1, 2, and Rev 4⁶).

It was customary with the prophets to transform and purify popular conceptions, by bringing them into relation with their ethical idea of God. The seraphim are an illustration of this process. The popular mythical seraphim were a personification of the serpent-like flash of lightning. The usage and meaning of the singular sārāph (= 'fiery serpent,' Nu 21⁶, Is 14²⁹), as well as the etymology of the word, suggest this view of the origin of the seraphim. The later Jewish tradition, according to which they are serpents, points in the same direction (Enoch 20⁷ 61¹⁹ et al.). The brazen serpent, Nehushtan, which was removed from the Temple by Hezekiah, was a relic probably connected with the popular mythical conception, and it may have suggested the seraphim of the heavenly palace to Isaiah's mind.

Two other theories of the origin of the prophetic conception have been advanced, but there is little that can be said in their favour. Some would derive the name from the Babylonian Sharrapu, a name for Nergal the fire-god and consequently would regard the seraphim as the flames that enveloped this deity. Others have endeavoured to associate them with the Egyptian griffins (seriff), half-lion and half-eagle, which are represented as guardians of graves. According to the latter view, the duty of guarding the threshold of the Temple would be the function that must be assigned to the seraphim of Isaiah's vision. In criticism, it may be remarked that the Egyptian griffin is more akin to the Hebrew cherub, and the latter should be sharply distinguished from the seraph (cf. art. CHERUB). JAMES A. KELSO.

SERAR (1 Es 5²) = Sisera, Ezr 2⁵, Neh 7⁵⁴.

SERED.—A son of Zebulun (Gn 46¹⁴, Nu 26³⁸ (22) [gentilic name Seredites]).

SERGIUS PAULUS.—See PAULUS (SERGIUS).

SERJEANTS.—EV tr. in Ac 16³⁵⁻³⁸ of Gr. rhabdouchoi (= 'rod-bearers'), which represents the Lat. lictores (RVm lictores), officials whose duty it was to attend the Roman magistrates, to execute their orders, and especially to administer the punishments of scourging or beheading. For this purpose they carried, as their mark of office, the fusces, a bundle of rods with an axe inserted. Cf. art. PHILIPPI.

SERON.—A Syrian commander defeated by Judas Maccabæus at Beth-horon (1 Mac 3¹⁴ 34¹).

SERPENT, BRAZEN

SERPENT.—

1. nāchāsh, generic name (cf. Arab. chanash), Gn 3¹ etc.; the most commonly used word, occurs frequently.

2. 'eph'eh (root to 'groan' or 'hiss,' cf. Arab. af'a) is applied to the viper (Job 20¹⁶, Is 30⁶ 59⁶).

3. 'akshub, Ps 140³ 'adder.' The root meaning (cf. Arab. akasa) seems to be 'bending back,' as a serpent does before striking.

4. pethen, tr. 'asp,' Dt 32³³, Job 20⁴, Is 11⁵; tr. 'adder,' Ps 58⁴, where it is referred to as the favourite of the serpent-charmer.

5. shēphiphōn Gn 49¹⁷, tr. 'adder,' AVm 'arrowsnake,' RVm 'horned snake' (cf. Arab. sheffūn).

6. tsepha, Is 14²⁹, AV 'cockatrice,' RV 'basilisk,' EVm 'adder.'

7. tsiphō'ni, Pr 23³² 'adder'; Is 11⁵ 59⁶, Jer 8¹⁷, 'cockatrice,' RV 'basilisk,' mg. 'or adder.'

8. qippōz, Is 34¹⁵, AV 'great owl,' RV 'arrowsnake.' See Owl.

9. sārāph, Is 14²⁹ 30⁶ 'fiery serpent,' coupled with nāchāsh in Nu 21⁶, Dt 8¹⁵.

10. zōchālē 'āphār, Dt 32³⁴; zōchālē 'erets, Mic 7¹⁷; some creature that glides on or into the earth, probably therefore a serpent. Cf. WORM, 6.

11. tannin, tr. 'serpent,' Ex 7¹⁰⁻¹², RVm 'any large reptile'; Ps 91¹³, AV and RV 'dragon.' See DRAGON.

12. (Gr.) echidna—any poisonous serpent (Mt 3⁷ 12³⁴ 23³⁴, Lk 3⁷, Ac 28³).

Serpents are very common in the Holy Land and in the wilderness to the south. Over 30 species are known. Though the great majority are really harmless, all are dreaded by the natives, and several kinds are most deadly. Fatal snake bites are by no means uncommon; the writer knows of seven cases at first hand. The Egyptian cobra (Naja haji) is found, but fortunately is not common. It is the favourite with snake-charmers, and is very probably the pethen, tr. 'asp' in OT. It was held in much veneration by the ancient Egyptians, and a little bronze serpent recently found in the excavations of ancient Gezer—probably an object of worship in pre-Israelite times—was of this form. Another very dangerous snake is the horned sandsnake (Cerastes hasselquistii), supposed to be the 'asp of Cleopatra.' It lies in ambush (Gn 49¹⁷) in depressions of the road and bites the passer-by. It is called by the Arabs shiffūn, which corresponds to the Heb. shēphiphōn. Other poisonous Palestine snakes belonging, like the last mentioned, to the viper family are Vipera euphratica, V. ammodytes, Daboia xanthina—a large, nocturnal species—and the small Echis arenicola which haunts sandy deserts. These vipers are all included under the Heb. 'eph'eh (Arab. af'a). The viper of Ac 28³ was probably Vipera aspis, which is common on most of the larger isles of the Mediterranean, though extinct in Malta. The expression 'fiery serpent' probably refers to the burning sensation produced by the bite; in Ps 140³ their poison is supposed to reside in their tongues.

Some of the references to serpents do not apparently refer to any natural object. This view is taken in the translation in Is 14²⁹ of tsepha, and in Is 11⁵ 59⁶, Jer 8¹⁷ of tsiph'oni, where 'cockatrice' occurs in AV and 'basilisk' in RV. The former was, among early English writers, a creature with a head and body like a cock, but the tail of a serpent, with a sting at its extremity. The basiliskos of the LXX was probably the golden uraeus, the ornament of the royal headdress among the Egyptians. There is no clear reason why in the passages quoted the references should not be to an actual species of snake. The reference in Am 9² to the serpent (nāchāsh) at the bottom of the sea may have some reference to the Babylonian myth of Tiamat. See also DRAGON and LEVIATHAN. For the serpent of Gn 3 see FALL (4), and SATAN, p. 829^f.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

SERPENT, BRAZEN.—Nu 21⁹ relates that Moses was commanded by God to make a serpent of brass (or rather, of bronze) and to set it upon a standard (RV), that those who had been bitten by the serpents might look on it and be healed. This was in harmony with a wide-spread belief that the image of a hurtful thing drives the evil away. In the absence of a direct statement we cannot say whether it was Jahweh who was worshipped under the form of the bronze serpent of 2 K 18—the Nehushtan, or piece of bronze, as it was called. Some think it represented the Celestial Dragon, others the spirit of an ancestor, others a chthonic deity: Robertson Smith believed that it was the totem of David's house. There are traces of serpent-worship in Israel (1 K 18 Zohaleth = 'snake'; Neh 2³). The two points of comparison present to our Lord's mind in Jn 3¹⁴ are—(1) the lifting up of the serpent on the pole and Himself on the Cross, and (2) the voluntary looking of the Hebrews to the serpent—for the verb employed means more than simply seeing—and the faith of believers (see Sir 16⁵⁻⁷). J. TAYLOR.

SERUG.—Son of Reu (Gn 11²⁰. 22. 23, Lk 3³⁴).

SERVANT.—See next art. and SLAVE.

SERVANT OF THE LORD.—In this phrase, as repeatedly in the EV of the OT, 'Lord' is substituted for 'Jahweh,' the proper name of the God of Israel, which stands in the Hebrew text.

1. Originally the term 'servant' in this phrase is simply correlative to such terms as 'lord,' 'master,' which the ancient Hebrews, in common with their Semitic kinsmen, applied to their god. In the first instance, the phrase 'the servant of Jahweh' merely defines a man as one who acknowledges Jahweh as his god; it corresponds closely to what we might rather call a worshipper of Jahweh. Naturally, therefore, it may stand in antithesis to a similar phrase in which the name of another deity takes the place of that of Jahweh. Thus the 'servants of Jahweh' and 'the servants of the (Tyrian) Baal' are contrasted in 2 K 10², though the fact that the same word is used in both phrases is obscured by the RV, which exaggerates a distinction capriciously introduced by the punctuators into the Hebrew text.

2. Thus it will be readily understood that any Israelite might be called 'the servant of Jahweh,' and as a matter of fact a large number of individuals received this phrase as their name; it is familiar to English readers in the form Obadiah, which was originally pronounced, as the LXX indicates, Abdiyah (cf. the parallel name Abdiel—'servant of God'). Adherents of other gods received similar proper names, such as Ebed-melech (wh. sec) = 'servant of the god Melech,' or Abd-Melkarth, Abd-Eshmun, and Abd-Mandl, typical Phœnician and Nabatean names meaning respectively servant of the gods Melkarth, Eshmun, and Manāt.

3. But just as modern terms denoting religious attachment, like 'Christian' or 'believer,' may, according to the connexion in which they occur, differ greatly in the fulness of their meaning, so 'the servant of Jahweh' might imply a higher degree, or more special form, of service than is necessarily involved in the proper name Obadiah, or in the distinction between 'servants of Jahweh' and 'servants of Baal.' Such fuller significance attaches to the phrase when prophets (Am 3⁷, 2 K 9⁷, Jer 7², and often) or priests and Levites (Ps 134¹) are specified as 'the servant of Jahweh'; so also when particular individuals are thus described. Among the individuals specifically termed 'the servant of Jahweh' (which in speeches of Jahweh of course becomes 'my servant') are Abraham (Gn 26²⁴), Moses (Ex 14²⁸, Nu 12¹¹, and often), Joshua (Jos 24²⁹), Caleb (Nu 14²⁸), Job (Job 1¹), David (2 S 3¹⁸ and often), Eliakim (Is 22²⁰), Zerubbabel (Hag 2²), and the person who is termed 'the Shoot' (EV text 'the Branch,' Zec 3⁸).

4. The use of the term in Deutero-Isaiah (Is 40–55) is peculiar. In certain passages this writer clearly uses the term to describe the nation: the entire people is personified, spoken of as an individual, and called by Jahweh 'my servant,' or, by the prophet speaking in his own name, 'the servant of Jahweh.' These passages are 41⁸, 44², 49¹, 44¹, 45¹. The same use of the term is found in Ps 136², which was written much later; but it does not occur in any extant literature that is unquestionably earlier than the Deutero-Isaiah, for Jer 30¹⁰ (not found in the Greek text) = 46²⁷, is probably not a saying of the prophet Jeremiah's, and in Ezk 37²² 28²⁵, sometimes cited as parallel, the phrase is used of an individual of the past, the patriarch Jacob, not of the nation of the present.

5. But though the particular character of 'the servant of Jahweh' in which the nation is personified may be peculiar to the Deutero-Isaiah, and one or two writers influenced by him, similar personifications are common enough with Hebrew writers, and are sometimes so remote from our habits of thought and expression that the RV has sacrificed the figure to gain intelligibility, as, e.g., in Jos 9⁷, which, literally rendered, runs, 'and the man of Israel said unto the Hivite, perhaps thou art dwelling in my midst' (for further examples see G. B. Gray, Divine Discipline of Israel, 79 f., or 'Numbers,' in ICC p. 265 f.). Other notable instances of personification retained even in RV are Hos 11¹ 'When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt' (where son = the Hebrew nation), and Ps 129¹, where Israel is to say, 'Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth up, yet have they not prevailed against me. The plowers plowed upon my back; they made long their furrows.'

6. But while the personification of the nation as the 'servant of Jahweh' is certain in the passages cited in § 4, there are other passages in which most scholars in the past, and many of the present, have concluded that the title has another application—that it refers prophetically to Jesus Christ, or to some individual known historically to the writer, such as Jeremiah, Jehoiachin, Zerubbabel, or the Eleazar of 2 Mac 6¹⁸⁻²⁰, or to the pious section of Israel. In so far as this conclusion rests on the individualizing traits in the description of the servant in such passages as Is 50⁴ 52¹²⁻¹³, it is unconvincing; for the facts can be equally well, and, so far as the death, burial, and resurrection (cf. Ezk 37) of the servant are concerned, far better, explained by the analogy of the personifications referred to in the last paragraph, as figurative descriptions of the history of the nation in the past, and of the prophet's hopes for it in the future.

7. In one passage (Is 50¹⁰), indeed, 'the servant of Jahweh' is probably not the nation Israel; for the audience addressed appears to consist of Jews; if so, the servant here is either an individual or a comparatively small class—not the whole of the pious Israelites, for he is distinguished from 'those that fear Jahweh.' This passage is commonly considered to be the work of a later writer than the Deutero-Isaiah.

8. The most important differences of interpretation are concerned with four passages, 42¹⁻⁴ 49¹⁻⁶ 50⁴⁻⁹ 52¹²⁻¹³. These are commonly, though not unanimously, held to be the work of one writer, but several scholars hold that this writer was not the Deutero-Isaiah. The critical question is largely an exegetical one; if there really is the wide difference, which some claim to discover, between the use of the term 'servant of Jahweh' in, and the religious standpoints of, these passages and the Deutero-Isaiah, differences of authorship may not unnaturally be inferred; otherwise the grounds for disintegration are slight. Unfortunately the interpretation of the passages is rendered difficult and ambiguous by the state of the text; that the text is to some extent corrupt, especially in 52¹²⁻¹³, is now generally admitted; but as to the exact extent, and the nature of the corruption, differences of judgment prevail. No consistent interpretation of 'the servant of Jahweh' given in these four passages is possible on the basis of the present text; for in 49¹ the servant is identified with the nation, but in 53⁸ he is distinguished from the nation, for 'my people' (if the text be sound) cannot be made to mean anything but Israel except by very forced exegesis. Consequently, in the interests of consistency some scholars have struck out the word 'Israel' in 49^a, others have corrected 'the transgression of my people' in 53^a to 'our transgressions,' or 'their transgression,' or 'the transgression of peoples' (all comparatively slight changes in the Hebrew text). It may be observed that 53^a is in other respects admittedly obscure, if not also corrupt.

It must suffice to refer briefly here to one or two of the chief points for or against the two main alternatives—that in these passages, as elsewhere in Deutero-Isaiah, the servant is Israel, or something less than Israel (whether a section of the nation or an individual). We shall consider the latter alternative first.

(1) Two passages have been considered to demand a distinction between the servant and Israel. One of these, 53^a, as already stated, certainly does demand it, if the text be sound; but this is doubtful. The other passage is 49^a, which follows the statement in the present text that the servant is Israel (49^b). These verses as translated in RV imply that the servant and Israel are distinct. But though the translation of RV in v.^a is grammatically correct, it is not necessary; other grammatically correct translations are: 'and now Jahweh that formed me to be his servant hath determined to bring back Jacob again to himself, and that Israel should be gathered to him,' or 'and now saith Jahweh that formed me from the womb to be his servant in that he brought Jacob again to him, and drew Israel unto him.' Either of these translations allows of the identity of Israel and the servant. In v.^b RV is incorrect. The Hebrew is extremely awkward and questionable, but literally translated v.^b runs: '(a) lighter (thing) than thy being my servant is the raising up of the tribes of Jacob and the restoring of the preserved of Israel, and I will give thee for a light of the nations,' etc. The 'also' in 'I will also give' of RV, which suggests that the illumination of the nations is a second function of the servant, in addition to one already described, is absolutely unrepresented in and unsuggested by the Hebrew text. Thus v.^a is ambiguous as to the point at issue; it may mean (if it means anything) either, 'You do not exhaust your service by restoring Israel, you have also to illumine the nations; or, The fact that you are my servant means more than that I shall rescue you, it means that I shall make use of you for carrying out my purpose of illumining the nations.'

(2) Apart from the passages just discussed, which are either textually open to suspicion or ambiguous in meaning, there is nothing that directly forbids identifying the servant with Israel in 42^a, 49^a, 50^a, 52^a, 53^a, as he is unmistakably identified with Israel by the Deutero-Isaiah in many passages (see § 4). In the present text of 49^a the identification is actually made. But the strongest argument for the correctness of this identification is to be found in the fact that it does fuller justice to the general tenor of the passages: this is perfectly clear in 42^a; here the Divine speech and the writer's mind are alike filled with two subjects—the Servant and the Nations of the world; the servant is to instruct the nations in the religion of Jahweh: granted that the servant is Israel, we have here a constantly recurring contrast, Israel and the nations; otherwise Israel is totally disregarded. In 49^a the servant addresses the nations of the world, and the function of the servant, which on some interpretations (see above) alone is mentioned, and on any interpretation alone receives prominence, is that of spiritually illumining the nations; in 52^a–53^a Jahweh states that, as the past humiliation of the servant by its very extent attracted far-spread attention, so his coming exaltation will impress nations and kings. Here again, nothing is said of Israel, unless the servant is Israel. In 53^a certain speakers make a confession that they had misjudged the servant of Jahweh, terming him not the righteous one but a sinner, and regarding the unparalleled sufferings which they now perceive had been borne for them, as due to the fact that he was abandoned by Jahweh. Again, the least difficult view as to the speakers who make this confession is that they are the nations referred to in 52^a, and that the servant is the Hebrew nation. That Israel suffered for the nations is certainly a remarkable idea, but that all the sufferings of Israel were not due to its own sins appears to be the thought of Deutero-Isaiah in 40^a. Again, the relative righteousness of Israel, which is all that need be implied if we see in ch. 53 a confession of the nations, is implied elsewhere, e.g. in 40^a.

It is impossible even to indicate here all the difficulties that beset, or the points that favour, the several theories of interpretation. The case for identifying the servant with Israel throughout is 40–55 has been ably presented in English by K. Biddle in AJTh. iii, pp. 490 ff., and by A. S. Peake in The Problem of Suffering in the OT, pp. 34–72 and 180–193, who gives on pp. 44–50 a valuable critical translation of the chief passages. With equal ability the identification of the servant with the ideal Israel is maintained by J. Skinner in the Cambridge Bible for Schools, 'Isaiah xl.–lxvi.', pp. xxx–xxxvii. and 233–238, together with the notes on the relevant passages. The case for interpreting the servant in some passages as an individual has not been fully re-stated in English over against the recent thorough arguments for other interpretations; the student may best turn to Delitzsch's Com. (Eng. tr. 1890), or G. A. Smith's 'Isaiah', vol. ii. (Expositor's Bible). T. K. Cheyne, in EBI 4398–4410, offers a very valuable and penetrating criticism of all these theories, as a prelude to his own Jerahmeelite theory, for which he has hitherto found no supporters.

9. In NT some of the passages in the Deutero-Isaiah are frequently cited or referred to; and in most cases, though not in all (see Ac 13^a, cf. 2 Ti 2^a), the servant is identified with Jesus (e.g. Mt 8¹⁷ 12¹⁸⁻²¹, Lk 22³⁷, Ac 8²¹). This, of course, proves nothing with regard to the original meaning; for Christian, like Jewish, exegesis was capable of individualizing terms that originally had a wider application; for an instance of this, see He 2⁶⁻⁸, where what is stated in Ps 8 of man in general is referred specifically to our Lord. G. B. GRAY.

SESI (1 Es 9^a) = Shashai, Ezr 10^a.

SESTHEL (1 Es 9^a) = Bezalel, Ezr 10^a.

SET.—'Set at' is valued at, as 2 K 12^a 'The money that every man is set at.' 'Set at nought' means treat with contempt, as Lk 23¹¹ 'Herod with his men of war set him at nought.' 'Set by' is to value, esteem, as 1 S 18³⁰ 'His name was much set by.' 'Set to' means to affix, as Jn 3³ 'He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true.'

SETH.—The third son of Adam, Gn 4² (J) 5³ (P), 1 Ch 1¹, Lk 3³⁸. In the first of these passages J assigns a characteristic etymology for the name, Eve being made to say, 'God hath set (shāth) for me another seed instead of Abel,' for which reason she called him Shēth (i.e. 'setting' or 'slip'). In Sir 49^a Seth is coupled with Shem as 'glorified among men.'

SETHUR.—The Asherite spy (Nu 13¹³ ⁴⁰).

SETTLE (RVm 'ledge').—Ezk 43¹⁴ (only) as tr. of 'āzārāh, which is used of the two ledges between the base and the hearth of the altar.

SEVEN.—See NUMBER, § 7.

SEVENEH (Syene).—A town at the First Cataract, the southern extremity of Egypt proper: Eyp. Swn, now Assuan (Aswan). It lies on the east bank, opposite the island of Elephantine, where lay the capital of the first nome of Upper Egypt, and behind it are the celebrated granite quarries. 'From Migdol to Syene' is the correct tr. in Ezk 29¹⁰ 30^a, as LXX and RVm. At Syene-Elephantine there was a colony of Jews with a sumptuous temple of Yahu (Jehovah; cf. Is 19¹⁹) earlier than Cambyse's conquest in b.c. 525, and throughout the Persian occupation. For this we have the evidence of papyri written there in the Aramaic language.

SEVENTY

the dates of the documents hitherto found range from 471 to 410, in the reigns of Xerxes, Artaxerxes, and Darius II. One of these is a petition to Bagoas, the governor of Judea, for the re-building of the temple, which had been destroyed by the nations in 411. To this a favourable reply was given. But the temple was probably swept away in the final revolt of Egypt against the Persians about 405. Since the seventh century the frontier garrison against the Ethiopians had been posted there, and the military element predominated.

SEVENTY.—See NUMBER, § 1.

SHAALABBIN.—See next article.

SHAALBIM.—A town mentioned with Mt. Heres and Aijalon as being occupied by the Amorites (Jg 13¹⁰). It was, with Makaz and Beth-shemesh in the district of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4⁹); and if it be the same place as Shaalabbim, it is mentioned with Aijalon and Beth-shemesh in Jos 19⁴². It is probably identical with Shaalbon, the home of one of David's heroes, who is called 'the Shaalbonite' (2 S 23²⁴, 1 Ch 11²⁰). It may perhaps be identified with Selbit, about 8 miles N. of Beth-shemesh. Possibly Shaalbim should be read for Shaalim in 1 S 9⁴.

SHAALBON, SHAALBONITE.—See SHAALBIM.

SHAALIM, LAND OF.—See SHAALBIM.

SHAAPH.—1. The son of Jaddai (1 Ch 2⁴⁷). 2. A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Ch 2⁴⁹).

SHAARAIM.—1. A town of Judah, in the Shephelah, mentioned in Jos 15³⁴. Some identify it with Khurbet Sateh, west of Beth 'Atd; others with Zakariya. Shaaraim is perhaps mentioned again in the pursuit of the Philistines after the death of Goliath (1 S 17², RVm 'the two gates'). 2. A town of Simeon (1 Ch 4²¹); called Sharuben in Jos 19⁴, and Shilimi in Jos 15³².

SHAASHGAZ.—A chamberlain of Ahasuerus (Est 2¹⁴).

SHABBETHAI.—A Levite who opposed Ezra in the matter of the foreign marriages (Ezr 10¹⁶)—Sabbateus of 1 Es 9⁴. Cf. Neh 8⁷ [1 Es 9³ Sabateus] 11¹⁶.

SHACHIA.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8¹⁰).

SHADDAL.—See art. God, 2 (c).

SHADRACH.—The name given to Hananiah (Dn 1⁷).

SHAFTS.—See ARMOUR ARMS, 1 (d).

SHAGE.—See SHAMMAH, 3.

SHAHARAIM.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8¹⁰).

SHAHAZUMAH.—A town allotted to Issachar (Jos 19²²). Its site has not been identified.

SHALEM.—In Gn 33¹⁴ we read 'Jacob (on his return from Haran) came to Shalem a city of Shechem' (RV reads 'in peace to the city of Shechem'; so Luther in his German translation). The word shalem means 'peace, and the preposition b 'in' may have fallen out owing to the final letter of Jacob. Otherwise we must suppose Shalem to be a small town (in the neighbourhood of Shechem), which has been identified with a village called Salim. W. F. BOYD.

SHALISHAH.—A region through which Saul travelled with his servant in search of the lost asses (1 S 9⁴). The route as given probably describes a circuitous journey, to the N.W., the E., and finally S. through Benjamin. This would place the 'land of Shalishah' somewhere on the hills W. of Shiloh. Baal-shalishah (2 K 4⁴) was doubtless a place in the same district. H. L. WILLETT.

SHALLEHETH.—See JERUSALEM, II. 4.

SHALLUM, an inhabitant of Jabesh, was nominally king of Israel for one month in the period of anarchy which preceded the extinction of the nation. As he assassinated his predecessor Zechariah, so in turn he was 'removed' by his successor Menahem (2 K 15¹⁶). H. P. SMITH.

SHAME

SHALLUM.—1. See preced. article. 2. See JEHOAHAD, 2 3. The husband (or son, LXX in 2 Kings) of Huldah (2 K 22⁴, 2 Ch 34²²). 4. A Judahite (1 Ch 2⁴⁰). 5. A descendant of Simeon (1 Ch 4²³). 6. A high priest (1 Ch 6¹², 13; Ezr 7²—Salem of 1 Es 8¹ and Salemas of 2 Es 1¹). 7. A son of Naphtali (1 Ch 7¹³), called in Gn 46²⁴ and Nu 26⁴⁹ Shilem, with the gentile name Shilemites (Nu 26⁴⁹). 8. The eponym of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 9¹⁷ bis, Ezr 2⁴²—Neh 7⁴⁶); called in 1 Es 5²⁸ Salum, and (possibly) in Neh 12²⁵ Meshullam. 9. A Korahite gatekeeper (1 Ch 9¹⁹, 21), called in 26 1. 2. Meshelemiah, and in 26¹⁴ Shelemiah. It is not at all unlikely that this name should be identified with the preceding. 10. Father of Jehizkiah, an Ephraimite chief (2 Ch 28²²). 11. One of the porters who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁴ [1 Es 9²² Sallumus]). 12. One of the sons of Bani who had committed the same offence (Ezr 10⁴² [1 Es 9²¹ Samatus]). 13. The son of Hillohesh (Neh 3³²). 14. The uncle of Jeremiah (Jer 32⁷). 15. Father of Maaseiah (Jer 35⁴).

SHALLUN.—The son of Col-hozeh (Neh 3¹⁵).

SHALMAN.—This name occurs only in the clause 'as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle' (Hos 10¹⁴). The person and place referred to are both unknown. Shalman may be a contraction for Shalmaneser, but it is impossible to say which, if any, of the four kings of Assyria bearing that name suits the connexion. It has been suggested that the Moabite king Salmanu (mentioned in Tiglath-pileser's triumphal inscription, in Rawl. 67, line 60) may be the person referred to by the prophet. The Vulg. version seems to think of the slaughter of Zalmunna by Gideon (Jg 9⁹). See also art. BETH-ARBEL. W. F. BOYD.

SHALMANESER (Assyr. Shulman-asharidu, i.e. 'Shulmanu [a god] is chief').—In 2 K 17¹⁸ 18³⁴ the Shalmaneser is obviously a king of Assyria who succeeded Tiglath-pileser (wh. see) and preceded Sargon. This was Shalmaneser IV., who reigned over Assyria B.C. 727–722. He ruled Babylon as well. No monuments of his are preserved. The Eponym Canons give campaigns for his last three years. The siege of Samaria was probably begun in his reign and finished under Sargon. The name Shalmaneser appears in 2 Es 13⁴⁰ as Salmanasar. C. H. W. JOHNS.

SHAMA.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴).

SHAMBLES.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 7; FOOD, § 11.

SHAME.—1. In the first Biblical reference to this emotion (Gn 22¹⁶, cf. 37) 'shame' appears as 'the correlative of sin and guilt'; it is 'the overpowering feeling that inward harmony and satisfaction with oneself are disturbed' (Delitzsch, Com., in loc.). From the OT point of view the crowning shame is idolatry: 'As the thief is ashamed when he is found, so is the house of Israel ashamed; they say to a stock, Thou art my father' (Jer 2²; cf. Is 41¹⁴ 42¹⁷). The all-inclusive promise to those who trust in God is 'none that wait on thee shall be ashamed' (Ps 25³ RV; cf. 119⁹¹, 100, 154¹⁶, 493² 54¹⁴, Jer 17¹³, Jl 2²⁶, Ro 5⁵ 9³⁰ 10¹¹). The absence of shame is always regarded as an aggravation of sinful conduct: Job (19³) reproaches his friends because they are 'not ashamed' of dealing hardly with him; the climax of Jeremiah's complaint (6¹⁴) against those who had 'committed abomination' is that 'they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush' (cf. 81², Zeph 3⁴, 11). The culmination of shamelessness is seen in those 'whose glory is in their shame' (Ph 3¹⁹); but in this passage, as elsewhere (Is 50⁶; cf. Pr 10⁴ 25⁹), 'shame' is, by a natural transference of ideas, applied not to the inward feeling, but to its outward cause. The degradation of those 'whose god is their belly' is seen in their boasting of conduct which ought to have made them ashamed of their perversion of gospel liberty into sinful licence.

'The return of shame is a sign of true repentance: 'then shalt thou remember thy ways and be ashamed' (Ezk 16⁴¹, cf. Ezr 9⁶).

2. The consciousness of shame varies with the conventional standards adopted in any society. For example, poverty (Pr 13¹⁵), leprosy (Nu 12¹⁴), widowhood (Is 54⁴) may be viewed as involving 'shame,' though there is no blame. In the sense of violation of propriety St. Paul applies the word to men who wear their hair long and to women who wear it short (1 Co 11¹⁶⁻¹⁷, cf. 6¹⁴ 14¹⁵); by an analogous adaptation of its meaning he describes God's ideal 'workman' as one 'that needeth not to be ashamed' (2 Ti 2¹⁵).

3. In the NT sin is pre-eminently the shameful thing (Ro 6², Ph 3¹⁸, Eph 5², Jude 12, 1 Jn 2²⁸; cf. 3⁶). But the distinguishing characteristic of the early Christian use of the word is 'the transvaluation of values.' 'Jesus, the author and perfecter of faith, . . . endured the cross, despising shame' (He 12⁷). When St. Paul says 'I am not ashamed of the gospel' (Ro 1¹⁶), by a well-known figure of speech his negative statement emphatically asserts his positive glorying (Gal 6¹⁴). To 'suffer as a Christian' and 'not (to) be ashamed' is to 'glorify God' (1 P 4¹³; cf. 2 Ti 1^{12, 13, 14}). The same heightening of the contrast is implied when, on the one hand, the Son of Man declares that in the day of judgment He will be ashamed of all who are now ashamed of Him and of His words (Mk 8³⁸, Lk 9²⁶); and on the other hand, St. John's assurance is that those who abide in Christ 'may have boldness and not be ashamed before him at his coming' (1 Jn 2²⁸). Of them who desire a heavenly country 'God is not ashamed . . . to be called their God'; for the city He has prepared, they are being prepared by the sanctifying grace of Him 'who is not ashamed to call them brethren' (He 11¹⁶ 2¹¹).

J. G. TASKER.

SHAMGAR smote 600 Philistines with an ox-goad (Jg 3³¹). There is no mention of his judging Israel, or of the duration of his influence. The exploit belongs to the latest redaction of the book; 4¹ continues the story of 3³⁰. Nothing is known of any Philistine dominion at so early a period, and in some Gr. MSS the verse follows 16¹. His exploit resembles that of Shammoth in 2 S 23¹¹ (cf. 21¹⁵⁻²²), and may have been attached to him as an expansion of the reference in the song of Deborah (Jg 5⁶). There, however, he appears to be a foreign oppressor, and the connexion of the two passages is obscure, the song having to do with Canaanite oppression in the North. The name is foreign, Hittite or Assyrian. He is the 'son of Anath.' Anath occurs in the Tell el-Amarna tablets, and Anatu is an Assyrian goddess, traces of whose worship are found in Egypt, Phoenicia, and Syria (cf. place-names Beth-anath [Jg 1³], Beth-anath [Jos 15³⁷]). The names are important as showing Babylonian influence after the period of the Tell-el-Amarna tablets.

C. W. EMMET.

SHAMHUTH.—See SHAMMAH, 4.

SHAMIR.—1. A Kohathite (1 Ch 24⁴⁶). 2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15⁴⁶). It is perhaps Khurbet Sömerah, west of Debir. 3. The home and burial-place of Tola (Jg 10¹⁻³). The site is uncertain.

SHAMLAI.—See SALMAI.

SHAMMA.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7²⁷).

SHAMMAH.—1. Son of Reuel, son of Esau, a tribal chief (Gn 36¹⁴). 2. Third son of Jesse, present when Samuel sought a successor to Saul (1 S 16⁹); with Saul in the battlefield when David visited the camp (17¹³). He is the same as Shimeah, father of Jonadab (2 S 13³), the Shimeah of 1 Ch 2¹, and the Shimei, father of Jonathan who slew the giant (2 S 21²). In 1 Ch 20⁷ Jonathan is called son of Shimeah. 3. Son of Agee, a Hararite, one of the three mighty men of David. Alone he held the field against the Philistines (2 S 23¹¹). The parallel passage, 1 Ch 11¹⁶, wrongly attributes the feat to Eleazar. He is probably identical with 'Shamnah the Harodite' (Hararite) of 2 S 23²⁸. V.²⁸ should read 'Jonathan son of Shamnah, the Hararite.' In 1 Ch 11²⁴, 'son of Shage' is probably confused with 'son of Agee.' Read, with Lucian, 'son of Jonathan.' Shimei, son of Ela (1 K 4¹⁵), should also appear here if we accept Lucian's reading of 'Ela' for 'Agee' (2 S 23¹¹). 4. An officer in David's employ, called Shammoth in 1 Ch 11²⁷, and Shamhuth in 1 Ch 27⁸. Probably the same as No. 3.

J. H. STEVENSON.

SHAMMAI.—1. A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2²⁵). 2. The 'son' of Rekem and 'father' of Maon (1 Ch 2⁴¹). 3. A Judahite (1 Ch 4¹⁷).

SHAMMOTH.—See SHAMMAH, 4.

SHAMMUA.—1. The Reubenite spy (Nu 13⁴). 2. One of David's sons (2 S 5⁴, 1 Ch 14⁴; called in 1 Ch 3³ Shimea). 3. A Levite (Neh 11¹⁷)—Shemaiah of 1 Ch 9¹⁶. 4. The head of a priestly family (Neh 12⁴).

SHAMSHERAI.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8²⁸).

SHAPHAM.—A Gadite (1 Ch 5¹²).

SHAPHAN ('coney' or 'rock-badger': an old totem clan-name—so W. R. Smith).—1. 'The scribe' (secretary of state) of Josiah in 621 B.C., 'son of Azaliah,' who laid before the king the law-book discovered by Hilkiah (wh. see) in the Temple (2 K 22¹⁻¹¹—2 Ch 34¹⁻¹⁸). Shaphan appears to have been the chief lay leader in the execution of Josiah's reforms. His family for two following generations played a worthy part as servants of Jehovah, and friends of the prophet Jeremiah: the Ahikam of 2 K 22¹⁴⁻¹⁵ (= 2 Ch 34²⁰⁻²²) and Jer 26²⁴, the Gemariah of Jer 36^{12, 22}, and Elashah (Jer 29³) were Shaphan's sons; the Micaiah of Jer 36^{11, 12}, and Gedaliah (wh. see), whom the Chaldeans made governor of Judaea after the Captivity of 586 B.C., his grandsons. 2. The 'Jaazaniah, son of Shaphan,' denounced in Ezk 8¹¹ as a ringleader in idolatry, was possibly, but not certainly, a son of the same Shaphan.

G. G. FINDLAY.

SHAPHAT.—1. The Simeonite spy (Nu 13³). 2. The father of Elisha (1 K 19^{16, 19}, 2 K 3^{11, 13}). 3. A name in the royal genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 3²). 4. A Gadite (1 Ch 5¹²). 5. One of David's herdmen (1 Ch 27³⁰).

SHAPHIR.—A city, probably on the Philistine plain (Mic 1¹³). It has been located by some a few miles S.E. of Ashdod. Attempts have been made to identify it with the Shamir of Jos 15¹⁸.

H. L. WILLETT.

SHARAI.—One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10⁴⁰).

SHARAR.—See SACAR.

SHAREZER would answer to the Assyrian Shar-usur, 'preserve the king,' but that is only part of a name. 1. It is given 2 K 19³⁷—Is 37³⁸ as the name of a son of Sennacherib who with Adrammelech (which see) murdered his father. Shar-elir-Ashur was the name of a son of Sennacherib, who in a fragmentary letter is addressed as monarch, about the time of Esarhaddon's reign. The name might give rise to Sharezer. At present, however, the Assyrian accounts mention only one murderer, and do not name him. A satisfactory explanation of the Hebrew narrative is yet to be found. 2. Sharezer (the name is prob. incomplete) appears in Zec 7² as one of a deputation sent to consult the spiritual heads of the Jewish community.

C. H. W. JOHNS.

SHARON.—1. ha-shārôn, lit. 'the plain,' 1 Ch 27³⁰, Ca 2¹, Is 33³ 35² 65¹⁴; Gr. ho Sarôn, whence AV Saron, Ac 9³⁵. This is the great Maritime Plain extending from Jaffa, or a little south of it, to Mount Carmel in the north. Though called a plain, it is of an undulating character, and was in parts, particularly towards the N., a forest of oaks (Is 35⁷). Although but poorly cultivated, it has a great depth of rich soil and is capable of much development; left now largely to weeds, it yields annually a magnificent crop of beautiful wild flowers.

it has always been a pasturage of flocks (1 Ch 27²², Is 65¹⁴). Around Ramleh and Ludd are forests of olives, and the orange gardens of Jaffa are too well known to need more than a passing reference; wherever the hand of man has been diligent, there the soil has bounteously responded. Over a great part of the plain, especially near the sea, water may be tapped at no great depth. Its rivers are the marshy Nahr Zerka or Crocodile River, just below Carmel, Nahr el-Muffir, Nahr Iskanderuneh, and Nahr el-Aujeh, the last mentioned close to Jaffa. The chief town of Sharon was in ancient days Dor (Jos 11¹² 12²³, 1 K 4¹¹), in NT times Casarea, and in later Crusading times (1218–1291) the fortified port of Athlith. In Jos 12¹⁸ Lassharon is mentioned as one of the royal cities of Canaan; as 'the king of' is omitted in the original, the passage may read 'king of Aphek in the Sharon.' For 'rose of Sharon' see ROSE.

2. A second Sharon (Saronas) is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome as between Mt. Tabor and Tiberias, and this is to-day represented by the village of Sārōna in the Ard el-Hamma N.E. of Tabor. This may be the place mentioned in Jos 12¹⁸ (see above).

3. The suburbs (RVm 'pasture lands') of Sharon (1 Ch 5¹⁸) are mentioned as among the possessions of Gad along with Gilead and Bashan.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

SHARUHEN.—See SHAAARAIM, 2.

SHASHAI.—One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10¹⁶—Sosis of 1 Es 9²⁴.

SHASHAK.—A Benjamite family (1 Ch 8¹⁴).

SHAUL.—1. A king of Edom, Gn 36²⁷.—1 Ch 1⁴⁴.

2. A son of Simeon (Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁵, Nu 26¹³, 1 Ch 4²⁰). The clan of which he is the eponym was of mixed Isr. and Can. descent, hence Shaul is called in Gn 46¹⁰ and Ex 6¹⁵ 'the son of the Canaanite.' In Nu 26¹³ the patronymic Shaulites occurs. 3. An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6²⁴ (2), called in v. 23 (2) Joel).

SHAVEH, VALE OF.—A broad valley (ʔmeq), known also as 'the king's vale' (Gn 14⁷), which was near Salem. It is apparently the same place as 'the king's dale' (2 S 18¹⁹), in which Absalom set up a pillar or monument. Shaveh was possibly the broad open head of the valley of Hinnom which, lower down, contracts to a ravine.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM ('the plain of Kiriathaim').—The place where the Emim were smitten by the allied kings from the East (Gn 14⁸). It probably derived its name from the Moabite Kiriathaim (Nu 32⁷, Jos 13¹⁹).

H. L. WILLETT.

SHAVSHA occurs in the list of David's officers in 1 Ch 18¹⁶ as 'scribe' (RVm 'secretary'), an office made necessary by the growth of the court and relations with other states. His name, and the fact of his father's not being mentioned, make it probable that he was a foreigner chosen to deal with foreign correspondence. His name was evidently unfamiliar; in the list of 2 S 20²⁵ it appears as Sheva; in that of 8¹⁵⁻¹⁸ (otherwise identical with Ch.) Seraiah has been substituted; LXX varies greatly in all passages. It is generally held that Shavsha is correct. Apparently in Solomon's time he was succeeded by his sons (1 K 4³ Shishah being probably only another variation of the name). C. W. EMMET.

SHEAL (Ezr 10²³).—One of those who had married a 'strange' wife; called Jasaclius in 1 Es 9²⁰.

SHEALTIEL (Salathiel of 1 Es 5⁴⁸, 6², AV of Mt 1¹³ and Lk 3²⁷).—The father of Zerubbabel (Ezr 3², 5², Neh 12¹, Hag 1¹², 2²³). According to 1 Ch 3¹⁷, Shealtiel was the eldest son of king Jeconiah. In v. 19 the MT makes Pedaiah (a brother of Shealtiel) the father of Zerubbabel.

SHEARIAH.—A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8³⁸ 9⁴¹).

SHEARING-HOUSE, THE.—A place at which Jehu, on his way from Jezreel to Samaria, met and slew the brethren of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 10¹³, 14).

Possibly the original should be left untranslated and appear as a place-name Beth-eked, which has not been identified.

SHEAR-JASHUB ('a remnant shall return,' Is 7⁹).

—A symbolical name given to a son of Isaiah to signify the return of the remnant to God after the punishment at the hands of the Assyrians. See 8¹⁸ 10³⁰, 31, and cf. 7¹⁴ 8¹⁻⁴, and art. ISALAH, p. 387b.

SHEATH.—See ARMOUR ARMS, 1 (c).

SHEBA.—1. The OT name for the people and country of the Sabæans in S.W. Arabia, the modern Yemen. In Gen. and Chron. the racial relationships of the people are diversely given. Gn 10⁷ (P) and 1 Ch 1⁹ make them Hamites, Gn 10²⁸ (J) Semites. Again, whilst Gn 10²⁸ has Joktan as the immediate ancestor of Sheba, Gn 25¹ has Jokshan. These discrepancies are sufficiently accounted for by the extensive commerce of the Sabæans, the number of their settlements in distant regions, and the connexions which they were thus led to form. The language and script of Abyssinia, for instance, prove that a Sabæan colony was established there; hence the genealogy in Gn 10⁷.

The following are the salient points in the information which the OT gives us. The country was rich in gold (Ps 72¹⁵) and incense (Jer 6²⁰); the people were great traders (Ezk 27²¹), dealing in costly wares (Ezk 38¹³); their caravans were well known throughout the East (Job 6¹⁹); they were given to raiding (Job 1¹³), possibly uniting trade and robbery, when convenient (cf. Odys. xv. 415 ff.); and they were not averse to the slave-trade (Jl 3³); eventually, it was hoped, they would become tributaries of Israel (Is 60⁶, Ps 72¹⁰).

The notices in Greek and Latin authors correspond with the Biblical statements. Strabo, e.g., mentions myrrh, incense, cinnamon, balsam, amongst the products of the land, and states that their commerce made them exceedingly wealthy; that they had abundant furniture of gold and silver, beds, tables, bowls, cups, in costly houses. The panels, walls, and ceilings were adorned with ivory, gold, silver, mosaics. He affirms that they frequently laid waste the Syrian desert.

The Sabæans are also mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions. Tiglath-pileser III. (B.C. 745–727) enumerates the articles which he received from them in tribute: 'gold, silver, camels, female camels, spices of all sorts.' In an inscription of B.C. 707, Sargon declares that he 'received the tribute of Pir'u, king of the land of Musuru (Egypt), Samsê, queen of the land of Aribu (Arabia), It'amara, king of the land of the Sabu'na (Sabæans), gold, products of the mountains, horses, camels.'

During the 19th century a few European travellers succeeded in penetrating Yemen and bringing back a moderately full account of its natural features, and a large amount of material for reconstructing its history. It is incomparably superior to the rest of Arabia, both in climate and in soil. The central district is a highland region, with mountains some 8000 ft. above the sea level. Fertile valleys branch out from the hills, 'well timbered in places, and threaded by silvery streams of dancing waters; sloping fields, gay with crops and wild flowers; terraced or jungle-covered slopes.' Here are grown the best vines that Arabia produces. The air is pure and comparatively cool. The present capital is Sana, a town of about 20,000 inhabitants, on the southernmost of three great plateaux. The ancient capital, Marib, N.E. of Sana, lies between the rich valleys of the west and the 'wadys of Hadramaut, which were the sources of Arabian gum.' Inscriptions relating to the Sabæan kingdom have been found in various parts of the Arabian peninsula. They are written in a dialect which closely resembles Ethiopic, but there are no vowel letters, or modifications of the consonants, to indicate vowel sounds. Many come from the vicinity of Marib, where the ruins are of astonishing extent. The remains of its great dam, in particular, are very striking; a gigantic wall, two miles long and 175 paces wide, was built to connect two hills, and the water was run off for irrigation purposes by dykes which were cut at different levels. The construction of this work lies back in remote antiquity, B.C. 1700 being the date given by one authority, and B.C. 700 by another. About A.D. 100 it seems to have burst, and the streams which it once served to retain are now wasted in the sands. The Koran (Sura 34) adduces this event as an instance of the punishment of disobedient ingratitude. In addition to the inscriptions, coins have been found and the names of the kings whose monograms they bear have been determined. From these two sources forty-five royal names have become known, six kings having been called It'amara (see Sargon's list of tributaries). From some of the records it appears that two kings reigned contemporaneously (cf. Ps 72¹⁰), and this has been explained by the fact that the prince next in age to the king was designated as his successor, sometimes to the temporary exclusion of the king's son.

Experts have differed with respect to the number of periods into which the history of the Sabæan kingdom falls. All recognize three such divisions: (1) That of the mākarib or priest-kings; (2) that of the kings of Sheba; (3) that of the kings of Sheba and Dhū-Raḍān. Glaser (Skizze der Gesch. Arabiens) prefixes to the first of these a Minæan empire, and adds a fifth period, during which the dated inscriptions supply a more exact chronology. These five ages cover the time from about B.C. 2000 to the conquest by Abyssinia in the 6th cent. A.D. Many of the statements which have been copied from the rocks and slabs relate to war and agriculture. They bring before us a set of traders disposing of the products of their own country, and also carrying goods from India and Africa to the great emporium Tyre and the powerful empires of Mesopotamia. They give us a glimpse of the life led by a class of powerful nobles who dwelt on their estates in castles and towers. And they furnish a considerable amount of information respecting the Sabæan religion, its offerings of incense and animals, its pilgrimages to certain shrines, its special month for pilgrimage, Dhū Hijjātān. The heavenly bodies were worshipped, the sun as a female, the moon as a male, deity. Many other divinities were recognized: a male Athtar (cf. the female Ashtoreth), Almakah, Tal'ab, Samī, Kawim, Bashir, Haubas. The precise significance of some of these titles is open to doubt. But the cognate Heb. words justify us in saying that Samī is 'the Hearer,' Kawim, 'the Sustainer,' Bashir, 'the Tidings-bringer,' and the Arabic word of the same form indicates that Tal'ab is a spirit of the trees. Three other names, Wadd ('Love'), Jaghuth ('He helps'), and Nasr ('Vulture' or 'Eagle'), are spoken of in the Koran (Sura 72) as though they were antediluvian idols. On inscriptions which date from the 4th and 5th centuries of our era, Rahman ('the Merciful') appears. This is due to Jewish influence, and it is interesting to observe that the Jews now living in Yemen have a tradition that their ancestors left Palestine before the Christian era. Cf. also art. SEBA.

2. A worthless adventurer, who snatched at what he thought was a chance of winning the sovereignty of Northern Israel (2 S 20¹⁴⁻¹⁷). His appeal was addressed to the deep-seated inter-tribal jealousy. David took a serious view of the situation thus created (v. 16^c), but his rival lacked the personal qualities which might have rendered him formidable. He traversed the entire centre of the country seeking adherents in vain. Knowing that Joab and Abishai were on his heels, he shut himself up in Abel-beth-maacah (modern Abil), a town in the extreme north. There, according to a probable emendation of the text (v. 14), he was supported by his clansmen the Bichrites (not Berites, cf. 'son of Bichri', v. 1). The place would speedily have been carried by assault had not a woman, whose judgment was highly esteemed by the inhabitants, persuaded them to throw Sheba's head over the wall to Joab (vv. 16-22). 3. A Gadite, (1 Ch 5¹¹). 4. The Sheba of Jos 19² is out of place after Beer-sheba. V. 3 shows that we ought to find thirteen, not fourteen, names. The LXX retains that number by omitting Sharuhēn from the list. Sharuhēn, however, should not be dropped, for it is identical with the Shilhim of 15². Some Heb. MSS leave out Sheba, as does also the parallel passage 1 Ch 4². The Shema of the LXX is from the list of 15². There can be little doubt that Shema, inserted by mistake in the Heb. text and transliterated by the LXX, was subsequently changed to Sheba. J. TAYLOR.

SHEBA, QUEEN OF.—1 K 10¹⁻¹³ narrates a visit of the contemporary queen of Sheba to king Solomon. At the present day there is a strong tendency to regard this as a legendary addition made by the later editor for the purpose of emphasizing Solomon's wealth and wisdom. The reasons adduced are not quite conclusive. It is no doubt true that the inscriptions hitherto discovered fail to mention any queen of the Sabæans. But the names are given of queens who reigned over other Arabian countries, and, curiously enough, in Sargon's inscription, quoted on p. 842^b, Samsē, queen of Aribu, immediately precedes It'amara, king of Sheba. It must be admitted, however, that the narrative in 1 K 10 is not free from difficulties. We cannot satisfactorily explain the words 'concerning the name of the Lord' (v. 1); the LXX 'and' etc. being an obvious attempt to evade the difficulty, and the Chronicler (2 Ch 9¹) omitting all the words. It is hard to believe that the monarch of a highly civilized and exceedingly wealthy State would be dumbfounded by the luxury of the court of Jerusalem (v. 5); that reads as though the chieftain of a petty tribe of Arabs was in question. Moreover, it is likely enough that the motive of the visit was other than our author supposed. Riddles, proverbs, apologues, and stories supply much of the material for the leisure conversation of the Arabs, but the queen of Sheba would visit her brother monarch with a more practical object than these. Commercial intercourse between the two countries was of extreme importance for the prosperity of both: Kittel (Die Bücher der Könige, p. 89) is justified in suggesting that she wished to promote this.

The fantastic legends which gathered round this journey may be conveniently read in Sura 27 of the Koran, and the notes on that chapter from Mohammedan sources which Sale has collected. Mohammed himself no doubt derived his account from Jewish sources. A lengthy history of queen Bilkis, from Ta'labi's Lives of the Prophets, may be found in Brünnow's Arabic Chrestomathy. Solomon marries the queen, and the Abyssinians, to whom the story passed from the Arabs, call her Makeda, and trace from this marriage the lineage of all their kings. In this connexion two facts should be noted. First, that Abyssinia was undoubtedly colonized by the Sabæans. Second, that Jos. (Ant. ii. x. 2) speaks of 'Saba, a royal city of Ethiopia,' and (viii. vi. 5 f.), without naming Sheba, gives an account of the visit to Solomon of a woman who was 'queen of Egypt and Ethiopia.' He is mistaken as to the locality, but it is interesting to observe the tradition which he reports, 'that we possess the root of that balsam which our country still bears by this woman's gift.' J. TAYLOR.

SHEBANIAH.—1. A Levitical family (Neh 9¹⁰⁻¹⁶). 2. A priest or Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh 10⁴ 12¹⁴ [see SHECANIAH]). 3. Another Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh 10¹²). 4. A priest (1 Ch 15²⁴).

SHEBARIM.—A place mentioned (Jos 7⁵) in the description of the pursuit of the Israelites by the men of Ai. RVm gives 'the quarries,' but the text is probably corrupt.

SHEBAT.—See TIME.

SHEBER.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2⁴⁵).

SHEBNA (in 2 K 18¹⁸ SHEBNAH).—A major-domo or palace-governor of king Hezekiah, against whom is directed one of the recorded utterances of Isaiah (Is 22¹⁵⁻²⁵). The prophetic denunciation appears to have found its fulfilment in Shebna's degradation to the office of 'scribe' or secretary, and the elevation of ELIAKIM (wh. see) to the post of palace-governor (2 K 18¹⁸ * 27 19² = Is 36² 11. 37³). Shebna was in all probability a foreigner.

SHEBUEL.—1. A son of Gershom (1 Ch 23¹⁸ 26²⁰), called in 24³⁰ Shubael, which is prob. the original form of the name. 2. A son of Heman (1 Ch 25⁴ [v. 30 Shubael]).

SHECANIAH.—1. A descendant of Zerub. (1 Ch 3², 2, cf. Ezr 8² [1 Es 8² Sechenias]). 2. An exile who returned (Ezr 8² [1 Es 8² Sechenias]). 3. Chief of the tenth course of priests (1 Ch 24¹¹). 4. A priest (2 Ch 31¹⁴). 5. A contemporary of Ezra (Ezr 10² [1 Es 8² Sechenias]). 6. The father of Shemaiah (Neh 3²). It is possible that he and No. 1 are identical. 7. The father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh 6¹⁸). 8. The eponym of a family which returned with Zerubabel (Neh 12⁹). It is the same name which, by interchange of b and k, appears as Shebaniah in Neh 10⁴ 12¹⁴.

SHECHEM.—1. Gn 33¹⁸ 34². 6 etc. See JACOB, HAMOR. 2. A Manassite clan, Nu 26³¹ (26) (the Shechemites), Jos 17¹, 1 Ch 7¹⁹. 3. See next article.

SHECHEM.—The place in which Jacob for a while established himself (Gn 33¹⁸, Jn 4¹²). Here he is said to have dug the well consecrated by Christ's conversation with the Samaritan woman, and still shown to travellers, with a claim to authenticity which is lacking in the vast majority of the so-called 'holy places.' It was evidently a place of sanctity: there was a great oak (or terebinth) here—no doubt a sacred tree—where Jacob hid his teraphim (Gn 35⁴), and under which Joshua gave his parting address to the elders (Jos 24). A great stone under the tree was traditionally connected with the latter event (24²⁶). This is no doubt the reason why Shechem was a Levitical city, and also a city of refuge (20⁷). The city, however, remained Canaanite after the conquest, serving the local god Baal-Berth (Jg 9⁴): Gideon's concubine, mother of Abimelech, was a Canaanite from Shechem, and her relatives set up her son as a king, to his and their own destruction (Jg 9). Here Rehoboam alienated the Northern Kingdom by his overbearing speech (1 K 12¹), and Jeroboam for a time was established here (12²⁸). It was not a place of importance before the Exile, though continuously inhabited down to and after that event (Jer 41¹). The development of the Samaritan nation led to its rise. It was known at this period to the natives by the name Mabortha (Jos. BJ. iv. viii. 1), but the name by which it was generally known, after its re-building by Titus Flavius Vespasianus, was Flavia Neapolis, or, more briefly, Neapolis—a name which still persists in the modern Arabic form Nablus, though usually Roman or Greek names imposed on Palestinian sites have disappeared, the older names persisting.

In the Byzantine period there was a bishopric at Neapolis, of which we know little—save that the Samaritans in A.D. 474 wounded the bishop, and were in consequence severely punished by the emperor Zeno. The city fell to the Crusaders in 1099, and several churches were there built by them—one of which still survives in part as a mosque. In 1184 it was re-conquered by Saladin. The inhabitants have always been noted for turbulence and lawlessness. Towards the end of the 18th century it was a storm-centre of the inter-tribal wars of the fellahtin, the leader of the district being the notorious Kasim el-Ahmad.

It is now a town of some 24,000 inhabitants, all Moslems except about 150 Samaritans and 700 Christians. They are concerned in extensive soap manufacture, and in trade in wool and cotton with Eastern Palestine. There are Protestant and Roman Catholic missions, and an important English hospital directed by the Church Missionary Society.

In or near the town are shown 'Jacob's well,' which, as already said, is not improbably authentic; and a shrine covering the traditional 'tomb of Joseph,' the genuineness of which is perhaps less unassailable.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

SHEDEUR.—The father of Elizur (Nu 15² 21⁹ 73¹⁰ 101¹⁸).

SHEEP.—

1. šēm, 'small cattle,' such as sheep and goats, Gn 4²

etc.; a single sheep or goat, Ex 22¹. 2. seh, Dt 14⁴ etc., a sheep or goat; collectively, like 1, in Is 7⁷ etc. 3. ayil, Gn 15⁹ 'ram.' 4. rāchēl, Gn 31³² 32⁴, Ca 6⁶ etc., 'ewe.' See prop. name RACHEL. 5. kar, Dt 32⁶ etc., 'young lamb.' 6. kebes, Nu 7¹⁰, Is 5¹, and kesēb, Lv 3¹, a lamb from one to three years old; the lamb of sacrifice. 7. taleh (Arab. tully), 1 S 7⁴, Is 40¹ 65², a lamb, older than the preceding. 8. immar (Aram.), Ezr 6⁷, 'lamb.' 9. In Gn 33¹⁸ AVm has 'lamb' as tr. of gēsilāh. See K. sīrah. 10. (Gr.) amnos, Jn 1²⁹ etc., 'lamb.' 11. arēn, Lk 10⁴ etc., 'lamb.' 12. arnion Rev 5⁶ etc., the equivalent of Heb. kesēb. 13. probaton, Jn 10¹ 2¹ 4¹ etc., a general term like Nos. 1 and 2.

The common sheep of Palestine is the fat-tailed sheep (Ovis aries, var. laticaudata). The mass of tail-fat is sometimes enormous; it is the 'whole rump' (Heb. and Arab. al-yādh) of Ex 29²², Lv 3⁹ etc. Sheep are usually pastured with goats except when the land is too rocky and barren for the former. The flock is led by the shepherd, though the shepherd's boy may bring up the rear; on a journey a shepherd of experience must drive the flock (Gn 33¹²), while another leads. When away from villages, the sheep are herded at night in felds, which are roughly made enclosures of piled-up stones; the shepherd lives in a cave or hut adjoining, and is in very intimate touch with his sheep, each of which he knows unfailingly at a glance. The skin of a sheep, roughly tanned with all the wool on, is the common winter jacket (surweh) of a shepherd or peasant. To kill a sheep or lamb for a stranger's meal is one of the first acts of Bedouin hospitality. In the country, sheep are killed only in such circumstances or in honour of some festive occasion (cf. 1 S 25¹⁸, 1 K 1¹⁹).

SHEEP GATE.—See JERUSALEM, II. 4.

SHEERAH.—A 'daughter' of Ephraim, 'who, according to the MT of 1 Ch 7²⁴, built the two Beth-horons and a place of doubtful identity called Uzen-sheerah—'portion [lit. something weighed] of Sheerah.'

SHEHARIAH.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8²⁸).

SHEKEL.—See MONEY, WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, III.

SHEKINAH (from Heb. shakan—'to dwell,' meaning 'dwelling' [abstract], or 'that which dwells').—The word is not found in OT, but occurs often in other Jewish literature, always of God. The OT, particularly in certain of its writings, uses 'anthropomorphisms' freely, e.g. it speaks of God dwelling in a place or being seen. Later thought objected to this, as materializing the Divine nature; hence in the Targums (Aram. paraphrases of the OT used, though not in their present form, by the 1st cent. A.D.) various devices were adopted to prevent popular misunderstandings. Periphrases were used for the Divine name, 'the Word' (Memra), 'Spirit,' or 'Wisdom' being substituted. One of the most important of these was the 'Shekinah.' 'God dwells' usually became 'the Shekinah rests'; 'the temple of God' became 'the house of the S.' (note the Tabernacle was the mishkān, from the same root). Gn 28¹⁶ becomes 'the glory of the S. of J' is in this place'; Is 6³ 'my eyes have seen the glory of the S. of the King of the world.' God's hiding His face is the removal of the S. Now the presence of God (especially in P and related writings) was often manifested by a fiery appearance, or a light in a cloud. It was so in nature (Ps 18¹⁰), on Sinai (Ex 24¹⁶), in the wilderness and in the Tabernacle (16⁷ 29¹ 40³⁴, Nu 14¹⁰), in the Temple (1 K 8¹⁰); cf. Ezk 1²⁸ etc. This glory was not God, but an effluence from Him, or from His Shekinah. For the S. was not 'the glory,' as is usually imagined, but the source and centre of it. It is a stage nearer to God Himself, and, though often used in connexion with the physical manifestation, represents an invisible and universal presence. E.g. it is the source of inspiration. Eli failed to recognize Hannah's condition, because it had left him. It was present where three were gathered to administer justice. According to some, it was inseparable from Israel, still hovering over the west wall of the Temple.

But it was commonly taught that it had always been absent from the second Temple, as had been 'the glory' (cf. Ezk 11²² 43²); or again, that on the successive sins of Adam and his descendants it had been withdrawn from earth to the first heaven, and finally to the seventh. The conception, in fact, varied. It was disputed whether it was an entity distinct from God, or only the essence of God as manifested. Though at first regarded as impersonal and passive, as distinct from the Memra, the agent of creation, in the Talmud it becomes active and takes the place of the latter. The tendency to personification is significant. Insisting one-sidedly on the transcendence or aloofness of God, the Jew had to bring Him to earth again by such mediatorial agencies, which were semi-personal and Divine, but not God, and by the development of an elaborate angelology. In the NT the word 'glory' seems often to refer to the Shekinah (cf. Eth. Enoch 'Lord of glory,' and 'the Great Glory,' as titles of God). Ro 9¹ speaks of 'the glory' as a Jewish privilege; He 9¹ of 'the cherubim of glory.' It was believed that the Shekinah would return with the Messiah: 'the glory of the Lord shall be seen and the cloud' (2 Mac 2⁵). (a) It is connected with Christ (Lk 2⁴, Mt 17²; cf. 2 P 1¹⁷ RVm, where the Shekinah is personified). In 1 P 4¹⁴ 'the spirit of glory' rests upon Christ, as upon the Tabernacle; in He 1³ He is 'the effulgence of the glory'; in Ja 2¹ He is apparently called 'the Shekinah.' Of special significance is Jn 1¹⁴, which combines the expressions 'glory' and 'tabernacle' (Gr. skēnōn, probably intentionally chosen to represent 'Shekinah,' as in Rev 21³). It connects the personal presence of God in Christ with the earlier presence in the Tabernacle; what was formerly symbol is now manifest 'in flesh.' The vagueness of the Jewish conception gives place to the definite presence of the personal Christ. Cf. with Mt 18²⁰ and 1 Co 11¹⁴, sayings such as 'when two sit together and are occupied with the words of the Law, the Shekinah is with them,' or 'the man is not without the woman, nor the woman without the man, nor both of them without the Shekinah.' (b) It is connected with the Christian. The first of the six things lost by Adam was 'the glory,' i.e. the reflexion upon him of the Divine glory, or perfection. Of this we fall short (Ro 3²³), but it is in process of being recovered by the Christian (5² 8¹⁰. 30, 2 Co 3¹⁸ 4⁶; cf. 2 Es 7⁷¹. 88). C. W. EMMET.

SHELAH.—1. The youngest son of Judah by Shua (Gn 28⁵. 11. 26 46¹², Nu 26²⁰ 69, 1 Ch 2³ 4¹³). He gave his name to the family of the Shelanites (Nu 26²⁰ 69). Probably 'the Shelanite' should be read also for 'the Shilonite' of Neh 11³ and 1 Ch 9³. 2. The son of Arpachshad (Gn 10²⁴ 42 11¹³ 32). 14. 15. 1 Ch 1¹⁸. 24, Lk 3³⁸. 3. Neh 3¹⁵. See SILAM.

SHELEMIAS.—1. 2. Two of the sons of Bani, who married a 'strange' wife (Ezr 10³¹. 4 [Selemlas in 1 Es 9²⁴ 44]). 3. Father of Hananiah (Neh 3³⁰). 4. A priest (Neh 13¹⁴). 5. The father of Jehucal or Jucal (Jer 37³ 38¹). 6. The father of Irijah (Jer 37¹²). 7. 1 Ch 26¹⁴. See MDSHELEMIAS. 8. Ancestor of Jehudi (Jer 36¹⁴). 9. Son of Abdeel (Jer 36²⁴).

SHELEPH.—A son of Joktan (Gn 10²⁶) and therefore a tribe in Southern Arabia. It is not yet identified.

J. F. McCURDY.

SHELESH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7²⁴).

SHELOMI.—Father of an Asherite prince (Nu 34²⁷).

SHELOMITH.—1. The mother of the man who was stoned to death for having blasphemed 'the Name' (Lv 24¹⁴). 2. Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3¹⁴). 3. One of the 'sons of Izhar' (1 Ch 23¹⁴, called in 24²² Shelomoth). 4. A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11²⁰). 5. A family which returned with Ezra (Ezr 8¹⁰ [1 Es 8²⁶ Salimoth]).

SHELOMOTH.—1. (1 Ch 24²²)—Shelomith of 23¹⁴. 2. A descendant of Moses (1 Ch 26²³). 3. A Gershonite (1 Ch 23⁹).

SHELUMIEL.—Prince of the tribe of Simeon, Nu 1² 7²⁶. 4 10¹⁰ (cf. Jth 8¹). See also SIEMUEL.

SHEM.—The word signifies 'name,' which can also denote 'fame,' 'renown' (cf. 'the men of name,' Gn 6⁴). Possibly it is an abbreviation; cf. Shemuel (Samuel), 'name of God.' In one of the two traditions combined in J (Gn 6¹⁴. 10²²⁻²⁴) Shem, the 'son' of Noah, is the eponymous ancestor of several peoples, occupying, roughly speaking, the central portions of the known world. P has a parallel list in 11¹⁰⁻²⁶. It is clear that Shem (from which is formed the frequently used title Shemites or Semites) stands merely for a geographical division, for some of the nations traced to him—e.g. Elam, and Lud (probably Lydians)—are certainly not Semitic. In the other tradition (9²⁰⁻²⁷) 'Shem' stands for a people in Palestine—the Hebrews, or some portion of them—with whom 'Japheth' lived in close conjunction, and to whom 'Canaan' was subjugated. See HAM.

A. H. McNEIL.

SHEMA.—1. A Reubenite, 1 Ch 5⁴. See SHIMEI, No. 5. 2. One of those who put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (1 Ch 8¹³, called in v. 2² Shimei). 3. One of those who stood at Ezra's right hand, at the reading of the Law (Neh 8⁴, called in 1 Es 9²⁴ Sammus). 4. A town of Judah, situated in the Negeb. The site is unknown. It is probably this Shema that appears in 1 Ch 2⁴⁸ as a 'son' of Hebron. Cf. also SHEBA, 4.

SHEMAAH.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 12²).

SHEMAIAH.—('Jahweh has heard').—1. The prophet who with Ahijah encouraged the revolution of the ten tribes from Jeroboam. In MT he appears after the revolution has begun (1 K 12²²⁻²⁴, 2 Ch 11¹⁻⁴). In the second LXX account, however, he appears at the beginning, at the assembly in Shechem (1K 12²²). He is mentioned further in 2 Ch 12⁶⁻⁸, and his history in 12¹⁵. 2. Son of Shecaniah, descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3²²). 3. Son of Shecaniah, 'keeper of the east gate,' and assistant to Nehemiah in repairing the wall (Neh 3²⁰). 4. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4²⁷), perhaps Shimei of vv. 2². 27. 5. A Reubenite (1 Ch 5⁹), apparently called Shema in v. 4. 6. A Merarite Levite dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Ch 9⁴, Neh 11¹⁴). 7. A Levite of the family of Jeduthun (1 Ch 9¹⁴), called Shammua in Neh 11¹⁷. 8. Head of the Levitical Kohathite clan of Elizaphan in the time of David (1 Ch 15⁴ 11). 9. The scribe who registered the names of the priestly courses in the time of David, son of Nathanel (1 Ch 24⁹). 10. A Korahite Levite, oldest son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26⁴. 6. 7). 11. A Levite, teacher of the Law in Judah under Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17⁴). 12. A Levite of the family of Jeduthun, engaged in purifying the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Ch 29¹⁴). 13. A Levite 'over the freewill offerings of God' (2 Ch 31¹⁵). 14. A chief of the Levites (2 Ch 35⁹), called Samaias in LXX and in 1 Es 1¹. 15. A chief man under Ezra (Ezr 8¹⁴), called Maasmas and Samaias in 1 Es 8⁴. 4. 16. One of the family of Adonikam (Ezr 8¹³), in 1 Es 8³⁹ Samaias. 17. A priest of the family of Harim who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²¹), in 1 Es 9²⁴ Sameus. 18. A layman of the family of Harim who did the same (Ezr 10²¹), in 1 Es 9²⁴ Sabbous. 19. A prophet, son of Delalah, hired by Sanballat and Tobiah to terrify Nehemiah (Neh 6¹⁰⁻¹⁴). 20. One of the 24 courses of priests (Neh 10⁸ 12⁶. 18). 21. A man present at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12²⁴). 22. A priest, descendant of Asaph (Neh 12²⁸). 23. A singer (or clan) having part in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12²⁸). 24. Another, or perhaps the same (Neh 12²⁸). 25. Father of Uriah the prophet (Jer 26 [Gr. 33] 30). 26. A prophet, called 'the Nehelamite,' carried into captivity at Babylon with Jehoiachin, actively engaged in opposing Jeremiah (Jer 29¹⁻²²). Jeremiah predicted the complete cutting off of his family. 27. Father of Delalah, who was a prince in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 38 [Gr. 43] 11).

28. 'The great,' kinsman of Tobias (To 5¹²). In several cases two of these may be the same individual. The identification has the most probability in reference to 2 and 3, 8 and 9, and 12 and 13.

GEORGE R. BERRY.

SHEMARIAH.—1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12⁹). 2. A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11¹⁹). 3. 4. Two men who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10^{32, 4}).

SHEMEBER.—King of Zebolim (Gn 14²).

SHEMED.—See SHEMER, No. 4.

SHEMER.—1. The owner of the hill purchased by Omri (1 K 16²⁴). 2. A Merarite (1 Ch 6^{31 (40)}). 3. An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁴, called in v. 32 Shomer). 4. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8¹²). The Heb. MSS show here some confusion between r and d as the final letter of the name. The AV (Shamed) and RV (Shemed) retain the reading of the Geneva version, which is based on the Vulg. Samad.

SHEMIDA.—A 'son' of Gilead, according to Nu 26³² [P]; called in Jos 17² [JE] a 'son' of Manasseh; his descendants are enumerated in 1 Ch 7¹⁹. The gentilic name Shemidaite occurs in Nu 26³².

SHEMINITH.—See art. PSALMS, p. 772^a.

SHEMIRAMOTH.—A Levitical family (1 Ch 15^{18, 20} 16⁵, 2 Ch 17⁹).

SHEMUEL.—1. The Simeonite appointed to assist in the dividing of the land (Nu 34²⁰). It is not improbable that the MT should be corrected to Shelumiel, the form in 1² 2⁷ 7⁸, 4 10¹⁹. 2. Grandson of Issachar (1 Ch 7²).

SHEN ('the tooth or crag').—A well-known place 'the Shen,' named with Mizpah to indicate the position of the stone which was set up by Samuel to commemorate the defeat of the Philistines (1 S 7¹²). The site is unknown.

SHENAZZAR.—See SHESHBAZZAR.

SHEOL.—The Semitic equivalent of the classical conception of Hades. The word has been derived from a number of roots. The two main probable origins seem to be those from the Assy. root sha'al ('to consult an oracle'), and shilu ('chamber'). The latter derivation seems somewhat more in accordance with the synonym of pit. In any case, according to this derivation of the word, Sheol was regarded as an underworld of the dead in which the shades lived. Hebrew eschatology, although somewhat obscure in its early phase, probably tended to perpetuate the animistic conception. The habit of burying the family in communal tombs may also have lent some meaning to the word. In Sheol the dead continued to live as on earth. It seems to have been a somewhat common belief that they could be summoned by some process of necromancy (1 S 2⁸). In the absence of any consistent Hebrew eschatology, however, it is impossible to determine whether the dead were believed to be conscious or active. Apparently different opinions existed on this point (cf. Ps 88¹³ 94¹⁷ 30¹⁰, Job 14¹, with Ezk 32²⁷). From the latter it would appear that the non-activity of the dead was the more current opinion.

According to Eth. Enoch 22¹⁻¹⁴, Sheol was divided into four sections, intended respectively for the martyrs, the righteous who were not martyrs, sinners who had lived prosperously, and sinners who had been to some degree punished. The situation of those in these four sections varied from extreme bliss in the first case to loss of all hope of the resurrection in the fourth. The souls in the third division were to be 'slain' in the day of judgment; but the meaning of this is obscure. Nor is it at all clear that this fourfold division was commonly held. The twofold division into the abode of the blessed and the abode of those suffering punishment seems the more generally held. At the resurrection, which preceded the judgment, it was believed, at least by those under the influence of Pharisaism, that the righteous shades would rise from Sheol, and, after receiving new bodies, ascend to heaven.

The NT conception of Sheol is not fundamentally other than that of Judaism, if we may judge from the few references. The most important is that of Lk 16²², the parable of Dives and Lazarus. Hades (AV hell) in the NT is either the synonym of death, or of complete loss and misery, although the idea of punishment is usually expressed by Gehenna. It would appear that the idea of purgatorial cleansing, which Rabbinical Judaism introduced into the conception, was altogether absent from NT thought. Christ is said (Rev 1¹⁸) to have 'the keys of death and Hades,' and in 1 P 3¹⁹ He is said to have preached to 'spirits in prison,' i.e. in Sheol (cf. Apoc. Baruch 23⁴, 2 Es 7^{38, 39}). Generally speaking, however, the NT does not develop any new doctrine of Sheol, and is as far as possible from favouring the extreme speculation of either Rabbinic Judaism or of Patristic Christianity.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

SHEPHAM.—A place on the eastern boundary of the Promised Land (Nu 34^{10, 11}). The site has not been identified. Perhaps Zabdî, the Shipmite (1 Ch 27²⁷), was a native of Shepham.

SHEPHATIAH ('Jah has judged').—1. One of David's sons (2 S 3⁴ = 1 Ch 3³). 2. A family which returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2⁴ = Neh 7⁹) and Ezra (Ezr 8⁹). The name appears in 1 Es 5⁹ as Saphat and in 8⁴ as Saphatias. 3. A family of the 'sons of Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2⁵⁷ = Neh 7⁵⁹) = 1 Es 5³³ Saphuthi. 4. A Judahite family (Neh 11⁴). 5. A Benjamite family (1 Ch 9⁹). Either this or the preceding should perhaps be identified with No. 2 above. 6. A contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer 38¹). 7. A Benjamite warrior who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12²). 8. A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 27¹⁸). 9. A son of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21³).

SHEPHELAH.—See PLAIN (5).

SHEPHER.—A 'station' of the children of Israel (Nu 33^{32, 34}). Nothing is known about its position.

SHEPHERD.—See SHEEP.

SHEPHI (1 Ch 14⁶) or SHEPHO (Gn 36²²).—A Horite chief.

SHEPHUPHAM (Nu 26^{39 (40)}) or SHEPHUPHAN (1 Ch 8⁸).—A Benjamite family—Gn 46²¹ Mupim and 1 Ch 7^{12, 13} 26¹⁸ Shuppin; gentilic Shuphamites in Nu 26^{39 (40)}.

SHEREBIAH.—One of the Levites who joined Ezra (Ezr 8^{18, 24}, Neh 8⁷ 9⁴ 10^{12 (13)} 12^{8, 24}). The name appears in 1 Es 8⁴⁷ as Asebebias, v. 54 Esecebias, and 9⁴ Sarabias. Cf. MAHLI.

SHERESH.—A Manassite clan (1 Ch 7¹⁶).

SHERIFF.—In Dn 3², 'sheriffs' is the EV tr. of Aram. tiptlaye, a word of quite uncertain meaning.

SHESHAOCH.—A cryptic name of Babel, found in the received text of Jer 25²⁶ 51⁴. It is formed by the method called Atbash, that is a substitution of tau for aleph, shin for beth, and so on. The word is, however, no part of the original text of Jeremiah, being a conceit of later editors. In both passages it is lacking in LXX. Cf. LEB-KAMAL. J. F. McCurdy.

SHESHAI.—A clan resident in Hebron, driven thence by Caleb (Nu 13²², Jos 15¹⁴, Jg 1¹⁰).

SHESHAN.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2^{31, 34, 35}).

SHESHBAZZAR.—This name is of Bab. origin, and appears in LXX in several forms, some of which point to the sun-god Samas, others (e.g. Sanabassar) to the moon-god Sin as the derivation, the meaning being 'O sun-god [or moon-god], protect the lord [or the son].' The person Sheshbazzar is described as 'the prince of Judah,' and is said to have received from Cyrus the sacred Temple vessels and to have taken them to Jerusalem (Ezr 1^{8, 11}, cf. 1 Es 2^{12, 13}). The same fact is stated in Ezr 5^{14, 16}, where Sheshbazzar is designated 'the governor' (pechāh), and is also said to have laid the foundations of the Temple (cf. 1 Es 6:14, 19). It is probable that the Persian title 'Tirshatha' in Ezr 2:61, Neh 7:65, 70 refers to Sheshbazzar.

Some have identified Sheshbazzar with Zerubbabel on the ground that the laying of the foundation of the Temple is in Ezr 3:1 ascribed to Zerubbabel and in 5:16 to Sheshbazzar, while instances of men bearing two different names occur not infrequently (e.g. 2 K 23:34, 24:17, Dn 1:7). But, when we compare Ezr 3:1 and 5:16, it does not seem necessary to assume that the two men are identical. Both may have returned from Babylon at the same time, and while Sheshbazzar was the ruling official, Zerubbabel may in all likelihood have been the moving spirit in building the Temple. Ezr 3:1 gives the Chronicler's own account of the work, while Ezr 5 purports to be an official report, and would naturally mention the official head of the community as the person responsible for what occurred during his term of office. Then the possibility of the one person bearing two names, while not impossible, seems unlikely here, because (1) both names are of foreign origin, unlike the double names Daniel and Belteshazzar, where the one is Hebrew and the other foreign; and (2) as a rule the Chronicler is careful to note the identification—e.g. 'Daniel whose name was Belteshazzar.'

If, then, Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel were two different men, was Sheshbazzar a Jew or a foreigner? In all probability he was a Jew. It was quite in accordance with the policy of the Persians to appoint a Jew to act as governor in Jerusalem, while the name Sheshbazzar, being of Bab. origin, would not likely be borne by a Persian. It has been conjectured that Sheshbazzar is identical with the Shenazzar of 1 Ch 3:18, a son of Jeholachin and uncle of Zerubbabel; and this would justify the title 'prince of Judah' given to him in Ezr 1:8. Then, further, it is not unlikely that the younger man, Zerubbabel, took the leading part in the work of restoration, and as a result his uncle's memory would fall into the background. This theory is made more probable by the fact that Zerubbabel succeeded to the governorship as early as the reign of Darius Hystaspis, b.c. 520 (cf. Hag 1:14, 22). W. F. BOYD.

SHETH.—In Nu 24:7 (only) AV and RVm tr. bēnē shēth 'children (sons) of Sheth,' but there can be little doubt that the correct tr. is that of RV, 'sons of tumult.'

SHETHAR.—One of the seven princes who had the right of access to the royal presence (Est 1:14).

SHETHAR-BOZENAI.—One of those who corresponded with Darius about the re-building of the Temple (Ezr 5:2, 6:6, 13). Called in 1 Es 6:3, 7:27 7: Sathrabuzanes.

SHEVA.—1. A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2:49). 2. See Shavsha.

SHEWBREAD.—In one of the oldest historical documents preserved in the OT we find, in a passage telling of David's flight from Saul, the first mention of an offering in the shape of 'holy bread,' which was presented to J* in the sanctuary at Nob (1 S 21:4-6). Here this holy bread is also termed 'the bread of the presence' (v. 9), i.e. of J*, which appears in EV as 'shewbread'—a rendering due to Tindale, who adds the note, 'shew-brede, because it was always in the presence and sight of the Lorde' (cf. v. 6, which ends literally thus: 'the presence-bread, that was taken from the presence of J*'). 'Presence-bread' is also the name for this special offering generally used in the Priests' Code—but 'continual bread' in Nu 4:7, contracted from the fuller expression 2 Ch 24. The Chronicler, however, prefers another designation, which may be rendered 'pile-bread' (1 Ch 9:23, 23:30 etc., EV 'shewbread') and is to be explained by the arrangement of the loaves in two piles (see below and cf. Lv 24:8 RVm).

After its first historical mention in connexion with the sanctuary of Nob, where it was periodically renewed—at what intervals is not stated—the presence-bread is next met with in the Temple of Solomon. Here was an 'altar of cedar' (1 K 6:20), which modern scholars regard as an altar for the presentation of the offering of the shewbread. It stood, according to the restored text, in front of the debir, or Most Holy Place, and it is to be identified with 'the table whereupon the shewbread was,' mentioned in 7:48 in a section of later date (see, for the composite text of these chapters, the authorities cited in art. TEMPLE, and cf. ib. § 5). The same interchange of 'altar' and 'table' is found in Ezk 41:22, cf. 44:16.

The table of shewbread to be provided for the Tabernacle of P is discussed in the art. TABERNACLE, § 6 (a) (cf. TEMPLE, § 9). The preparation of the shewbread itself, which in the time of the Chronicler was the privilege of a division of the Levites (1 Ch 9:32), is prescribed in another section of P (Lv 24:5-9). The offering consisted of twelve unleavened cakes of considerable size, since each cake contained a fifth of an ephah—an ephah held more than a bushel—of fine flour. The cakes or loaves were arranged on the table in two piles; on the top of each pile was placed an oblation of frankincense. The cakes were renewed 'every Sabbath day' (v. 8 RV); those removed were eaten by the priests alone within the sanctuary precincts, the shewbread being among 'the most holy of the offerings of the Lord' (v. 9).

As regards the original significance of the shewbread offering there can be no doubt. This antique form of oblation had its origin in pre-historic times in the naïve desire to propitiate the deity by providing him with a meal (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 16). This view is confirmed by the fact that it was accompanied, even in the later period, by a provision of wine, as is clear from the mention of 'the flagons thereof, and the bowls thereof, to pour out withal' (Ex 25:29 RV, Nu 4:7). The analogy of the classical lectisternia will at once suggest itself. Less familiar is the similar offering among the Babylonians, who laid cakes of 'sweet,' i.e. unleavened, bread on the altars of various deities (see Zimmer's list in KAT³ 600). The analogy between the Babylonian and Hebrew ritual is rendered still more striking by the identity of the name 'bread of the presence' (loc. cit.), and of the number of cakes offered—twelve or a multiple of twelve. This number had probably an astrological origin, having reference originally to the twelve months of the year, or the twelve signs of the Zodiac. For the later Hebrews, at least, the twelve loaves of the presence-bread doubtless represented the twelve tribes of Israel, and were interpreted as a symbolical expression of the nation's gratitude to God as the continual source of every material blessing. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SHIBAH.—A name given to a well dug by Isaac (Gn 26:25), which gave its name to the town Beersheba (wh. see). The word means, according to the writer, 'an oath'; and Beersheba is 'the well of the oath,' so named from the swearing of the oath of friendship between Isaac and Abimelech (Gn 26:26). In Gn 21:22-34 we have another account, according to which the well was dug by Abraham and received its name from the oath between Abraham and Abimelech. There is also a play on the word shebā'ah, 'oath' and sheba, 'seven,' as a sacrifice of seven lambs was offered. Perhaps the name, however, was already in existence before Abraham's time, and the writer simply gives a more or less plausible explanation of its derivation. W. F. BOYD.

SHIBBOLETH (means both 'ear of corn' and 'stream').—In the strife that arose between the Gileadites, under Jephthah, and the Ephraimites, an episode occurred which is recounted in Jg 12:4-6. According to this, the Gileadites were holding the fords of Jordan in order to cut off the fugitive Ephraimites; but the only way of differentiating between friend and foe was to test a fugitive as to his pronunciation of such a word as 'Shibboleth,' in which the Ephraimite peculiarity of pronouncing sh as s would immediately be noticed. If, on uttering this word, the fugitive pronounced it 'Sibboleth,' he was known to be an Ephraimite, and was forthwith slain. In this way there fell, according to the obviously exaggerated account in J, 'forty and two thousand.' W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

SHIELD.—See ARMOUR ARMS, § 2 (a).

SHIGGAION.—See PSALMS, p. 772^a.

SHIHOR. In Is 23¹, Jer 21⁸ seems to mean Egypt (?), the Nile (?), or the waters of Egypt: in 1 Ch 13⁵, Jos 13³, it is the S.W. frontier of Canaan. If the name is Hebrew it may mean 'the Black,' in allusion to the dark waters or even to the black alluvial land itself: the Egypt. name of Egypt is Kemi, meaning 'black.' But, as Brugsch pointed out, Shi-Hor is the Egypt. name of a stream or canal, possibly the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, on or near the eastern border of Egypt (see SHUR). The black alluvium might well be counted as the boundary of Canaan: but elsewhere the boundary is the 'Brook' (or 'River') of Egypt, i.e. the Wady el-Arish (see SHUR). F. L. GRIFFITH.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH.—One of the boundaries of Asher (Jos 19³⁴). It stands apparently for a river, most probably the Nahr ez-Zerkā, the Crocodile River.

SHIKKERON.—A place on the northern boundary of Judah (Jos 15¹¹). The site is unknown.

SHILHI.—Father of Asa's wife (1 K 22⁴, 2 Ch 20¹).

SHILIM.—A town of Judah (Jos 15²⁷). Cf. SHAARAIM, 2.

SHILLEM, SHILLEMITES.—See SHALLUM, No. 7.

SHILOAH.—See SILOAM.

SHILOH.—1. Here the Israelites assembled at the completion of the conquest, and erected the Tent of Meeting; portions were assigned to the still landless tribes, and cities to the Levites (Jos 18¹ etc. 21¹ etc.). At Shiloh the congregation deliberated regarding the altar built by the men of the eastern tribes in the Jordan Valley (22²²). During the period of the Judges, it was the central sanctuary (Jg 18³¹), the scene of great religious festivals and pilgrimages (21¹⁹, 1 S 1⁹). On one of these occasions the Benjamites captured as wives the women who danced among the vineyards (21¹⁹). Here the youth of Samuel was spent, and from this narrative we gather that the 'tent' had given place to a permanent structure, a 'temple' (hkal), under the care of the high priest Eli and his family. The loss of the ark and the disaster to his sons proved fatal to Eli (1 S 4¹⁻²), and Shiloh apparently ceased to rank as a sanctuary. The destruction of its temple, possibly by the Philistines, is alluded to in Jer 7¹², 14 26⁶. (cf. Ps 78⁶⁰). Eli's descendants are afterwards found at Nob (1 S 14³ 22¹¹). The prophet Ahijah was a native of Shiloh (1 K 11²⁶ 14², 4).

The original name, as shown by the gentile Shilonite, was Shilon. This form survives in the mod. Seilan, a ruined site on a hill E. of the road to Shechem, about 9 miles N. of Bethel, and 3 miles S.W. of Khān el-Lubbān (Lebonah, Jg 21¹⁹). A terrace on the N. of the hill, with a rock-hewn quadrangle, c. 400 ft. × 80 ft., may have been the site of the ancient temple. There is an excellent spring in the valley to the east. There are also numerous rock-hewn tombs. The terraced slopes tell of vineyards, long since disappeared.

2. The real meaning of the clause 'until Shiloh come' (Gn 49¹⁰ EV) is doubtful. If 'Shiloh' were a name applied to the Messiah, it would have a special significance; but this cannot be discovered. No ancient version so reads it. The Targ. (Onk., Jerus., and pseud.-Jon.) all interpret it of the Messiah. The Peshitta, on the other hand, reads 'until he shall come whose it [i.e. the kingdom] is.' Three possible readings are given in RVm. (1) 'Till he come to Shiloh'; grammatically correct, and supported by many scholars.

SHIMEI, SHIMEITES

Elsewhere in Scripture, Shiloh means the Ephraimite town. This is taken to refer to Judah's laying down the leadership he had exercised, when, the conquest finished, Israel assembled at Shiloh. Apart from other objections, however, shēbet, 'sceptre,' seems to denote something more than a mere tribal supremacy, and it is not certain that Judah possessed even that pre-eminence. (2) 'Until that which is his shall come'; so LXX 'till the things reserved for him come.' (3) 'Until he shall come whose it is' (Pesh., Targ. as above). While no certain decision as to the exact meaning is possible, the Messianic character of the verse is clear. It contemplates the ultimate passing of the power of Judah into the hands of an ideal ruler.

Shilonite—'native of Shiloh' is used of—1. Ahijah (1 K 11²⁶ etc.). 2. A family dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Ch 9⁴ etc.). In the latter passage the true reading is prob. 'the Shelanite' (cf. Nu 26²⁰). W. EWING.

SHILONITE.—1. See SHILOH, 2. 2. See SHELAH, 1.

SHILSHAH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁷).

SHIMEA.—1. See SHAMMA, No. 2. 2. A Merarite (1 Ch 6³⁰ (11)). 3. A Gershonite (1 Ch 6³⁰ (64)). 4. See SHAMMAH, No. 2.

SHIMEAH.—1. A descendant of Jehiel (1 Ch 8², called in 9³⁸ Shimeam). 2. See SHAMMAH, No. 2.

SHIMEAM.—See SHIMEAH, No. 1.

SHIMEATH.—A name given to the father or mother of one of the murderers of Joash (2 K 12²¹, 2 Ch 24²⁶). The murderer himself is called Zabad in 2 Ch. and Jozacar in 2 Kings. Probably for Zabad in 2 Ch. we ought to read Jehozabad, and undoubtedly Jozacar and Jehozabad are identical, and by scribal repetition (dittography) we have the two really identical names and the varying forms Shimeath, Shimrith, and Shomer. The descriptions 'Ammonitess' and 'Moabitess' in 2 Ch. are certainly later embellishments of the story, and Shimeath was probably the father of the one murderer, Jehozabad, and an Israelite. The Shimeathites were a family or division of the tribe of Caleb (1 Ch 2⁴). They may be included in the description 'the families of the scribes, which dwelt at Jabez,' but the whole passage leaves us uncertain. The Vulg. regards the name as referring to the function of a section of the scribes (resonantes) after the Exile. W. F. BORD.

SHIMEI, SHIMEITES.—Shimei was a popular name among the Hebrews, being especially common in Levitical circles. Of most of the persons bearing it, absolutely nothing except the name is known. 1. The personage of this designation, of whom the historian has given us some details, is a Benjamite of the clan of Saul. On account of his tribal and family connexions, it is quite natural for him to be David's bitter enemy. As the latter is fleeing before Absalom, Shimei meets him and heaps curses and insults on the fugitive monarch. David's triumphant return, however, brings him in abject penitence to the feet of his sovereign, who pardons him (2 S 16¹⁻¹⁴, 19¹⁷⁻²⁴). Nevertheless, David in his dying charge is represented as enjoining Solomon to 'bring his hoar head to Sheol with blood.' After this Shimei is not permitted to go beyond the walls of Jerusalem on pain of death; but presuming three years later to go to Gath in quest of fugitive slaves, he is executed by Benaiah at the command of the king (1 K 2³⁶, 38¹). 2. In the court intrigues connected with the royal succession, a courtier, Shimei (cf. art. RER) by name, espoused the cause of Solomon (1 K 1⁸). The official at the head of one of the prefectures which were erected by this monarch, is probably identical with him (1 K 4¹). 3. A master of the vineyards under David (1 Ch 27³¹). 4. A prince of the Judean royal house, a brother of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3¹⁸). 5. The name occurs in the tribal genealogies of both Simeon and Reuben (1 Ch 4²⁶, 27 5⁴ [in v. 5 Shema]). 6. The grandson of Levi (Ex 6¹⁷, Nu 3¹⁸, 21, 1 Ch 6¹⁷ 23⁷, 9). 7. A son of Merari (1 Ch 6²²). 8. In the genealogy of Asaph (1 Ch 6²³). 9. The tenth course of Levitical singers who were appointed by David (1 Ch 25¹⁷). 10. A Levite who took part in the cleansing of the Temple under Hezekiah, probably identical with one mentioned later as having charge of the tithes and oblations (2 Ch 29¹⁴ 31¹² 12). 11. In post-exilic times the name appears among those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²² [1 Es 9²² Semeis] 12. [1 Es 9²² Semei] 12 [1 Es 9²⁴ Someis]). The individuals referred to in vv. 12 and 13 belong to the laity. In Zec 12¹³ the family of the Shimeites are mentioned as participants in the mourning for national guilt; they appear in this connexion as representatives of the Levites. 12. The name occurs in the genealogy of Mordecai (Est 2⁵ [Ad. Est 11² Semeias]). 13. Shammah, the brother of David, appears as Shimei in 2 S 21¹². 14. 1 Ch 8²¹ - Shema of v. 12.

JAMES A. KELSO.

SHIMEON.—One of the sons of Harim, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²¹ [1 Es 9²² Simon Chosameus]).

SHIMON.—A Judahite family (1 Ch 4²⁰).

SHIMRATH.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8²¹).

SHIMRI.—1. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4²⁷). 2. The father of one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴⁶). 3. A family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26¹⁹). 4. A Levite (2 Ch 29¹³).

SHIMRITH.—See SHIMEATH.

SHIMRON.—1. The fourth son of Issachar (Gn 46¹³, Nu 26²⁴ 29, 1 Ch 7¹); gentile Shimronites in Nu 26²⁴ 29. 2. One of the towns whose kings Jabin called to his assistance (Jos 11¹). It was afterwards allotted to the tribe of Zebulun (Jos 19¹⁴). Its site is unknown. Cf. next article.

SHIMRON-MERON.—A Canaanite town, west of Jordan, whose king was among those whom Joshua smote (Jos 12²⁰). Comparing its position in the list with that of Shimron in the list given in Jos 11¹, we may infer that the two places are identical.

SHIMSHAI.—The scribe or secretary of Rehun (Ezr 4⁸ 9. 17. 22), called in 1 Es 2¹⁶ Samellius.

SHIN and SIN.—The twenty-first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 21st part, each verse of which in Heb. begins with this letter in one or other of its two forms.

SHINAB.—The king of Admah (Gn 14⁹).

SHINAR.—A term employed in the OT for the greater part, if not the whole, of Babylonia (Gn 10¹⁰ 11³ 14¹ 9, Jos 7², Is 11¹⁴, Zec 5¹¹, Dn 1²). Its former identification with Sumer, or Southern Babylonia, never regarded as very satisfactory, is now given up. Equally untenable is the view that it is to be identified with Shan-khar, a land or district the king of which is mentioned in a letter from Tell el-Amarna along with the king of Khatti. There is little doubt that Shinar is to be identified with the land of Babylonia, but the origin of the name has not been determined. L. W. KING.

SHION.—A town of Issachar (Jos 19¹⁴), prob. 'Aydn ash-Sha'in, about 3 miles east of Nazareth.

SHIPHI.—A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4²⁷ 28).

SHIPHEITE.—See SHEPHAM.

SHIPRAH.—One of the two Hebrew midwives (Ex 1¹⁹).

SHIPHTAN.—An Ephraimite prince (Nu 34²⁶).

SHIPS AND BOATS.—1. In OT and Apocrypha.—

(1) Among the Israelites.—In spite of the long line of coast by which Palestine is bordered, the Israelites were an agricultural rather than a maritime people. In fact a large part of the coast was occupied by the Phoenicians in the North and the Philistines in the South. That in the earliest times the people as a whole were ignorant of navigation is shewn by their version of the Flood, in which an unnavigable box takes the place of the navigated ship of the ancient Accadian story. Except tions more or less to the rule in relatively ancient times were the tribes of Asher on the north, and Dan, before its emigration, on the south.

'And Dan, why did he remain in ships?
Asher sat still at the haven of the sea,
And abode by his creeks' (Jg 5¹⁷).

It is very doubtful whether boats were originally used, even by the Phoenicians and the Philistines, except for fishing, and perhaps for purely local traffic and communication. Zidon, the earliest Phœnician settlement, was, like its synonym, Beth-saida, derived from a root meaning to catch prey, and was doubtless first noted as a fishing town. Again, Dagon, the chief god of the Philistines, is derived from the word dag, meaning a fish.

At a somewhat later period we find Zebulun described as a 'haven of ships' (Gn 49¹³), and later still, probably after the division of the kingdom, Issachar is mentioned with Zebulun as deriving wealth from naval commerce (Dt 33¹⁹).

In any case, it is not till the time of Solomon that we hear definitely of any important development of commercial enterprise. Under the direction, and with the co-operation, of the Phœnicians, cedar and cypress timbers from Lebanon were cut and floated down the rivers to the coast and formed into rafts (AV floats), which carried the sawn stones to Joppa. Here they were broken up, and both were conveyed to Jerusalem for the building of the Temple (1 K 5⁸, 2 Ch 2¹⁴). Solomon had also a navy of ships navigated by Phœnician sailors. They were stationed at Ezion-geber, at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, and traded with Ophir, probably in the south-east of Arabia, in gold and precious stones (1 K 9²⁶ 28). The 'ivory and apes and peacocks' of 1 K 10²² may have been imported into this region from India and more distant Eastern lands, or the ships of Hiram and Solomon may themselves have made more distant voyages. In addition to this, there was a regular trade maintained with Egypt, whence Solomon imported chariots and horses (10²⁸ 29).

The conflict between the Northern and Southern Kingdoms after Solomon's death put a stop to the commercial activities of the Jews, and there does not appear to have been any attempt to revive them till the time of Jehoshaphat, whose fleet of ships made for trading for gold to Ophir was wrecked at Ezion-geber. An offer of Ahaziah to join in a renewal of the enterprise was afterwards rejected (1 K 22⁴⁸ 49). The mention in Is 2¹⁶ of 'ships of Tarshish' among the objects against which J's judgment would be directed, makes it likely that there was again a revival of naval commerce in the prosperous reigns of Jotham and Uzziah. Finally, in the time of the Maccabees we read that Simon, the brother of Judas, made Joppa a seaport (1 Mac 14²). It was probably at this period that the Jews first began to have experience of ships of war (1 Mac 11⁷ 15²; cf. Dn 11³⁰), though they must have been in use at a much earlier period. There are figures of such ships, with sharp beaks for ramming, in Layard's History of Nineveh, and Sennacherib in his expedition against Merodach-baladan had ships manned by Tyrians. In Is 33²¹ the allusion is certainly to hostile ships, but the reference may be to ships of transport, rather than warships. In any case the distinction between a merchantman and a warship in early times was obviously not so definite as it afterwards became.

(2) Among neighbouring nations.—Unlike the Israelites, the Phœnicians were the great navigators of the ancient world. Their country was particularly favourable for such a development. Dwelling on a narrow piece of sea-board, unsuited for agriculture (they imported corn from Palestine, 1 K 5¹¹, Ac 12²⁰), they had behind them the Lebanon range, famed for its great cedars, and a coast with good natural harbours. By the time of Solomon they would seem already to have had an extensive trade. The phrase 'ships of Tarshish' which probably meant originally ships accustomed to trade with Tartessus in Spain, had come to be used in a secondary sense, like our 'East-Indiaman,' of large vessels suited for such a trade. It is believed that by this time they had penetrated as far as Cornwall, and had even found their way to the Canaries. Their numerous colonies, at any rate the most distant, of which Carthage is the best known, probably began to be founded soon after. The form of their ships was, it would appear, a gradual development from the hollowed trunk of a tree to the vessel of three banks of oars, known among the Greeks as a trireme (see Hastings' DB, art. 'Ships'). With the Assyrians navigation seems to have been confined to the Tigris and Euphrates, where small timber boats, supported by inflated skins (keleks), and coracles of plaited willow (kufas), were largely in use (see EBI, art. 'Ships'). On the other hand, the Babylonians seem quite to have justified the phrase 'ships of their rejoicing' i.e. in which they take pride (Is 43¹⁴), having extended their voyages to the Persian Gulf, and even engaged in commerce with India since the 7th cent. B.C. The Egyptians used 'vessels of papyrus' for the navigation of the Nile (Is 18², cf. Job 9²⁵), but it is not quite certain whether they were boats constructed out of papyrus, or rafts composed of bundles of these reeds bound together. We learn from Egyptian monuments that they had also ships of considerable size. We have very little to guide us in determining the form or size of ships during these early periods, but it is probable that while at first they appear to have varied greatly, they gradually approximated to the type of vessel used in the Levant in NT times. It is not possible to say at what time sails were first introduced. We find them, or more correctly the sail, in the one great sail mentioned in Ezk 27⁷ in addition to the oars. In Is 33²² the sail only is mentioned. In v.²¹ the 'galley with oars' is mentioned distinctively, and in contrast to the 'gallant ship,' which probably means the larger vessel provided with a sail.

(3) In literature.—That the Israelites, though, generally speaking, unused to navigation, had some acquaintance with and took an interest in shipping, is clear from the constant reference to ships in their literature. Is 33²², in which Israel is compared to a disabled vessel, has been already alluded to. Ezekiel's famous comparison of Tyre to a ship in 27¹⁻¹¹ gives a fair general idea of the different parts of a ship of that period, though some of them—the deck-planks of ivory, the sail of fine bordered linen, the awnings of blue and purple—are evidently idealized. The graphic picture in Ps 107²³⁻²⁷ of the terrors experienced by those 'who go down to the sea in ships' was almost certainly written by one who had experienced a storm at sea. In Ps 104²⁶ the ships are, as much as leviathan, the natural denizens of the deep. Of special beauty is the simile of the ship that passes over the waves and leaves no pathway of its keel behind (Wis 5¹⁰), to express the transitoriness of human life and human hope. The danger of ship-faring is pointed out in Wis 14⁴. That people should commit their lives to a small piece of wood would be absurd but for Divine Providence.

2. In the NT.—We are concerned chiefly with our Lord's Galilean ministry and St. Paul's voyages. (1) On the Sea of Galilee.—The Galilean boats were used primarily for fishing, and also for communication between the villages on the Lake, and probably for local trade. At least four of our Lord's disciples were fishermen, and were called while engaged in their work. He frequently crossed the Lake with His disciples, and sometimes preached from a boat to the people on the shore (Lk 5⁸, Mk 4¹). Among the most picturesque incidents of His life as recorded in the Gospels are the miracle of stilling the tempest and the miraculous draughts of fishes. The boats were small enough to be in danger of sinking from a very large catch of fish, and yet large enough to contain our Lord and at least the majority of His twelve Apostles, and to weather the storms which are still frequent on the Lake. It appears from the frequent use of the definite article, 'the boat,' that one particular boat, probably St. Peter's, was usually employed.

(2) In the Levant.—Ships played an important part in St. Paul's missionary journeys. It was frequently necessary for him to cross the Ægean, and sometimes to make longer voyages to and from Syria. That he was frequently exposed to great danger we learn not only from the detailed account of his shipwreck in Ac 27, but from an express statement in 2 Co 11²⁵, in which, writing before this event, he says 'thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day have I been in the deep,' which certainly seems to mean that he drifted for this space of time upon the spar or some part of a wrecked ship. But our interest is centred chiefly in the account of his voyage from Cæsarea to Puteoli in Ac 27. 28. From this we learn that the larger vessels were of a considerable size, that of the shipwreck containing, according to what is probably the correct text, 276 persons (27²⁷; according to B, 76). It was impelled only by sail, the only oars mentioned being the paddles used as rudders, which were braced up, probably in order to allow the ship to be more easily anchored at the stern (vv.²⁸, 40). This, a custom not infrequently resorted to when some special purpose was served by it, was to enable them to thrust the vessel into a favourable place on shore without the necessity of turning her round. In addition to the mainsail, the vessel had a foresail (artemon), which was used for the same purpose, as more easily adapted for altering the ship's course (v.⁴⁰). The vessel had one small boat, which was usually towed behind, but was taken up for greater security during the storm (v.¹⁶). Another remarkable practice is that described in v.¹⁷ as 'using helps, undergirding the ship.' These helps or 'under girders' were chains passed under and across the ship, and tightened to prevent the boards from springing. It was a common practice of ancient times, and is not unknown even in modern navigation. Soundings were taken to test the near approach to land, much as they would be at the present day. Though ships had to depend mainly on one great square sail, by bracing this they were enabled to sail within seven points of the wind. In this case, allowing another six points for leeway, the vessel under a north-easter (Euraquilo, v.¹⁴) made way from Cauda to Malta, a direction considerably north of west. As, however, the vessel could not safely carry the mainsail, or even the yard-arm, these were first lowered on deck, and then the vessel must have been heaved to and been carried along and steadied by a small storm-sail of some kind. Had she drifted before the wind she would inevitably have been driven on to the Syrtis, the very thing they wished to avoid (v.¹⁷). This has been shown very clearly by Smith in his classical work, The Voyage of St. Paul, ch. iii. The same writer draws attention to the thoroughly nautical character of St. Luke's language, and the evidence of its accuracy by a comparison with what is known of ancient naval practice; and, what is perhaps even more striking, the evidence of skilful navigation to which the narrative points. He justly observes that the chief reason why sailing in the winter was dangerous (27²⁸) was not so much the storms, as the constant obscuring of the heavens, by which, before the discovery of the compass, mariners had chiefly to direct their course.

The fact that two of the ships in which St. Paul sailed were ships of Alexandria engaged in the wheat trade with Italy (27²⁸, 28¹¹⁻¹²; Puteoli was the great emporium of wheat), is especially interesting, as we happen to know more about them than any other ancient class of ship. In the time of Commodus a series of coins with figures of Alexandrian corn-ships was struck to commemorate an exceptional importation of wheat from Alexandria at a time of scarcity. One of these ships, moreover, was driven into the Piræus by stress of weather. Lucian lays the scene of one of his dialogues (The Ship or Wishes) on board of her. From the coins and the dialogue together we get a very good idea of the ships of that time (2nd cent. A.D.) and their navigation. Lucian's ship was 180 ft. by 45 ft., with a calculated tonnage of about 1200. It is not surprising, then, that the Castor and Pollux was large enough to contain, in addition to her cargo and crew, the 276 persons of the shipwrecked vessel (Ac 28¹¹). Josephus was wrecked in a ship containing 600. The ships had one huge square sail attached to an upright mast about the centre of the vessel, with a very long yard-arm. There was also a second small mast, set diagonally near the bow, and looking not unlike a modern bowsprit, which carried the foresail. On the principal mast there was also sometimes a small triangular topsail. Both ends of the vessel curved upwards and were pointed horizontally, and terminated, the former especially, in some sort of decoration, very frequently a swan. The two rudder paddles, the universal method of steering till about the 12th cent., were usually in the larger vessels passed through port-holes, which could also serve as hawse holes when the vessel was anchored by the stern.

(3) In literature.—In the books of the NT, shipping provided the writers with some striking similes. In the Ep. to the Heb. (6¹⁹), Christian hope is called 'the anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and entering into that which is within the veil.' Again, St. James compares the tongue, in the control which its constraint exercises on the character, to the very small rudders by which ships, though they be so great, are turned about (3⁴). F. H. WOODS.

SHISHA.—See SHAVSHA.

SHISHAK (Egyp. Shoshenk or Sheshonk I.).—Founder of the 22nd Dyn. (c. B.C. 950). He reigned at least 21 years. Jeroboam fled to him (1 K 11⁴⁰), and he plundered Jerusalem in the fifth year of Rehoboam (14²⁵, 2 Ch 12²). A long list of Palestinian towns of Israel, as well as of Judah, was engraved by Sheshonk on the south wall of the temple of Karnak, but Jerusalem has not been recognized among the surviving names in the list. Max Müller suggests that these towns may not have been conquered but that they merely paid tribute, hence the appearance of Israelitish towns among them. F. L. GRIFFITH.

SHITRAI.—A Sharonite who was over king David's herds that fed in Sharon (1 Ch 27²⁹).

SHITTAN TREE (shittah, Is 41¹⁹ RV 'acacia tree'; shittim wood [atse-shittim], Ex 25⁵, 10, 13, 26¹⁵, 27¹, 6, Dt 10⁴, RV 'acacia wood').—shittah was originally shittah, and is equivalent to Arab. sunt, which is the Acacia nilotica; but the word no doubt included other desert acacias. The seyal of the Arabs, which includes the gum-arabic tree (A. seyal), and A. tortilis would both furnish suitable wood. Both these trees are plentiful around the Dead Sea, particularly at 'Ain Jidy. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

SHITTIM.—1. The name of the last encampment of the Israelites, on the east of the Jordan opposite Jericho. There the Israelites began to intermarry with Moabites (Nu 25¹⁰), and from there Joshua sent out the spies to Jericho (Jos 2¹ 3¹). The name means 'acacias,' and the place is called in Nu 33⁴⁸ Abel-shittim, or 'Meadow of acacias.' Josephus (Ant. iv. viii. 1, v. i. 1) identifies the place with Abila, which he says is 7½ Roman miles east of the Jordan, and which Jerome says was 6 miles east of it. Several modern scholars identify Abila with Khirbet Kefrên at the entrance of the Wady Kefrên, at the base of the mountains of Moab.

2. Joel's reference to the 'Valley of Shittim' (3¹⁸) must refer to some valley leading from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea (cf. Ezk 47¹⁵).—perhaps the 'Valley of the brook Kidron,' the modern Wadyen-Nâr. It is certainly not the same as No. 1, although confused with it by Ochser (JE xl. 297 f.). The reference to Shittim in Mic 6¹—from Shittim to Gilgal—is geographically unintelligible, and is rightly thought by many scholars to be a gloss. GEORGE A. BARTON.

SHIZA.—Father of a Reubenite chief (1 Ch 11⁴⁰).

SHOA.—A race named in Ezk 23²³ along with Babylonians, Chaldeans, Pekod, Koa, and Assyrians. The Sutti were nomads, frequently named in the same company by Assyrian and Babylonian writers, and among other seats inhabited the E. of the Tigris. C. H. W. JOHNS.

SHOBAB.—1. One of David's sons (2 S 5¹⁴, 1 Ch 3¹⁴). 2. A Calebite (1 Ch 2¹³).

SHOBACH.—The captain of the host of Hadarezer, the Aramean king of Zobah (wh. see), who commanded the forces of that king when he aided the Ammonites in their war with king David. David defeated him, and Shobach lost his life (2 S 10¹⁶⁻¹⁸). In 1 Ch 19¹⁶ the name is spelled Shophach.

Perhaps because so little was known of Shobach, he played an important part in later imaginative tradition. The Mishna (Sotah, viii. 1) makes him a giant of the Ammonites equal to Goliath, while the Samaritan Chronicle, sometimes called 'the book of Joshua,' tells a long tale concerning him (chs. 26-38), making him the son of Haman, a king of Persia whom Joshua had killed, and who stirred up a great coalition to avenge the death of his father! All authentic information concerning Shobach is contained in 2 S 10¹⁶⁻¹⁸, which 1 Ch 19¹⁶ repeats. GEORGE A. BARTON.

SHOBAL.—A family of porters (Ezr 2⁴, Neh 7⁴⁶ [1 Es 5²⁵ Sabi]).

SHOBAL.—1. A 'son' of Seir the Horite, and one of the 'dukes' of the Horites (Gn 36²⁰, 23, 29 = 1 Ch 1³⁸, 40). 2. A Calebite family in the tribe of Judah. This Shobal is called in 1 Ch 4¹, 2 a 'son' of Judah, and in 2⁵⁰ 'son' of Caleb and 'father' of Kiriath-jearim. The name is probably to be connected, if not identified, with No. 1.

SHOBEK.—A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10²⁴ (28)).

SHOBI.—According to 2 S 17²⁷, a son of Nahash the king of Ammon, who, with Machir of Lo-debar, showed kindness to David when he fled to Mahanaim at the time of Absalom's rebellion. There is some doubt about the name, however, as in 1 Ch 19¹⁴ the son of Nahash who succeeded him was Hanun. S. A. Cook (AJSJL xvi. 164) suggests that the text of 2 S 17²⁷ is corrupt, and that it originally read 'and Nahash came,' instead of 'Shobi, son of Nahash.' The very existence of Shobi seems, therefore, uncertain. If, however, the present text of Samuel is sound, it is a better historical authority than Chronicles.

GEORGE A. BARTON.

SHOCK, STACK.—In Jg 15⁵ the former, and in Ex 22⁵ the latter, is in AV the rendering of the same word—RV uniformly 'shocks,'—which in both places is opposed to the 'standing corn' or 'standing grain' (so Amer. RV for 'corn' throughout). The former, at least, is misleading, since the Hebrews did not set up their sheaves in shocks (Scoticæ 'stooks'), but piled them in heaps for conveyance to the threshing-floor (AGRICULTURE, § 3). So in the beautiful figure, Job 5²⁶, render 'like as a heap of corn cometh up (to the threshing-floor) in its season.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SHOE.—See DRESS, § 6, where also reference is made to the custom, widely prevalent in antiquity, of removing the shoes before entering a temple, or other sacred precinct, in order to save the latter from ceremonial defilement. (For the original motive see RS² 453.)

The shoe played a part, further, in certain symbolical actions in Hebrew law. Thus in Ru 4⁷ we are informed that it was an ancient custom in Israel, on completing a purchase, for the seller to draw off his shoe and hand it to the buyer, as a symbol of the transference of the property sold. A parallel symbolism is disclosed by the frequent occurrence, in early Babylonian deeds of sale dealing with house property, of the phrase, 'the pestle [of the mortar] has been transferred' (Meissner, Aus dem altbab. Recht, 6). In times when writing was the accomplishment of the few, such a symbolic act in the presence of witnesses was doubtless held equivalent to the later formal deeds (Jer 32⁴⁴).

The same passage of Ruth and Dt 25¹⁰ shows that this symbolism, somewhat differently performed, with another still more expressive, was also adopted in the case of one renouncing his right to his deceased brother's wife (see MARRIAGE, § 4).

In the expression 'upon [or over] Edom will I cast my shoe' (Ps 60⁸ 108⁹) many authorities find a reference to an extension of this shoe symbolism, the actual taking possession of the property being symbolized by throwing a shoe over or upon it. Others, however, rendering as RVm 'unto Edom,' see in the words an assertion of Edom's servitude, it being the part of a slave to carry his master's shoes. The context and the singular 'shoe' (not 'shoes') favour the former interpretation.

SHOHAM.—A Merarite (1 Ch 24²⁷).

SHOMER.—1. 1 Ch 7²². See SHEMER, No. 3. 2. 2 K 12²⁴. See SHIMEATH.

SHOPACH.—See SHOBACH.

SHOSHANNIM, SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH.—See PSALMS, p. 772^a.

SHOVEL.—1. Ex 27³ 38², Nu 4¹⁴, 1 K 7⁴⁰, 45, 2 K 25¹⁴, 2 Ch 4¹¹, 16, Jer 52¹⁸, of a utensil for removing the ashes from the altar. 2. Is 30²⁴, for the broad, shallow, winnowing shovel with which corn after threshing was thrown up against the wind to clear it of the chaff.

SHRINE.—See DIANA.

SHROUD.—This word is used in Ezk 31³ in the general sense of 'shelter,' 'covering,' as in Milton's Comus, 147—'Run to your shrouds, within these brakes and trees.'

SHUA.—1. The father of Judah's Canaanite wife (Gn 38², 12), who appears in 1 Ch 2³ (RV) as Bath-shua. 2. A daughter of Heber (1 Ch 7³²).

SHUAH.—A son of Abraham and Keturah, Gn 25¹, 1 Ch 1². The tribe represented by this name may perhaps be the Suchu of the cuneiform inscriptions, (n the right bank of the Euphrates. Bidad the Shuhite (Job 2¹¹ 8¹ 18¹ 25¹ 42²) is prob. intended to be thought of as belonging to this tribe.

SHUAL.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁰).

SHUAL, LAND OF.—A region referred to in 1 S 13¹⁷ as the destination of one of the three bands of Philistine raiders. The close connexion of Ophrah with the district named indicates that this was one of its towns.

H. L. WILLETT.

SHUBAEL.—See SHEBUEL.

SHUHAH.—A brother of Chelub (1 Ch 4¹¹).

SHUHAM.—A son of Dan (Nu 26⁴), called in Gn 46²² Hushim; gentilic Shuhamites in Nu 26⁴.

SHUHITE.—See SHUAH.

SHULAMMITE.—See SHUNEM, SONG OF SONGS.

SHUMATHITES.—A family of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 28²⁴).

SHUNAMMITE.—See next article.

SHUNEM.—A border town of Issachar (Jos 19¹⁴), and the camping-ground of the Philistines before Saul's last battle (1 S 28⁴). It has been identified from early times with Sōlam, a village five miles south of Tabor, on the south slope of Little Hermon. It is on the north of the Valley of Jezreel, and opposite to Gilboa, where Saul was encamped; the situation suits the scene of the battle well. A Shunem is also the scene of Elisha's miracle in 2 K 4⁴¹, where the identification is more doubtful. The narrative suggests a place on the road from Samaria, his home (v. 1), to Carmel, and not too far from the latter (v. 28⁴); Solam satisfies neither of these conditions. Shunammite is applied (1) to Abishag (1 K 1¹), who is perhaps the original of the Shulammite of Ca 6¹, the interchange of l and n being exemplified in the modern Solam—Shunem; (2) to the unnamed friend of Elisha in 2 K 4⁴¹. 8¹⁻⁴. The narrative gives us a picture of Heb. home-life at its best, and shows how the legal and theoretical subjection of the wife was often modified in practice. She is 'a great woman,' perhaps an helress, and takes the lead in both stories; by the time of the latter she may have been a widow. For the miracle, cf. 1 K 17²⁴.

C. W. EMMET.

SHUNI.—A son of Gad (Gn 46¹⁴, Nu 26¹⁴ (26) [gentilic Shunites]).

SHUPHAM, SHUPHAMITES, SHUPPIM.—See MUPPIM and SHEPHUPHAM.

SHUR.—A place or district on the N.E. border of Egypt (Gn 16⁷ 20¹ 25¹⁸, Ex 15²², 1 S 15⁷ 27⁴). The name in Aramaic means 'wall,' and, as Egypt. th is regularly rendered by sh in Aramaic, Shur is probably the Egypt. city Thor (the vocalization is uncertain), a fortress near the N.E. frontier, and capital of the 14th nome of Lower Egypt. This Thor lay on a stream or canal named Shi-Hôr (see SHIHOR), and malefactors were sent thither after having their noses cut off. It is tempting to identify it with Rhinocorura (see EGYPT [RIVER OF]), but it was on the banks of a fresh-water canal and 10 days' march from Gaza. Perhaps it is the later Sele, near el-Kantara, on the Suez Canal.

F. L. L. GRIFFITH.

SHUSHAN (Dn 8², Neh 1¹ etc.).—The Susa (Ad. Est 11⁹) of the Greeks, now Sus or Shush in S.W. Persia, between the Shapur and the river of Dizful (the ancient Koprates). It was for many centuries the capital of Elam, and afterwards one of the three capitals of the Persian empire. Cf. also ELAM.

SHUSHANCHITES, i.e. inhabitants of Shushan (Susa), are mentioned in Ezr 4⁹ among the colonists settled by Osnapper (Ashurbanipal) in Samaria.

SHUSHAN-EDUTH.—See PSALMS, p. 772^a.

SHUTHELAH.—One of the three clans of the tribe of Ephraim (Nu 26³⁴. [gentilic Shuthelahite]). In the parallel passage, 1 Ch 7²⁰, 21, the foundation text has been expanded and mis-written. J. F. McCURDY.

SHUTTLE.—Only Job 7⁴, where it is doubtful whether the reference is to the shuttle-rod of the loom or to the loom itself. The Heb. word has the latter meaning in its only other occurrence, Jg 16⁴. See SPINNING and WEAVING, §§ 3 and 4 (b).

SIA (Neh 7⁷) or SIAHA (Ezr 2⁴).—A family of Nethinim (1 Es 5²⁹ Sua) who returned with Zerubbabel.

SIBBECAI.—See MEBUNNAI.

SIBBOLETH.—See SHIBBOLETH.

SIBMAH.—See SEBAM.

SIBRAM.—A point on the ideal northern boundary of the Holy Land (Ezk 47¹⁴); site uncertain. Cf. ZIPHON.

SICCUTH.—A word which is found in parallelism with Chiun in Am 5²⁶. The present form is probably due to the Massoretic combination of the consonants of Sakkuth with the vowels of shiqquts ('abomination')—the same vocalization which we find in Chiun. Sakkut is another name for the Assy. god Ninib, god of the planet Saturn. Kaiwanu (Chiun) is also a name of Ninib. This would make Chiun and Siccuth synonymous—or at least different manifestations of the same deity. As evidence that this is the correct reading of the names, Rogers points out that the Babylonians themselves invoked Sakkut and Kaiwanu together, just as they appear in Amos. (See CHIUN and REPHAN.)

W. M. NESBIT.

SICK, SICKNESS.—See MEDICINE.

SICKLE.—The Hebrew sickles (Dt 16⁹ 23³ etc.) or reaping-hooks were successively of flint, bronze, and iron, and set in handles of bone or wood. In Palestine the flint sickle goes back to the later Stone age (Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, 388 ff. with illust.);

a specimen was found by Bliss at Lachish. Similar flint sickles, with bone hafts, have been found in Egypt. The ancient sickles were of two kinds, according as the cutting edge was plain or toothed; the modern Palestinian reaping-hook is of the latter kind and somewhat elaborately curved (illust. Benzinger, *Heb. Arch.*² 141). In Jer 50¹⁶ the reaper is described as 'he that handleth the sickle' (maggdl, AVm 'scythe', which is also wrongly given as an alternative in AVm of Is 2⁴, Mic 4³ for 'pruning hooks'). The same word is rendered 'sickle' in Jl 3¹³ 'put ye in the sickle, for the vintage is ripe' (RVm), where the context, the LXX rendering, and the same figure in Rev 14¹⁹.²⁰ all show that the reference is to the smaller but similarly shaped grape-knife, expressly named maggdl in the Mishna, with which the grape-gatherer cut off the bunches of ripe grapes.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SICYON.—This was one of the numerous places written to by the Romans on behalf of the Jews in B.C. 139 (1 Mac 15²³). It was situated on the Gulf of Corinth, about 18 miles W. of Corinth. It was distinguished in plastic art, and was in early times very important and wealthy, but sank to insignificance early in the Christian era.

A. SOUTER.

SIDDIM, VALE OF.—The scene of the defeat of the five Canaanite kings by Amraphel and his three allies (Gn 14¹⁻¹²). It is described as full of 'slime pits' or bitumen wells, i.e. holes in the ground from which there issued petroleum, which, when exposed to the air, hardened into solid bitumen. In the rout of the five kings by the four, these holes proved disastrous to the forces of the former, hampering them in their efforts to escape (Gn 14¹⁰). The battlefield is doubtless thought of as being in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, where bitumen is still abundant, masses of it, which have been detached from the bottom, being often found floating on the surface after shocks of earthquake; and the Vale of Siddim is expressly identified in Gn 14³ with the Dead Sea by the explanatory insertion, 'the same is the Salt Sea.' If by this is meant that the vale was co-extensive with the Dead Sea, the statement must be erroneous, for the greater part of the Dead Sea (the N. half of which has in places a depth of 1300 feet) is the remains of an inland sea which existed 'long before the appearance of man on the earth,' and consequently long before the age of Abraham. But it is possible that the Vale of Siddim is intended to be identified with only a portion of the Dead Sea; and those who consider Sodom and the other four 'cities of the plain' to have been situated at the S. end of the Dead Sea (where the morass of es-Sebkha now is) have taken the site of Siddim to be the southern portion of the Sea itself, which is very shallow and may once have been dry ground that has been covered by water through subsidence (cf. art. 'Siddim' in Hastings' DB). By other observers, however, the shallows at the southern extremity of the lake are thought to be the result of elevation rather than of submergence; and if Sodom and the other four cities associated with it were situated at its N. end, a barren plain, in its N.W. corner, may have been the scene of the engagement recorded in Gn 14. G. W. WADE.

SIDE, a Greek colony, was situated on the coast of Pamphylia, on a low promontory about 10 miles E. of the river Eurymedon. It had two harbours and was well fortified. The remains are extensive and interesting (Eski Adalia). It was one of the cities addressed on behalf of the Jews by the Romans in B.C. 139 (1 Mac 15²³).

SIGN.—Any outward fact which serves as a pledge of a Divine word or a proof of a Divine deed is a sign, whether it be natural or supernatural in its character. The rainbow served as the sign of the Noachic, as the rite of circumcision of the Abrahamic, covenant (Gn 9¹² 17¹ 'token,' Ro 4¹¹). That God was with, and worked for, the Israelites was shown in the plagues of Egypt (Ex 10²). Gideon asks for and receives a sign that it is Jehovah who speaks with him (Jg 6³⁷), and Saul also receives signs to confirm the words of Samuel (1 S 10⁷). The prophetic word is thus proved from God (Is 7¹⁴ 38⁷, Jer 44²⁹, Ezk 14⁸). The sign need not be supernatural (1 S 2²⁴, Is 8¹⁴ 20⁹); but the Jews in the time of Christ desired miracles as proofs of Divine power (Mt 12²⁸ 16¹, Jn 4⁴⁸, 1 Co 12²), a request which Jesus refused and condemned. The message of the Baptist, though not confirmed by any sign, was seen to be true (Jn 10⁴). It is Jonah's preaching that is probably referred to when Jesus speaks of him as a sign to his generation (Mt 12³⁹). The 'babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger,' is the simple and humble sign to the shepherds of the birth of a Saviour, Christ the Lord (Lk 2¹²); and He is welcomed by Simeon as 'a sign which is spoken against' (v.³⁴). The Fourth Gospel frequently describes the miracles of Jesus as signs (3² 4³⁴), and attributes to them an evidential value which is not prominent in Jesus' own intention. This confirmation of the gospel was found in the Apostolic Church (Mk 16²⁰, Ac 4¹⁶ 6⁸ 8⁶, 13 15¹², 2 Co 12¹²). The last things will be ushered in by extraordinary signs (Mt 24³⁰, Lk 21²⁵, 2 Th 2²—the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, Rev 12¹³ etc.). The faith that depends on signs, if not altogether condemned (Jn 6²⁶), is by Jesus deprecated (4⁴⁸, cf. 1 Co 12²). Cf. also p. 568⁸.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

SIGNET.—See SEAL.

SIHON.—A king of the Amorites at the time of the conquest of Canaan. His dominion lay beyond the Jordan, between Jabbok on the N. and Arnon on the S., extending eastward to the desert (Jg 11²²). He refused to allow Israel to pass through his land, and was defeated at Jahaz (Nu 21²¹⁻²⁴, Dt 2²⁶⁻²⁸, Jg 11¹⁴⁻²²). Heshbon, his capital, was taken; and his land, along with that of Og king of Bashan, became the possession of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. Frequent reference is made to his defeat (Nu 32³, Dt 1⁴ 3², 9 4⁴⁶, 41 29⁷ 31⁴, Jos 2¹⁰ 9¹⁰ 12² 13¹⁰, 21 37, 1 K 4¹⁹, Neh 9²⁷, Ps 135¹¹ 136⁹). Sihon in Jer 48⁴ stands for Heshbon, the city of Sihon.

W. F. BOYD.

SILAS (Acts) and SILVANUS (Epistles).—There can be little doubt that the Silvanus of the Pauline Epistles (2 Co 1¹⁹, 1 Th 1¹, 2 Th 1¹) is the same as the Silas of Acts.

Probably Silas is an abbreviation, like Lucas (Luke), Hermas, Amplias, Epaphras, Nymphas, etc. In Acts we find many such familiar names (cf. esp. Priscilla in Acts = Prisca Ro 16³ RV, Sopater Ac 20⁴ = Sosipater Ro 16²¹). We might indeed have expected 'Silvas' not 'Silas,' but these abbreviations are very irregular. It has been suggested that Silas was the real name, and of Semitic origin, while Silvanus was adopted for a Roman name as being similar in sound; but then we should have expected for the latter 'Silanus,' not Silvanus.

Silas was a Christian prophet (Ac 15²²), one of the 'chief men among the brethren' (therefore doubtless of Jewish birth), who with 'Judas called Barsabbas' was sent as a delegate from the Apostolic Council with Paul and Barnabas, to convey the decision of the Council (15²²). He was also probably a Roman citizen (16³⁷), though this inference is denied by some. It is uncertain if he returned from Antioch to Jerusalem (15⁴¹ is of doubtful authenticity), but in any case he was soon after chosen by Paul to go with him on the Second Journey, taking Barnabas' place, while Timothy afterwards took John Mark's. For this work Silas' double qualification as a leading Jewish Christian and a Roman citizen would eminently fit him. He accompanied Paul through S. Galatia to Troas, Philippi (where he was imprisoned), Thessalonica, and Berea. When Paul went to Athens, Silas and Timothy were left behind, perhaps to bring the latest news from Thessalonica (in case it was possible for the Apostle to return thither), with injunctions to follow at once; and this they probably did. But they seem to have been sent back on a mission to Macedonia (1 Th 3: Paul was 'left behind at Athens alone'), Timothy to Thessalonica, Silas perhaps to Philippi; they rejoined Paul at Corinth, and are associated with him in the letters, probably written thence, to the Thessalonians. Here Silas disappears from the Pauline history. But there is no reason for suspecting a defection like that of Mark; the cordial reference to his former preaching in 2 Co 1¹³ (written on the Third Journey) contradicts this. We afterwards find him attending on St. Peter, acting as bearer and perhaps scribe of his First Epistle (1 P 5¹²); for there is no reason to suppose that the Petrine Mark and Silvanus were other than those connected with St. Paul. Whether this attendance was before or after the death of St. Paul depends on the date we give to 1 Peter; see a full Excursus in Dr. Bigg's edition of that Epistle.

A. J. MACLEAN.

SILK.—See DRESS, 1.

SILLA.—The servants of king Joash smote him 'at the house of Millo [read rather 'at Beth-Millo'] on the way that goeth down to Silla' (2 K 12⁹). Where or what Silla may have been there is nothing to show. The LXX reads Gaalla or Gaalad. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

SILLOAM ('waters of Shiloah,' Is 8⁶; 'pool of Siloah' [RV Shelah], Neh 3¹⁴; 'tower in Siloam,' Lk 13⁴; 'pool of Siloam,' Jn 9⁷; probably identical with the 'king's pool' of Neh 2¹⁴).—The name survives to-day in Silwān, the name of the village which occupies the steep E. slopes of the valley of the Kidron from opposite the 'Virgin's Fount' (Gihon) to near Btr Eyyub (En-rogel). The village consists of a northern, older section inhabited by Moslem fellahtn, and a small, southern quarter belonging to immigrant Yemenite Jews from Arabia, while still farther down the valley is an isolated row of huts allotted to the lepers. All the site now occupied by the fellahtn has been built upon in ancient times, and the whole area is riddled with cave dwellings, cisterns, rock-cut steps, and ancient tombs. Some of the caves have apparently served the purposes successively of tombs and chapels, while to-day they are dwellings or store-houses. It may be considered as certain that in NT times, and probably for some centuries earlier, there was a considerable village in this situation. The 'tower' which fell (Lk 13⁴) may have been a building similar to many to-day perched on the edge of the precipitous rocks above the Kidron. Immediately across the valley, to the N. of Siloam, in the very bed of the Kidron, is the Virgin's Fount (see Gihon), the original spring of Jerusalem. In early times the water of this spring, after probably filling a pool here, ran down the valley; at a later period the surplus supply was conducted by an aqueduct built along the N. side of the valley (partially excavated near its W. end), to a spot where is situated to-day a dry pool known as Birket el-Hamra. Remains of this aqueduct have been traced. As the water supply was, under this arrangement, vulnerable to attack, king Hezekiah 'stopped the upper watercourse of Gihon and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David' (2 Ch 32³⁰; cf. 32⁴, 2 K 20²⁰). The work thus described is the famous Siloam tunnel, 1700 feet long. This runs in an extraordinarily serpentine course from the Virgin's Fount, and opens in the Tyropæon Valley under the name 'Ain Silwān, or the 'Spring of Siloam,' to pour its waters into the pool known as Birket es-Silwān, or the 'Pool of Siloam.' These may have been 'the waters of Shiloah that go softly,' a great contrast to the mighty Euphrates (Is 8⁶, 7). Close to the lower opening of the tunnel was found, in 1880, a Heb. inscription giving an account of the completion of the work. Although undated, there is every reason to believe that this is a contemporary account of Hezekiah's work, and if so, it is the oldest Heb. inscription known.

The original Pool of Siloam, of which the present Birket occupies but a part, was excavated by Dr. F. Bliss, and was shown to have been a rock-cut reservoir 71 feet N. to S. by 75 feet E. to W.; and just outside its W. edge was found a flight of ancient rock-cut steps, probably those mentioned in Neh 3¹⁴. A covered arcade, 12 feet wide, had been built, probably about NT times, round the four sides of the pool, and a division ran across the centre to separate the sexes when bathing. Such was probably the condition of the pool at the time of the events of Jn 9⁷. The surplus water of the pool leaves by a sluice at its S. end, and traverses a rock-cut channel to reach the gardens of the Siloam villagers. S. of the Birket es-Silwān is a walled-in area which in recent times was a kind of cesspool for the city, the sewage coming down the Tyropæon Valley (now diverted to its proper sewer again) being there stopped by a great dam across the valley. On this dam, at one period, ran the city wall, and Dr. Bliss proved by excavations that it was supported by buttresses of great strength. The area shut off by this dam is the so-called 'lower Pool of Siloam' or Birket el-Hamra, and may have been used at one time to store surplus waters from the upper pool. Probably it was the 'reservoir' (RV) or 'ditch' (AV) 'between the two walls, for the water of the old pool' (Is 22¹¹), that is, the reservoir to which the water from the 'old pool' at Gihon was conducted by the earlier aqueduct referred to above, while the dam itself is with some probability considered to be the 'wall of the pool of Siloah by the 'king's garden' (Neh 3¹⁴). The water of the 'Ain Silwān' is naturally, like that of its source (Gihon), brackish and impregnated with sewage; it also runs intermittently.

SIMEON (Lk 3³⁰, Ac 13¹ 15¹⁴ Symeon).—1. The second son of Jacob and Leah (Gn 29³³ [J]). By R he, together with Levi, is closely related to Dinah, she being a full sister (cf. 34). From Gn 30²⁰ (E) we learn that he had five full brothers, but we are not told how many other sisters or half-sisters he had. J (Gn 37²⁵) speaks of 'all' Jacob's 'daughters,' but their names are nowhere recorded (cf. 46⁷ [P]). J, who is specially inclined to etymologizing (see RVm of Gn 32⁴¹, 25⁵³ 11¹ 16¹¹, 14 etc.), connects the name, as in the case of Reuben, with Jacob's 'hatred' of Leah: 'Because Jahweh hath heard (shāma) that I am hated, etc., and she called his name Shim'ôn' (29³³). The meaning of the name is unknown, but it has been connected by many scholars with the Arabic sim, the hybrid offspring of the hyæna and the female wolf. This word sim appears as a tribal name among the Arabs, and it is well known that numerous tribal names are those of animals; Leah and Rachel probably belong to this class. In such cases the names probably point to the totem worship of the ancestors. If the name appears, as is supposed by some scholars, in the inscriptions of Esarhaddon, it may be of importance in connexion with the history of the tribe, but no light is derived from the form as to its meaning.

In the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49) Simeon is coupled with Levi (wh. see) as sharing in the curse of Jacob and in the consequent dispersion of the tribe among the other tribes of Israel. This is an indication that at the time the 'Blessing' was composed, the tribe was practically dissolved. P's census of the tribes ascribes 59,300 fighting men to Simeon at Sinai (Nu 1²³). At Moab there were only 22,200 (26¹⁴)—another indication of the future fortune of the tribe. Jg 12. 17 makes Simeon join with Judah, at the latter's request, in making the first attack upon the Canaanites, over whom they won a decisive victory at Bezek. Judah in return was to aid Simeon in gaining his possession. Together they attacked and defeated the inhabitants of Zephath-hormah. Hormah is connected with Arad (Nu 21¹⁻³) about 17 miles to the S.E. of Hebron. Hormah in Jos 15²⁰ is assigned to the tribe of Judah, but re-appears in 19⁴ as a city of Simeon. We are not told in Judges of the settlement of Simeon, but it is implied in the Dinah story (Gn 34) that both he and Levi secured a temporary foothold about Shechem. On account of their treachery, however, they were dispossessed and well-nigh annihilated by the revenge taken upon them by the Canaanites. Levi was permanently shattered; Simeon, however, managed to recover sufficiently to establish itself on the southern border of Judah. There, however, they came into contact with nomad tribes of Edomites and Arabs—a circumstance which doubtless contributed to their failure to rehabilitate themselves and win a permanent abode among the original occupants of the land. They are not mentioned in the Song of Deborah (Jg 5), but this may be accounted for by their position. Judah also had no part in that important struggle, and as passed over in silence. In historical times nothing is heard of them, and the conclusion is justified that they eventually became merged with the neighbouring tribes, and were later, with them, absorbed by Judah, as Reuben was afterwards by Gad. This conclusion is supported by the fact that the cities which are assigned to Simeon in the list given in Jos 19¹⁻² re-appear elsewhere as cities of Judah (cf. Jos 15²²⁻²³, 1 K 19¹, Neh 11²⁸⁻²⁹, 1 S 27³⁰⁻³¹). In connexion with David's ventures to win over the Edomites and other tribes to the south, the name of Simeon does not appear, as might have been expected if the tribe had preserved its solidarity. According to 1 Ch 4³⁶, Simeonites advanced against Gedor and Mt. Seir, in the time of Hezekiah apparently, and there secured permanent possessions. Instead of Gedor, the LXX reads Gerar, the name of the Philistine city of Abimelech. It must be admitted that our sources are too uncertain and too indefinite to enable us to speak decisively on almost any point of interest in connexion with this tribe. On the one hand, too much credence is given to statements of late writers, as though they furnished indubitable evidence; on the other hand, far-reaching conclusions are often drawn from fragmentary and isolated expressions, both Biblical and extra-Biblical, which are little warranted. See also TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

2. The great-grandfather of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 2¹). 3. The 'righteous and devout' (dikaïos kai eulabēs) man who took the infant Jesus in his arms and blessed Him, on the occasion of the presentation in the Temple (Lk 2²⁶). The notion that this Simeon is to be identified with a Rabbi who was the son of Hillel and the father of Gamaliel I. is very precarious. JAMES A. CRAIG.

SIMON (a Greek form of Simeon).—1. Simon Chosameus, who was found to have a 'strange' wife (1 Es 9²²—Ezr 10³¹ Simeon). 2. The subject of the encomium in Sir 50¹⁰, 'son of Onias, the great (or high) priest.' It is doubtful if Simon I. or Simon II. (both 3rd cent. B.C.) is meant. 3. The Maccabean high priest and ethnarch, son of Mattathias, slain by his son-in-law Ptolemy, B.C. 135 (1 Mac 16¹⁸; see MACCABEES, 4). 4. A Benjamite, guardian of the Temple in the time of Onias III., who suggested to Apollonius, the governor, to plunder it (2 Mac 30). 5. See PETER. 6. See SIMON MAGUS. 7. Simon the Cananean, one of the Twelve (Mt 10⁴, Mk 3¹⁴). The surname is an Aramaic equivalent of 'Zealot' (Lk 6⁴, Ac 1¹³). 8. See BRETHREN OF THE LORD. 9. Simon the Leper, our Lord's host at Bethany (Mt 26⁶, Mk 14³; cf. Jn 12¹), possibly husband or father of Martha, doubtless cured of his leprosy at some time before the anointing by Mary (cf. MARY, 2). 10. The Pharisee who was our Lord's host when the sinful woman anointed Him (Lk 7⁴⁰). The contradictions between these two stories are so great that it is difficult to suppose that they relate the same event in different versions. Two such incidents may well have happened, and one may have suggested the other (cf. MARY, 2). 11. Father, or brother, of Judas Iscariot, himself surnamed Iscariot (Jn 6⁷¹ 13³ 'Judas of Simon Iscariot,' 13³ 'Judas Iscariot of Simon'). 12. The Cyrenian who bore our Lord's cross (Mt 27³², Mk 15²¹, Lk 23²⁶); see ALEXANDER and RUFUS. The followers of Basilides in the 2nd cent. said that Simon was crucified instead of Jesus. 13. The tanner, Peter's host at Joppa (Ac 9⁴⁰).

SIMON MAGUS.—Mentioned in Ac 8²⁴, and described as using sorcery in Samaria and thereby amazing the people. He claimed to be 'some great one,' and was regarded by all as 'that power of God which is called Great.' When Philip reached Samaria, and, preaching the gospel, gathered many into the Church, Simon also fell under the influence of his message. We are told that he 'believed,' which cannot mean less than that he recognized that the Evangelist exerted, in the name of Jesus Christ, powers the reality of which he could not deny, and the efficacy of which 'amazed' him. He therefore sought baptism, and, being baptized, continued with Philip. The Apostles Peter and John came down to Samaria to establish the work begun by Philip, and by the laying on of their hands gave the Holy Ghost to the converts. This was no doubt evidenced by the miraculous gifts which were vouchsafed by God to His Church during its early years. The shallowness of Simon's belief was now shown, for he offered to buy from the Apostles the power of conferring the Holy Ghost. Peter rebuked him in language of such sternness as to lead him to beg of the Apostle to pray that the judgment of God might not fall upon him for his sin.

Simon holds the unenviable position of being the one outstanding heretic in the NT: and from then until now his character has been held in particular odium. Ignatius, the earliest of the Fathers, calls him 'the first-born of Satan'; Irenaeus marks him out as the first of all heretics; and later centuries have shown their sense of the greatness of his sin by using the word simony to indicate the crime of procuring a spiritual office by purchase. Justin Martyr mentions three times in his Apology, and once in his Dialogue, a Simon as a leader of an heretical sect. He states that Gitta, a village in Samaria, was his birthplace, and speaks of him as visiting Rome, and being so successful in his magical impostures as to have secured worship for himself as God, and to have been honoured with a statue, which bore the inscription SIMONI DEO SANCTO ('to Simon the Holy God'). He further mentions that 'almost all the Samaritans, and even a few of other nations,' worshipped him as 'first God' (cf. Ac 8¹⁰ 'this man is that power of God which is called Great'). He also adds that Helena, a fallen woman who accompanied him, was 'the first idea generated by him.' Justin does not specifically identify this Simon with the Simon of the Acts, but there can be no reasonable doubt that he held them to be one and the same.

There was discovered in Rome in 1574 the base of a statue bearing the inscription Semovi Sancto Deo fidio sacrum Sex. Pompejus . . . donum dedit. It is therefore generally assumed, and no doubt correctly, that Justin, being shown by the Simonians at Rome this statue of the Sabine deity Semo Sancus, was led to believe erroneously that it had been erected in honour of Simon. But this error of his regarding what had occurred in Rome need not invalidate his statements regarding Simon himself in Samaria and the progress and tenets of his sect, for he himself was a Samaritan and thus cognizant of the facts. Irenaeus deals more fully with Simon and his followers, though there is good reason for assuming that he is really indebted to a lost work of Justin for his information. He directly identifies him with the Simon of Ac 8, places him first in his list of heretics, and makes him the father of Gnosticism. From the account he gives of the doctrines of the Simonians, it is clear that by his time they had developed into a system of Gnosticism; but it is very doubtful whether he is right in making the Simon of the NT the first setter forth of Gnostic myths. The beginning of Gnosticism is very obscure, but we may be fairly certain that it had not arisen as early as the scenes described in Ac 8. The Simonian doctrines as given by Irenaeus are therefore doubtless developments of the heretical teaching of Simon, which, even from the short account in the Acts, would seem to have lent itself readily to Gnostic accretions. As time went on many fanciful additions were made to his history, until in the 4th cent. the legend reached its completeness. Throughout these romances Simon is found travelling about from place to place in constant opposition to Peter, uttering calumnies against the Apostle; but being pursued by Peter he is ultimately vanquished and discredited. The earlier forms of the story lay the scene of the travels chiefly in Asia Minor, and describe the final conflict as taking place at Antioch. The later forms, however, make Rome, in the days of Nero, the ultimate goal of the journeyings. Here Simon is said to have met his death through his conflict with Peter or with Peter and Paul. By one tradition the magician, seeing his influence waning, desired his followers to bury him in a grave, promising to rise again the third day. They obeyed, and he perished, for, as Hippolytus adds, 'he was not the Christ.' By another tradition Simon is depicted as deding to give to the Emperor a crowning proof of his magical powers by attempting to fly off to God. He is reported to have flown for a certain distance over Rome, but, through Peter's prayers, to have fallen and broken his leg, and to have been ultimately stoned to death by the populace. Another form of the tradition represented Paul as a companion of Peter in the contest, and as praying while Peter adjured the demons that supported Simon in his fight, in the name of God and of Jesus Christ, to uphold him no longer. Simon thereupon fell to the earth and perished.

Renewed interest in the history of Simon was aroused in modern times by Baur's maintaining that in the Clementine literature, where the most developed form of the legend occurs, Simon is intended to represent not the actual Simon of the Acts, but rather Paul, whom he (Baur) conceived to have been fiercely opposed theologically to Peter. Full information on this theory may be found in Hastings' DB iv. 523f., where its unsoundness is shown. It may be said to be now generally rejected.

It should be added that Hippolytus ascribes a work entitled 'The Great Revelation' to Simon, and quotes largely from it; and that the sect of the Simonians did not long survive, for Origen states that he did not believe that there were in his day thirty of them in existence.

SIMPLICITY.—1. In the OT 'simple' is, with one exception, the translation of a word (pšht), whose root-idea is 'openness.' Openness of mind is praiseworthy when it implies willingness to receive instruction; it becomes blameworthy when it connotes a disposition equally receptive of good and of evil, or an incapacity to distinguish between right and wrong. In Proverbs 'the simple' are represented as needing 'prudence' (14 RVm), and they are exhorted to 'understand prudence' (8 RVm). In 14¹⁵, 18 'the prudent' are favourably contrasted with 'the simple' who 'believe every word,' and therefore 'inherit folly.' It is 'the testimony of the Lord' that makes the simple wise (Ps 19⁷; cf. 119¹²⁰). In 2 S 15¹¹ 'simplicity' means 'integrity' (šm). In the LXX the Heb. word (psšer) for 'straightness' or 'uprightness' is translated by the NT equivalent of 'simplicity' (haplotēs).

2. In the NT 'simple' (akeraios = Lat. integer) is used twice (Mt 10¹⁴ RVm, Ro 16¹⁹) to describe the character in which there is 'no foreign admixture'; the RV retains 'simplicity' as the rendering of haplotēs only in 2 Co 11³, where it denotes those in whose character there are 'no folds,' who are whole-hearted in their devotion to Christ (Trench, NT Synonyms, § 1vi.). The Christian ideal is 'simplicity toward Christ' (2 Co 11⁴). In the life of His loyal disciples dove-like simplicity is blended with the wisdom of the serpent (Mt 10¹⁶). Their 'eye' being 'single' (haplous), their 'whole body' is 'full of light' (Mt 6²²). Christ Jesus being made unto them 'wisdom from God' (1 Co 1³⁰), they are no longer beguiled like Eve, but are 'wise unto that which is good, and simple unto that which is evil' (Ro 16¹⁹).

SIN.—The teaching of the Bible with regard to the doctrine of sin may be said to involve a desire, on the part of the leaders of Jewish thought, to give a rational account of the fact, the consciousness, and the results of human error. Whatever be the conclusion arrived at respecting the compilation of the early chapters of Genesis, one thought, at least, clearly emerges: the narratives are saturated through and through with religious conceptions. Omnipotence, sovereignty, condescending active love, and perfect moral harmony, all find their place in the narratives there preserved, as attributes of the Divine character. The sublime conception of human dignity and worth is such that, in spite of all temptation to the contrary belief, it remains to-day as a firmly rooted, universally received verity, that man is made 'in the image of God' (Gn 1²⁷).

1. THE OLD TESTAMENT.—1. The early narratives.—It is remarkable that in the story of the Fall the writer (J) attributes the sin to a positive act of conscious disobedience to God, and not only so, but he regards it as an entity standing over against 'good' (2¹⁷). This is more clearly brought out in the same writer's narrative of the murder of Abel, where sin is represented as 'couching at the door,' lying in wait for the overthrow of the sullen homicide (4⁷). The profound psychological truth that the power of sin grows in the character of him who yields to its dictates is also noticed in this story. Falsehood and selfishness and defiance of God are heard in Cain's answer to the Divine voice. These stories are the beginning of the history of a long process of development which resulted in the Flood. From individual acts of wrong-doing we are brought face to face with the condition, 'every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually' (6⁹). Hitherto God is represented as commanding, punishing, pleading with man, and even encouraging him with hopes of future restoration (3¹⁵). The growth and arrogance of sin in the human race became so pronounced and universal that He is said to have rejected man completely, and in His wrath to have destroyed His creation, which was infected by man's corruption. He is 'grieved at his heart,' and is repentant for having 'made man on the earth' (6⁶⁻⁷). The same narrator, in giving the current explanation of the diversity of human language, notes another racial rebellion against God, which was punished by the overthrow of Babel (11¹⁻⁹).

A change in the Divine method of dealing with sinful man is now noticeable. The writers lead gradually up to this, beginning with Noah, whose righteousness (walk with God, cf. 6⁹) stands in solitary contrast to the universal decadence. The educative elective principle enters into the relationships of God and man. A covenant is established by which these relationships are defined, and by consequence human consciousness is gradually deepened. As a result, temptation to sin becomes more formidable and many-sided. In individual cases outside the covenant we see, indeed, evidences of a higher standard of moral obligation than that reached by the Patriarchs (cf. Gn 12¹³, 20¹¹). At the same time, the history of Esau furnishes us with proof that already glimmerings of a more profound ethical basis upon which to build human character, than that recognized elsewhere, had begun to obtrude themselves. If in the case of Abraham 'faith was reckoned for righteousness' (Ro 4⁹), and belief in the fidelity of God's promises, in the face of the most untoward conditions, constituted the foundation-stone of the patriarch's noble character, so in Esau's case it was the lack of this belief, with the consequent inability to appreciate the dignity to which he was born, that lay at the root of his great and pathetic fallure. The secret of Joseph's power to resist temptation lay, not merely in his natural inability to be guilty of a breach of trust towards his master, but still more in his intense realization that to yield would be a 'great wickedness and sin against God' (Gn 39⁹). Thus, while it is true to say that the dominant conception of sin in the OT is that it is the great disturbing element in the personal relations of God and man, it seems to have been realized very early that the chief scope for its exercise lay in the domain of human intercourse. The force of Abimelech's complaint against Abraham lay in the fact that the former was guiltless of wronging the latter, whereas he was in serious danger of sinning against God in consequence of the patriarch's duplicity.

2. The Sinaitic Law.—The next great critical point in the evolution of human consciousness of sin is reached in the promulgation of the Law from Sinai. Here the determinative process of Divine election is seen in its widest and most elaborate working. The central purpose of the Law may be considered as of a twofold character. Not only are the restrictions tabulated in order to the erection of barriers against the commission of sin ('God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before you, that ye sin not,' Ex 20²⁰), but positive enactments regulating the personal communion of God and Israel provide frequently recurring opportunities of loving and joyful service (Ex 23¹⁴). The law of restitution, as given in Ex 21-22, may be regarded as harsh in some of its enactments, but it may be easily conceived as an immense stride forward on the road to 'the royal law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Ja 2⁸). Nor can it be said that restitution and mutual service between God and His people are left out of sight in those chapters of Exodus which are universally recognized as containing the oldest part of the Mosaic Code. These anthropopathic conceptions of God abound, and are seen in the idea of His jealousy being roused by idolatrous practices (Ex 20⁵), in the promises made to Israel that, in return for services to Jehovah, He will save His people in the face of their enemies (Ex 23²²). Thus it will be easily understood that, as the Levitical and Priestly Codes were gradually elaborated into a somewhat intricate system of legal and ceremonial obligations, the nomenclature of sin in its various aspects came to be accordingly enlarged. For example, in one verse three distinct words occur in connexion with Divine forgiveness ('forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin,' Ex 34⁷), and though there is a certain vagueness in the precise meaning to be attached to each of these words, whether it be guilt or punishment, rebellion or sin-offering, wickedness considered as a condition, or trespass, which is in the writers' minds, the thoughts underlying each have to do with the relations between God and His people. It must not be forgotten, moreover, that the ceremonial enactments provided a circle of ideas of permanent importance in the Hebrew conception of Jehovah's character. The law of clean and unclean animals and things paved the way for truer and nobler thoughts of God's holiness, and of the uncleanness of sin as being its contradiction. The 'trespass' of Achan, involving as it did the whole of Israel in his guilt and punishment, did not consist so much in his stealing of the common spoil taken from the enemy, as in his appropriating what was 'holy,' or 'devoted' unto the service of God (Jos 7¹⁻¹⁴). The presence of 'the devoted thing' with the common property of the army dragged the whole people into a position of guilt, which could be expiated only by the death of the offender. In this way alone could they be restored to Divine favour, and their army receive Divine succour.

3. Deuteronomy and the Historical Books.—In the Deuteronomic summary of the Law, whatever be the date at which it was edited, a loftier ground of obedience is attained. Love, of God and of their fellow-men, is more explicitly dwelt on as the motive power of human life (Dt 6⁵ 10¹⁶ etc.), and the heart is again and again referred to as the seat of that love, both passively and actively (11¹⁸ 6⁵ 10¹⁶). The basis upon which it is rested is the fact of God's love for them and their fathers evidenced in many vicissitudes and in spite of much to hinder its activity (4³⁷ 7¹⁷ 10¹⁶). Though there are numerous echoes of the older conception that the keeping of God's commandments is one side of a bargain which conditions men's happiness and prosperity (4²⁴ 10⁶), yet we observe a lofty range of thought bringing in its train truer ideas of sin and guilt. The sternness of God is insisted on, but as having for its objective the good of His people (10¹⁸ 6²⁴). It is a necessary phase of His love, compelling them to recognize that sin against God is destructive of the sinner. The ultimate aim of the Deuteronomist is the leading of men to hate sin as God hates it, and to love mercy and righteousness as and because God loves them (cf. Dt 10¹⁸, Lv 19³⁴), by establishing the closest relationship and communion between Him and His people (cf. Dt 14¹ 7⁶ 26¹⁸ 27⁹ 28⁹ etc.).

One sin is specially insisted on by the Deuteronomist, namely, the sin of idolatry. No doubt this is largely due to the experience of the nation under the judges, and during the history of Israel subsequent to the great schism. The national disasters which recur so frequently during the former of these periods are always attributed to this sin; while the return of the people, under the guidance of a great representative hero, is always marked by the blessings of peace and prosperity. So in the story of the Northern Kingdom the constant refrain meets us in each succeeding reign: 'He cleaved unto the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, wherewith he made Israel to sin' (2 K 3³ 10²⁹ 13² etc.). During the vigorous and successful reign of Ahab and Jezebel, the seeds of national decay were sown, and the historian neglects not to point out the source to which the later mournful decline may be traced (1 K 16²⁴). On the other hand, there is little reference to this sin during the reigns of Saul and David, and, in spite of the weaknesses of character displayed by the former, the historian pictures for us a great advance in national vigour and growth under these kings and their successors in the Southern Kingdom. The great rebellion against the Davidic dynasty is itself attributed to the declension of Solomon in his old age from the pure Jehovah-worship so zealously and consistently advocated by his father. We must remember also that, side by side with the introduction of foreign religious ideas, vice peculiar to Oriental despotism invaded the royal court and the nation of Israel. We are not, however, altogether limited to what is here inferentially taught as to national sin, with its consequent national punishment. David himself is represented as guilty of a sin which marred his character as an individual, and of an act of indiscretion which seems to have been regarded as a breach of that trust held by him as God's viceroy on earth. Both these cases are of interest for the light which they throw on the doctrine of sin and its consequences. In the case of Bathsheba, which was a purely personal transgression, the prophet Nathan comes not only as the bearer of a message of Divine pardon to the repentant sinner, but also as the stern judge pronouncing sentence of severe and protracted punishment. The death of the newly born child and the subsequent distractions arising out of the affair of Absalom are looked on as expressions of God's wrath and of retributive justice (see 2 S 12¹⁰⁻¹⁸). Whatever the contemporary reasons may have been for regarding his public act as sinful, and even the reckless Joab considered it an act of wanton folly, we find the same features of repentance and forgiveness, and the same inclusion of others in the suffering consequent on its commission. The prophet Gad comes to the king as the revealer of God's wrath and the messenger of God's pardon (2 S 24¹⁻²⁵). Into this narrative, however, another element is introduced, telling of the difficulty which was felt, even at this early stage of human history, as to the origin of sin. God is said by the early historian of David's reign to have been the author of the king's act, because 'His anger was kindled against Israel' (2 S 24¹). It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that at one stage of Hebrew thought God was looked on as, in some respects at least, the author of evil (cf. Ex 42⁷ 14⁸, Jg 9²³, 1 S 16¹⁴ 18¹⁰ 19⁹). Nor ought we to be surprised at this, for the problem is one which was sure to present itself very early to the minds of thoughtful men; while the numerous instances where the commission of a sin seemed to have been made subservient by God to the exhibiting of His power and love afforded presumptive prima facie evidence that He Himself willed the act as the minister of His glory (see the history of Joseph with the writer's comments thereon, Gn 45⁵ 50²⁰, Ps 105¹⁷; cf. Job 1¹² 21⁻⁷, Hos 2). It is interesting to note the advance made in speculative thought with regard to this still unsolved, and perhaps insoluble, problem, between the time of the above-mentioned historian and that of the later Chronicler (1 Ch 21¹). Here the name of Satan or 'Adversary' is boldly inserted as the author of the sin, a fact which reminds us of the categorical denial of the Son of Sirach, 'He hath not commanded any man to be ungodly; and he hath not given any man licence to sin' (15²⁰). That the origin of sin continued to be debated and speculated upon down to a very late period is evidenced by the vehement warning of St. James against imputing to God the temptation to evil (Ja 1¹³), and by the counter assertion that God is the Author of nothing but good (v. 17).

4. The Prophets.—By far the most important stage in the history of the OT doctrine of sin is that which is marked by the teaching of the Prophets. The four practically contemporary prophets of the 8th cent. are Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah. The first named reveals a wide outlook on the world at large, and a recognition of the prevalence and power of sin in other nations than Israel. Damascus, Philistia, Tyre, Edom, Ammon, and Moab, as well as Judah and Israel, all come under the displeasure of the prophet Amos. Each had been guilty of cruelty and wrong to the people of Jehovah. The characteristic faults of these heathen peoples—lust and tyranny of the strong over the weak—had invaded Israel too. The love of money, with its attendant evils of injustice, and robbery of the poor by the wealthy, is inveighed against by both Amos and Hosea as deserving of the wrath of God (cf. Hos 12⁷, Am 4⁸). This degeneracy of the people of the Northern Kingdom during the reign of Jeroboam II. was as much in evidence in the ranks of prophets and priests as among the other ruling classes, and to it, as the cause, is assigned the downfall which so speedily followed (Am 3¹ 6¹⁻⁷ 2⁷ 9¹², Hos 4⁹ 9⁷, 5¹, Mic 3¹ etc.). Both Isaiah and Micah mourn over the same moral declension (Is 5¹ 16¹, Mic 2² etc.), and it may be said that it is owing to the preaching of these four prophets that the centre of gravity, as it were, of sin is changed, and the principles of universal justice and love, as the fundamental attributes of Jehovah's character and rule, are established. It was the prophetic function to deepen the consciousness of sin by revealing a God of moral righteousness to a people whose peculiar relationship to Jehovah involved both immense privileges and grave responsibilities (Am 3¹, Hos 3¹, Mic 3¹ etc.). Terrible, however, as were the denunciations, and emphatic as were the declarations of the prophets against the vices of greed, oppression, and lust, they were no less clear in their call to repentance, and in promises of restoration and pardon (Is 1¹⁸, Mic 7¹⁸, Hos 6¹, Am 9¹¹). The story of Jonah of Gath-hepher is the revelation of a growing feeling that the righteous dominion of Jehovah was not, in the exercise of its moral influence, confined exclusively to Israel. The consciousness of sin and the power of repentance have now their place in the lives of nations outside the Abrahamic covenant.

Hitherto the prophetic teaching was largely confined to national sin and national repentance. It is not till the days of Jeremiah that the importance, in this respect, of the individual begins to manifest itself. The lament of Jeremiah, it is true, frequently expresses itself in terms of national infidelity (Jer 2⁶⁻²⁷ 8⁷ 35¹⁴⁻¹⁷ 31²⁸ 32²², etc.). At the same time an element of individualistic thought enters largely into his teaching (cf. 17¹⁰ 32¹⁹). On its darker side he notes how universally present sin is seen to be: 'from the least even unto the greatest,' 'from the prophet even unto the priest' all are infected (8¹⁰, cf. v. 8). It is impossible to find a man either just or truth-loving (5¹); and the explanation is not far to seek, for sin is a disease which affects the individual heart, and therefore poisons the whole life of each man (cf. 13⁷ 5²³ 7³ etc.). The nature of the disease he characterizes as desperate in the awful deceit which supervenes (17⁹). A hopeless pessimism seems at times to have pervaded the prophet's teaching, and such of the people as were aroused by his appeals were smitten by a blank despair (10²³ 2²² 18¹² 13²³ etc.). As the prophet grows older, however, and gains a wider knowledge from his own bitter experiences, he discovers a way of escape from the overpowering influences of sin. As the heart is the seat of evil, it is found that the creative act of God can provide a remedy (31²³ 32²⁹ 24⁷). A new heart straight from the hand of God, beating with new and holy impulses, is the sure, as it is the only, hope for men (32⁴⁰). Every individual, from the least to the greatest, in whom the Divine activity has been at work shall have the felicity of hearing the blessed sentence, 'I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin will I remember no more' (31²⁴).

Following up and developing this tendency, Ezekiel is express in his declaration of the moral independence of each man. Repudiating, as Jeremiah did, the doctrine that the sin and moral guilt of the fathers are imputed to the children, he elaborates clearly and emphatically the truth, which to us seems axiomatic, that the soul of the father is personally independent of the soul of the son, with the terrible but inevitable corollary, 'the soul that sinneth, it shall die' (Ezk 18⁴⁻²⁰, cf. vv. 10-20). The profound truth which lies at the basis of the ancient belief in the close interaction of individual and racial guilt is, of course, valid for all time, and has been sanctified by the historical fact of the Incarnation. The life, work, and death of Christ have their value in the re-establishment of this truth, and in the re-creation, as it were, of the concurrent truth of the solidarity of the whole human race (cf. the expression 'we are all become as one that is unclean,' Is 64⁶).

5. Psalms.—We turn now to the Psalms, and there find, as might be expected, the deepest consciousness of personal guilt on the part of the sinner. Of course, it is to be remembered that the Jewish Psalter is the product of different epochs in the national history, ranging probably from the heyday of prophetic religion to the age immediately succeeding the Captivity, if not much later. It may be said, indeed, that this volume of sacred poetry constitutes a kind of antiphonal response to the preaching of the Prophets. Confession of and repentance for sin, both personal and national, constitute the prominent features of the authors' attitude. A deep love for God breathes through each poem, and a profound hope that at some future date Israel may once again be restored to the favour of Jehovah.

The religious instinct of the compilers displays itself in their choice of those Psalms which form a preface or introduction to each of the five sections or books constituting the entire volume, setting the music, so to speak, of each part. The First Book (Pss 1-41) opens with a Psalm which is simply an expression of the power of sin and of the awful danger to which men are exposed by dallying with it. It is thus well fitted to be the prelude to such outbursts as occur in Pss 6st, 10th, 17th, 22nd, etc. The Second Book (Pss 42-72) commences with a poem which is the language of a soul desperately longing for full communion with its God, and, in spite of an oppressive fear heightened by the mockery of sinners, triumphing in the hope that the lovingkindness of Jehovah will yet call forth praise and joy. It is in this section that we have teaching of the deepest import touching the consciousness of personal and racial guilt; and at the same time a detestation of sin accompanied by a spiritual longing after inward righteousness hard to be paralleled in the OT. Here, too, hope conquers; forgiveness and restoration are looked forward to with sublime confidence. Perhaps in 50th-55 we have an echo of the Prophetic denunciation of legalism in its degenerate days (cf. Is 1st-16, Jer 7th, Am 5th, Mal 1st). The Third Book opens with a poem (Ps 73) in which the holiness of God is opposed to the folly and pride of sinners. The difficulty attaching to the problem of the relation between sin and suffering, so dramatically discussed and worked up in the Book of Job, is here dwelt on. For its answer we are referred to the certain fact that God is the strength and refuge of all those who are pure in heart. In Ps 90, which opens the Fourth section of the volume, the author puts the eternal and omniscient God over against man, with his iniquities and secret sins, as they call forth His terrible but just wrath (v. 11). The beauty of holiness and the confident trust that God is the ultimate refuge of all who come to Him are again and again dwelt on in the Psalms of this book (cf. 103rd). In the Fifth division beginning with Ps 107, the note of praise is struck, and is kept up almost without intermission to the end. The final exaltation of Zion corresponding to the lasting overthrow of iniquity (Ps 107th) is proclaimed with a certainty which can express itself only in songs of loudest praise. With an insight which can only be termed inspiration, we find one of the poets co-ordinating the forgiveness of Jah and the fear of Him as cause and effect (130th, cf. 'The Psalms' in The Cambridge Bible, by Kirkpatrick).

6. Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes.—The confidence thus expressed is all the more remarkable because of the general belief in the universality of sin and of its effects (cf. Ps 14th, 51st), a belief which was shared by the authors of the Book of Job (14th, 15th, 41st), Proverbs (20th), and Ecclesiastes (7th, cf. 1 K 8th). In the Proverbs we have what might be described as an attempt to place the moral life on an intellectual basis. The antithesis of wisdom and folly is that which marks the life of the righteous man and the sinner. Ethical maxims, the compiled results of human experience, follow each other in quick succession, but the book is devoid of the bright, warm hopefulness so characteristic of the Psalms. The sinner is left to his fate, and the wise man is he who, ordering his own life aright, leaves the fool to pursue his folly and deserve his fate.

The author of the Book of Job sets himself to solve the problem of the connexion between sin and human suffering, and though he fails, as he was bound to fail, to clear up the difficulty, he makes it evident that the one cannot always be measured in terms of the other. The conviction of his own innocence—Job's most treasured personal possession—upholds his belief against the prevalent conception that sin is always punished here and now, and that righteousness is always rewarded in like manner. The end of this dramatic treatise, however, emphasizes the popular creed, though the experience of Job must have shaken its universal validity. The conception of sin is, of course, entirely ethical, but is very wide in its scope. In defending himself against the thinly veiled accusations of his friends, Job reveals his ideas of the range and depth of the ravages of sin in human life and conduct, and gives evidence of remarkable spiritual penetration (e.g. ch. 31, see R. A. Watson's commentary on this book in The Expositor's Bible). Mention may, perhaps, be usefully made here of Elihu's contribution to the discussion, in which he intervenes by a lengthened argument to prove that suffering may be looked on not merely as punishment for sin, but also as a means of discipline, and as designed by God as a warning against sin (cf. ch. 33 ff.).

II. APOCRYPHAL BOOKS.—Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon.—The intellectualism which is characteristic of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes finds a prominent place in Sirach and the Wisdom of Solomon. There are here two sharply defined classes of men ('two and two, one against another,' Sir 33rd), a dualistic conception which permeates all creation (cf. 42nd). The sinner is to be 'dealt with' unmercifully ('help not the sinner,' 12th), nor no good can come from him who refuses instruction. It is possible, however, for the sinner to return unto the Lord and forsake his sins (17th). The only way in which righteousness may be pursued is by the cultivation of wisdom and instruction, and by paying heed to the experiences of daily life (34th, 39th-41st, 14th). Let reason be the guide of human action and all will be well (37th, cf. 32nd). It is possible for the educated man to acquire such a command over his inclinations that he is able of himself to make the great choice between life and death (15th), but for the fool there is little hope (15th). Looking back on the centuries of human history, the writer discovers that sin has brought in its train all the great physical calamities which mark its progress (39th). The relation is, however, external, and is a mark of Divine vengeance and wrath against sinners (cf. 40th). There is no trace of the profound conception of spiritual sympathy between the different orders of creation, characteristic of the teaching of St. Paul (cf. Ro 8th-22).

The author of the Book of Wisdom displays the same fundamental thought that wisdom and sin are totally incompatible (Wis 1st). Ignorance and folly are identified with sin (2nd, 4th, 5th etc.), and not merely the causes of sin. The only way to attain to righteousness is by the careful, unremitting discipline of the reason (cf. 2nd, 17th, 6th). Running like a thread of gold through the whole book, however, is the conception of the immortality of righteousness and of those who cultivate wisdom (1st, 2nd, 3rd, 6th, 8th, 17th etc.). In the beautiful personification of Wisdom (6th-8th) we find the writer not only speaking of the Spirit of God as being its Author and Diffuser, but practically identifying them with each other (cf. 9th, 12th, cf. 2 Es 14th). The universality of sin does not enter largely into his teaching (cf., however, 3rd, 12th, 13th), and at times we feel as if he believed that some were born to be righteous and some to sin, the power of moral choice being really confined to the former (cf. 8th, 7th).

III. THE NEW TESTAMENT.—1. Synoptists.—The practical outcome of the teaching of the OT is seen in the emphasis laid by the first of the Synoptists upon the function which it was the destiny of Jesus to discharge in connexion with sin. The angelic communication to Joseph (Mt 1st) may, without illegitimate criticism of origins, be considered as one of those illuminating flashes of Divine revelation which obtain their interpretative value in the light of subsequent history. At any rate, this is the feature of Jesus' work upon which the Apostles laid particular stress, in their earliest as in their latest teaching. It is true that the preparatory work of the Baptist aroused in the breasts of the multitudes who thronged to hear him an active consciousness of sin, together with the necessity for repentance and the possibility of consequent forgiveness (Mk 1st). The preaching of John was, however, necessarily lacking in one element which makes the life and work of Jesus what it pre-eminently is—a new power introduced into the world, giving unto men the gift of repentance (Ac 5th, cf. 11th), and enabling them 'to turn away every one from their iniquities' (cf. Ac 3rd). It is significant in this connexion that the recorded teaching of Jesus bears comparatively few traces of direct abstract instruction regarding sin. At the same time, we must not forget the scathing denunciation hurled by Him at the legalistic, and worse, conceptions of sin abounding in the Rabbinical schools of His time (cf. Mt 23rd-28, Mk 7th), or the positive, authoritative declarations by which He drew from the ancient laws of Sinai the essential ethical ideas therein enshrined (cf. Mt 5th-48, where the teaching may be described as an intension rather than an extension of the area of sin). For Him 'the law and the prophets' had an abiding significance (Mt 7¹²), but their regulative values needed re-adjustment. Sin, against which the Law was a deterrent, and the preaching of the Prophets a persistently solemn protest, has its domain not in the physical but in the spiritual region of man's life (cf. Lk 11³⁸⁻⁴⁴). It is by poisoning the life at its roots that it destroys the whole upward growth, and it is here that the language of Jesus assumes its most formidable prophetic severity. There are certain classes of sins, however, against which He uttered His most solemn warnings. Their common characteristic is that of wilfulness or deliberateness. Remarkable amongst these is that described as 'blasphemy against the Holy Ghost' (cf. Mk 3²⁹—Lk 12¹⁰—Mt 12^{31f.}), which St. Mark designates 'an eternal sin.' Taking into consideration the circumstances in which the words were spoken, it is clear that Jesus was pointing to a condition of the soul when it loses all power to retrace its steps, when it reaches a place where even God's forgiveness cannot follow. The sin of unreality was one to which the Pharisees were specially addicted, and to it, therefore, He drew their attention constantly (Mt 23²⁻⁷, Mk 12^{28f.}, Lk 20^{45f.} 11⁴⁵; cf. Mt 6¹⁻¹⁸ 5²⁰).

Every sin is bound to exercise influence, not only on the life and character of those immediately guilty, but also on a circle outside. There is, however, a species having for its special object the dragging down of those who would otherwise be innocent. The terms of the emphatic warning against leading others astray, either by positive interference or by the force of example (cf. Mk 9⁴², Mt 18⁶, Lk 17²), remind us of the sad presage by which Jesus foreshadowed the traitor's end (Mt 26²⁴). The word used to denote this sin is also employed in speaking of sin in its relation to the guilty individual. The fact that Jesus deals with both aspects at the same time shows how strongly He felt the impossibility of any sin remaining, in its working, a purely personal offence. There is always here in activity a force which may be described as centrifugal, inevitably bringing harm to those within the circle of its movement (cf. Ro 14^{17f.}). Nor did Jesus hold Himself to be free from this danger of contamination ('thou art a stumbling-block unto me,' Mt 18⁷), while He points to the ideal Kingdom of the Son of Man where nothing causing men to stumble shall be allowed a place (Mt 13⁴¹). It is interesting to remember here that St. Paul uses the same word to express the result of the preaching of 'Christ crucified' to the Jews (1 Co 12²; cf. Gal 5¹, Ro 9^{31f.}, 1 P 2²). This was, indeed, a contingency foreseen by Jesus Himself, as will be seen in His answer to the messengers of the imprisoned Baptist (Mt 11⁶). Doubtless these words were intended to convey a gentle warning to the prisoner against permitting the untoward circumstances of his life to overcome his once firm faith in the Messiahship of One whom he had publicly proclaimed as 'the Lamb of God' (Jn 1²⁹). A direct reference to an OT example of this sin occurs in Rev 2⁴, where the conduct of Balaam is held up to reprobation.

In the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, Jesus taught the necessity for the realization of personal guilt on the part of the sinner in order to forgiveness and justification in the sight of God (Lk 18¹²). In the same way, it was the lack of this sense by the Pharisees, so far as they were themselves personally concerned, that constituted the great obstacle to their conversion (Jn 9⁴¹).

A prominent feature of Jesus' teaching has to do not so much with active, deliberate sins as with what may be termed 'sins of omission.' It seems as if He wished to inculcate, by repeated emphasis, the truth that the best way to combat temptation with success is to be active in the pursuit of good. The spiritual side of this doctrine He enshrined in the form of a parable, in which He pointed out the danger to the soul arising from neglect to invoke the active agency of the Holy Spirit, even though the 'unclean spirit' had been exorcized and banished 'out of the man' (see Mt 12⁴⁻⁶—Lk 11²⁴⁻²⁶). In the discourse descriptive of the General Judgment, Jesus marks the crucial test by which men shall be tried: 'Inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of these least, ye did it not unto me' (Mt 25⁴⁵). The same thought is conveyed frequently in parabolic form, as for example in the parables of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25¹⁻¹³), the Talents (25¹⁴⁻³⁰) in which is emphasized the profound lesson, 'from him that hath not, even that which he hath shall be taken away' (cf. Mt 13¹²), Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16¹⁹⁻³¹); while much of the teaching in the Sermon on the Mount is based on the same principle (cf. Mt 5²³⁻²⁴).

2. St. Paul.—The presentation of the gospel message to the world outside the Jewish nation led St. Paul to review in detail the origin, cause, scope, and result of sin. Starting from his own individual experience, which was that of a sinner profoundly conscious of his position (cf. 1 Co 15⁹ 9²⁷, Ro 7¹⁴⁻²⁵, 1 Ti 1⁵), and conscious also of the remedy inherent in Christ's gospel (2 Co 12⁹), he insists on the universality of the presence and power of sin, in order to establish the co-ordinate universality of the presence and power of 'the manifested righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ' (Ro 3^{21f.}; cf. the expression 'where sin abounded, grace did abound more exceedingly,' 5²⁰). The central feature of St. Paul's teaching is the activity of God's grace in forgiving, restoring, and justifying the sinner; and for the purpose of establishing the reasonableness and the necessity (cf. 1 Co 9¹⁶) of bringing the gospel before the world, it was needful first to establish the guilt of all for whom it was intended, and to create, so to speak, in men a consciousness of moral failure and helplessness. This he does in the opening chapters of his Epistle to the Romans. Here, although he deals separately with Jews and Gentiles, he maintains the proposition that all alike are sinners (Ro 5¹², cf. Eph 2¹). It is true that the Jew was the recipient of the Law; and as such he occupied the position of the moral teacher of mankind. But instead of proving the means whereby a true 'knowledge of sin' (Ro 3²⁰, cf. 5¹²) is gained, it became, through abuse, a hindrance rather than a help to his spiritual advancement (see 2^{17f.}). And just as the Jews stultified the Divinely given Law, by the exaltation of its merely transitory elements at the expense of its essential moral ideals, so the Gentiles defied 'the law written in their hearts, testified to by their conscience' (Ro 2¹⁵).

This reduction of all mankind to the same level in the sight of God is further incidentally pressed by the establishment of a definite relationship between the sin of Adam and racial guilt (5¹²⁻¹³). What precisely were St. Paul's opinions as to this connexion it is impossible to discover. It is doubtful whether, in face of the intensely practical work in which he was engaged, he stopped to work out the problem of 'original sin.' It is enough for him that 'sin entered into the world through one man' and that 'through the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners' (see Sanday-Headlam, 'Romans' 5 in ICC, p. 136 ff.).

Different interpretations have been given of the words translated 'for that all sinned' (5¹²), some seeing in them an explicit statement that the whole human race was involved generically in the sin of Adam (cf. Bengel, ad loc., and Liddon, Epistle to the Romans, p. 103). Others affirm that St. Paul is here asserting the freedom of the will, and is stating the plain proposition that all men have sinned as a matter of fact, and of their own choice. The Apostle, however, seems to have left room for a synthesis of these two ideas. It matters not whether he has done so consciously or not. As the result of Adam's transgression sin obtained an entrance and a sphere of action in the world, and not only so, but a predisposition to sin was inherited, giving it its present power over the human will. At the same time, the simple statement 'all sinned,' explanatory as it is of the universality of death, includes the element of choice and freedom. Even those whose consciousness of sin was weakened, if not obliterated, by the absence of positive or objective law, were subjected to death. Here we have the assumption of generic guilt arising directly out of St. Paul's belief in the relation between sin and physical death, as that of cause and effect (cf. 1 Co 15²²). Not only is the connexion here mentioned insisted on, but, passing from physical death to that of which it is but a type, spiritual or moral death, he shows the awful depth to which sin has sent its roots in man's nature (Ro 6¹², cf. v. 19, 21^a).

Mention has been made above of the power of choice, where sin is concerned, inherent in human personality. Into the very seat of this power, however, sin has made an entrance, and has found a powerful ally in 'the flesh' (7¹⁹). The will to resist is there, but its activity is paralyzed. Though St. Paul makes 'the flesh' or 'the members' of the body the seat of sin, he is far from teaching that human nature is essentially evil. The flesh may be crucified with its 'passions and lusts' (Gal 5²⁴; cf. 1 Co 9²⁷, Ro 6¹⁹), and the bodily members instead of being 'servants to uncleanness' may become 'servants to righteousness unto sanctification' (cf. art. 'Flesh' in Hastings' DCG). An important feature of St. Paul's doctrine of sin consists in his exposition of the function of law in revealing and arousing the consciousness of sin. A curious expression, 'the mind of the flesh' (Ro 8⁷), emerges in this connexion, and the impossibility of its being 'subject to the law of God' is insisted on. 'Apart from the law sin is dead,' but, once the Law came, sin sprang into life, its presence and power were revealed (cf. 1 Co 15⁵⁶), and by it man was confronted with his own moral weakness.

In spite of his belief in the all-pervading character and strength of sin, St. Paul's gospel is the reverse of a gospel of despair. If, on the one hand, there is a death which connotes moral corruption and slavery to sin, on the other hand there is a death unto sin which is not only a realization of, but a participation in the death of Christ. The fact of his employing the same word and idea in senses so completely contrasted lends a marvellous force and finality to his teaching on the remedial and restorative effects of Christ's work (cf. Ro 6²⁻¹⁴, Eph 2¹⁻¹⁰). A favourite idea, relative to this, is that of crucifixion. The member of Christ as such has crucified his 'old man' (Ro 6⁶), 'the flesh with the passions and lusts thereof' (Gal 5²⁴, cf. 2²⁹). This is the ultimate ideal result of the redemptive work of Christ. The experience of St. Paul forbade him to believe that the state of 'death unto sin' is fully realized here and now (1 Co 9²⁷, cf. Sir 37¹³). His continuous references to the Christian life as one of warfare, in which it behoves the follower of Christ to be armed with weapons offensive and defensive, shows that his conception of the struggle against sin is that of one unceasing age-long conflict, issuing in victory for the individual, as for the race, only when the Kingdom of Christ is established in a peace that is everlasting (Eph 6¹¹⁻¹⁷, 2 Co 10⁴⁻⁶, 6⁷, Ro 13¹³, 1 Ti 1¹⁸; cf. Ph 2², Philm² etc.).

3. St. John.—(a) In order to understand St. John's presentation of Jesus' teaching on sin, it will be useful to see his own individual doctrine as given in his Epistles. Here the mission of Christ is dwelt on as having for its objective the taking away of sins (1 Jn 3⁴; cf. Jn 16¹¹ 1²⁹), and 'abiding in him' is dwelt on as constituting the guarantee of safety against sin (1 Jn 3⁶; cf. Jn 15⁴), as it also affords power to live the active fruitful life of righteousness. Further, there is a law 'which expresses the Divine ideal of man's constitution and growth,' and whoever violates it, by wilfully putting himself in opposition to this law, is guilty of sin, for 'sin is lawlessness' (3⁴). Another aspect of this law has to do with the mutual relationship of Christians who should be bound together by a love which is the reflexion of the eternal love of God for men (1 Jn 4⁷⁻²¹). If the law of love is neglected or broken, even in the matter of intercessory prayer for brethren who have sinned, unrighteousness is present, and 'all unrighteousness is sin' (5¹³⁻¹⁷). From this we see how intensely real was St. John's belief in the presence and power of sin amongst men. Indeed, one of the tests by which a man's sincerity may be discovered is his power of realizing this fact. He, moreover, gives as his reason for writing this Epistle, 'that ye may not sin' (2¹). The need of 'an Advocate' who is also 'the propitiation for our sins' is insisted on as being the special creation of Christ in Christian consciousness (1 Jn 2¹⁻²; cf. Jn 14¹⁹). All this brings into clearer relief and greater prominence his doctrine of the sinlessness of the professing follower of Jesus Christ. The Christian as such 'cannot sin, because he is begotten of God' (1 Jn 3⁹; cf. 5¹⁸, 3 Jn¹¹), and, on the other hand, 'he that doeth sin is of the devil' (1 Jn 3⁹). The Christian abides in Christ (cf. Jn 15⁴⁻⁵), and because he does so he sinneth not (3⁶), whereas the committal of sin is the sure guarantee that he has neither seen nor known Him. The secret of his safety lies in the promise of Jesus that He 'keeps' (cf. Jn 17¹³) His own so that 'the evil one toucheth him not' (1 Jn 5¹⁸). The paradox in which St. John thus clothes his doctrine of sin reveals his profound conception of its character. Any sinful act by the Christian interrupts, and mars so far, his fellowship with God. If, however, the act be not the outcome of the man's habit or character, he cannot be said to do 'sin' in the sense of 'realizing sin in its completeness' (see Westcott, Epistles of St. John, on 1 Jn 3⁴). The fruit of Divine fellowship is developed in the Christian's inner or central life from which sin is banished; and this reminds us somewhat of St. Paul's view of the crucifixion of the flesh with its 'passions and lusts.'

A peculiar reference is made by St. John to 'a sin unto death.' This might be translated with perhaps a closer adherence to the writer's thought if the article were omitted. It is not any specific act or acts that he so characterizes. The saying must rather refer to sinful deeds of a character 'which wholly separates from Christ,' and thus tends to death (see Westcott, op. cit., on 5⁶). In so far as it springs from a heart which wilfully and with contumely rejects Christ, in so far may it be identified with the sin against the Holy Ghost (cf. Mk 3²⁹, Mt 12³¹, Lk 21¹⁰). The writer's refusal to insist on intercessory prayer for one thus guilty calls to mind the warnings in the Epistle to the Hebrews against the sin of apostasy or wilful sin after the reception of 'the knowledge of truth' (cf. He 6⁴⁻⁶ 10²⁶). It is probable that St. John has in his mind a class of sins which combine within itself the characteristics of both those mentioned (see art. 'Sin' in Hastings' DB iv. p. 535^b). One feature of 1 John connects this Epistle very closely with the Fourth Gospel, revealing itself in those passages which identify sin with falsehood, and righteousness with truth. It seems as if the writer traced all sin back to the spirit which leads men to deny 'that Jesus is the Christ' (1 Jn 2²² 4³). On the other hand, the acceptance of this belief carries with it the assurance of God's abiding presence, wherein is the sure guarantee of the realization of His purpose in us—'that we might live through him' (1 Jn 4³, cf. 4² 5¹).

(b) Fourth Gospel.—It is this last aspect of sin that is the dominant note of the teaching of St. John's Gospel. Indeed, this writing may be said to be a record of the sad rejection foreshadowed in the general terms, 'He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not' (1¹¹). This was more particularly true of the Jews of Jerusalem and Judæa, where the story of Jesus' ministry as told in this Gospel is for the most part laid. It is thus significant that in His last great discourse with His disciples, occurring as it did in Jerusalem, the centre of the activity hostile to His claims, Jesus lays special stress on the sin of unbelief in Him ('The Holy Ghost will convict the world of sin . . . because they believe not on me,' Jn 16⁸). The revelation of the Divine life, with its manifold evidences of love and mercy in and by Jesus, took away whatever excuse men might have in the presence of God's judgment. The real reason for the rejection of Jesus by the Jews lay in their hatred of 'the Father' (Jn 15²⁴, cf. v. 23). Indeed, it is this very revelation, designed by God as the eternal remedy against sin (Jn 1st), which in its process and achievement affords further possibilities to sin and its consequences (Jn 9th; cf. Lk 12th).

Nor must we omit to note that in this Gospel sin is regarded as a species of slavery. The reference to this aspect occurs but once (Jn 8th), but that it occupied an important place in early Christian teaching is evident from the incidental notices found scattered throughout the NT (cf. Ro 6^{th-20}, Tit 3rd, 2 P 2nd, Mt 6th=Lk 16th etc.).

The popular belief in the connexion between sin and physical suffering is noticed also in the Fourth Gospel, where Jesus is represented as denying its universal applicability (Jn 9th). At the same time He recognized that in certain cases the belief was justified (Jn 5th). It was, perhaps, His profound knowledge of a similar but a deeper relationship than this—the relationship of sin to the whole life—that gave to the words and actions of Jesus that exquisite tenderness in His treatment of individual sinners so noticeable in this Gospel (cf. Jn 4th, 8^{th-15}); a tenderness which He would fain impart to His followers in their dealings with fellow-sinners (cf. Jn 7th, Mt 7th, Ja 2nd).

We are thus enabled to see that the view of sin held and taught by Jesus is profounder and graver than any as yet existing, for it is an offence against One who is at the same time a righteous and loving Father and a just and holy God (Lk 15th; cf. Mt 5th, Jn 3rd etc.). The life of Christ is the object-lesson which Christians are invited to imitate in their daily relationships and life (Mt 11th, Jn 13th, 1 Jn 2nd, Ph 2nd; cf. 1 P 2nd etc.), and St. John has pointed out to us, in the words of Jesus Himself, the standard to which His followers are asked to aspire, when He defied His bitter life-long enemies to convict Him of sin (Jn 8th).

4. St. James.—The author of this circular letter views sin in its practical bearings on the daily life of men. Nevertheless, his conception of its character and results is as far-reaching as we have seen it to be in both the Pauline and the Johannine teaching. Its origin he traces to the surrender of the individual's will to 'desire' (Ja 1st). 'In itself the desire may be natural and innocent: it is when the man resolves to gratify it against what he feels to be the higher law of duty, that he becomes guilty of sin even before he carries out his resolve in act' (J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, note on 1st). The writer combats the idea that God is the author of evil, by insisting on the fact that each man may make a good or a bad use of temptation. As a morally free agent he stands or he falls, and the result of this freedom may be the promised 'crown of life' (1st) or hopeless 'death' (1st). We are here reminded of the 'sin unto death' (1 Jn 5th) referred to already, for 'sin when full-grown, when it has become a fixed habit determining the character of the man, brings forth death' (J. B. Mayor, op. cit. p. 53; cf. R. J. Knowling, Epistle of St. James, ad loc.). This Epistle betrays its Jewish origin in the attitude of the writer to the Law; for him the result of the Incarnation has been the transmuting of the Mosaic Law into 'the perfect law, the law of liberty' (1st, cf. 2nd), 'the royal law' (2nd). It may be said that he sometimes merely echoes the well-known opinion of contemporary Jewish Rabbins about transgressing the minutest behest of the Law (see the extracts from Rabbinical writings quoted by R. J. Knowling, op. cit., note on Ja 2nd). At the same time it must be admitted that his conception of sin, even when it finds expression in the seemingly trivial case of 'respect of persons' (2nd), 'is founded on a true spiritual view of the relation of man to God' (Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 533^b). The law of love is the essential guiding principle of all Christian life, and where this law is transgressed in the social relations of that life, the expression in our Epistle 'ye commit sin' (lit. 'ye work sin,' 2nd) is not too strong or emphatic.

A further point in connexion with St. James' teaching occupies the closing passages of his Epistle. In this, as in the whole of his writing, he deals with it from the point of view of the daily life. In his exhortation to mutual confession of sins and intercessory prayer for forgiveness he is incidentally dwelling on the truth that all real Christian life is conditioned by its adherence, both in word and in deed, to the principle of love (cf. 2nd). The same may be said of his advice with regard to the corporate prayer of the Church on behalf of one who is physically sick (5th). It is probable that our author held the common Jewish belief that sin and disease were connected as cause and effect, and his conviction that 'the prayer of faith' reaches out in its power to the whole man, extending even to the forgiveness of his sins by God, is based on his belief in the solidarity of human life as well as of the law to which it owes its allegiance. As in the case of the member of the community whose bodily and spiritual needs are ministered to by the active intervention of the Church, so he urges each individual member to prayer on behalf of his erring brother. The twofold blessing promised to this act of brotherly love may well be taken as an expression of his conviction that the individual lives of the members of the Christian community are knit so closely together that no single act of sin can be committed without so far bringing death within range of all, and that no act of love can be exercised without so far bringing mercy and forgiveness to all, and thus 'covering a multitude of sins' (cf. 1 P 4th).

5. Hebrews.—It cannot be said that there is any special doctrine of sin in this Epistle. Its readers were well acquainted with OT conceptions and teaching, and the writer deals mainly with the superiority of the New Covenant over the Old in supplying means whereby there shall be 'no more conscience of sins' (He 10th; cf. Westcott, The Epistle to the Hebrews, Add. Note on 9th). The central feature of this writing is the stress laid on the discovery by Christianity of 'a new and living way' (10th) by which we have direct access to God. It is by the removal of guilt in the forgiveness of sins by the sacrifice of Jesus that this way is opened 'once for all' (10th; cf. v. 1st 9th etc.). Special emphasis is therefore laid on the failure of the Mosaic institutions to 'take away sins' (10th, cf. 9th), and on the awful character of the danger of harbouring 'an evil heart of unbelief' (3rd).

The temptation to which the 'Hebrews' were exposed was that, under stress of persecution, they would reject the final revelation of God in Christ, or revert, under the influence of the Hellenistic Judaizers, to the somewhat eclectic faith of the latter. This wilful sin the writer characterizes as 'crucifying the Son of God afresh' (6th) and as treading Him under foot (cf. 10th). In warning them against the dangers to which they would be exposed during the time of suffering and trial now imminent, he points out to them that these trials may become in their own hands the means of their spiritual advancement. Instead of being the sole outcome of sin, suffering is often the chastisement of a loving Father 'that we may be partakers of his holiness' (12th). The great Example, whose solution of an age-long problem we are asked to study, was Jesus, 'who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame' (12th), and who though 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (4th), was nevertheless made 'perfect through sufferings' (2nd).

SIN.—The stronghold (fortress) of Egypt, 'Ezk 30^{th-15}, must be Pelusium, the Egypt. name of which is not clearly known, or some fortress in its neighbourhood. In the list of governors appointed by Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, while native princes were retained elsewhere, Sin is the only city put in charge of an Assyrian: no doubt he was placed at Pelusium to keep open the gate of Egypt for the Assyrian king. F. L. L. GRIFFITH.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF (name probably derived from the moon-god Sin).—A region on the route of the Hebrews from Egypt to Mt. Sinai. It is usually identified with the plain lying S. of the Ras Abu Zenimeh. Upon the view held in many quarters that Mt. Sinai must be located somewhere in the Negeb, the wilderness of Sin was on the more direct route from Egypt to Kadesh, near to if not identical with the desert of Zin (Nu 13² 20¹ 27¹⁴ 33³ 34¹, Dt 32⁸, Jos 15¹⁻³). Cf. ZIN. H. L. WILLETT.

SINAI (Mountain).—A holy mountain in the Sinaitic peninsula (whose name is said to be derived from that of Sin, the moon-god). It is called Horeb by E and D, whereas J and P employ the name 'Sinai'. Here Moses was granted the vision of the burning bush (Ex 3¹), whereby he first received a call to lead the Israelites to adopt Jahweh as their covenanted God; and here took place the tremendous theophany which is the central event of the Pentateuch, wherein the covenant was ratified.

The identification of Mt. Sinai is a matter of some difficulty, and various attempts to discover it have been made from time to time. The traditional site is Jebel Mûsa, 'the mountain of Moses,' almost in the centre of the triangle; here there has been a convent ever since at least A.D. 385, about which date it was visited by St. Silvia of Aquitaine—whose account of her pilgrimage still survives in part. This identification has therefore the warrant of antiquity. It is not, however, wholly free from difficulty, principally connected with questions of the route of the Exodus; but it is possible that with further study and discovery these difficulties may be found to be evanescent.

In recent years the tradition has been questioned, and two suggestions have been made calling for notice. The first is that originally suggested by Lepsius, who would place Sinai at Mount Serbal, some distance north-west of Jebel Mûsa. This theory has been championed, with a good deal of force, by the latest investigator, Professor Petrie's assistant, Mr. C. T. Currelly (see Petrie, Researches in Sinai, ch. xvii.). The region appears more suitable for the occupation of a large host than the neighbourhood of Jebel Mûsa, and it accords better with the probable site of Rephidim.

The second view would place the mountain out of the peninsula altogether, unless it can be proved that the Land of Midian included that region. And, indeed, the close connexion evident between Sinai or Horeb and Midian, which appears, for example, in Ex 3, makes this a theory worth consideration. But we are still in the dark as to the limits of Midian: all we can say is that it is not known whether Midian extended west of the Gulf of 'Akabah, and that therefore it is not known whether Sinai was west of 'Akabah. It must, however, be freely granted that to place Sinai east or north of 'Akabah would entirely disjoint all identifications of places along the line of the itinerary of the Exodus.

For the allegorical use of 'Sinai' in Gal 4²⁵, see art. HAGAR. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

SINAI (Peninsula).—The triangular tongue of land intercepted between the limestone plateau of the Tih desert in the north, and the Gulfs of Suez and 'Akabah, at the head of the Red Sea, on the south-west and south-east. It is a rugged and waste region, little watered, and full of wild and impressive mountain scenery. Except at some places on the coast, such as Tor, there is but little of a settled population.

This region was always, and still is, under Egyptian influence, if not actually in Egyptian territory. From a very early period it was visited by emissaries from Egyptian kings in search of turquoise, which is yielded by the mines of the Wady Magharah. There sculptured steles were left, and scenes engraved in the rock, from the time of Semerkhet of the first dynasty, and Seneruf of the third—dated by Professor Petrie in the fifth and sixth millennia B.C. These sculptures remained almost intact till recent years; till a party of English speculators, who came to attempt to re-work the old mines, wantonly destroyed many of them (see Petrie, Researches in Sinai, p. 46). What these vandals left was cut from the rock and removed for safety, under Professor Petrie's direction, to the Cairo Museum. A remarkable temple, dedicated to Hathor, but adapted, it would appear, rather to Semitic forms of worship, exists at Serabit el-Khadem, not far from these mines. It was probably erected partly for the benefit of the parties who visited the mines from time to time.

Geologically, Sinai is composed of rocks of the oldest (Archaean) period. These rocks are granite of a red and grey colour, and gneiss, with schists of various kinds—hornblende, talcose, and chloritic—overlying them. Many later, but still ancient, dykes of diorite, basalt, etc., penetrate these primeval rocks. Vegetation is practically confined to the valleys, especially in the neighbourhood of water-springs.

SINCERE.—The Eng. word 'sincere,' as it occurs in 1 P 2² 'the sincere milk of the word,' is used in its old sense of 'unmixed,' 'pure' (RV 'without guile').

SINew (that shrank).—See Gn 32²⁵ for the traditional origin of a special food-taboo (cf. FOOD, § 10), the result of which was that the Hebrews abstained from eating the sciatic muscle (RV 'the sinew of the hip') of animals otherwise clean. The prohibition is not mentioned in any of the legislative codes of the Pentateuch.

SINGERS.—See PRIESTS AND LEVITES, III. 1. 2.

SINIM.—The 'land of Sinim' (Is 49¹²) must, from the context, have been in the extreme south or east of the known world. In the south, Sin (Pelusium, Ezk 30^{15f}) and Syene (Ezk 29¹⁰ 30⁶) have been suggested. The latter is favoured by recent discoveries of papyri (cf. SEVENEH). The LXX favours the view that a country in the east was intended, and some modern commentators have identified Sinim with China, the land of the Sinae.

SINITES.—A Canaanite people (Gn 10¹⁷ = 1 Ch 1⁹). Their identification is quite uncertain.

SIN-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 14.

SION.—1. A name of Hermon, Dt 4⁴⁸. Sion is taken by some to be a textual error for Sirion (wh. see). 2. See ZION in art. JERUSALEM, II. 1.

SIPHEMOTH.—One of the places to which a portion of the spoil of the Amalekites was sent after David's return to Ziklag (1 S 30²⁵). The site has not been recovered.

SIPPAI.—See SAPH.

SIRACH.—See APOCRYPHA, 13.

SIRAH, THE WELL OF.—The place at which Joab's messengers overtook Abner (2 S 3²⁶). It lay on the road from Hebron to Jerusalem, and is now probably 'Ain Sirah, near Hebron.

SIRION.—The name said to be given by the Zidonians to Mt. Hermon, Dt 3². Like Senir, it may originally have been the designation of a particular part of the mountain. Cf. SION, 1.

SISERA.—1. In Jg 4²². Sisera is represented as captain of the host of Jabin, a Canaanite king; his army is overcome by the Israelites under Barak. In his flight after the battle, Sisera, overcome by fatigue, seeks refuge in the tent of Jael, who treacherously kills him while asleep. In another account (Jg 5, the older account) Sisera appears as an independent ruler, and Jabin is not even mentioned; the two accounts differ in a number of subsidiary details, but in two salient points they agree, namely, as to the defeat of Sisera and as to the manner of his death. It is clear that two traditions, one concerning Jabin and another concerning Sisera, have been mixed up together; in order to harmonize them Sisera has been made Jabin's captain (see BARAK, DEBORAH, etc.). 2. A family of Nethinim (Ezr 2³⁵ = 1 Es 5²⁴ Serar). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

SISINNES.—The governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia under Darius (1 Es 6², 7²⁷ 7⁷¹). In Ezr 5⁸ etc., he is called Tattal (wh. see).

SISMAI.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2⁴⁰).

SITH.—'Sith,' that is 'since,' occurs in Jer 15⁷ and other places; while 'sithence' occurs in 2 Es 10¹⁴.

SITHERI.—A grandson of Kohath (Ex 6²³).

SITNAH ('strife').—The name given to a well dug by the herdmen of Isaac in the region of Gerar (Gn 26²¹). The site is uncertain. H. L. WILLETT.

SIVAN.—See TIME.

SKIRT.—See DRESS 4 (b).

SKULL, PLACE OF A.—See GOLGOTHA.

SLANDER, TALEBEARING.—Both noun and verb 'slander' are used of malicious gossip of varying degrees of heinousness. The references are all to the slandering of persons, except Nu 14³⁸ AV, where RV has 'an evil report against the land.' The expression 'walking with slanders' (Jer 6¹⁸, cf. 9⁴) is in the original identical with 'going about as a talebearer' (Lv 19¹⁶, Pr 11¹³ 20¹⁹; cf. Ezk 22⁷ in AV and RV). The element of falsehood in the gossip is seen in 2 S 19²⁷, where 'slandered' is synonymous with 'falsely accused.' 'Of no sin and wickedness are there so many complaints in OT as of slander and false accusation—whereof the Psalms are witness' (Cornill, Jeremia, 89). See, further, CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 5. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SLAVE, SLAVERY.—The Heb. 'ebhedh, usually tr. 'servant,' has a variety of meanings, between which it is not always easy to distinguish. E.g. in 2 S 9² 'servant'—retainer, in v.^{10b}—bondman, in v.¹¹—a polite expression of self-depreciation (cf. 2 K 4¹ and 1 K 9²³). In a discussion of Hebrew slavery only those passages will be dealt with in which the word probably has the sense of bondage.

1. Legally the slave was a chattel. In the earliest code (Book of the Covenant [=BC]) he is called his master's money (Ex 21²). In the Decalogue he is grouped with the cattle (Ex 20¹⁷), and so regularly in the patriarchal narratives (Gn 12¹⁶ etc.). Even those laws which sought to protect the slave witness to his degraded position. In the BC the master is not punished for inflicting even a fatal flogging upon his slave, unless death follows immediately. If the slave lingers a day or two before dying, the master is given the benefit of the doubt as to the cause of his death, and the loss of the slave is regarded as a sufficient punishment (Ex 21²¹). The jus talionis was not applicable to the slave as it was to the freeman (cf. 21^{22c} with 22²²); and it is the master of the slave, not the slave himself, who is recompensed if the slave is gored by an ox (Ex 21²⁸). In these last two instances BC follows the Code of Hammurabi [=CH] (§§ 196–199, 252).

In practice the slave as a chattel was often subject to ill usage. He was flogged (Ex 21²⁰, Pr 29¹⁹), and at times heartlessly deserted (1 S 30^{14c}). Though the master is here an Amorite, the cases of runaway slaves in Israel bear testimony to their sufferings even at the hands of their fellow-countrymen; cf. the experiences of the churl Nabal (1 S 25¹⁰), of the passionate Shimel (1 K 2²⁹), and of Sarah (Gn 16⁹); the implications as to the frequency of such cases in the law of Dt 23^{16c}, and in later times (Sir 33^{24–25}). The position of the maid-servant was in general the same as that of the man-servant. In the BC it is assumed that the maid-servant is at the same time a concubine (Ex 21^{7c}; cf. Hagar, Zilpah, and Bilhah in the patriarchal narratives). Even in P the idea of the slave-girl as property is still retained (Lv 19²⁰). Here the punishment for the violation of a slave-girl was almost certainly a fine to be paid to the master, if we may judge from the analogous law in Ex 22¹⁶—Dt 22²⁸; i.e. it is an indemnity for injury to property. In practice the maid-servant, though the concubine of the master, is often the special property of the mistress (Gn 16^{2a}, 9 25¹² 30²), at times having been given to her at marriage (Gn 24⁵⁹ 29²⁴, 39). She is subject to field labour (Ru 2^{20c}) and to the lowest menial labour (1 S 25⁴, figurative, but reflecting actual conditions).

Slaves were recruited (1) principally from war, at least in earliest times. Captives or subject populations were often employed not only as personal attendants, but also as public slaves at the Temple (Jos 9²², 27 [2^a a gloss], Neh 7^{57–60}, and see art. NETHINIM) or on public works in the corvée (Jos 16¹⁰, Jg 12^{2d}, 1 K 9^{20–22}—2 Ch 8^{7–9}), while captive women were especially sought as concubines or wives (Dt 21^{10–14}). (2) From the slave-trade, of which the Israelites undoubtedly availed themselves (cf. the implications in Gn 37²³ 17¹², Lv 25⁴⁴). This trade was mainly in the hands of the Phoenicians and Edomites (Am 1⁶, 9, Ezk 27¹³, Jl 3⁶). (3) From native Israelites who had become enslaved as a punishment for theft (Ex 22⁴), whether for other crimes also is not stated; Josephus (Ant. xvi. i. 1) knows of no other. (4) From native Israelites who, through poverty and debt, had been forced to sell themselves (Ex 21², Am 2⁸, Dt 15², Lv 25³⁹, Pr 11²² [?] 22⁷ [?]) or their children (Ex 21⁷, 2 K 4¹, Neh 5⁵, 8, Is 50¹, Job 24⁹) into servitude.

Whether the creditor had the right to force the debtor into slavery against his will is not clear. Ex 21² and 2 K 4¹ (cf. Mt 18²³) rather favour this view. The reflexive verb in Lv 25^{39a} and in Dt 15², where the same verbal form should probably be again translated by the reflexive, not by the passive as in RV, favours voluntary servitude. But possibly the later codes are modifications of the earlier practice. Neh 5⁵ is ambiguous.

As to the number of slaves we have no adequate data. Gn 14¹⁴ cannot be used as evidence. The numbers in the corvée (1 K 5¹³, 15) are discrepant, and in any case probably do not refer to slaves proper. The prosperous retainer of Saul has 20 servants (2 S 9⁴⁰). The proportion of slaves to freemen in Neh 7^{58c} is 1 to 6. The price of slaves naturally varied. The BC (Ex 21²) fixes the average price at 30 shekels (about £4). CH in the same law allows but 17 shekels (§ 252, cf. 214). Joseph is sold for 20 shekels (Gn 37²⁸). In later times the price in Exodus seems to have been maintained (2 Mac 8¹; Ant. xii. ii. 3).

2. But while the slave was a chattel, nevertheless certain religious and civil rights and privileges were accorded him. In law the slave was regarded as an integral part of the master's household (Ex 20¹⁷), and, as such, an adherent of the family cult (cf. the instructive early narratives in Gn 24 and 16). Accordingly the BC (Ex 23²) and the Decalogue (Ex 20¹⁰) guarantee to him the Sabbath rest. Deuteronomy allows him a share in the religious feasts (12¹², 18 16¹¹, 14), the humanitarian viewpoint being chiefly emphasized. In P the more primitive idea of the slave as a member of the family, conceived as a religious unit, is still retained and utilized in the interest of religious exclusiveness. Thus, while the gēr (sojourner) cannot partake of the Passover unless circumcised, the slave must be circumcised and so is entitled to partake (Ex 12⁴⁴ cf. the narrative Gn 17^{22c}). Again, while the gēr in a priest's family, or even the daughter of a priest who has married into a non-priestly family, may not eat of the holy things, the priest's slave is allowed to do so (Lv 22^{10c}).

As to civil rights: In the BC, murder of the slave as well as of the freeman is punishable with death (Ex 21¹²—Lv 24¹⁷; the law is inclusive). If death results from flogging, the master is also punished. connect-ally by a fine (Ex 21^{20f.}). If the slave is seriously maimed by his master, he is given his freedom (Ex 21^{26f.}). At this point the BC contrasts very favourably with the CH. The latter does not attempt to protect the slave's person from the master, but only provides for an indemnity to the master if the slave is injured by another (199, 213, 214). While a man could be sold into slavery for debt (see above), man-stealing is prohibited on pain of death (Ex 21¹⁶=Dt 24⁷). Deuteronomy interprets the Exodus law correctly as a prohibition against stealing a fellow-countryman. Deut. also forbids returning a slave who has escaped from a foreign master (Dt 23^{16f.}). If the slave in this case were a non-Israelite (which, however, is not certain), the law would be a remarkable example of the humane tendencies in Deut. and would again contrast favourably with CH, which prescribes severe penalties for harbouring fugitive slaves (16, 19). The humane law for the protection of captive wives (Dt 21¹⁰⁻¹⁴) is also noticeable.

But practice often went far beyond law in mitigating the severity of servitude. Indeed, slavery in the ancient East generally was a comparatively easy lot. The slave is grouped with wife and child as part of the master's household (Ex 20¹⁷). Children are property and can be sold as well as slaves (Ex 21⁷; cf. 22¹⁶=Dt 22²⁸ where the daughter is regarded as the father's property). Children are flogged as well as slaves (Pr 13²⁴). Wives were originally bought from the parents, and wives and concubines are often almost indistinguishable. Hence the lot of the slave was probably not much harder than that of wife or child (cf. Gal 4¹), and the law implies the possibility of a genuine affection existing between master and man (Ex 21⁵=Dt 15¹⁶). Accordingly we find many illustrations of the man-servant rising to a position of importance. He may be intrusted with the most delicate responsibilities (3n 24), may be the heir of his master (Gn 15¹⁻⁴), is often on intimate terms with and advises the master (Jg 19^{25f.}, 1 S 9^{24f.}), the custom of having body-servants (Heb. na'ar Nu 22²², 1 K 18¹², 2 K 4¹², Neh 4²² etc.) favouring such intimacies, and he may even marry his master's daughter (1 Ch 23^{16f.}; cf. similar cases in CH § 175 ff.). Especially servants of important men enjoy a reflected dignity (1 S 9²², 2 K 8⁴). The rise of servants into positions of prominence was so frequent as to be the subject of proverb-making (Pr 14²⁴, 17², 19¹⁰, 30^{22a}).

Whether a servant could own property while remaining a servant is not clear. The passages adduced in favour of it (1 S 9²⁴ [a gratuity], 2 S 9²², 16²² [Ziba is a retainer], Lv 25^{40b} [not a real servant]) are not pertinent. Dt 15¹⁷ makes against it, but not necessarily, and the fact that in Arabia and Babylonia (CH § 176) the slave could own property awakens a presumption in favour of the same custom in Israel.

Under a good house-wife the maid-servant would be well taken care of (Pr 31¹⁵). At times she also seems to be the heir of her mistress (Pr 30^{22b} [?]). The son of the slave-concubine might inherit the property and the father's blessing (Gn 16^{7f.}, 21¹⁰, 49²⁷), but this depended on the father's will (Gn 25⁶), as in Babylonia (CH § 170^{2f.}). The effect of occupying such positions of trust was often bad. Proverbs fears it (19¹⁰, 30²¹⁻²³), and such passages as 2 K 5^{26f.}, Neh 5¹⁴, Gn 16⁴ justify the fear. Servants also tended to become agents of their master's sins (1 S 21¹⁻¹⁵, 2 S 13¹⁷).

3. Thus far no distinction between native and foreign slaves has been observed either in law or in practice, except possibly by implication at Ex 21¹⁶=Dt 24⁷, and Dt 23^{16f.}. The view that the protective laws in Ex 21^{20f.} apply only to the native slave is without exegetical justification, and Gn 17¹², Ex 12⁴⁴, Gn 15³ [if the text can be trusted] 39¹⁷, [probably equally applicable to conditions in Israel], 1 Ch 23^{16f.} and Gn 16^{15f.} show that the foreign man- or maid-servant may enjoy all the advantages of the native Israelite.

The distinction drawn between the subject Canaanites and the Israelites at 1 K 9^{26f.}—2 Ch 8^{7f.} is clearly incorrect (cf. 1 K 5¹²) and belongs to a later development in the ideas of slavery (see below). The distinction drawn in P between the 'home-born' slave and the one 'purchased with money' (Gn 14¹⁴, 17¹² etc.) does not refer to the two classes of foreign and native slaves.

In apparently but one particular, though this is of vital importance, the native slave is legally better off than the foreign-born, namely, in the right to release. Already in CH (§ 117) provision was made for the release, after three years, of a wife or children who had been sold for debt. In the BC (Ex 21¹⁻⁶) this idea was associated with the Sabbath idea, and a release was prescribed after 6 years of servitude, but the law was extended to cover every Israelite man-servant. Yet in the specifications of the law (vv. 2, 4) the rights of the master still noticeably precede the rights of the husband and father. Provision is also made for the slave to remain in servitude if he prefers to do so. In this case the servant is to be brought to the door of the master's house, not of the sanctuary (the rite would then lose its significance), and have his ear pierced with an awl (a wide-spread symbol of servitude in the East) when he would become a slave for life.

The phrase 'unto God' (v. 5a) can scarcely refer in this connexion to the local sanctuary, as has usually been held. It signifies the adoption of the slave into the family as a religious unit, and probably referred originally to the household gods (or ancestors?).

In the case of the maid-servant (Ex 21⁷⁻¹¹) no release was permitted under ordinary circumstances (v. 7), for it is assumed that the slave-girl is at the same time a concubine, and hence release would be against the best interests both of herself and of the home. Yet she is not left without protection. Her master has no right to sell her to a family or clan not her own ('foreign people,' v. 8b, probably has this restricted significance, sale of an Israelite to a non-Israelite being out of the question), but must allow her to be redeemed, presumably by one of her own family. Failing this, he may give her to his son, in which case she is to be treated as a daughter (v. 9). If neither of these methods is adopted, a third way is provided. He may take another (concubine or wife), but must then retain the first, provide for her maintenance and respect her marital rights (v. 10). If the master refuses to adopt any one of these three methods ('these three,' v. 11, refers to the three methods in vv. 8-10, not to the three provisions in v. 10), then, and then only, the maid-servant has a right to release.

The above is but one of several possible interpretations of this passage. Further, the meaning of v. 8a is doubtful. The text is corrupt. Instead of the phrase 'who hath espoused her to himself,' we should read either 'so that he hath not known her,' or 'who hath known her.' On the first reading the two methods of procedure in vv. 8, 9 are allowable if she be still a virgin (in v. 10 she is no longer such). On the second reading one of the three methods in vv. 8-10 must be followed when she is de facto a concubine. The latter reading is exegetically preferable. The resultant possibility of a father giving his concubine to a son was probably not offensive, at a time when wife and concubine were regarded as property which a son could inherit. Among the Arabs marriage with a stepmother was common till the rise of Islam. In later times these marriages were forbidden both in the Koran and in the Hebrew law (Dt 22³⁰, 27²², Lv 18²⁰, 20¹¹).

The Deuteronomic re-formulation of the Law of Release (Dt 15¹²⁻¹⁸) is noteworthy. (1) Release is extended to the maid-servant. Consequently the specifications in Ex 21^{2, 4, 7-11} are allowed to lapse, and in the awl-rite only the possibility of the slave continuing in servitude through love of his master is considered. This change is due to the increasing respect for the marriage relation. The slave-husband's rights over the wife are now superior to the master's rights, and it is apparently no longer assumed that the maid-servant as such is the concubine of her master. Where concubinage does not exist, the maid-servant can be released without prejudice to the marital relation. (2) In Deut the awl-rite is clearly only a domestic rite. This con-urms the interpretation of the rite given above. The Deuteronomist, who localizes all religious observances at the central sanctuary, consequently drops the 'unto God' of Ex 21^{4a}. (3) The characteristic humanitarian exhortation (vv. 12, 14) is added, and the reasonableness of the law defended (vv. 15, 18).

Jer 34⁸⁻¹⁷ describes an abortive attempt to observe the law in its Deuteronomist formulation. The law had evidently not been observed in spite of its reasonableness, and was subsequently again allowed to become a dead letter.

A third version of the Law of Release is found at Lv 25³⁹⁻⁴⁴. Three cases are considered: (1) that of the Israelite who has sold himself, because of poverty, to his fellow-countryman (vv. 39-42). Such an one is not to be regarded as a real slave but as a hireling, and is to be released in the year of Jubilee. (2) Actual slaves are to be obtained only from non-Israelite peoples (cf. 1 K 9²⁵). For them there is no release (vv. 44-46). (3) If an Israelite sells himself to a gēr, he may be redeemed at any time by his next of kin or by himself (power to acquire property assumed), but in any case he must be freed at the year of Jubilee (vv. 47-49). The redemption-price is proportioned to the number of years he had yet to serve from the time of his redemption to the Jubilee year, in other words, to the pay he would receive as an hireling during that period. Thus the possibility of an Israelite becoming an actual slave is again obliterated. The differences between this law and the earlier legislation are marked. (a) It formulates the growing protest against the idea that an Israelite could be a slave (cf. Neh 5⁴⁻⁵). (b) Through the institution of the Jubilee year it provides that even the quasi-servitude which is admitted should not be for life, and consequently it ignores the awl-rite.

A difficulty emerges at this point. The Levitical law, which postpones release till the 50th year, seems to work a greater hardship at times than the earlier laws, which prescribe release in the 7th year. Here three things are to be remembered: (a) the earlier law had probably become a dead letter long before the present law was formulated (cf. Jer 34, above); (b) the Jubilee law is the result of a theological theory (cf. vv. 2, 42, 45), and never belonged to the sphere of practical legislation; (c) as such it is to be construed, not in antithesis to the 7th year of the earlier laws, but to the lifelong period of servitude often actually experienced. It will not lengthen the time until the year of release, but will theoretically abolish all lifelong servitude. This theoretical point of view so predominates that the prolongation of the time of servitude, if the law had ever become actually operative, is left out of account. The fact that the Israelite in servitude to another Israelite is really worse off than an Israelite attached to a gēr, who could be redeemed at any time, also shows that we are not dealing with practical legislation.

4. In these three laws of release we have three clearly marked stages in the recognition of the slave's personality. The BC provides for the release of the Israelite man-servant. Deut., with its humanitarian tendencies, extends this privilege to the maid-servant. Lev., on the basis of its theological conceptions, denies that any Israelite can be an actual slave. But all these laws remain within nationalistic limitations. One step more must be taken. The rights of the slave as a man, and not simply as a fellow-countryman, must be recognized. The growing individualism which accompanied the development of the doctrine of monotheism prepared the way for this final step, which was taken by Job in the noble passage 31¹³⁻¹⁵. In the same spirit Joel universalizes the primitive conception of the necessary attachment of the slave to the family cult, and makes him share equally with all flesh in the baptism of the Spirit of God (2²⁹).

Note.—The relationship of servant to master is a favourite figure in the OT for the relationship of man to God (esp. in the Psalms). The nation, Israel, is also often thought of as the servant of Jehovah (cf. Is 41⁸⁻¹⁰).—a thought which finds its most profound expression in Is 42¹⁻⁴ 49¹⁻⁶ 50¹⁻¹⁰ 52¹⁻⁵ 53¹². Cf. art. SERVANT OF THE LORD.

5. In the NT it is only the attitude of Jesus and St.

Paul towards slavery that demands attention. Jesus was not a political agitator, or even a social reformer. In nothing is this fact more strikingly illustrated than in His allusions to slavery. He refers to it only for purposes of illustration (e.g. Mk 12¹⁻⁴, Mt 24⁴, Jn 8³⁴ etc.). He never criticizes it, even when it violates, as He must have realized, His own principles of love and brotherhood (Mt 18²³, Lk 17²⁰; contrast the figurative picture in Lk 12⁵⁷). But, as Christianity reached into the world and developed into a social force, it became increasingly necessary to consider what its attitude towards slavery should be, especially as many slaves became Christians (in Ro 16¹⁰, 11, 1 Co 1¹, Ph 4²² 'them of the household' are the slave-retainers). In this connexion St. Paul enunciates just one great principle—In Christ all the distinctions of this world disappear; the religion of Jesus knows neither bond nor free (1 Co 12¹³, Gal 3²⁸, Col 3¹¹). But he did not use this principle to overthrow the institution of slavery. On the contrary, at 1 Co 7²¹⁻²² he counsels one who has been called (into the Christian life) while a slave not to mourn his lot. He even advises him, if the opportunity to become free is offered, to remain in servitude (v. 21, but the interpretation is doubtful), the near approach of the Parousia (v. 22) apparently throwing these external conditions of life into a perspective of insignificance for St. Paul. The Apostle does not seek 'to make free men out of slaves, but good slaves out of bad slaves' (Eph 6⁵⁻⁹, Col 3²²⁻⁴¹; cf. 1 P 2¹⁸). In these passages the corresponding duties of master to man are also insisted upon, as there is no respect of persons with Christ. It is significant that in the later Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 6¹⁸, Tit 2⁹⁻¹¹) the exhortations to the masters are omitted. It would seem as if some slaves had taken advantage of the Christian principle of brotherhood to become insubordinate. In Philemon we have the classical illustration of St. Paul's attitude towards slavery exemplified in a concrete case. Here again he does not ask Philemon to free Onesimus; and it is clear from 1 Ti 6¹⁸ and the subsequent history of the Church that Christians in good standing owned slaves. But in Philem 16 the slave is transfigured into a brother in Christ. For further discussion of this point see art. PHILEMON.

Though the Church recognized slavery, it is a remarkable fact that in the epitaphs of the catacombs the deceased is never spoken of as having been a (human master's) slave, though often described as a slave of God. In death, at least, the Christian ideal was fully realized. The slave becomes with the master only the slave of God. Contrast the gloomy equality in Job 3¹⁹. KEMPER FULLERTON.

SLEEVES.—See DRESS, 2 (d).

SLEIGHT.—The word tr. 'sleight' in Eph 4¹⁴, 'by the sleight of men,' means literally dice-playing. Tindale uses 'wilyne,' which is more intelligible now than 'sleight.'

SLIME.—See BITUMEN, SIDDIM [VALE OF].

SLING.—See ARMOUR ARMS, § 1 (e).

SMITH.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 2.

SMYRNA (also and more strictly Zmyrna) was founded as a colony from Greece earlier than b.c. 1000, but the early foundation, which had been Aolian, was captured by its southern neighbours the Ionian Greeks and made an Ionian colony. This second foundation became a powerful State, possessing territory far to the E., and as late as the 7th cent. b.c. fought on equal terms against the great Lydian power (see SARDIS). It gradually gave way, however, and was captured and destroyed about b.c. 600 by Alyattes, king of Lydia. It now ceased to be a Greek city, and it was not till the 3rd cent. b.c. that it became so again. There was a State called Smyrna between 600 and 290, but it was mainly a loose congeries of villages scattered about the plain and the surrounding hills, and not in the Greek sense a polis (city-State). Alexander the Great intended to re-found the city, but did not carry out his plan. It was left for one of his successors, Lysimachus, who accomplished it in B.C. 290. The old city had been on a steep high hill on the N. side of the extreme eastern recess of the gulf; the new was planted on the S.E. shore of the gulf, about 2 miles away. The object of the change was to obtain a good harbour and a suitable point for the starting of a land trade-route to the E. There were in reality two ports—a small inner one with a narrow entrance, and a mooring ground; the former has gradually filled up through neglect. Its maritime connexion brought it into contact with the Romans, who made an alliance with Smyrna against the Seleucid power. In B.C. 195 Smyrna built a temple to Rome, and ever afterwards remained faithful to that State through good fortune and bad. Rome showed a thorough appreciation of this friendship and loyalty, and in A.D. 26 this city was preferred before all others in Asia as the seat of the new temple to be dedicated by the confederacy of that province to Tiberius.

The city was of remarkable beauty. Its claim to be the chief city of Asia was contested by Ephesus and Pergamum, but in beauty it was easily first. In addition to its picturesque situation it was commended by its handsome and excellently paved streets, which were fringed by the groves in the suburbs. The city was well walled, and in the pagos above possessed an ideal acropolis, which, with its splendid buildings in orderly arrangement, was known as the crown or garland of Smyrna. The protecting divinity of the city was a local variety of Cybele, known as the Sipyrene Mother, and the towers and battlements of her head-dress bore an obvious resemblance to the appearance of the city. (The Greeks identified her with Nemesis, who here alone in the Greek world was worshipped, and not as one but as a pair of goddesses.) There was one street known as the Street of Gold. It went from W. to E., curving round the sloping hill, and had a temple on a hill at each end. For its length and fine buildings it was compared to a necklace of jewels round the neck of a statue. The life of the city was and is much benefited in the hottest period of the day by a west wind which blows on it with great regularity, dying down at sunset. This was counterbalanced by a disadvantage, the difficulty of draining the lowest parts of the city, a difficulty accentuated by this very wind. Smyrna boasted that it was the birthplace of Homer, who had been born and brought up beside the river Meles. This stream is identified by local patriotism with the Caravan Bridge River, which flows northwards till it comes below the pagos, then flows round its eastern base and enters the sea to the N.E. of it. But this is a mistaken view. The Meles is undoubtedly to be identified with the stream coming from the Baths of Diana and called Chalka-bounar, as it alone satisfies the minute description of the Smyranean orator Aristides (flourished 2nd cent. A.D.) and other ancient writers. It rises in the very suburbs of the city, and is fed by a large number of springs, which rise close to one another. Its course is circle-shaped at first, and afterwards it flows gently to the sea like a canal. Its temperature is equable all the year round, and it never either overflows or dries up. The city has suffered from frequent earthquakes (for instance, in A.D. 180), but has always risen superior to its misfortunes. It did not become a Turkish city till Tamerlane captured it in A.D. 1402. Even now the Christian element is three times as large as the Mohammedan, and the Turks call the city Infidel Smyrna. It has always been an important place ecclesiastically.

The letter to the Church at Smyrna (Rev 2:8-11) is the most favourable of all. The writer puts its members on a higher plane than any of the others. They have endured persecution and poverty, but they are rich in real wealth. They are the victims of calumny, but are not to be afraid. Some are even to be sent to prison as a prelude to execution, and to have suffering for a time. If they are faithful they shall receive real life.

The church was dead and yet lived, like the city in former days. The Jews in Smyrna had been specially hostile to the Christians, and had informed against them before the Roman officials. Most of them were probably citizens of Smyrna, but became merged in the general population and were not confined to a certain tribe, since the Romans ceased to recognize the Jews as a nation after A.D. 70. The hatred of the Jews there can be explained only by the supposition that many of the Christians were converted Jews. Similarly they helped in the martyrdom of Polycarp (A.D. 155). The city and its Christianity have survived all attacks. A. SOUTER.

SNAIL.—1. chōmel, Lv 11:30. See LIZARD. 2. shabbēlul, Ps 58: 'Let them be as a snail which melteth and passeth away.' The reference here appears to be to the slimy track which a snail leaves behind it, which gives the appearance of 'melting away.' E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

SNARES.—A cord with running noose (mōqēsh, Am 3:5 etc.; cf. yāqōsh 'one who lays snares,' 'fowler' Hos 9:8) was used to catch ground game and birds. The fowler also used a net (resheth, Pr 1:1, Hos 5: etc.), under which he tempted birds by means of food, and then, concealed near by, pulled it down upon them. The pach (Ps 124, Pr 7:22, Ec 9:12 etc.) probably corresponded to the Arab. fakhh, a trap made of bone and gut, with tongue and jaws on the principle of the common rat-trap. It is light, and the bird caught by the foot easily springs up with it from the ground in its vain efforts to escape. Of this Amos gives a vivid picture (3:9). In later times the fowler used decoys to lure birds into his cage (Sir 11:30). Both mōqēsh and pach are several times rendered in EV by gin. The NT pagis (Ro 11:9 etc.), and brochos (1 Co 7:23), may mean 'snare,' 'net,' or 'trap'; whatever seizes one unawares. W. EWING.

SNOW.—Every winter snow falls occasionally in the mountainous districts of Palestine, but seldom lies for more than a few hours—at most for a day or two. The greater part of the year, however, snow, glistening on the shoulders of Great Hermon, is easily seen from most of the higher hills in the country. It is frequently used as a symbol of whiteness and purity (Ex 4:8, Ps 51:7, Is 1:18, Mt 28:3 etc.). It stands for the cold against which the good housewife provides (Pr 31:21). From Mt. Hermon snow has been carried since olden times to great distances, to refresh the thirsty in the burning heat of summer (Pr 20:1). Water mīlth eth-thilf ('like the snow') for coolness, is the modern Arab's ideal drink. W. EWING.

SNUFFERS, SNUFF DISHES.—The former of these are the 'tongs' of Ex 37:2, the latter the vessels in which the burnt portions of the wicks were deposited. See TABERNACLE, 6 (b). Cf. FIREPAN.

SO.—The king of Egypt (Mizraim), Hoshea's correspondence with whom led shortly to the captivity of Israel (2 K 17:4). In B.C. 725 the kingdom of Egypt was probably in confusion (end of Dyn. 23), the land being divided among petty princes, and threatened or held by the Ethiopians. It is difficult to find an Egyptian name of this period that would be spelt So in Hebrew. Assyrian annals, however, inform us that in 722, shortly after the fall of Samaria, a certain Sib'i, 'tartan' (commander-in-chief) of Musri, was sent by Pir'u, king of Musri (i. e. probably Pharaoh, king of Egypt), to the help of Gaza against Sargon. This Sib'i may be our So (or Seve), not king, but commander-in-chief. It has been thought that the Heb. So, Seve, and the Assy. Sib'i might stand for the name of the Ethiopian Shabako of the 25th Dyn., as crown prince and then king, but they would be singularly imperfect renderings of that name. Shabako gained the throne of Egypt about B.C. 713. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

SOAP (bōrth) occurs in EV (AV 'sope') only in Jer 2:2 (washing of the person) and Mal 3:2 (operations of the fuller). Properly bōrth denotes simply that which cleanses.' The cognate word bôr is commonly rendered 'cleanness,' but in Job 9³⁰, Is 1²⁵ RVm gives 'lye.' Soap in the modern sense of the word was unknown in OT times, and we do not know what precisely is referred to by bôrûh. As in Jer 22²² nether (AV 'nitre' [wh. see]), a mineral alkali, is set in antithesis to bôrûh, it is supposed that the latter was some kind of vegetable alkali which, mixed with oil, would serve the purposes of soap. This may be confirmed by the fact that in Jer 2²² and Mal 3¹ LXX renders bôrûh by poia = 'grass.'

SOBRIETY.—See TEMPERANCE, 1.

SOCO, SOCOH (RV has Socoh everywhere, except in 1 Ch 4¹⁸ and 2 Ch 28¹⁸, where it has Soco).—1. A fortified town in the Shephelah of Judah, mentioned in Jos 15²⁸ along with Adullam and Azekah; the Philistines (1 S 17¹) 'pitched between Socoh and Azekah'; Ben-hesed, one of Solomon's twelve officers, had charge of it (1 K 4⁹); it was re-fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁷); during the reign of Abaz it was taken, along with other prominent fortress cities of the Shephelah, by the Philistines. Its site was known to Eusebius and Jerome. It is now Khurbet Shuweikeh (dim. of Arab. Shaukeh), a ruin on a remarkable isolated hill in the Wady es-Sunt (Vale of Elah) near where it turns west. The hill is surrounded on three sides by deep valleys, while on the remaining, the E. end, a narrow, low neck, easily defended, connects it with the higher ground. Although there are few remains on the surface, the ancient city wall may be traced round most of the circumference: there is a plentiful spring to the S.W. Such a defensible site, lying close to main roads from Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Hebron, etc., to the great Philistine plain, must always have been of first-class importance. The Suchathites of 1 Ch 2²⁶ are perhaps inhabitants of Socoh.

2. Another Socoh (apparently) is mentioned in Jos 15²⁸, along with Jattir and Debir. The site of this may be esh-Shuweikeh, 10 miles S.W. of Hebron. 3. Socoh in 1 Ch 4¹⁸ is probably one or other of these two towns.

SOLEMN, SOLEMNITY.—The adj. 'solemn' frequently occurs in AV, always with assembly or meeting or some such word, and always in its early sense of 'regular' or 'public.' Thus 'a solemn feast' means simply 'a stated feast'; there is no corresponding word in the Hebrew. In the same way 'solemnity' means 'public occasion.' How much this word, as used in AV, differs from its modern meaning, may be seen from Shaks., Midsummer Night's Dream, v. i. 376:

'A fortnight hold we this solemnity,
In nightly revels and new jollity.'

SOLEMN ASSEMBLY.—See CONGREGATION

SOLOMON.—1. Sources.—1 K 1–11 (cf. 11⁴), with parallels in 2 Ch 1–9 (add references in closing chs. of 1 Ch.). In Chronicles the character of Solomon, as of the period as a whole, is idealized; e.g. nothing is said of the intrigues attending his accession, his foreign marriages and idolatry, or his final troubles, even with Jeroboam. Details are added or altered in accordance with post-exilic priestly conceptions (51², 13 7⁸ 81¹⁵); 1⁸ (cf. 1 K 3⁹) makes the sacrifice at Gibeon more orthodox; the dream becomes a theophany; in 7¹ fire comes down from heaven. In 9²⁸ reference is made to authorities, possibly sections of 1 K.; there is no evidence that the Chronicler was able to go behind 1, 2 K. for his materials. The books of OT and Apocrypha ascribed to Solomon are of value only as giving later conceptions of his career. Josephus (Ant. viii. i.–viii.) cannot be relied on where he differs from OT; the same holds good of the fragments quoted by Eusebius and Clemens Alexandrinus. Later legends, Jewish and Mohammedan, are interesting, but historically valueless; the fact that they have in no way influenced the OT narrative is an evidence of its general reliability; only two dreams and no marvels are recorded of Solomon. Archaeology has so far contributed very little to our knowledge of his reign.

2. Chronology.—His accession is dated c. B.C. 969, i.e. about 50 years later than the traditional chronology. We have unfortunately no exact dates, the dates of Hiram and Shishak (1 K 11⁴⁰) not having been precisely determined. The origin and interpretation of the 480 years in 6¹ are very doubtful. The 'little child' of 3⁷ (cf. Jer 1⁶) does not require the tradition that Solomon was only twelve at his accession (Josephus); the probabilities point to his being about twenty. The 40 years of his reign, as of David's (cf. Jg 3¹¹, 30 53⁸ etc.), would seem to represent a generation.

3. Early years.—Solomon was the son of David and Bathsheba (2 S 12²⁴, 25), presumably their eldest surviving child; his position in the lists of 5¹⁴, 1 Ch 3¹⁴ is strange, perhaps due to emphasis. The name means 'peaceful' (Heb. Shelomoh; cf. Irenæus, Friedrich), indicating the longing of the old king (1 Ch 22⁹); cf. Absalom ('father is peace'). The name given him by Nathan (2 S 12²⁵), Jedaniah ('beloved of J'), the same root as David, is not again referred to, perhaps as being too sacred. It was the pledge of his father's restoration to Divine favour. We have no account of his training. 'The Lord loved him' (2 S 12²⁴) implies great gifts; and v. 25 and 1 K 1 suggest the influence of Nathan. His mother evidently had a strong hold over him (1 K 1. 2).

4. Accession.—The appointment of a successor in Eastern monarchies depended on the king's choice, which in Israel needed to be ratified by the people (1 K 12); where polygamy prevails, primogeniture cannot be assumed. 1¹³ implies a previous promise to Bathsheba, perhaps a 'court secret'; the public proclamation of 1 Ch 22¹⁹, if at all historical, must be misplaced. Adonijah, 'a very goodly man' (1 K 1⁸), relying on the favour of the people (2¹⁹) [it is doubtful whether he was the eldest surviving son], made a bid for the throne, imitating the method of Absalom and taking advantage of David's senility. He was easily foiled by the prompt action of Nathan and Bathsheba; Solomon himself was evidently young, though soon able to assert himself. The careful and impressive ritual of the coronation was calculated to leave no doubt in the people's mind as to who was the rightful heir. The young king learned quickly to distinguish between his friends and enemies, as well as to rely on the loyalty of the Cherethites, his father's foreign bodyguard. The sparing of Adonijah (1 K 1²⁶) suggests that he was not a very formidable competitor; his plot was evidently badly planned. His request to Bathsheba (2¹³) may have been part of a renewed attempt on the kingdom (as heir he claims his father's wives), or may have been due to real affection. At any rate the king's suspicion or jealousy was aroused, and his rival was removed; Canticles suggests that Solomon himself was believed to have been the lover of Abishag. The deposition of Abiathar, and the execution of Joab and Shimei, were natural consequences; and in the case of the two last, Solomon was only following the advice of his father (2³⁴). He thus early emphasized his power to act, and as a result 'his kingdom was established greatly' at a cheap cost. We shall hardly criticise the removal of dangerous rivals when we remember the fate which he himself would have met if Adonijah had succeeded (1²¹), and the incidents common at the beginning of a new reign (2 K 11¹; cf. Pr 25⁶).

5. Policy.—The work of Solomon was to develop the ideas of his father. He consolidated the kingdom, welding its disorganized tribal divisions together into a short-lived unity, by the power of an Oriental despotism. The subjugation of the Canaanites was completed (9²⁰). The position of Jerusalem as the capital was secured by the building of the Temple and palaces and by the fortification of Milo (9²⁴ 11²⁷). A chain of garrison and store cities was established (9¹⁵), together with a standing army which included 12,000 horsemen and 1400 chariots (4²⁶ 10²⁶). The extent of his dominions (4²¹ 24) may represent the idea of a later age, and Eastern monarchs were ready to claim suzerainty where there was but little effective control. But inscriptions show us how kaleidoscopic were the politics of the period; kingdoms rose and fell very quickly, and the surrounding States were all at the time in a state of weakness. It was this that enabled his reign to be a generation of peace. His troubles (11¹⁻⁴⁰) were very few for so long a life. The hostility of Hadad (v. 14⁶) was a legacy from David, but there is no evidence that he became king of Edom. Rezon (4²²) conquered Damascus and founded a dynasty, but we hear nothing of any serious war. Nothing is known of the Hamath-zobah which Solomon subdued (2 Ch 8³). More than any other Jewish king, he realized the importance of foreign alliances, which were closely connected with his commercial policy. (a) Early in his reign he married Pharaoh's daughter (1 K 3¹), who brought as her marriage portion Gezer (9¹⁶). This Pharaoh was apparently the last of the Tanite (21st) dynasty—a confused period of which little is known; we have no other notice of the connexion between Egypt and Palestine at this period. Solomon was able to control, and no doubt profited by, the caravan trade between the Euphrates and the Nile. The caravanserai of Chinnah (Jer 41¹⁷; cf. 2 S 19³⁷, 1 K 2⁷) may have been established at this period in connexion with that trade. From Egypt (unless a N. Syrian Musri is intended) came horses and chariots for Solomon's own use, and for the purposes of a Syrian trade (10²⁸ 29). The alliance was apparently not disapproved at the time (cf. Ps 45), but it was not continued; Shishak protects Jeroboam (1 K 11⁴⁰). (b) The alliance with Hiram of Tyre (according to Clem. Alex., Solomon also married his daughter, cf. 11¹⁻⁸) was a continuation of the policy of David [but unless this Hiram was the son of David's ally, the building of the palace in 2 S 6¹¹ is put too early]. This was in connexion with his building operations (5¹⁻¹²). Timber from Lebanon was brought by sea to Joppa, together with skilled workmen from Tyre, especially the Gebalites (v. 18, cf. Ezk 27⁹); Hiram, a worker in brass, is particularly mentioned (1 K 7¹³). The yearly payment consisted of agricultural commodities (5¹¹; note exaggerations in 2 Ch 2¹³). A grant of twenty cities in Galilee was unsatisfactory to Hiram, though he apparently paid for them (1 K 9¹⁶⁻¹⁴). A more substantial return was the security which Solomon was able to offer to Phœnician trade with the E., and, above all, access to the port of Ezion-geber on the Red Sea, made possible by his suzerainty over Edom. Tamar (1 K 9¹⁶ RV [AV 'Tadmor']) in S. Judah apparently protected the route to the port. A lucrative trade was carried on by the two kings in partnership, in gold, spices, sandalwood, apes, peacocks, etc. (9²⁴ 10¹¹⁻²³). The extent of their voyages is a mystery, the situation of both Ophir and Tarshish being unknown. Assuming that there was only one Tarshish, and that in the West, it is still very doubtful whether Solomon can have been allowed any share in the Mediterranean trade; 'ships of Tarshish' may be only a name for a particular type of vessel. The Ophir trade must have been connected with S. Arabia; hence no doubt the visit of the queen of Sheba (10¹); the 'presents' exchanged would be really of the nature of barter, as illustrated by the Tell el-Amarna tablets. The Jews never took kindly to the sea, and, except for the abortive attempt of Jehoshaphat (22⁴⁸), Solomon's policy found no imitators.

6. Internal condition of his kingdom.—The impression is given us of great wealth. Though the sums left by David (1 Ch 22¹⁴) are incredible (equal to a thousand million pounds), Solomon's own revenue (four millions, 1 K 10¹⁴) is possible for an exceptional year. But the gold was used chiefly in unproductive forms of display (v. 18⁶), and probably but little was in circulation among the people; he had a difficulty in paying Hiram (9¹¹). His passion for buildings was extravagant; the Temple was seven years in building (6³⁸); his own house thirteen (7¹); there was also the palace for his wife (v. 8). He had an enormous court (note list of officers in 4²) and harem (11¹), necessitating a luxurious daily provision (4²²). The country was divided into twelve parts, under twelve officers, each responsible for a month's supplies (v. 7); these did not coincide with the tribal divisions, and Judah was exempt. For the building operations a mas or forced levy was organized under Adoram (5¹⁸, cf. 2 S 20²¹) with numerous subordinates (5¹⁶ 9²²); 30,000 men were sent to Lebanon, 10,000 a month; there were carriers and hewers (5¹⁸), and the aborigines were used as helots (9²⁰, Ezr 2²⁴ mentions their descendants). The mas was the very word used of the labour in Egypt, and beneath the apparent prosperity (4²⁰ 26) was a growing discontent and jealousy of Judah, which broke out in the rebellion of Jeroboam. By his personal popularity and extravagant display Solomon won a great 'name' (4²¹ 10¹⁻⁷), and gave Israel a position among the nations. His reign came to be idealized, but his policy was clearly economically and socially unsound, and could only lead to ruin. From the religious point of view the outstanding feature is the building of the Temple. It is an anachronism to represent it as the centralization of the worship of J^h according to the standard of Deut., to the exclusion of the 'high places,' and its effect was largely neutralized by the honour paid to other gods (11); none the less its elaborate magnificence was a visible proof of the triumph of J^h over the Baal worship of Canaan, and of His exaltation as supreme God of the nation. It cannot be maintained that the material and local conception of the Deity which it suggested made entirely for spiritual religion (Is 1⁸, Jer 7⁴, Ac 7⁴⁸); it meant a concentration of power in the hands of the Jerusalem priesthood at the cost of the prophets, who had no influence during Solomon's reign (Nathan in 4⁵ is probably his brother), and the attitude of Nathan, Ahijah, and Shemaijah makes it probable that they looked with suspicion on the new developments. It was, however, a necessary step in the religious history of the nation, and the Psalms prove that it made Zion the centre of its enthusiastic patriotism.

7. His wisdom was the special gift of God (3⁵). His 'judgment' (v. 18⁶) is the typical instance. It presumably took place early in his reign (cf. the contemptuous laughter of the people in Jos. Ant. viii. ii. 2), and simply shows a shrewd knowledge of human nature; many parallels are quoted. It proves his fitness for judicial functions, and 4²⁹⁻³¹ gives the general idea of his attainments. He was regarded as the father of Jewish proverbial (or gnomic) wisdom; 'wisdom books' existed in Egypt long before, but it seems impossible to distinguish in our present 'Proverbs' (c. B.C. 250) what elements may be due to him. Sirach and Wis. have no title to his name. 1 K 4²⁹⁻³¹ suggest general and poetical culture, parables drawn from nature, rather than the beginnings of science. Ps 72 may possibly belong to his age, but not Ps 127 or Canticles. Later tradition added much; the solving of 'riddles' held a large place in the wisdom of the East, and we hear of the 'hard questions' of the queen of Sheba (10¹), and of a contest between Solomon and Hiram (Jos. Ant. viii. v. 3). Josephus also speaks of his power over demons; Rabbinical legend of his control over beasts and birds, of his 'magic carpet,' and knowledge of the Divine name. Examples of the legendary material are accessible in Farrar's Solomon.

8. Character.—Solomon evidently began his reign with high ideals, of which his dream (3⁵) was a natural expression. His sacrifice at Gibeon (v. 4) gives another aspect; his religion was associated with external display. So the magnificence of the Temple, the pageantry and holocausts of its dedication (8), certainly ministered to his own glory, no less than to God's. His prayer, however, if it be in any sense authentic, is full of true piety, and he seems to have had a real delight in religious observances (9²). His fall is connected with his polygamy and foreign wives (11, cf. Neh 13²). He not only allowed them their own worship, a necessary concession, but shared in it; the memory of his 'high places,' within sight of his own Temple, was preserved in the name 'Mount of Offence.' This idolatry was, in fact, the natural syncretism resulting from his habitual foreign intercourse. Self-indulgence and the pride of wealth evidently played their part in his deterioration. Of his actual end nothing is known; he was an 'old man' (1 K 11⁴) at sixty years, but Jeroboam's flight suggests that he could still make his authority felt. Ecclesiastes gives a good impression of the 'moral' of his life; but whether he actually repented and was 'saved' was warmly debated by the Fathers. Dt 17¹⁴ criticises his Egyptian alliance and harem, his love of horses and of wealth, and Sir 47¹²⁻²¹ is a fair summary of the career of one whose 'heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, as was the heart of David his father' (1 K 11⁴). His wisdom could not teach him self-control, and the only legacy of a violated home-life was a son 'ample in foolishness and lacking in understanding.'

SONG OF SONGS (or CANTICLES).—1. Place in the Canon, interpretation, structure.—(a) The Song of Songs is one of the Kethûbm, Hagiographa, or Writings, the third of the three classes into which the Jewish Canon was divided. Printed copies of the Heb. OT follow the arrangement of the German and French MSS in placing it at the head of the five Megillôth or Rolls—the short books which are read at the great annual solemnities of Passover, Pentecost, the 9th Ab, Feast of Booths, Purim. Probably it owes its premier position to the fact that Passover is the earliest festival of the year. But there is reason for believing that a more ancient order survives in the LXX, where it stands by the side of Prov. and Eccles., the two other works to which Solomon's name was attached.

Grave doubts were long entertained by the Rabbis respecting the canonicity of Canticles (a common name of the book, from Vulg. Canticum Canticorum).

The Synod of Jamnia (A.D. 90-100), after some discussion, decided in favour of its reception, and Rabbi Akiba (A.D. 135) lent to this conclusion the weight of his great influence: 'All the Hagiographa are holy, but the Song of Songs is the most holy, and the whole world is not of such importance as the day in which it was given.' The opening words of the Targum are equally strong: 'Songs and praises which Solomon the prophet, the king of Israel, spake by the Holy Spirit before Jahweh, the Lord of the whole world. Ten songs were sung in that day, but this song was more to be praised than they all.' The Midrash asserts that 'Canticles is the most excellent of songs, dedicated to Him who one day will cause the Holy Ghost to rest on us; it is that song in which God praises us and we Him.'

(b) It was evidently admitted into the OT because it was supposed to treat of a religious theme. This is implied by its title in the Syriac Version: 'Wisdom of Wisdoms, which is Solomon's: the book which is called in Hebrew Shirath Shirim (i.e. "Song of Songs"). The theme was supposed to be the reciprocal love of Jahweh and Israel, and the story of that love in the history of the Chosen People. This was here enshrined in an allegory somewhat analogous to Hos 1-3 and Ezk 16. The Church adopted this line of interpretation from the Synagogue: Christ is the bridegroom, the Church or the soul is the bride.

The rubrics prefixed to many verses in Cod. Amiatinu. of the Vulgate illustrate the manner in which this was worked out: 'Voice of the Synagogue,' 'Voice of the Church,' 'Voice of Christ,' 'Voice of Mary Magdalene to the Church,' 'Christ calls together the nations.' To some writers the Virgin Mary was the bride, and Canticles told the story of the Incarnation. Luther read here Solomon's thanksgivings for the blessings bestowed on his kingdom. The school of allegorists has lost ground considerably in modern times, but is not yet extinct. There were, however, almost from the beginning, exegetes who saw that the subject really treated of in Ca. is the mutual love of man and woman. In the early Church the great name of Theodore of Mopsuestia stands out on this side, and among the Jews that of Ibn Ezra. Castelleto was driven out of Geneva by Calvin for asserting it, and Luis de Leon was thrown into prison by the Inquisition for the same cause.

(c) The question of form is closely connected with that of subject. Origen was the first to point out its affinity to the drama, but the earliest attempt to work this out thoroughly was made as late as 1722 by a German, G. Wächter. He has found many followers. Solomon and a country maiden were supposed to be the two leading characters. He married her, and his love for her led him to adopt a simpler mode of life. But is there not a third important character in the play? Later students answered in the affirmative. The revised explanation was that Solomon carried off 'the Shulammité' to his harem, and, abetted by the women already there, the 'daughters of Jerusalem,' sought to divert her affections from her shepherd-lover: failing in this, he at last magnanimously resigned her to the shepherd. Leaving aside all detailed objections, the consideration which is fatal to these and all conceivable forms of the theory is that the drama has no place in Semitic literature. If Ca. had been an exception to the rule, how is it that there is not a single stage-direction, not a note of any kind to identify the speaker or regulate the action?

Certain important MSS of the LXX show how keenly this defect was felt; to each longer or shorter section they prefix 'The Bridegroom,' 'The Bride,' 'A second time the Bride adjoins the maidens,' or the like, and one MS (23) runs to the following length, before 5¹, 'Not having found the bridegroom, the bride went out, and, as one found by the city-watchmen in the night, she is wounded and the keepers of the wall take her veil.'

And how is it that there is, within the poem itself, no movement towards a climax, no knot united or cut, no dénouement? Matters are as far advanced at 1⁴ 2⁴ as at 8³.

Even during the period when the drama-theory was most vigorously maintained, some distinguished scholars held that Ca. is made up of a number of originally detached pieces, which were eventually brought together because they all treat of Love. Wetzstein's Die Syriache Dreschlafel (1873) furnished a strong reinforcement of this opinion. He had observed, whilst resident in Syria, that the peasant bridegroom and bride are entitled king and queen for the first week of married life [a contemporary Arabic epithalamium has since then been cited (ZATW xxiv. p. 42) in which the man actually bears the name of the reigning Sultan, Abd il-Hamid]; they are attended by a vizier, have their throne on the threshing-floor, and receive the homage of the whole countryside. Songs and dances are executed by the 'friends of the bridegroom,' the bystanders, and the newly married pair. Some of these ditties, especially those which enumerate the charms of the bride, are of exactly the same character as certain sections of Canticles, and 7¹⁰ corresponds precisely with the waaf ('description') which the bride sings as she goes through the sword-dance on the wedding night. These facts have induced a large number of expositors to believe that Ca. is a collection of love-songs, composed expressly for, or at any rate suitable for use at, marriage festivals.

Budde, who strongly advocates this view, admits that the book is not without marks of unity, but holds that these are sufficiently accounted for on the supposition that all these folk-songs originated in a single district and period. Haupt entirely rejects the idea of a unity, and, looking on the book in its present state as a disorganized mass, re-arranges it into twelve poems. The extent to which he carries the liberty of re-casting may be seen in his No. 3, 'Brothers of the Bride,' which is made up of 63 7¹¹ 21 15⁸ 8⁸⁻¹⁰ 8¹³. Even Budde's less drastic treatment scarcely does justice to the tokens of plan and unity which the book presents. The recurrence of certain phrases (27 3⁸ 8⁴; 27 4⁸ 8¹⁰) is meant to indicate connexions and transitions of thought, and there is no overwhelming reason against our ascribing them to the original writer.

The sentiments and the style are so similar throughout as to justify our thinking of a single author who composed erotic and nuptial pieces for several occasions, and afterwards wove them into a garland of verse (cf. 2⁵ 5⁸; 1¹⁶ 4¹; 1² 6⁵; 2¹⁶ 6⁵; 6¹ 6¹⁰; 2⁹ 8¹⁰). A few of the smaller parts have probably been removed from their intended place, and it hardly admits of doubt that 4⁸ is a belated fragment, unintelligible where it now stands. But when we remember the apparent irrelevance of the occasional verses sung in Palestine to-day, we shall be slow to deny that the singers and auditors of Ca. grasped allusions and perceived a fitness which we fail to apprehend. And in studying the song from this point of view it is well to bear in mind the facts collected by Dalman (Paläst. Divan, p. xii.). He points out that the waf is not limited to wedding festivities, but is sung by the tent-fire, in the village inn, in the coffee-house where townsmen gather at night; that it is usually brief when descriptive of the beauty of bride or bridegroom; that in Palestine itself—however true Wetzstein's account of Damascus and the Hauran—there are but scanty traces of the temporary royalty of the bridal pair, and none of the thrashing-sledge throne.

2. Contents.—These fall into what we may call seven cantos. I. (12-27): in 12-14 the bride declares her affection; in v. 24, deprecates unfavourable criticism; in v. 27, inquires for her beloved. In 12-23 we have their praise of each other; in 24-7 her experience of love. II. (28-29): vv. 8-14 a spring visit, v. 16 the foxes, v. 16¹¹, close of the canto. III. (31-31): vv. 1-5 a dream, vv. 6-11 interlude. IV. (41-51): in 41-7 he sets forth her charms; v. 8 a fragment, vv. 9-11 his ecstasy of love, 41²-51 a 'garden.' V. (51-69): 51-8 a dream, 59-62 waf sung by bride; vv. 4-9 his praise of her. VI. (610-84): 610 inquiry by women, v. 11¹ her rapture, 612-710 waf sung during sword-dance ('dance of camps,' 71), 711-84 songs of the bride. VII. (84-10): v. 8 a reminiscence, v. 8¹, the power of love, vv. 8-10 the solicitude of the brothers, v. 11¹, an apologue, v. 11¹, conclusion.

We cannot regret that these canticles of human love have been preserved for us in the OT. The mutual attraction of the sexes is Divinely ordained. The love which finds expression in Ca. is regulated by marriage. The imagery is too luscious and the detail too complete for our taste, but they were produced by an Oriental for Orientals. More reticence does not necessarily mean more genuine purity. We should indeed have been glad to find some recognition of the loftier side of marriage, or something to remind us of Pr. 31. But the occasions for which these verses were composed and a comparison of the effusions which are still current on like occasions effectually disarm criticism. Dalman (Pal. Divan, p. xiii.) remarks justly concerning the folk-songs which he has brought together: 'The fact that the poems dwell only on the physical excellences of the beloved corresponds with the degree of civilization to which the Palestinian populace has attained. It does not follow that the

SONG OF THE THREE HOLY CHILDREN

Oriental ascribes no value to a woman's excellences of disposition and character.'

3. Authorship and date.—The title (1¹), according to which Solomon was the poet, is entirely destitute of authority. Its late and artificial origin is betrayed by the absence of the full form of the relative pronoun, which occurs nowhere in the poems themselves. The ascription of the authorship to the famous king is due partly to his being mentioned in 1⁵ 8¹² (37¹¹ are doubtful) and partly to his reputation as the typically wise man, the composer of songs a thousand and five (1 K 4³²). But the canonicity of the book would not have remained an open question until the 1st cent. of the Christian era if it had then been extant a thousand years as an acknowledged product of his hand. Moreover, the language in which it is written belongs to the very latest stratum of Biblical Hebrew. The exclusive use of the abbreviated pronoun occurs in no early document, and cannot be explained as a peculiarity of the northern dialect. And there is no proof that the writer was specially connected with the North; if he mentions Lebanon, Amana, Shenir, Hermon, Tirzah, he also knows En-gedi, Heshbon, the wilderness (of Judah), the 'daughters of Jerusalem.' Considering the brevity of the book, there is a very considerable number of words which are seldom or never found elsewhere, or are employed here in place of more common ones, or are to be seen only in late writings. One of them pardēs, is Zend; another, 'ēgēz, is Persian; 'appirōd, may be the Gr. phoreion; several are Aramaic. We should not look for these phenomena earlier than the period when Hebrew was yielding place to Aramaic, and if the exact age cannot be determined, the 3rd cent. B.C. is at least approximately correct.

4. Style.—It would be a dull eye that should miss the beauty of these poems. The verse moves lightly and gracefully, the imagery is charming. Our poet was deeply susceptible to the loveliness of nature, and fully capable of appreciating the art of his time. He carries us with him into the open air, to the vineyards, the villages, the mountains. He is awake at daybreak, to inhale the scent of the forest trees, to gather the apples and the pomegranates, to listen to the tinkie of the rills. Flocks of wild pigeons, timid and swift gazelles, fields embroidered with lilies, the breath of spring—all appeal to him. On the other hand, he is stirred by the pomp of a court, the magnificence of a royal inter, the glittering whiteness of an ivory tower, martial trophies, the attire of women, their jewels and perfumes. As a poet, there is nothing else in the Bible to compare with this. Had it indeed been Solomon's, it would have been as the title asserts, his Song of Songs, the fine fleur of his poetry.

5. Text.—This is not in a satisfactory state, but the critic should proceed with much caution. There are many passages where our view of the interpretation suggests alterations (12 4. 8. 9 29 310 414. 16 51. 6 62. 3. 5 78. 9. 10), but it is obviously easy to allow ourselves too much licence. Bearing in mind what might be advanced on both sides, who shall determine whether Nergal is to be substituted for nithgaloth ('banners') at 610? The Versions, especially LXX and Syr., supply a few better readings (12 4. 7. 10 217 31. 3. 10 48 12 51 13 65 71 82). There are obvious errors of transcription: nard should not follow nar is (41¹¹). Emendations suggested by the metre deserve attention (1⁵ 39. 11 75), but this has been carried much too far, not only by Bickell, but also in Kittel's edition of the Heb. Bible. Littmann (ZATW xxiv. p. 43) pertinently remarks that in many of the popular Arabic poems which he has collected there is an absence of definite verse-measure, and considers that 'in the OT also, verses of that kind, without definite metre, are at least possible.' There has been also a little too much readiness to delete verses, sentences, or words, on the ground that they occur in other parts of the poem in more suitable contexts. Martineau would omit 31⁴ because of its resemblance to 5¹¹. We must not forget that catchwords and refrains are characteristic of this class of poetry.

SOPATER, SOSIPATER.—These are two forms of the same name; St. Luke, as usual, adopts the more colloquial. 1. In Ac 20⁶ we read that Sopater, son of Pyrthus (RV), of Berea, accompanied St. Paul on his journey towards Jerusalem as far as Asia (if these last words are part of the true text), i.e. Troas [see SECUNDUS]. The mention of the father's name, unusual in NT, is thought by Blass to denote that Sopater was of noble birth; by Alföldi, to be intended to distinguish him from—2. A 'kinsman,' i.e. fellow-countryman [see JASON], of St. Paul, who sends greetings in Ro 16²¹. It seems unlikely, but not impossible, that these are the same person.

SOREK, VALLEY OF (perh. = 'valley of the soreq vine' [cf. art. VINE]).—The valley or wādī; in which Delilah lived (Jg 16⁴). Eusebius and Jerome connect the valley with Capharsorec, a village to the north of Eleutheropolis and near Saraa, that is, Zorah, the home of Samson's father. Capharsorec is now Khurbet Surik, to the north of Wādī es-Surār, which is identified with 'the valley of Sorek,' and not far from Sur'ah. See also ZORAH.

SOSIPATER.—See SOPATER.

SOSTHENES.—1. Ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, whom 'they all' (RV) laid hold on and beat when Gallio dismissed the case against St. Paul (Ac 18¹⁷). He probably succeeded Crispus as ruler when the latter became a Christian (v. 8), and the hostility of the rabble to the Jews showed itself when they were worsted in the courts. 2. 'The brother' associated with St. Paul in addressing the Corinthians (1 Co 1¹), and therefore probably a native of Corinth who had special relations with the Church there. If both references are to the same man, he must have been converted after the Gallio incident.

SOSTRATUS.—The governor of the citadel at Jerusalem under Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 4²⁷ (28), 29).

SOTAL.—A family of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2⁵⁸—Neh 7⁵⁷).

SOUL.—The use of the term in the OT (Heb. nephesh) for any animated being, whether human or animal (Gn 1²⁰ 'life,' 2⁷), must be distinguished from the Greek philosophical use for the immaterial substance which gives life to the body, and from the use in the NT (Gr. psyche) where more stress is laid on individuality (Mt 16²⁶ RVm). As the Bible does not contain a scientific psychology, it is vain to dispute whether it teaches that man's nature is bipartite (body and soul or spirit) or tripartite (body and soul and spirit): yet a contrast between soul and spirit (Heb. nāch, Gr. pneuma) may be recognized; while the latter is the universal principle imparting life from the Creator, the former is the individual organism possessed of life in the creature (Gn 2⁷—'breath of life' and 'living soul').—In some passages the terms are used as equivalent (Is 26⁹, Lk 14⁴⁷, Ph 1²⁷ RV), in others a distinction is made (He 4¹³, 1 Th 5²³). The distinction is this: 'soul' expresses man as apart from God, a separate individual; 'spirit' expresses man as drawing his life from God (cf. Jn 10⁴, 'life' = 'soul,' and 19³⁰). This separate individuality may renounce its dependence and refuse its submission to God. Hence the adjective 'psychical' may be rendered sensual (Ja 3¹⁵, Jude 1⁹ [RVm 'Or, natural, Or, animal']), or natural (1 Co 2¹⁴ 15⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶). Probably sensual in the two passages conveys more moral meaning than the term 'psychical' justifies, and natural is the better rendering, as expressing what belongs to the old unregenerate life in contrast with the characteristic of the new life in Christ, the spiritual (pneumatic). A parallel change in the use of the term 'flesh' and its corresponding adjective may be noted.

SOWER, SOWING.—See AGRICULTURE, § 1.

SPAIN.—The extent of country to which in NT times the name Spain, or more strictly 'the Spains,' was given, was practically identical with modern Spain. In the earliest times of which we have any knowledge it was inhabited, at least in part, by a race supposed to be a mixture of the aboriginal Iberian population with immigrant Celts. In b.c. 236, Hamilcar, father of the great Hannibal, invaded the country from Carthage, and after nine years of conquest was succeeded by his son-in-law Hasdrubal, who in turn was succeeded by Hannibal, under whom about b.c. 219 the conquest of the country was practically completed. Hannibal used it as his base in the Second Punic War against Rome. The Romans first invaded Spain in 218, and after various successes and reverses constituted two provinces there in 197, known for centuries afterwards as Hispania Citerior (Tarraconensis) and Hispania Ulterior (Bætica), separated from one another by the Ebro. The mountainous districts in the NW. were not actually subdued till the time of the Emperor Augustus (b.c. 20). The country was valued for its agricultural products, as well as its precious metals. It became the most thoroughly Romanized of all the Roman provinces, and in nothing is St. Paul's Roman attitude more evident than in his determination to proceed from Rome to Spain, rather than to Africa or to Gaul (Ro 15²⁴). It is not known whether he carried out his plan. Spain claims more honoured names in Roman literature than any other country in the 1st cent. A.D., having been the birthplace of the two Senecas, Columella, Mela, Lucan, Martial, and Quintilian.

SPAN.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

SPARROW (tsippōr, Ps 84³ 102⁷). The Heb. word is probably equivalent of Arab. asfūr, and includes any 'twittering' birds; generally tr. 'bird' or 'fowl'. See BIRD. In the NT references (Mt 10²⁹, Lk 12⁶ 7) strouthion evidently refers to the sparrow, which to-day is sold for food as cheaply as in NT times.

SPECKLED BIRD.—Jer 12⁹ (only). If the MT of this passage is correct, the tr. can hardly be other than 'Is mine heritage unto me (i.e. to my sorrow [a dativus ethicus, Cheyne, ad loc.]) (as) a speckled bird of prey? Are (the) birds of prey against her round about?' (so, substantially, RV). The people of Israel is compared to a bird of prey, just as, on account of its hostility to Jehovah, it is compared in v. 8 to a lion. But, as a speckled bird attracts the hostile attention of other birds, Israel becomes a prey to the heathen. The rendering proposed by some, 'mine heritage is unto me the ravenous hyæna,' cannot be obtained from the present text, which, however, is possibly incorrect.

SPELT.—See FITCHES, RIE.

SPICE, SPICES.—1. bāsām, Ca 5², RVm 'balsam'; bōsem [once, Ex 30²³, besem], plur. bēsāmīm. In Ex 30²³ is a list of various aromatic substances included under the name bēsāmīm. These were stored in the Temple

(1 Ch 9²⁹), and in Hezekiah's treasure-house (2 K 20¹³); they were used for anointing the dead (2 Ch 16¹⁴), and also as perfumes for the living (Ca 4¹⁰ etc.). 2. sammim, Ex 30³⁴ 'sweet spices'; and, along with 'incense', Ex 30⁷ 40³⁷, Lv 4⁷, Nu 4¹⁶ etc. In the first passage the 'sweet spices' are enumerated as stacte, onycha, and galbanum (all of which see). 3. nekōth, Gn 37²⁵ 'spicery' (RVm 'gum tragacanth or storax'), 43¹¹ (RV 'spicery'). The gum tragacanth is the product of the Astragalus gummifer, of which several species are known in Syria. The storax (Styrax officinalis), a shrub with beautiful white flowers, also affords an aromatic gum valued by the ancients. Whether nekōth corresponded definitely to one of these, or was a generic term for 'perfumes,' is an open question. 4. 5. Gr. ardmata (Mk 16¹, EV 'spices') and amōmon (Rev 18¹⁸, RVm 'amomum,' RV 'spice,' AV omits) are probably both generic. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

SPIDER.—1. sēmāmīth; see LIZARD (7). 2. akkōbtsh (cf. Arab. 'ankabūt', Job 8¹⁴, Is 59⁶ 4). Both references are to the frailness of the spider's web.

SPIKENARD (nērd, Ca 1¹² 4¹³ 14; also Gr. nardos pistike, Mk 14², Jn 12³).—The fragrant oil of an Indian plant, Nardostachys jatamansi, which grows with a 'spike.' The Arab. name sunbul hīndī, Indian spike, preserves the same idea. The perfume when pure was very valuable (Jn 12³).

About the meaning of the Gr. epithet pistike there has been much speculation. See note in RVm at Mk 14², and cf. art. 'Spikenard' in Hastings' DCG. E. W. MASTERMAN.

SPINDLE.—See SPINNING AND WEAVING, § 3.

SPINNING AND WEAVING.—1. The raw material.—

In all periods of Hebrew history the chief textile materials were wool and flax, and to a less extent goats' hair. As for the last named, it will be remembered that St. Paul was proud of being 'chargeable to no man' (2 Co 11⁹) in virtue of his trade as a weaver of tent curtains (Ac 18³), doubtless from the goats' hair (cilicium) for which his native province was famed. The preparation of the various materials for the loom differed according to the nature of each. Wool, before being spun, was thoroughly scoured and carded, probably, as now in the East, by means of a bow-string. In the case of flax, the stalks were rippled and exposed to the sun till thoroughly dry (Jos 2⁹); thereafter by repeated processes of steeping, drying, and beating, the fibres were ready for the 'heckling' or combing. Representations of these processes are preserved in the tombs of Egypt. Is 19⁹ also refers to the flax industry on the banks of the Nile; the emended text runs: 'And confounded shall be the workers in linen; the combing-women and weavers shall grow pale, and they that lay the warp shall be broken in spirit; (even) all that work for hire shall be grieved in soul.'

2. Spinning.—The spinning was done, as all the world over, by means of the distaff and spindle, and was pre-eminently women's work (Ex 35²⁴, 2 K 23⁷, Pr 31¹³). Both men and women, on the other hand, plied the loom. The distaff probably consisted, as elsewhere, of a piece of cane slit at the top to hold the wool. The spindle everywhere consists of a round shank of wood, 9–12 inches in length, furnished with a hook at the top for catching the wool or flax, and having its lower end inserted into a circular or spherical whorl of clay, stone, or other heavy material to steady the rotary motion of the spindle (see Rich, Dict. of Rom. and Gr. Ant. s.v. 'Fusus'; cf. 'Colus'). Many spindle-whorls have been found in the course of the recent excavations in Palestine (for illust. see Bliss and Macalister, Excavations, etc., pl. LXX. viii.; PEFSt 1902, 39; 1904, 324 and oft.). Sometimes a piece of broken pottery served as a whorl (id. 1902, 338). Distaff and spindle are named together in Pr 31¹³.

RV, however, rightly reversing the renderings of AV in 2 S 3²⁹ for 'one that leaneth on a staff' recent scholars render 'one that holdeth a spindle,' expressive of the wish that Joab's descendants may be womanish and effeminate.

3. The three varieties of loom.—'Loom' does not occur in AV; in RV it wrongly appears (Is 38¹²) for 'thrums' (so RVm). It is almost certain, however, that Delilah's loom is meant by the word rendered 'beam' in Jg 16¹⁴ (see 4 (c)). Three varieties of loom were in use around the Mediterranean in ancient times—the horizontal loom and two varieties of the upright loom, distinguished by the Romans as the tela pendula and the tela jugalis.

(a) The horizontal loom is at least as old as the twelfth Egyptian dynasty, and probably goes back to pre-historic times. That the Hebrews were early familiar with it is evident from the incident of Samson and Delilah above referred to, the true interpretation of which will be given in a later section, 4 (c). It is still, with some modifications, the loom in use to-day from Morocco to the Ganges and the farther East.

(b) The oldest variety of the upright loom is that familiar to classical students from the well-known representation, on a Greek vase, of Penelope's loom. It consisted of two uprights joined at the top by a cross-beam, from which, or from a second beam below it, depended the threads of the warp. These were kept taut by having small stone weights attached to their lower ends, hence the name tela pendula. In view of the numerous 'weavers' weights' recently unearthed at Gezer and elsewhere (illust. PEFSt 1903, 311, plate iv.; cf. 1904, 324), it can no longer be doubted that this form of the upright loom was also in use in Palestine, even as far back as the later Stone Age (Vincent, Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, 405).

(c) The second and later variety of the upright loom had for its distinguishing feature a second cross-beam at the foot of the uprights, which served as a yarn-beam or as a cloth-beam, according as the web was begun at the top or at the bottom of the loom. By providing a third cross-beam capable of revolving, a web of much greater length could be woven than if the latter were confined to the height of the loom. The loom in ordinary use in NT times was of this type, as is evident from many passages in the Mishna.

4. OT references to the processes of weaving.—In its simplest form the art of weaving consists in interlacing a series of parallel threads, called the warp, with another series called the weft or woof, in such a way that each thread of the weft passes alternately over and under each thread of the warp. In the beginnings of the art this interlacing was laboriously done by the fingers of the spinner as in plaiting, of which weaving is only a more complicated variety. Now the first process is to stretch the threads of the warp (Lv 13⁴⁸) evenly between the upper and lower beams of the loom. This process of warping is mentioned in the literal sense only, Is 19⁹ (§1), but is elsewhere used in a metaphorical sense, as Job 10¹ (RV 'knit together'), Ps 139¹³ RVm, and the difficult passage Is 30¹. Of the four alternatives here given by the Revisers the only admissible rendering is the first of RVm 'weave a web,' or, still better, 'warp a warp,' an apposite figure for commencing a new 'web' of political intrigue (cf. the similar metaphor 59⁶). The Heb. law forbade the use of wool and linen, the one as warp, the other as woof, in the same web.

In the process of uniting warp and woof there are 'the three primary movements,' as they are named to be considered. These are (1) shedding, i.e. dividing the warp into two sets of odd and even threads for the passage of the weft, (2) passing the weft through the 'shed' by means of a rod or a shuttle; and (3) beating up the weft to form with the warp a web of uniform consistency. These three processes, so far as applicable to the Egyptian and Hebrew looms, are the subject of a special study by the present writer in the article 'Weaving' in EBI iv. 5282-87 (with illust.), to which the curious student is referred. It must suffice here to mention only such of the details as bear on certain OT references, most of them misunderstood hitherto.

(a) The formation of the shed was effected by at least two leash-rods or shafts, the Roman liciatoria, suspended from the upper cross-beam (see illust. Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, ii. 171) or otherwise, connected by loops or leashes with each of the odd and even warp-threads respectively. The two sets of threads were alternately brought forward (or raised in the horizontal loom) by pulling the leash-rods, thus forming a shed for the passage of the shuttle-rod carrying the weft. Now, with a heavy warp, the rods must have been of considerable thickness,—a stout branch of a tree serves as a leash-rod, for example, in a modern Anatolian loom figured in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. ii. 179. Accordingly, when the shaft of Goliath's spear is compared to a weaver's mānār (1 S 17⁷, 2 S 21¹⁹, 1 Ch 20⁵; cf. 11²²), it is not to either of the 'beams' of the loom but to 'a weaver's shaft' or leash-rod that the comparison applies. The original term above given, it may be added, is from the same root as nār, one of the Mishna terms for the leash-rod (cf. Jerome's true rendering, quasi liciatorium lezentium).

(b) The weft or woof (Lv 13⁴⁸) was passed through the shed by means of a staff or rod on which the yarn was wound. Homer, however, was already familiar with a shuttle-rod at one end of which was a revolving spool from which the weft-thread unrolled itself in its passage. It is uncertain whether Job 7⁶, the only EV occurrence of shuttle, refers to a shuttle-rod, or to the loom as a whole.

(c) The weft was beat up at each passage of the shuttle-rod by a thin lathe or batten, or, as later, by a special comb.

In Egypt, however, under the Middle Empire, it would appear that the more efficient 'reed,' still used in modern weaving, had already been invented for this purpose (Garstang, Burial Customs of Anc. Egypt, [1907], 133 ff. with illust.); the two reeds there figured are 27 and 29 inches in length, showing approximately the width of the web. The Bedouin women of Moab to-day weave their tent curtains in strips about 5 yards long and from 16 to 20 inches wide, according to Jausen (Coutumes des Arabes, etc. [1908], 74).

The Hebrews in early times used a batten simply to beat up the weft withal, as we learn from the true text of Jg 16¹³, which reads thus: 'If thou weavest the seven plaits of my head with the warp [and beatest them up with the batten, then shall I become weak and be as other men; and she made him sleep, and wove the seven plaits of his head with the warp], and beat them up with the batten (EV 'pin'), and said (as in EV) . . . and he awoke out of his sleep and pulled up the loom together with the warp.' For Delilah, seated on the ground beside her horizontal loom with Samson's head upon her knees (v. 19), it was an easy matter to use his flowing locks as weft and weave them into the warp of her loom. When Samson awoke he pulled up the loom, which was fastened to the ground with pegs.

With Penelope's type of loom, the web could be woven only from the top downwards. This was also the Jewish custom in NT times with the other form of upright loom. Our Lord's tunic, it will be remembered, 'was without seam, woven from the top throughout' (Jn 19²³). For the weaving of such seamless robes, which were in vogue in Egypt under the later dynasties at least, it was necessary to mount a double warp and to weave each face of the warp with a continuous weft (see EBI iv. 5289).

5. When the web was finished, the weaver cut the ends of the warp threads, those left hanging being the thrum of Is 38¹³ RVm, and rolled up the web. These two processes are the source of the figures for premature death in the passage cited. The 'new' cloth of Mt 9¹⁶, Mk 2²¹ AV was unfurled (RV 'undressed'), that is, cloth fresh from the loom. The milling or fulling was the work of the fuller (ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 6).

6. Special kinds of fabrics.—By appropriate arrangement of the warp, woof, and leash-rods, striped, checked, and other varieties of cloth were produced. The cloth intended by the 'chequer work' of Ex 28⁴ is quite uncertain. The Revisers probably mean by the phrase a species of check, produced by alternating different coloured bands in the warp, or in the woof, or in both. The 'work of the cunning workman' (Ex 26¹ etc.), of which the inner curtains of the Tabernacle were composed, was probably a species of tapestry (EV Pr 7¹⁶ 31²² but here doubtful), in which a design was traced by inserting short coloured threads behind a varying number of warp threads.

A weft of gold thread was employed for the high priest's robes (Ex 28³⁵, 39²²; cf. Jth 10²¹, 2 Mac 5¹ 'cloth of gold'). Herod Agrippa's 'royal apparel' (Ac 12²¹) is said by Josephus to have been woven throughout of silver thread.

In OT times the finer textile fabrics were imported from Babylonia (Jos 7²¹), Phœnicia (Ezk 27¹⁶), Egypt, and in NT times even from India for the high priest's dress (Mishna, Yōma, iii. 7). In the days of the Chronicler the weavers formed a trade guild (1 Ch 4²¹), and so continued in later times. As a class they were held in disrepute by the mass of the people, so much so that the Talmud declares weaving to be 'the lowest of crafts.' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

SPIRIT.—The term is applied to God as defining His nature generally (Jn 4²⁴), and also as describing one element in that nature, His self-consciousness (1 Co 2¹¹). It expresses not only God's immateriality, but also His transcendence of limitations of time and space. In the phrases 'Spirit of God,' the 'Spirit of the Lord,' the 'Spirit of Jesus Christ,' the 'Holy Spirit,' the 'Spirit of Truth,' the third Person in the Godhead is described (see HOLY SPIRIT). The term is applied to personal powers of evil other than man (Mt 10¹ 12⁴, Lk 4³³ 7²¹, 1 Ti 4¹; cf. Eph 6¹²), as well as personal powers of good (He 1¹⁴), and to human beings after death, either damned (1 P 3¹⁹) or blessed (He 12²³). It is used also as personifying an influence (1 Jn 4⁶, Eph 2²², Ro 8¹⁴). Its most distinctive use is in the psychology of the Christian life. The contrast between 'soul' and 'spirit,' and between 'flesh' and 'spirit,' has already been noted in the articles on these terms. While soul and spirit are not to be regarded as separate faculties, yet 'spirit' expresses the direct dependence of the life in man on God, first in creation (Gn 2⁷), but especially, according to the Pauline doctrine, in regeneration. The life in man, isolating itself from, and opposing itself to, God, is soul; that life, cleansed and renewed by the Spirit of God, is spirit; intimate as is the relation of God and man in the new life, the Spirit of God is distinguished from the spirit of man (Ro 8¹⁶), although it is not always possible to make the distinction. In Acts the phrase 'holy spirit' sometimes means the subjective human state produced ('holy enthusiasm'), and sometimes the objective Divine cause producing (see 'Acts' in the Century Bible, p. 386). As the Spirit is the source of this new life, whatever belongs to it is 'spiritual' (pneumatikon), as house, sacrifices (1 P 2²), understanding (Col 1⁹), songs (3¹⁶), food, drink, rock (1 Co 10³ 4); and the 'spiritual' and 'soulish' (rendered 'carnal' or 'natural') are contrasted (1 Co 2¹⁴ 15⁴⁴, 4). Spirit as an ecstatic state is also distinguished from mind (1 Co 14¹⁴, 15), as inwardness from letter (Ro 2²⁹ 7⁶, 2 Co 3⁶). The old creation—the derivation of man's spirit from God (Gn 2⁷, Is 42⁵), offers the basis for the new (Ro 8¹⁻¹⁷, 1 Co 2¹¹, 12), in which man is united to God (see INSPIRATION). ALFRED E. SPIRITUAL GIFTS.—1. The term.—A special Gr. word, charismata, is used in NT for spiritual gifts. It usually stands alone, but in Ro 1¹¹ it is coupled with the adjective pneumatikon ('spiritual'). It means concrete manifestations of the grace of God (charis), and is almost a technical term, though in Ro 6²³ etc. it is used generally of the gift of God, without reference to its visible result in the life of the believer. The principal passages which deal with spiritual gifts are Ro 12⁶⁻⁸, 1 Co 12. 13. 14, Eph 4⁷⁻¹⁰, 1 P 4¹⁰. The gifts may be divided into the apparently miraculous and the non-miraculous. (a) The miraculous include speaking with tongues (probably ecstatic utterances, usually unintelligible to the speaker; see TONGUES [GIFT OF]), and their interpretation; gifts of healing, and the working of miracles or 'powers'; of these we may instance the power of exorcism ([Mk] 16¹⁷, Ac 16¹⁸ 19¹³), and the punishment of offenders (Ac 5¹⁻¹¹ 13⁹, 1 Co 4²¹ 5⁴). On the border-line come prophecy, discerning of spirits, and the receiving of revelations, where the miraculous element is less strongly marked. (b) From these we pass to the non-miraculous gifts, gifts of character, and mental and spiritual endowments of various kinds. We find mentioned the power of exhortation and of speech (closely akin to prophecy); wisdom, knowledge, and faith; helps and governments (i.e. powers of administration); mercy and almsgiving; money, as affording opportunity for service and hospitality; 1 Co 7⁷ adds the gift of continence, and Gal 5²² gives a list of the fruits of the Spirit, as shown in the Christian character. Ro 12⁶ and 1 P 4¹⁰ mention only non-miraculous gifts, and in the Epp. the chief evidence for the miraculous is connected with Corinth.

2. Their nature.—Most of these gifts may be regarded as the raising of natural endowments to a higher level. Without going at length into the question of miracles, we may note that the evidence of their reality in this connexion is very strong; they are referred to in the Epistles (contemporary documents) as matters of common knowledge; St. Paul speaks of his own powers in this respect as well known (1 Co 2⁴ 14⁸, 2 Co 12²); and He 2⁴ mentions them as a recognized characteristic of the first age of Christianity. Further, these miraculous gifts of the Spirit belong to the class which may most easily be reduced to psychological law, and are to some extent paralleled in modern times, being mainly the well-attested manifestations which accompany times of revival, and are found in connexion with peculiarly gifted individuals.

*What we read about miracles—especially about the charismata—in the Epistles of St. Paul is of the nature of things unusual, obedient to laws that are somewhat recondite, distinctly implying Divine impulse and Divine guidance, and yet at most non contra naturam sed contra quam est nota natura (Sanday, Life of Christ in Recent Research, p. 219).

A striking feature of these gifts is their apparently wide-spread and democratic nature. The new life, with its hopes and powers, had been offered to all classes of society, and the humblest Christian felt the thrill of being 'filled with the Spirit.' Hence—

'the first age of the Christian Church was characterized by a vivid enthusiasm which found expression in ways which recall the simplicity of childhood. It was a period of wonder and delight. The flood-gates of emotion were opened: a supernatural dread alternated with an unspeakable joy' (Robinson, Ephesians, p. 121).

The results of this enthusiasm, as described in 1 Cor., were startling and visible to all; that it could not be without its dangers is obvious. Slaves or women, people of no account before, found themselves in possession of mysterious powers, which gave them a position of importance among their fellow-Christians. There arose the temptation to covet and strive by artificial and illegitimate methods for the more striking gifts, and to look on them as marks of superior sanctity, or the means of personal advancement. Others, on the contrary, felt themselves forgotten, and yielded to jealousy or despair. Rivalry led to disorder where the gifts were used in the public services of the Church.

3. Hence the tone of St. Paul's teaching as to their use. (a) He insists on their regulation. The gifts may be sporadic and intermittent; none the less their use must be orderly (1 Co 14⁴⁰); ecstasy is no excuse for loss of self-control (v. 32). Each Christian must recognize the limitations of his powers and not attempt to transcend them (Ro 12³).

There arises the question of the relation of the charismata to the ministry. Some have maintained that there was originally no fixed ministry, but only unorganized charismata; others again have tried to assign a definite office to most of the charismata. The truer view would seem to be that the charismata and the official ministry existed side by side, but were by no means identical (see Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 358). All Christians had their share in the gifts of the Spirit, though there were special endowments which would be looked for in the case of officers of the Church; in 1 Ti 4¹¹, 2 Ti 1⁶ a charisma is connected with 'the laying on of hands.'

(b) The purpose of the gifts is the edification and the service of the whole body. Chrysostom, in his remarkable homily on 1 Co 12, calls attention to the change of word in vv. 4-5. The 'gifts' are also 'ministrations' (diakonai), i.e. opportunities of service; hence the greater the gift the greater the responsibility, and the harder the work to be done. And so St. Paul passes on to the doctrine of the one body, served in different ways by all its members. Similarly in Eph 4¹¹ the possessors of the endowments are themselves gifts 'given' to the Church. The same truth is emphasized in Ro 12, 1 Co 14, 1 P 4, in fact in every place where the charismata are mentioned at any length; St. Paul's own object is always to 'impart' to others (Ro 1¹¹, 1 Co 14¹⁹; cf. Jn 7³⁸). It is obvious that this way of looking at the gifts would check ambition, pride, and selfishness in their use.

(c) Relative importance of the gifts. The more startling and apparently miraculous gifts are consistently treated as subordinate to gifts of character and edification. The former, indeed, are not decisive as to their origin; they are not peculiar to Christianity, and may be the accompaniment of evil and falsehood (Mt 7²² 24²⁴, 2 Th 2¹, 1 Co 12³, Rev 13¹³ 14¹). Indeed, in an age when exorcisms and miracles were associated with magic, and the heathen mantis, or frenzied prophet, was a familiar phenomenon, it was impossible to ascribe all 'powers' and ecstasy to the Holy Spirit. The test is on the one side doctrinal (1 Co 12³ 5, 1 Jn 4¹⁻³); on the other the moral life (Mt 7¹⁷⁻¹⁹, Ro 8⁹, 1 Co 13) and the practical tendency to edification (1 Co 14). The 'discerning of spirits' is itself an important gift (1 Co 12¹⁰, 1 Th 5²¹, 1 Jn 4¹). It is, indeed, remarkable how steadily the NT concentrates attention on the inner and less startling gifts of character, which the popular mind would ignore; and if it does not disparage, it certainly does not exaggerate, those which at first sight seemed to give more direct evidence of the presence of the Spirit. As a fact of history these tended to degenerate and finally to disappear. Justin and Irenæus mention them, and they played a large part in the Gnostic and Montanist movements, but after the 2nd cent. they practically died out as normal endowments of the believer, to be revived only sporadically in times of religious excitement. STARS.—The stars form part of the Divine creation in Gn 1. They are invisible in the sunlight, but begin to appear about sunset (Neh 4²¹). In poetical passages hyperbolic expressions are used concerning them. At the creation 'the morning stars sang together' (Job 38⁷); at the battle between Barak and Sisera 'the stars in their courses fought against Sisera' (Jg 5²⁰); in the former passage it may be that the angels are described as stars (cf. Rev 1²⁰ 'the seven stars are the angels of the seven churches'). The difference of magnitude in the stars is recognized by St. Paul: 'one star differeth from another star in glory' (1 Co 15⁴¹). The stars were looked upon as innumerable: 'tell the stars, if thou be able to tell them' (Gn 15⁵). The appearance of a bright particular star was supposed to portend some great event. Thus Balaam prophesied 'There shall come forth a star out of Jacob' (Nu 24¹⁷), and this was afterwards interpreted as applying to the Epiphany star (Mt 2²; see STAR OF THE MAGI); and so in 2 P 1¹⁶ we read of the day-star arising in men's hearts. Caution is given against the worship of the stars, in the legislation of Deuteronomy (4¹⁹), and the punishment of death assigned for the convicted worshipper (see HOST OF HEAVEN). In Apocalyptic literature (Rev 22¹⁶) our Lord describes Himself as 'the bright, the morning star'; whilst 'they that turn many to righteousness' are to shine 'as the stars for ever and ever' (Dn 12³). The day of the Lord is to be heralded by signs in the stars as well as in the sun and moon (Lk 21²⁵). The appearance of shooting stars, which come out of the darkness and go back into it, is alluded to in Jude 1¹² 'wandering stars, for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved for ever.' Special numbers of stars are mentioned; in Rev (1¹⁶ 12¹), the seven stars and twelve stars illustrate a conventional use of those numbers common in apocalyptic literature. In the OT the seven stars of the AV of Am 5⁸ are the Pleiades; and the 'eleven stars' which made obeliscence to Joseph in his dream are simply a conventional number to correspond with that of his brethren.

Of individual stars or constellations, the Bear (AV Arcturus), Orion, and the Pleiades occur; all three in Job 9⁹ 38³¹, the last two also in Am 5⁸. The mazzaroth (Job 38³²) are most probably the signs of the Zodiac (RVm; cf. 2 K 23⁵ margin). In 2 K 23⁵ the Heb. form of the word mazzaloth is different, and RV (text) renders it 'the planets.' The chambers of the south (Job 9⁹) are probably the stars of the southern hemisphere.

Of worship connected with the stars we have two notable instances. That of 'the queen of heaven' was popular in Jerusalem (Jer 7¹⁸) immediately before the Captivity, and to the neglect of it the captives in Egypt ascribed their disasters, in an address to Jeremiah (44¹⁷⁻²²) at Pathros. This worship consisted of the offering of incense and drink-offerings, and the making of cakes, with her figure, apparently, upon them. This Queen of Heaven seems to have been without doubt Venus, or Ishtar, whose star was considered the most beautiful in the heavens. This goddess is identical with Ashtoreth or Astarte. The second instance of star-worship is one that presents some difficulty. In Amos (5²⁶) we meet with an image of Chilun, if the word be a proper name, who is called 'the star of your god.' This passage is quoted by St. Stephen (Ac 7⁴²), where the expression is rendered 'the star of the god Rephan.' There seems little reason to doubt that Chilun is the same as the Assyrian Kaiwān, identical with the planet Saturn, to whom divine worship was paid. The form of name 'Rephan' seems to have arisen from a corrupt reading of the Hebrew, which is as old as the Septuagint. There are very few allusions to astrology in the OT, but in Isaiah (47¹⁴) we have mention of 'the astrologers (Heb. 'dividers of the heavens') the star-gazers, the monthly prognosticators'; all these persons drew their utterances and professed knowledge of the future from the heavens. The magicians and soothsayers of the Book of Daniel were a similar class, to which belonged the Magi or wise men who had seen the star which heralded the birth of the King of the Jews (Mt 2¹⁻²). See next article.

H. A. REDPATH.

STAR OF THE MAGI.—The character of the star which was seen by the Magi has been the source of many conjectures. While some consider it to have been an absolutely miraculous appearance, others have tried to connect it with some recognized form of celestial phenomenon. Some have held that it was a comet [the Greek word for the 'star' is applied to comets], and if such a comet as Donati's of 1858, which the present writer remembers well, had been visible at the time of the Nativity, it would have fulfilled the conditions of the narrative, and the difficulties about the star standing over 'where the young child was' (Mt 2⁹) would have been lessened. None such, however, seems to have been recorded. Others, noting that there were conjunctions of two of the brighter planets, Jupiter and Saturn (b.c. 7), and Jupiter and Venus (b.c. 6), have tried to connect this appearance with one of these. Others, again, have explained the appearance as that of what is known as a stella nova, i.e. a star which suddenly flashes out with great brightness in the firmament and then either dies out again altogether, or diminishes in the magnitude of its brightness, so as to be scarcely, if at all, visible to the naked eye. The difficulty connected with all these interpretations is due to the necessity that has been felt for giving a literal interpretation to the account that 'the star . . . went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.' But we may take it that the language here is of the same character as that which we constantly use about the sun or moon rising and setting. If, then, we assume that the star, whatever it was, was near the horizon in front of the wise men when they started on their journey, its relative position to them, so long as they kept a direct course, would vary but little. The place in the heavens of any fixed star varies only about one degree, or four minutes, each succeeding day.

A somewhat more difficult question than that about the appearance of the star is, Why did the wise men connect it with the birth of a king of the Jews? The traditional answer to this question is that there had been handed down from generation to generation among the wise men of Babylon a knowledge of Balaam's prophecy, 'There shall come forth a star out of Jacob' (Nu 24¹⁷), and that, when this notable star appeared, it was considered to be the herald of the appearance of a great person. There certainly was a Jewish population in Babylonia in our Lord's day, and if this prophecy was recognized as coming from a Hebrew document, and reference was made to the Jews, it would be most natural for the wise men, if they were Babylonians, to set their faces towards Jerusalem. There is this difficulty, however, about referring the 'star' of Balaam's prophecy to a phenomenon in the heavens, that from the parallelism of the Hebrew poetry we gather that the 'star' is intended to refer not to a star in the sky, but to some great prince or ruler (cf., for this use, Dn 8¹⁰). Still, the explanation of the journey may be much the same. There was a great ferment in the East and a wide-spread anticipation, even in the Roman world, of some great Saviour or deliverer to arise, as the poets Virgil and Horace testify, just about the time when the Saviour was born. If some such brilliant star appeared, this would be taken as portending that the moment for the appearance of such an one had arrived, and search would be made for the Great One. So, in the Apocalypse (Rev 22⁹), our Lord is represented as claiming for Himself that He is not only 'the root and the offspring of David,' but also 'the bright, the morning star.'

A. J. MACLEAN.

STEPHEN.—Early in the history of the Christian Church it was found necessary for the Apostles to devolve some of their duties on others. There is no reason for supposing (with Prof. Ramsay) that presbyters had yet been appointed, though they soon followed; but in Ac 6 seven persons, commonly (but not in NT) called 'deacons,' all but one probably Hellenistic or Greek-speaking Jews (see art. NICOLAN), were appointed to manage the distribution of alms to the Hellenist widows. Of the Seven, Stephen was the most prominent. Their duties were not eleemosynary only; Stephen at once undertook evangelistic work and won great success, persuading many, and working miracles. His success resulted in the first persecution of the Church, and false witnesses were brought who accused him of blasphemy, and of speaking against the Temple and the Law. He made a long defence (Ac 7²⁻⁴³), which is not easy of interpretation. He summarizes OT history from the call of Abraham to the building of Solomon's Temple (cf. St. Paul's sermon in Ac 13), in a manner which shows that he depended partly on tradition, for there are many discrepancies between his speech and OT. He speaks with great respect of the Mosaic Law (vv. 38-39, 43). Some think that he disparages the Temple as having been built against God's will (v. 48¹). But this is very improbable. Perhaps the defence was not completed; yet what was delivered gives its drift. The Jews had misunderstood their own Law. God had not confined His presence to the Tabernacle and the Temple; He had appeared to Abraham and others before the Law was given; Isaiah (66¹⁻²) had preached that God's worship was not confined to one place. But the people had persecuted the prophets as they now had killed Jesus. This defence provoked the Jews so much that they cast Stephen out of the city and stoned him—undoubtedly an illegal murder, not sanctioned by the Roman law. Stephen, whose dying prayer for his murderers (v. 60) recalls that of his Master, thus became the first Christian martyr. His death led to a persecution, and to a dispersal of the disciples from Jerusalem. This caused the spread of the gospel to many lands. But the most prominent fruit of the martyrdom, doubtless, was the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, who was present (7⁵⁸ 8¹), and of whom, as is generally acknowledged, Stephen was in his preaching the forerunner.

STEWARD.—This term is found six times in AV of OT. It is applied to Eliezer in Gn 15², where RV rightly tr. 'he that shall be possessor of my house.' In Gn 43¹⁹ 44¹⁻⁴ Joseph's 'steward' (AV and RV) is 'it, 'he who was over his house' (cf. 43¹⁸, 1 K 16⁹ in RV). In 1 Ch 28¹ AV 'stewards' is tr. of Heb. šārīm (lit. 'princes,' RV 'rulers'). For the 'steward' of Dan 11¹⁰ 16 (RV), see MELZAR.

The NT terms are (1) epitropos, 'steward' in Mt 20³,

STONE

Lk 8²; also translated in Gal 4⁹ AV 'tutors,' RV 'guardians.' (2) oikonomos, the usual term, found both literally and metaphorically, as is also the cognate noun oikonomia 'stewardship.' The latter is used literally in Lk 16^{2, 3, 4}, and metaphorically in 1 Co 9¹⁷, Eph 3², Col 1²⁴ 1 Ti 1⁴ [in last three 'dispensation,' RVm 'stewardship']. W. F. BOYD.

STOCKS.—See CRIMES, 9; PRISON, p. 756^b.

STOICS.—When St. Paul met representatives of the Stoic philosophy at Athens (Ac 17¹⁸), that school had been in existence for about three centuries and a half. The name came from the Stoa or Porch where Zeno (about B.C. 340-265), the founder of the school, taught at Athens.

The leading Stoic maxim is, 'Live according to nature.' Nature both in the world and in man is to be interpreted by its highest manifestation—Reason—which appears in the world as the all-pervading ethereal essence or spirit, forming and animating the whole; and in man as the soul. This World-spirit occupies the place of God in the Stoic system. Thus we find St. Paul quoting the words of a Stoic writer, 'We are also his offspring' (Ac 17²⁸). The approximation, however, is in language rather than in reality. The theology of the Stoics is pure pantheism. Their so-called God has no independent or personal existence.

The supremacy of reason in man is pushed to such an extreme that virtuous conduct demands the entire suppression of the emotional side of man's nature. This rigorous moral standard became, for practical reasons, considerably modified; but Stoic morality was always marked by its rigidity and coldness.

The great quality of Stoicism, which set it above Epicureanism, and brought it into line with Christianity, was its moral earnestness. In his dissertation on 'St. Paul and Seneca' Bp. Lightfoot has said, 'Stoicism was the only philosophy which could even pretend to rival Christianity in the earlier ages of the Church.' Perhaps there was in St. Paul's mind at Athens the high hope of bringing to the side of Christ such a noble rival of the gospel. Yet Stoicism and Christianity ran parallel rather than came into contact with one another, until through the weakness inherent in its theology and its ethics the current of Stoic philosophy was dissipated and lost.

STOMACH.—This English word occurs in 2 Mac 7²¹ with the meaning of 'courage,' 'Stirring up her womanish thoughts with a manly stomach.'

STOMACHER is the EV tr. of pēthigē, whose meaning (Is 3²⁴ only) is very uncertain. The Eng. word 'stomacher' was applied to that part of a woman's dress which covered the breast and the pit of the stomach. It was usually much ornamented, and was looked upon as an evidence of wealth.

STONE.—I. In OT.—1. Several different words are rendered 'stone,' but the one of by far the most frequent occurrence is 'ebhen,' which has the same wide range of application as its English equivalent. Palestine is a stony country, and the uses to which stone was put were numerous and varied. In its natural state a stone served for a pillow (Gn 28¹⁸) or a seat (Ex 17¹²), for covering the mouth of a well (Gn 29²⁵) or closing the entrance to a cave (Jos 10¹⁸; cf. Mt 27⁶⁰ etc.). Out of it, again, might be constructed a knife (Ex 4²⁵, Heb. šār RV 'flint'), a vessel (7¹³; cf. Jn 2⁹), a mill (Dt 24⁹). Above all, stone was employed in architecture. Houses (Lv 14⁴² etc.), walls (Neh 4², Hab 2¹¹), towers (by implication in Gn 11³), and especially the Temple (1 K 5¹⁷ etc.), are referred to as built of stone. We read of foundation-stones (1 K 5¹⁷), of a corner-stone (Ps 118²²), of a head-stone or finial (Zec 4⁷); and in 2 K 16¹⁷ mention is made of a pavement of stone. Masonry was a regular trade (2 S 5¹¹ etc.), and stonemasonry is frequently referred to (2 K 12¹⁴ etc.). Belonging to the æsthetic and luxurious side of life are precious stones and the arts of cutting and graving and setting them (Ex 28⁹, 11 31⁸ etc.); see, further, JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES. The profusion of stones made it natural to use them as missiles. Stone-throwing might be a mark of hatred and contempt (2 S 16⁹, 13), or the expedient of murderous intentions against which provision had to be made in legislation (Ex 21¹⁴, Nu 35¹⁷). In war, stones were regular weapons of offence. Usually they were hurled with slings (1 S 17⁴⁹, 1 Ch 12¹²), but, later, great stones were discharged by means of 'engines' (2 Ch 26¹⁵, 1 Mac 6³¹). Stoning to death was a natural and convenient method of execution. At first an expression of popular fury (Jos 7²⁶), it was afterwards regulated by law as an appointed means of capital punishment (Dt 17²; cf. Ac 7⁵⁸). See, further, CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 10. The use of stones as memorials was common. Sometimes a single large stone, at other times a heap of stones, was raised (Gn 31⁴⁴, Jos 8²⁹ 24²⁶). Akin to this was their employment to mark a boundary (Jos 15¹⁸ etc.). Stones would be the ordinary landmarks between the fields of one person and another, the removal of which was strictly forbidden (Dt 19¹⁴ etc.). In religious worship stones were employed in the forms of the pillar (Gn 28¹², 2 31¹⁴ 35¹⁴) and the altar. The latter was at first a single great stone (1 S 6⁴⁴), but afterwards was built of several stones, which must be unhewn (Ex 20²⁵, Dt 27⁶). See, further, PILLAR AND ALTAR. The use of stone for literary purposes (cf. the Moabite Stone) is illustrated by the tables of stone on which the Decalogue was written (Ex 24¹ etc.) and the inscribed stones of the altar on Mt. Ebal (Dt 27², Jos 8³⁰).

2. Stones = testicles (Lv 21³⁰, Dt 23¹, Job 40¹⁷).

11. In NT.—Here lithos is the ordinary word, and is found in most of the connexions already referred to. Noteworthy is the fact that Jesus, after quoting Ps 118²², took the rejected and exalted stone as a symbol of Himself (Mt 21⁴², Lk 20¹⁷). St. Peter adopts the symbol in his address to the Sanhedrin (Ac 4¹¹), and enlarges it, with further reference to Is 8¹⁴ 28¹⁶, in his figure of the 'living stone,' which is at once the foundation of God's spiritual house and a stone of stumbling to the disobedient (1 P 2⁴). The stone (petros) of Jn 1² should be 'rock,' or still better 'Peter' (RV); 'stony' (petrōdes) in Mt 13⁸, Mk 4¹⁶ should be 'rocky.' The 'white stone' of Rev 2¹⁷ represents Gr. psēphos, 'a pebble,' and the ref. perhaps is to the lessara gladiatoria bestowed on the victorious young gladiator. J. C. LAMBERT.

STONE-SQUARERS.—Only 1 K 5¹⁸ AV; RV has Gebalites as Jos 13⁸ RV, that is, men of the Phœnician city of Gebal, mentioned Ezk 27⁹, where the ancients and wise men of Gebal are referred to as calkers of ships. It has recently been suggested that the gentile name had become an appellative in the sense of 'stonecutter' (SBOT, 'Kings,' 83 f.), which is the meaning of AV. Others would emend to read 'did hew them and border them,' i.e. provide the stones with marginal drafts or with bevels. Cf. ARTS AND CRAFTS, § 3. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

STONES, PRECIOUS.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

STOOL.—In older English (including AV) "stool" was used freely for any kind of seat' (DB iv, 621); similarly the Heb. kissē includes both chairs and stools, see HOUSE, § 8. In the difficult passage Ex 1¹⁸ the word rendered 'stools' in the sense of birth-stools (sella parturientis) must be pointed to read 'stones' (abnāyim for obnāyim, both dual number), the reference being to the two stones or bricks on which a woman sat during her accouchement. This widely spread custom has been conclusively shown to have existed in ancient Egypt by Spiegelberg (Egypt. Randglossen, 19-25), from the realistic representation preserved in an early hieroglyphic sign for birth, confirmed by literary references. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

TORAX.—See SPICE, STACTE.

STRANGER

STORK (chōstādā, Lv 11¹⁹, Dt 14¹⁸, Job 39¹³, Ps 104¹¹, Jer 8⁷, Zec 5⁹).—The stork (Arab. abu said 'father of good luck') is a bird much loved in Palestine, where in its migration northwards it arrives in the spring (Jer 8⁷); it does great good by clearing the crops of caterpillars and locusts: when the storks arrive plentifully, it is anticipated that the harvests will be unusually good. These birds may be seen walking through the grain or circling round and round in groups high in the heavens. No doubt this powerful flight caused its wings to be noted (Job 39¹³, Zec 5⁹). No native would dream of harming it; its sacred character may have caused it to be an 'unclean' bird (Lv 11¹⁹, Dt 14¹⁸). Its Heb. name, implying 'lovingkindness,' was given because of its tender care of its young. The above remarks apply specially to the white stork (Ciconia alba); a black stork (C. nigra) has also been identified in the Holy Land. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

STORM.—See GALILEE [SEA OF], 3; WHIRLWIND.

STORY (EV for 'storey').—See HOUSE, § 5.

STRAIT.—This Eng. word is used in AV in the literal sense of 'narrow,' and in the figurative sense of 'strict' (of which it is simply another form). Once the verb 'strait' occurs, Sus 2¹ 'I am straited on every side.'

STRANGE FIRE.—See NADAB.

STRANGER.—This seems, on the whole, the most suitable English word by which to render the Heb. zār, which is a participle denoting primarily one who turns aside, one who goes out of the way, i.e. for the purpose of visiting or dwelling in another country. It has frequently the meaning foreigner, in contrast to 'Israelite,' especially with the added notion of hostility (cf. 'estranged'), and in antithesis to 'Israel' (e.g. Hos 7⁸ 8⁷, Is 1⁷, Ezk 7²¹ 11⁹, Jl 3¹⁷, Ob¹¹, Ps 54³ etc.). In P the word takes on a technical meaning found nowhere outside the Hexateuch, and exclusively post-exilic. It means 'layman' (which might with advantage be substituted for EV 'stranger'), as opposed to a Levite (see Nu 1¹⁸ 18⁷), or to a priest proper, or Aaronite (see Ex 29³³ 30²², Nu 3¹⁰, 38 18², Lv 22¹⁰, 12¹ (H)).

The 'strange woman' of Pr 2¹⁶ etc. has the same technical sense as 'foreign woman' with which it stands in parallelism, viz. harlot.

Sojourner (sometimes tr. of ōshab, 'settler' [see below]) is frequently substituted by RV for the AV 'stranger,' as tr. of gēr. The gēr was originally a man who transferred himself from one tribe or people to another, seeking, and usually obtaining, some of the rights of natives. A whole clan or tribe might be gērīm in Israel, as e.g. the Gibeonites (Jos 9), the Beerothites (2 S 4²). The Israelites are themselves often spoken of as 'sojourners' in the land of Egypt (see Gn 15¹³, Ex 22²¹ 23⁹, Lv 19²⁴ (H), Dt 10¹⁹ 23⁷ etc.). In the oldest Israelitish code (the Book of the Covenant, Ex 21¹ to 23¹⁹), the gēr is protected against injustice and violence (21²⁰ 23⁹). The D code (c. b.c. 620) goes much further, for, besides making more explicit and urgent the duty of defending, helping, and even loving the 'sojourner' (Dt 10¹⁸ 14²⁹ 24¹⁴, 19), and also securing to him his rights (24¹⁷ 27¹⁻⁹), the gēr was to be allowed to participate in the three great annual feasts (Dt 16¹⁴; cf. 5¹⁴ and Ex 23¹⁸). He is not, however, compelled, though allowed, to follow his protector's religion (Dt 14²⁹, 1 K 11⁷). That he occupies a status inferior to that of the born Israelite is indicated by the fact that he is classed with the widow and orphan as needing special consideration (10¹⁸ 14²⁹ 20¹⁴, 19), and that the right of intermarrying is denied him (7¹⁴, 23³). When, however, we come to P and to other parts of the OT which belong to the same stage of history and religion, we find the 'sojourner' almost on an equal footing with the native Israelite,—he is fast becoming, and is almost become, the proselyte of NT and Rabbinical times. His position has now religious rather than political significance. He is expected to keep the Sabbath and to observe the Day of Atonement, as well as the three great feasts (Lv 16²³). He is to eat unleavened bread during Passover week (Ex 12¹³; Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread are now blended), and, if circumcised (not otherwise), to keep the full Passover itself. But the gēr is not even yet the full equal of the Israelite, for he is not compelled to be circumcised, and no one can belong to the congregation who has not submitted to that rite (Ex 12⁴⁸; Nu 9¹⁴); he has not yet received the right of intermarriage (Gn 34¹⁴), and is prohibited from keeping Jewish slaves (Lv 25⁴⁵).

The closing of the ranks of Judaism, helped by the Exile, by the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, by the Samaritan schism, and consummated by the Maccabean wars, led to the complete absorption of the 'sojourner.' The word proselutos (representing the Heb. gēr), common in classical Greek for one who has come to a place (Lat. advena), acquired in Hellenistic Greek the meaning which meets us often in the NT (Mt 23³⁵, Ac 2⁶ etc.). See PROSELYTE.

The indiscriminate use of 'stranger' with the meaning of 'sojourner,' and of 'alien' and 'foreigner' is very confusing. 'Foreigner' is the proper rendering of Heb. nokri. The Heb. tōshab (lit. 'dweller') is a post-exilic substitute for gēr ('sojourner') in the original non-religious sense of the latter. For the sake of distinction it might be uniformly rendered 'settler' (EV 'sojourner,' 'stranger,' 'foreigner'). See, for the relations of Israel to foreigners proper, art. NATIONS.

T. WITTON DAVIES.

STRANGLING.—This is suggested as a mode of death, Job 7⁴. The cognate verb describes the manner of Aithophel's self-inflicted death (2 S 17²³, EV 'hanged himself'; cf. Mt 27⁵ of Judas). The idea conveyed is death by suffocation, not necessarily produced by suspension. Elsewhere, where hanging is mentioned in EV as a mode of punishment, some form of impalement is intended (see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 10).

In the pastoral letter sent down by the Council of Jerusalem to the early converts from heathenism, these are instructed to abstain inter alia 'from blood and from things strangled' (Ac 15²⁰, cf. v. 20 21²⁰). Both belong to the category of Jewish food taboo (FOOD, § 10). The former refers to the prohibition against eating meat which had not been thoroughly drained of the blood, the second to the similar taboo affecting the flesh of animals not slaughtered according to the very minute Rabbinical rules then in force. Thus in the Talmudic treatise Chullin, specially devoted to this subject, it is laid down (l. 2) that 'any one may slaughter . . . with any instrument except a harvest-sickle, a saw, etc., because these strangle,' in other words, they do not make the clean incision required for proper slaughter. 'What is strangled' (Ac 15²⁰ RV) or strangled meat is thus seen to be a current technical term of the Jewish shēkhita or ritual of slaughter. In modern phrase the Gentile converts were to eat only kōsher meat.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

STRAW, STUBBLE.—In Heb. the former is teben, the latter qash, and to Western ideas the one is as much 'straw' as the other. The distinction between the two is as follows: teben, the modern libn, is the mixture of chopped straw and chaff, produced by the action of the threshing-drag and winnowed out by the fan (AGRICULTURE, § 3), as distinguished from the grains of wheat (so Jer 23²⁴ where 'straw' RV, and 'chaff' AV are both inadequate). It is mentioned as the food of horses, asses, and camels. In reaping, as is still the custom, the stalks were cut knee-high or over; the length of stalk left standing is qash. Accordingly, when the Hebrews in Egypt 'gathered stubble for straw' (Ex 5¹⁴), what they did was to pull up the stalks of wheat left standing in the fields and cut them up into short pieces suitable for brick-making, instead of being allowed to procure the libn ready to their hand from the local threshing-floors. Since the corn-stalks were usually burned as manure, 'stubble' is frequently found in metaphors suggested by this practice (Is 5²⁴ 47¹⁴ etc.). In other passages containing reference explicit or implied to 'driven stubble' (41¹³), the smaller fragments of chopped straw which the wind blew away with the chaff from the threshing-floor may be intended.

STREET.—See CITY.

STRENGTH OF ISRAEL.—The EV tr. of the Divine title nētsach Yisrā'el in 1 S 15²³. Probably a more accurate rendering would be 'Glory of Israel.'

STRIPES.—See CRIMES, etc. ('Beating'), 9.

STRONG DRINK.—See WINE AND STRONG DRINK.

STRONGHOLD.—See CITY, FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT.

STUBBLE.—See STRAW.

STUFF.—In Lk 17³¹ and elsewhere in AV 'stuff' means 'furniture'; cf. Udall's tr. of Erasmus' Paraphrase, i. 7, 'All that ever they had about them of stuffe or furniture.'

STUMBLING-BLOCK (Gr. skandalon; AV 'offence,' 'occasion to fall,' 'stumbling-block'; RV 'stumbling-block,' 'thing that causes stumbling,' 'occasion of stumbling').—Properly the spring of a trap (cf. Ro 11⁹); hence something that ensnares or trips up. The verb is skandalizein; AV 'offend,' RV 'cause to stumble.'

SUA (1 Es 5²⁰)—Ezr 2⁴ Siaha, Neh 7⁴⁷ Sia.

SUAH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁶).

SUBAI (1 Es 5²⁰)—Ezr 2⁴ Shamlai, Neh 7⁴⁸ Salmal.

SUBAS.—A family of Solomon's servantse (1 Es 5²⁴).

SUBURB.—This word is used in AV in two quite distinct senses. (1) In 2 K 23³¹ a certain chamber, really within the Temple precincts, is said to have been 'in the suburbs' (Heb. parvar, RV 'precincts'). Practically the same original is retained as a proper name—Parbar, 1 Ch 26¹⁸ (RVm 'the Precinct'), where the reference is probably to the same spot as in the former passage. Modern scholars find in this mysterious parbar or parvar a designation of the western colonnade (or part thereof) of the Temple (see PARBAR).

(2) In all other instances 'suburbs' occurs only in connexion with the so-called Levitical cities, as the rendering—derived from the Vulg. suburbana (fields, etc., close to a city)—of a Heb. word meaning 'pasture-grounds.' Each of the 48 cities, according to Nu 35², is to be provided with a square tract of land measuring 2000 cubits—roughly 1000 yards—each way, which is to serve the Levites as a common pasture ground 'for their cattle and for their substance and for all their beasts' (v. 2 RV, cf. the lists in Jos 21²⁻⁴², 1 Ch 6⁵⁴⁻⁶¹).

SUCATHITES.—See SOCO, 1.

SUCCOTH.—A place first mentioned in Gn 33¹⁷, where it is said to have been so called because Jacob, on his return from Haran to Canaan, halting at it after his wrestling with the angel at Peniel, built there 'booths' (Heb. succoth) for his cattle. Gideon also, after crossing the Jordan in his pursuit of the Midianites, passed Succoth, and afterwards 'went up' to Peniel (Jg 8⁵ 7). The name has not been preserved; and the site is thus matter of conjecture. From the passages quoted and other notices it is clear that it was E. of the Jordan; and it may further be inferred that, while Peniel was close to the Jabbok (Gn 32²⁴ 25), on higher ground than Succoth, and to the E. or S.E. (Jg 8⁵ 7, cf. v. 13), Succoth was on the route between Peniel and Shechem, which would pass most naturally over the ford e'-Dāmiyeh (a little S. of the point at which the Jabbok enters the Jordan), in the territory of Gad. In e' vale (Jos 13²⁷, Ps 60⁶).—presumably, therefore, in that part of the Jordan valley through which the Jabbok flows into the Jordan, and which is very fertile. Jacob came from Mizpah (see No. 1 in art. s.v.), which is most naturally to be sought somewhere on the N. or N.E. of the Jebel 'Ajlun; and any one journeying thence to the ford ed-Dāmiyeh would naturally descend as soon as possible into the Ghôr (or Jordan valley), and join the track which passes along it from N. to S. The rest of Jacob's route would be consistent and intelligible, if Mahanaim (his last halting-place before Penuei, Gn 32²) were (say) at Deir 'Allā, 4 miles N. of the ford by which the track down the Ghôr crosses the Jabbok, Penuei near where the same track crosses the route from es-Salt to ed-Dāmiyeh (see the map), and Succoth on one of the lower terraces of the Jordan valley (which here sinks from -500 ft. to -1000 ft.), W. of the point just suggested for Penuei, S. of the Jabbok, and in the territory of Gad (Jos 13²⁷). Whether towns actually stood at or near the sites thus indicated can, of course, be determined only by excavation.

Succoth is said in the Talmud to have been called in later times Tar'alāh or Dar'alāh; and hence it has often been identified with Deir 'Allā mentioned above. But it is very doubtful whether Deir 'Allā has any connexion with this Talm. name; for Deir is a Syriac and Arabic word (common in names of places) meaning 'monastery,' which there is no reason whatever for seeing in the Tar or Dar (without the yod) of the Talm. name. Nor does the geographical position of Deir 'Allā seem to agree with the narrative of either Jacob or Gideon. See, further, Driver in Expt xiii. (1902), p. 457 ff., more briefly in Gen. p. 300 ff. S. R. DRIVER.

SUCCOTH (meaning in Heb. 'booths').—The name of the first encampment in the Exodus, which started from Rameses (Ex 12²⁷ 13²⁰, Nu 33⁴). It is probably the Egyptian Thuke, the same as or near to Pithom (wh. see), capital of the 8th nome, and situated in the Wady Tumilat. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH (2 K 17³⁰).—A deity whose image was made and set up in Samaria by the colonists from Babylon. 'Benoth' (LXX Banith) suggests 'Banitu' as it appears in the name Zarpanitu—in the inscriptions Zer-banitu—the wife of Marduk, patron god of Babylon. But there is no certainty. Sayce (in Hastings' DB) suggests that 'Succoth' may denote the 'proceSSIONAL shrines' in which the images were carried, 'Benoth' being corrupted from Belith or Belit, the classical Beltis, a common title and synonym of Zer-banitu. W. EWING.

SUD.—The name of a river or canal of Babylon named in Bar 1⁴. This name has not yet been found in the literature of Babylonia, and it seems probable that there is a mistake in the text, the true reading being Sur. A Babylonian text mentions a river or canal in the neighbourhood of Babylon called Nār Suru, and this may be the stream intended. Its position is unknown. T. G. PINCHES.

SUDIAS (1 Es 5²⁶) = Ezr 2⁴⁰ Hodaviah, Neh 7⁴ Hodevah.

SUKKIM.—The name of a tribe led by Shishak against Judea (2 Ch 12²). The identification of the Sukkim with the inhabitants of Suakin is very uncertain.

SUMER, SUMERIANS.—See p. 69^b.

SUN.—The first mention of the sun in the Bible is in Gn 1¹⁶, as 'the greater light to rule the day.' It was looked upon as the greatest and most important of the heavenly bodies, and motion was attributed to it, as is still done in ordinary parlance. We read of the going down of the sun, and of its rising; of the increasing force of its heat as the day went on (Ex 16²¹), of its influence in the production of the crops of the ground ('the precious things of the fruits of the sun,' Dt 33¹⁴). The sun 'goeth forth in his might' (Jg 5¹¹). The situation of a place is spoken of as 'toward the sunrising,' i.e. to the east (e.g. Nu 34¹⁰). Things that were notorious and done openly were said to be 'before or in the sight of the sun.' But while the sun is strong, the power of God is greater still. This is expressed in Job's assertion (9⁷) that God 'commandeth the sun and it riseth not.' The power of the sun affects the complexion ('I go blackened, but not by the sun,' Job 30²⁸ RVm; cf. Ca 1⁸), and even causes death. A case of death by SUNSTROKE occurs in 2 K 4¹⁸⁻¹⁹, and this power is alluded to in Ps 121⁶ 'The sun shall not smite thee by day.' The light of the sun is cheering: 'a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun' (Ec 11⁷). Contrivances for measuring the length of the day by the shadow cast by the sun were invented: we have some kind of dial, of which steps formed a part, indicated in 2 K 20⁹. It is 38°. Though there is no actual mention of an ECLIPSE in the Bible, part of the language used in describing the terrors of the day of the Lord both in OT and NT is derived from such an event: 'the sun shall be turned into darkness' (Jl 2³¹), 'the sun became black as sackcloth of hair' (Rev 6¹²). On the other hand, the brilliance and glory of the future life is portrayed by comparison with the sun. 'Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun' (Mt 13⁴³). 'The light of the sun shall be sevenfold' (Is 30²⁶); and even the sun will not be required, for, as in Ps 84¹¹ 'the Lord God is a sun,' so in Rev 21²³ (cf. 22³) 'the city hath no need of the sun . . . for the glory of God did lighten it.' The wonders of the day of Joshua's victory over the Amorites, when at his command the sun and moon are said to have stood still (Jos 10¹²⁻¹⁴), were long remembered by the Israelites (Hab 3¹¹, Sir 46⁹).

The power and influence of the sun over the natural world would soon lead to its being personified and worshipped, inasmuch as what was done upon earth was done 'under the sun.' In one of Joseph's dreams there is a personification of the sun (Gn 37⁹). In the Book of Deuteronomy (4¹⁹) there is a caution against SUN-WORSHIP, and the punishment of death by stoning is assigned to the convicted worshipper of the sun (17²), whilst in Job (31²⁶) there is an allusion to a superstitious salutation of the sun by the kissing of the hand. Sun-pillars, or obelisks used in the worship of the sun, are mentioned frequently in the OT, e.g. Ex 23²⁴, Lv 26³⁰, 2 Ch 14², Is 17⁸, Ezk 6⁴; and in Phoenicia, a solar Baal, Baal-Hammon, was worshipped. Sun-worship itself was, in the later days of the kingdom of Judah at any rate, one of the permitted forms of worship in Jerusalem. Sun-images are mentioned in 2 Ch. (14²) as existing in all the cities of Judah as early as the reign of Asa. In Josiah's reformation those who burnt incense to the sun were put down (2 K 23²⁴), while the chariots of the sun were burned with fire (after being hewn down according to 2 Ch 34⁴ 7), and 'the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun' were taken away (2 K 23¹¹). There was a great chariot of the sun at Sippar in Babylonia. We gather from Ezk 8⁸ that this sun-worship actually took place in the inner court at the door of the Temple, between the porch and the altar; the worshippers turned their backs upon the Temple itself, and worshipped the sun towards the east. Certain places where this worship appears to have been most popular took the name Beth-shemesh (wh. see), 'house of the sun,' from the fact.

We must not forget, in conclusion, that, in one Messianic passage (Mal 4²), the coming deliverer is spoken of as 'the sun of righteousness.'

SUPERSORPTION.—See TITLE, and MONEY, § 6.

SUPH.—A place-name in Dt 1¹ 'In the Arabah over against Suph'; AV reads 'over against the Red Sea,' in which case it has been assumed that the word for 'Sea' had fallen out in the received Hebrew text. Suph means 'weeds,' and the 'Sea of Weeds' was the Hebrew name of the Red Sea. The AV is almost certainly correct; the expression was so understood also by LXX and Vulgate. It is evident that by the 'Red Sea' the Gulf of 'Akabah is meant, as in Nu 21^a and elsewhere. J. F. McCURDY.

SUPHAH.—An unknown locality E. of Jordan (Nu 21¹⁴).

SUSANNA.—See APOCRYPHA, § 5.

SUSI.—A Manassite (Nu 13¹⁴ (1)).

SWALLOW.—1. dərər (Ps 84¹, Pr 26²). The allusion to the nesting of this bird in the sanctuary and its swift (unalighting) flight fits the swallow. 2. qār (Is 38¹⁴, Jer 8⁷). See CRANE. 3. sūs, sṭs, should be tr. as in RV (Is 38¹⁴, Jer 8⁷), 'swallow' instead of 'crane' (AV). See CRANE. Some ten species of swallows and swifts or martins are common in the Holy Land.

SWINE (chaztr).—Domesticated swine were probably kept in the East in the earliest historic times, when they appear to have been regarded as sacred. In a cave associated with the earliest place of sacrifice at ancient Gezer, in use certainly before B.C. 2000, large quantities of pigs' bones were found. It was the sacrosanct character of swine that lay at the root of the prohibition in Lv 11⁷ and Dt 14⁸; and the eating of swine's flesh and offering of swine's blood (Is 65⁶, 66¹⁷) are clearly regarded as a sign of lapse into paganism. The heathen frequently tried to compel the Jews to eat swine's flesh (e.g. 2 Mac 6¹⁸ 7¹) and thus renounce their religion. The contempt felt for swine is shown by the proverbs quoted in Pr. 11²², Mt 7⁶, and 2 P 2²². In the Talmudic writings the pig appears as the emblem of uncleanness, and those who keep swine are regarded with aversion. The same ideas colour the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15¹¹), where he is depicted as reaching the lowest depth of infamy in being sent to feed swine, and actually being reduced to covet their food; and also the narrative of the demoniacs, where the Gentile inhabitants of Gerasa lose their great herd of swine (Mt 8³⁰, Mk 5¹³, Lk 8²⁶).

In modern Palestine very much the same feeling survives. Chaztr 'pig' is a common but very opprobrious appellation. Swine's flesh is loathed by Jews and Moslems; the latter, who otherwise eat the same food as Christians, are always very suspicious that any unknown food may be contaminated with it. Pigs are not common in Palestine; they are kept by German colonists and in a few places by native Christians. In Rameh in Galilee, for example, considerable herds are kept and pastured in the surrounding fields. Horses, unfamiliar with their smell are much perturbed on approaching the village, and it is said that the cattle will not touch the water of the stream below where the swine are accustomed to resort.

SYCAMINE (Lk 17⁹).—sykaminos is, strictly speaking, the black mulberry (Morus nigra the tul shāmt of the Syrians), and it is probably this tree that is referred to in Lk 17⁹ and in 1 Mac 6⁴. But sykaminos is also used in LXX in many passages as the equivalent of the shiqm or sycomore (wh. see). E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

SYCHAR.—'A city of Samaria,' near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph (Jn 4⁵). Jerome in Onomast. distinguishes Sychar from Shechem, but in Ep. Paul. and Quaest. Gen. he identifies them, saying that the form Sychar is due to a scribal error. Much ingenuity has been exercised to show that the names are really identical, or at least apply to the same city. On the face of it this is unlikely. In A.D. 333 the Itinerary of Jerusalem places Sychar one mile E. of Shechem—in this agreeing with other ancient authorities. Canon Williams first suggested identification with 'Askar, a village on the skirt of Ebal, about two miles E. of Nāblus. The main objection to this is the presence of a copious spring, more than sufficient to supply the village; while from Jn 4¹⁵ we learn that the woman of Sychar was accustomed to go 'all the way' (RV) to Jacob's Well for domestic supplies. Further, there is nothing to indicate a pre-Arab settlement at 'Askar. Mr. Macalister (PEFSI, 1907, p. 92 ff.) draws attention to the mound Tuṭūl Balāṭā, a little nearer to Nāblus, just N. of the hamlet Balāṭā, which bears evidence of occupation from the period of the Hebrew monarchy to Roman times.

Jacob's Well, according to unanimous and unbroken tradition, lies about half a mile to the E. of Tuṭūl Balāṭā, on the S. edge of the plain, at the foot of Gerizim. Formerly of great depth (Jn 4¹¹), it is now much filled with rubbish, and is not more than 75 ft. deep. Depending on the percolation of surface water, with the greater depth the supply would be constant; but now it is dry before the summer is far advanced. The sacred associations of the Well, and the 'lightness' of the water, compared with the hardness of that from the spring, would form attractions in early, as in modern times. With no other ancient settlement near the Well, we may with some confidence place Sychar at Tuṭūl Balāṭā. With the ruin of the village the name may have migrated to 'Askar. W. EWING.

SYCOMORE (shiqm, 1 K 10²⁷, 1 Ch 27²⁸, 2 Ch 1¹⁵ 9²⁷, Is 9¹⁰, Am 7¹⁴; shiqmōth, Ps 78⁴⁷; (Gr.) sykomorea, Lk 19⁴).—This is the sycomore fig (Ficus sycamorus), a tree often 50 feet high, with an enormous trunk. It bears poor figs (Am 7¹⁴), but furnishes good timber. It is not to-day 'in abundance' as of old (1 K 10²⁷), but considerable numbers flourish still in the plain around Jaffa. This tree must not be confused with the 'sycamore' (Acer pseudo-platanus) of our home lands, which is a species of maple. See also SYCAMINE.

SYMBOL.—The prevalence of figurative language in the Bible is due partly to the antiquity and Oriental origin of the book and to the fact that its subject, religion, deals with the most difficult problems of life and the deepest emotions of the soul. The English word 'type,' as the equivalent of 'symbol' or 'emblem,' is sometimes confusing, as it has been used both for the fulfilment of the prototype and as that which points forward to the antitype. Like the proverb and parable, the symbol implies a connexion between two things of which one is concrete and physical, the other abstract and referring to intellectual, moral and spiritual matters. The former, of course, is the symbol.

1. Symbols of similarity.—Here the connecting principle is one of recognized likeness between the material object and its counterpart. Thus 'a watered garden' is made the emblem of a satisfied soul (Jer 31¹²). The similarity is that of supplied wants. In the same way the white garments of the priests and of the redeemed were emblematic of holiness (Ex 39²⁷⁻²⁹, Rev 19⁸). Marriage, as an Oriental relationship of purchased possession, was an emblem of Palestine in covenant with God, and of the Church as the bride of Christ. Thus also the Christian life was a race (He 12ⁱ) and a warfare (Eph 6ⁱⁱ⁻¹⁷). An element of similarity entered into the dream-visions recorded in the Bible and into the symbolism of prophetic warnings (Is 5ⁱ⁻⁷, Jer 13ⁱ⁻¹², Ezk 37ⁱ⁻¹¹). In the Epistles we meet with a rich variety of emblems created by the desire to interpret the Person and mission of Christ, and the relationship of the Christian believer to Him. The writers, being of Jewish origin and addressing communities which usually contained a number of Jewish Christians, naturally turned to the biographies, national history, and sacred institutions of the OT. Whatever was drawn from such a source would not only be familiar, but would seem to be part of an organic whole, and to possess a value of Divine preparation. Examples of these are the Second Adam, the Firstborn, the Chief Shepherd, the Chief Corner-stone. The journey to Canaan supplied Passover, manna, rock, redemption, better country, rest. From the Tabernacle and Temple were taken high priest, altar, sacrifice, veil, peace-offering, lamb, atonement.

2. Symbols of representative selection or Synecdoche.—The symbol is in this case the agent or implement, or some conspicuous accompaniment selected from a group of concrete particulars, so that the part represents the whole. Thus the insignia of office and authority are crown, sword, sceptre, seal, coin, robe, rod, staff. Various actions and relationships are symbolically indicated, such as the giving of the hand (compact), foot on the neck (conquest), bored ear (perpetual servitude), washing of the hands (innocence), bared or outstretched arm (energy), gnashing of teeth (disappointment and remorse), shaking the head (contempt and disapproval), averted face (angry repudiation), bread (hospitality), cross (suffering of Christ, and suffering for Him).

3. Memorial and mystical symbols.—These might belong to either of the above forms or be artificially selected, but the purpose was not so much to instruct and emphasize as to recall and perpetuate circumstances and feelings, or to suggest a meaning that must remain concealed. Such were the rainbow at the Flood, the stone Ebenezer, the symbolical names often given to children, as Moses, Ischabod, and the names in Jacob's family, the Urim and Thummim, the white stone, and the number of the beast, etc. Of this class were the sculptured emblems of the early Christians in the catacombs of Rome, such as the palm, dove, anchor, ship, fish, Alpha and Omega. Water, bread and wine, as the material elements in Baptism and the Lord's Supper, are the symbols of those Sacraments. The name 'symbol' is applied to the selection of generally accepted truths forming the Christian creed, or canon of belief. Certain characters in the Bible, such as Jonah, Mary Magdalene, Herod, Judas, have come to be identified with special types of character and conduct, and are said to be symbolical of those classes.

4. Dangers of symbolism.—(1) The act of transmitting spiritual and eternal truth through material and perishable media always involves limitation and loss. (2) The injudicious carrying out of symbolism into inferences not originally intended, leads into the opposite error of irrelevant addition. (3) The scrupulous avoidance of symbolism may itself become a symbol. (4) The external form which illuminates, emphasizes, and recalls is no guarantee of inward reality. The ceremony of purification is not purity. Sheep's clothing may not be a robe of innocence or rent garments indicate distress of soul. The cry 'Lord, Lord!' is not always raised by true discipleship. Hence Christ's message to the Samaritan woman concerning true worship, and His frequent protests against the ceremonial insincerities of the Pharisees. The condemnation of image-worship turned upon the total inadequacy of symbol to represent God. It might indicate man's thought of God, but it left untouched the constituent element of true religion, God's thought of man. 'Eyes have they, but they see not.'

SYNAGOGUE.—1. Meaning and history.—Like its original synagōgē (lit. a gathering, assembly—for its use in LXX see CONGREGATION), 'synagogue' is used in NT in a double signification: (1) in the sense of a community organized for religious purposes, as Ac 6⁹ 9² (cf. Rev 2⁹ 3⁹ 'the synagogue of Satan'); and (2) to denote the building in which the community met for worship—so some 50 times in the Gospels and Acts from Mt 4²³ onwards. The strict Heb. equivalent in the latter sense is 'the house of assembly.' Of other names for the synagogue as a place of worship may be mentioned the older term proseuchē (Ac 16ⁱⁱ RV 'place of worship'; Jos. Life, § 54, of the synagogue of Tiberias).

The origin of the synagogue as a characteristic institution of Judaism is hidden in obscurity. Most probably it took its rise in the circumstances of the Hebrew exiles in Babylonia. Hitherto worship had practically meant sacrifice, but sacrifice was now impossible in a land unclean (cf. Hos 3⁴ 9ⁱⁱ). There was still left to the exiles, however, the living word of the prophet, and the writings of God's interpreters from a former age. In those gatherings in the house of Ezekiel of which we read (Ezk 8ⁱ 20ⁱ⁻³) we may perhaps detect the germs of the future synagogue. We are on more solid ground when we reach the religious reform of Ezra and Nehemiah (B.C. 444-443). With the introduction of the 'Law of Moses' as the norm of faith and life, the need for systematic instruction in its complex requirements was evident to the leaders of the reform, as is clear from Neh 8ⁱⁱ. The closing century of the Persian rule, B.C. 430-330, may therefore be regarded as the period of the rise and development of the synagogue. From this period, more precisely from the reign of Artaxerxes III. Ochus (358-337), may be dated the only mention of the synagogue in OT, viz. Ps 74⁸ 'they have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land.' The papyrus finds of recent years have contained not a few references to the synagogues of the Jewish communities in Egypt, from the time of the third Ptolemy, Euergetes, B.C. 247-221, onwards (details in Schürer, GVV ii. 499 f.).

By the first century of our era the synagogue was regarded as an institution of almost immemorial antiquity. In referring it back to Moses himself, Josephus (c. Apion, ii. 17) is only echoing the contemporary belief, which is also reflected in the words of the Apostle James, 'for Moses from generations of old hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath' (Ac 15ⁱⁱ RV). For the wide extent and historical importance of the synagogues of 'the Dispersion,' see below, § 5.

2. The synagogue building and its furniture.—Remains, more or less extensive, of Jewish synagogues still survive from the second and third, more doubtfully from the first, centuries of our era, chiefly in Galilee. The examination of these remains, first undertaken by the Palestine Exploration Fund (see Survey of West Pal. i. 224 ff. with plans), has recently been carried out more fully by the German Orient Society, and the results published in the Society's Mittheilungen (Nos. 23, 27, 29 [1904, 1905]). In plan and details of ornamentation these Galilean synagogues display a general similarity. The buildings are rectangular in shape, and divided into three or five aisles by two or three rows of pillars. The entrance is almost always in the south front, and often consists of a large main, and two smaller side, entrances. The most elaborate was the synagogue of Capernaum, where, as elsewhere, traces were found of galleries running round three sides of the central aisle. These were probably assigned to 'the women (for similar arrangement in Herod's Temple, see TEMPLE § 11 (b)), although the question of the separation of the sexes in NT times is one on which the best authorities disagree.

As regards the furniture of the synagogue, the most important item was the chest or cupboard (ṭbā, the 'ark') in which the sacred rolls of the Law and the Prophets were kept. The synagogues of NT times were also doubtless provided with a raised platform (bēma), on which stood the reading-desk from which the Scriptures were read. The larger portion of the area was occupied by benches for the congregation, the worshippers facing southwards, in Galilee at least, towards the holy city. A few special seats in front of the bēma, and facing the congregation, were occupied by the heads of the community. These are the 'chief seats in the synagogues' coveted by the Pharisees (Mt 23⁶ and ||). In front of the 'ark' a lamp burned day and night.

3. The officials of the Synagogue.—The general management of the synagogue of a Jewish town, where it served also as a court of justice and—in the smaller towns and villages at least—as a school, was in the hands of the elders of the community. It had no special priest or 'minister,' as will appear presently. It was usual however, to appoint an official called 'the ruler of the synagogue' (Mk 5²², Lk 8⁴, and oft.), to whom the authorities of the community committed the care of the building as well as the more important duty of seeing that everything connected with the public services was done 'decently and in order.' Hence the indignation of the ruler of Lk 13¹⁴ at the supposed breach of the decorum of worship related in the preceding verses (vv. 10-12). It lay with the ruler also to select the readers for the day, and to determine the order in which they were to be called up to the reading-desk. Occasionally, it would seem, a synagogue might have two or more rulers, as at Antioch of Pisidia (Ac 13¹⁵).

The only other permanent official was the chazzān, 'the attendant' of Lk 4²⁰ RV (AV 'minister' in the same, but now obsolete, sense; cf. Ac 13⁹). The duties of the synagogue 'officer' (as we say in Scotland) were somewhat varied. He was responsible for the cleaning and lighting of the building; and during service it was his special duty to convey the sacred rolls from the ark to the readers at the desk, and to restore them when the reading was over, as recorded in Lk 4¹⁷.²⁰ To him fell also the duty of scourging criminals condemned by the court (Mt 10¹⁷ 23³⁴ etc.), but not, as is usually represented, the teaching of the school children (art. 'Education' in DB I. 650^a).

4. The synagogue service in NT times.—For this part of our subject we are dependent mainly on the fuller information preserved in the Mishna, which reflects the later usage of the 2nd century. According to Megillah, iv. 3, the service consisted of four parts, and with this the scattered hints in the Gospels and Acts agree. These parts are: (a) the recitation of the Shema, (b) the lifting up of hands, i.e. the prayers, (c) the lessons from the Law and the Prophets, and (d) the priestly benediction. Two elements of the full service, however, are here omitted as not strictly belonging to the essentials of worship, viz. the translation of the lessons into the vernacular, and the sermon.

(a) The recitation of the Shema.—The shema is the standing designation of three short sections of the Pentateuch, Dt 6⁴⁻⁹ (which opens with the word Shema—'Hear,' whence the name) 11¹³⁻²¹, Nu 15³⁷⁻⁴¹. Their recitation by the congregation was preceded and followed by one or two short benedictions, such as that beginning, 'Blessed be thou, Adonai, our God, King of the universe, who didst form the light and create darkness.'

(b) The lifting up of hands.—In contrast to the first item of the service, in which all took part, the prayers were said by a single individual chosen for the purpose, named 'the deputy of the congregation,' the worshippers however, repeating the Amen at the close of each collect. This mode of prayer in the public services was taken over by the early Church, as is attested by 1 Co 14¹⁶ (where the word rendered 'the giving of thanks' is the Gr. equivalent of that rendered 'benediction' below). By the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D. a formal liturgy had been developed—the famous 'eighteen benedictions,' which may be read in any Jewish prayer-book. It is impossible, however, to say with certainty how many of these were in use in our Lord's day. Dalman is of opinion that at least twelve of the eighteen collects are older than A.D. 70. These he arranges in three groups, consisting of three opening benedictions, six petitions, and three closing benedictions (see his art. 'Gottesdienst [synagoga]' in Hauck's PRE3 vii.).

(c) The OT lessons.—The liturgy was followed by a lesson from the Law. The five books were divided into 154 (or more) Sabbath pericopes or sections, so that the whole Pentateuch was read through in three years (or 3½ years, half of a Sabbatic period). The custom of calling up seven readers in succession—a priest, a Levite, and five others—may be as old as the 1st century. After the Law came, at the Sabbath morning service only a lesson from the Prophets, read by one person and left to his choice. It was the haph-tard, as the prophetic lesson was termed, that our Lord read in the synagogue of Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁶). 'The Hagiographa, except Esther, were not at this period read at Divine service. Even the Psalms had no place in the usual service' (Dalman).

In order that the common people might follow the lessons with intelligence, these were translated into Aramaic, the vernacular of Palestine, by an interpreter (meturgeman—our 'dragoman' is from the same root). The unique position of the Law in the estimation of the time is shown by the fact that the Pentateuch lessons had to be translated a verse at a time, while the Prophets might be rendered three verses at a time. Reader and interpreter stood while at the reading-desk.

At this point in the service at the principal diets of worship, the sermon was introduced. The preacher sat while giving his exposition, which is so often described in NT as 'teaching' (Mt 4²³, Mk 12⁶³ etc.). In the synagogue there was full liberty of prophesying. Any member of the community was free to exercise his gift. When a likely stranger was present, he was invited by the ruler of the synagogue to address the congregation (Ac 13¹⁶). (d) The service was closed by a priest pronouncing the priestly benediction, Nu 6²⁴⁻²⁶; if no priest was present, it is said that a layman gave the blessing in the form of a prayer.

On some occasions, at least, it was usual to ask the alms of the congregation (Mt 6²) on behalf of the poor. The full service, as sketched above, was confined to the principal service of the week, which was held on the forenoon of the Sabbath. At the other services, such as those held daily in the larger towns, where ten 'men of leisure' were available to form the minimum legal congregation, and the Monday and Thursday services, some of the items were omitted.

5. The influence of the Synagogue.—This article would be incomplete without a reference, however brief, to the influence of the synagogue and its worship not only upon the Jews themselves, but upon the world of heathenism. As to the latter, the synagogue played a conspicuous part in the preparatio evangelica. From the outworn creeds of paganism many earnest souls turned to the synagogue and its teaching for the satisfaction of their highest needs. The synagogues of 'the Dispersion' (Jn 7²⁸, Ja 1¹, 1 P 1¹, all RV) became in consequence the seed-plots of Christianity, as every student of the Book of Acts is aware.

The work which the synagogue did for Judaism itself is best seen in the ease with which the breach with the past involved in the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70, and the cessation of sacrificial worship, was healed. The highest religious life of Judaism had already transferred its channels from the grosser and more material forms of the Temple to the spiritual worship of the synagogue.

Nor must a reference be wanting to the fact that the synagogue, and not the Temple, supplied the mould and model for the worship of the Christian Church.

6. The Great Synagogue.—In late Jewish tradition Ezra is alleged to have been the founder and first president of a college of learned scribes, which is supposed to have existed in Jerusalem until the early part of the Gr. period (c. B.C. 300). To 'the men of the Great Synagogue,' or rather 'of the Great Assembly,' were ascribed the composition of some of the later OT books, the close of the Canon, and a general care for the development of religion under the Law. Recent writers, however, have in the main accepted the results of Kuenen's careful investigation in his Gesamm. Abhandlungen (Germ. tr. 125-160), and now regard the Great Synagogue as unhistorical, the tradition of its existence having arisen from a distorted view of the nature and purpose of the great popular assembly, of which we read in Neh 8-10.

SYNZYGUS (lit. 'yoke-fellow').—This is taken by some as a proper name in Ph 4³ ('Synzygus truly so called'), but it is nowhere else found as such. It is more probably a way of describing the chief minister of the church at Philippi. Lightfoot (Comm. in loc.) suggests Epaphroditus; Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 358), Luke; others, Barnabas or Silas or Timothy. An old tradition of the 2nd cent. the Apostle's wife; Renan supposes that Lydia is meant, and that she had become his wife; but see 1 Co 7⁴.

SYRACUSE, on the east coast of Sicily, was the principal city in the island. It was originally a Greek colony of ancient date, which was powerful enough to defeat the famous Athenian Sicilian expedition (B.C. 415-412). Its kings were often men of distinction, even in literature, of which they were noted patrons. The city had a varied career, being sometimes a kingdom, sometimes a democracy. In B.C. 241 the Romans took the western half of Sicily from the Carthaginians, but remained in alliance with the kings of Syracuse. The last king of Syracuse coquetted with the Carthaginians; the city was besieged and captured by Marcellus in 212, and the whole island was henceforth under a praetor, who had two questors, one situated at Lilybaeum in the W., the other at Syracuse. The city continued prosperous down till about the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. After that date it declined in importance, though it remained the capital of the eastern half of the island. In NT times a large number of the inhabitants were Roman citizens.

St. Paul's ship lay at anchor in the harbour for three days, when he was on his way from Malta to Rome (Ac 28¹³). He did not preach there. Christian memorials at Syracuse are not specially early.

TAANACH (Jos 12²¹, 1 K 4¹⁵, 1 Ch 7²⁹).—One of the royal Canaanite cities, mentioned in OT always along with Megiddo. Though in the territory of Issachar, it belonged to Manasseh; the native Canaanites were, however, not driven out (Jos 17¹¹⁻¹³, Jg 1²⁷). It was allotted to the Levites of the children of Kohath (Jos 21²⁵). It was one of the four fortress cities on the 'border of Manasseh' (1 Ch 7²⁹). The fight of Deborah and Barak with the Canaanites is described (Jg 5¹⁹) as 'in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo.' The site is to-day Tell Ta'annak, four miles S.E. from Tell el-Mutesellim (Megiddo). The hill has been excavated by Prof. Sellin of Vienna. Many remains of Canaanite and Jewish civilization have been found, and also a considerable number of clay tablets with cuneiform inscriptions similar to those discovered at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt. See Sellin in Mem. Vienna Acad., I. (1904), III. (1905).

TAANATH-SHILOH.—A town on the N.E. boundary of Ephraim (Jos 18⁶). It is possibly the mod. Ta'na, about 7 miles from Nablus (Neapolis), and 2 miles N. of Yānūn (Janoah).

TABAOTH (1 Es 5²³ ⁶⁰); and TABBAOTH (Ezr 2^c—Neh 7⁴⁰).—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel.

TABBATH.—An unknown locality mentioned in Jg 7².

TABEEL.—1. The father of the rival to Ahaz put forward by Rezin (wh. see) and Pekah (Is 7⁸). 2. A Persian official (Ezr 4⁷); called in 1 Es 2¹⁰ Tabellius.

TABELLIUS.—See TABELL, 2.

TABER.—Only in Nah 2⁷ 'her handmaids mourn as with the voice of doves, tabering (Aimer. RV 'beating') upon their breasts.' Beating the breast was a familiar Oriental custom in mourning (cf. Is 32¹³). The word here used means lit. 'drumming' (cf. Ps 68²⁶, its only other occurrence). The English word 'taber' means a small drum, usually accompanying a pipe, both instruments being played by the same performer. Other forms are 'tabor,' 'tabour,' and 'tambour'; and dim forms are 'tabret' and 'tambourine.'

TABERAH.—An unidentified 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 11³, Dt 9²²).

TABERNACLE.—1. By 'the tabernacle' without further qualification, as by the more expressive designation 'tabernacle of the congregation' (RV more correctly 'tent of meeting,' see below), is usually understood the elaborate portable sanctuary which Moses erected at Sinai, in accordance with Divine instructions, as the place of worship for the Hebrew tribes during and after the wilderness wanderings. But modern criticism has revealed the fact that this artistic and costly structure is confined to the Priestly sources of the Pentateuch, and is to be carefully distinguished from a much simpler tent bearing the same name and likewise associated with Moses. The relative historicity of the two 'tents of meeting' will be more fully examined at the close of this article (§ 9).

2. The sections of the Priests' Code (P) devoted to the details of the fabric and furniture of the Tabernacle, and to the arrangements for its transport from station to station in the wilderness, fall into two groups, viz. (a) Ex 25-27. 30. 31, which are couched in the form of instructions from J^h to Moses as to the erection of the Tabernacle and the making of its furniture according to the 'pattern' or model shown to the latter on the holy mount (25^v. 40); (b) Ex 35-40, which tell inter alia of the carrying out of these instructions. Some additional details, particularly as to the arrangements on the march, are given in Nu 3²⁴. 4⁴. and 7¹⁵.

In these and other OT passages the wilderness sanctuary is denoted by at least a dozen different designations (see the list in Hastings' DB iv. 655). The most frequently employed is that also borne, as we have seen, by the sacred tent of the Elohist source (E), 'the tent of meeting' (so RV throughout). That this is the more correct rendering of the original 'ohel mō'ēd', as compared with AV's 'tabernacle of the congregation', is now universally acknowledged. The sense in which the Priestly writers, at least, understood the second term is evident from such passages as Ex 25²², where, with reference to the mercy-seat (see 7 (b)), J^h is represented as saying: 'there I will meet with thee and commune with thee' (cf. Nu 7³⁹). This, however, does not exclude a possible early connexion of the name with that of the Babylonian 'mount of meeting' (Is 14¹³, EV 'congregation'), the mō'ēd or assembly of the gods.

3. In order to do justice to the Priestly writers in their attempts to give literary shape to their ideas of Divine worship, it must be remembered that they were following in the footsteps of Ezekiel (chs. 40-48), whose conception of a sanctuary is that of a dwelling-place of the Deity (see Ezk 37²⁷). Now the attribute of Israel's God, which for these theologians of the Exile overshadowed all others, was His ineffable and almost unapproachable holiness, and the problem for Ezekiel and his priestly successors was how man in his creaturely weakness and sinfulness could with safety approach a perfectly holy God. The solution is found in the restored Temple in the one case (Ezk 40 ff.), and in the Tabernacle in the other, together with the elaborate sacrificial and propitiatory system of which each is the centre. In the Tabernacle, in particular, we have an ideal of a Divine sanctuary, every detail of which is intended to symbolize the unity, majesty, and above all the holiness of J^h, and to provide an earthly habitation in which a holy God may again dwell in the midst of a holy people. 'Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them' (Ex 25⁸).

4. Taking this general idea of the Tabernacle with us, and leaving a fuller discussion of its religious significance and symbolism to a later section (§ 8), let us proceed to study the arrangement and component parts of P's ideal sanctuary. Since the tents of the Hebrew tribes, those of the priests and Levites, and the three divisions of the sanctuary—court, holy place, and the holy of holies—represent ascending degrees of holiness in the scheme of the Priestly writer, the appropriate order of study will be from without inwards, from the perimeter of the sanctuary to its centre.

(a) We begin, therefore, with 'the court of the dwelling' (Ex 27⁹). This is described as a rectangular enclosure in the centre of the camp, measuring 100 cubits from east to west and half that amount from south to north. If the shorter cubit of, say, 18 inches (for convenience of reckoning) be taken as the unit of measurement, this represents an area of approximately 50 yards by 25, a ratio of 2:1. The entrance, which is on the eastern side, is closed by a screen (27¹⁶ RV) of embroidered work in colours. The rest of the area is screened off by plain white curtains (EV 'hangings') of 'fine twined linen' 5 cubits in height, suspended, like the screen, at equal intervals of 5 cubits from pillars standing in sockets (EV) or bases of bronze. Since the perimeter of the court measured 300 cubits, 60 pillars in all were required for the curtains and the screen, and are reckoned in the text in groups of tens and twenties, 20 for each long side, and 10 for each short side. The pillars are evidently intended to be kept upright by means of cords or stays fastened to pins or pegs of bronze stuck in the ground.

(b) In the centre of the court is placed the altar of burnt-offering (27¹⁻³), called also 'the brazen altar' and 'the altar' par excellence. When one considers the purpose it was intended to serve, one is surprised to find this altar of burnt-offering consisting of a hollow chest of acacia wood (so RV throughout, for AV 'shittim')—the only wood employed in the construction of the Tabernacle—5 cubits in length and breadth, and 3 in height, overlaid with what must, for reasons of transport, have been a comparatively thin sheathing of bronze. From the four corners spring the four horns of the altar, 'of one piece' with it, while half-way up the side there was fitted a projecting ledge, from which depended a network or grating (AV 'grate') of bronze (27³ 38¹ RV). The meshes of the latter must have been sufficiently wide to permit of the sacrificial blood being dashed against the sides and base of the altar (cf. the sketch in Hastings' DB iv. 658). Like most of the other articles of the Tabernacle furniture, the altar was provided with rings and poles for convenience of transport.

(c) In proximity to the altar must be placed the bronze laver (30¹⁷⁻²¹), containing water for the ablutions of the priests. According to 38⁸, it was made from the 'mirrors of the women which served at the door of the tent of meeting' (RV)—a curious anachronism.

5. (a) It has already been emphasized that the dominant conception of the Tabernacle in these chapters is that of a portable sanctuary, which is to serve as the earthly dwelling-place of the heavenly King. In harmony therewith we find the essential part of the fabric of the Tabernacle, to which every other structural detail is subsidiary, described at the outset by the characteristic designation 'dwelling'. 'Thou shalt make the dwelling (EV 'tabernacle') of ten curtains' (26¹). It is a fundamental mistake to regard the wooden part of the Tabernacle as of the essence of the structure, and to begin the study of the whole therefrom, as is still being done.

The ten curtains of the dwelling (mishkān), each 28 cubits by 4, are to be of the finest linen, adorned with inwoven tapestry figures of cherubim in violet, purple, and scarlet (see COLOURS), 'the work of the cunning workman' (26¹⁶ RV). They are to be sewed together to form two sets of five, which again are to be 'coupled together' by means of clasps (RV; AV 'taches') and loops, so as to form one large surface 40 (10x4) cubits by 28 (7x4), 'for the dwelling shall be one' (26⁹). Together the curtains are designed to form the earthly, and, with the aid of the attendant cherubim, to symbolize the heavenly, dwelling-place of the God of Israel.

(b) The next section of the Divine directions (26⁷⁻¹⁴) provides for the thorough protection of these delicate artistic curtains by means of three separate coverings. The first consists of eleven curtains of goats' hair 'for a tent over the dwelling,' and therefore of somewhat larger dimensions than the curtains of the latter, namely 30 cubits by 4, covering, when joined together, a surface of 44 cubits by 30. The two remaining coverings are to be made respectively of rams' skins dyed red and of the skins of a Red Sea mammal, which is probably the dugong (v.¹⁴, RV 'sealskins,' Heb. tachash).

(c) At this point one would have expected to hear of the provision of a number of poles and stays by means of which the dwelling might be pitched like an ordinary tent. But the author of Ex 26¹⁻¹⁴ does not apply the term 'tent' to the curtains of the dwelling, but, as we have seen, to those of the goats' hair covering, and instead of poles and stays we find a different and altogether unexpected arrangement in vv.¹⁵⁻²⁰. Unfortunately the crucial passage, vv.¹⁵⁻¹⁷, contains several obscure technical terms, with regard to which in the present writer's opinion, the true exegetical tradition has been lost. The explanation usually given, which finds in the word rendered 'boards' huge wooden beams of impossible dimensions, has been shown in a former study to be exegetically and intrinsically inadmissible; see art. 'Tabernacle' in Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 563^b ff. To § 7 (b) of that article, with which Haupt's note on 1 K 7²⁸ in SBOT should now be compared, the student is referred for the grounds on which the following translation of the leading passage is based. 'And thou shalt make the frames for the dwelling of acacia wood, two uprights for each frame joined together by cross rails.' The result is, briefly, the substitution of 48 light open frames (see diagrams, op. cit.), each 10 cubits in height by 1½ in width, for the traditional wooden beams of these dimensions, each, according to the usual theory, 1 cubit thick, equivalent to a weight of from 15 to 20 hundredweights!

The open frames—after being overlaid with gold according to our present but scarcely original text (v.²⁹)—are to be 'reared up,' side by side, along the south, west, and north sides of a rectangular enclosure measuring 30 cubits by 10 (3:1), the east side or front being left open. Twenty frames go to form each long side of the enclosure (1½x20=30 cubits); the western end requires only six frames (1½x6=9 cubits.); the remaining cubit of the total width is made up by the thickness of the frames and bars of the two long sides. The two remaining frames are placed at the two western corners, where, so far as can be gathered from the obscure text of v.²⁴, the framework is doubled for greater security. The lower ends of the two uprights of each frame are inserted into solid silver bases, which thus form a continuous foundation and give steadiness to the structure. This end is further attained by an arrangement of bars which together form three parallel sets running along all three sides, binding the whole framework together and giving it the necessary rigidity.

Over this rigid framework, and across the intervening space, are laid the tapestry curtains to form the dwelling, the symbolic figures of the cherubim now fully displayed on the sides as well as on the roof. Above these come the first of the protective coverings above described, the goats' hair curtains of the 'tent,' as distinguished from the 'dwelling.' In virtue of their greater size, they overlap the curtains of the latter, their breadth of 30 cubits exactly sufficing for the height and width of the dwelling (10+10+10 cubits). As they thus reached to the base of the two long sides of the Tabernacle, they were probably fastened by pegs to the ground. At the eastern end the outermost curtain was probably folded in two so as to hang down for the space of two cubits over the entrance (26⁹). In what manner the two remaining coverings are to be laid is not specified.

[This solution of the difficulties connected with the construction of the Tabernacle, first offered in DB iv., has been adopted since the above was written, by the two latest commentators on Exodus, M'Neile and Bennett; see esp. the former's Book of Exodus [1908], lxxiii-xciii.]

(d) The fabric of the Tabernacle, as described up to this point in Ex 26¹⁻²⁰, has been found to consist of three parts, carefully distinguished from each other. These are (1) the artistic linen curtains of the dwelling, the really essential part; (2) their supporting framework, the two together enclosing, except at the still open eastern front, a space 30 cubits long and 10 cubits wide from curtain to curtain, and 10 cubits in height; and (3) the protecting tent (so called) of goats' hair, with the two subsidiary coverings.

The next step is to provide for the division of the dwelling into two parts, in the proportion of 2 to 1, by means of a beautiful portière, termed the veil (vv.³¹⁻³³), of the same material and artistic workmanship as the curtains of the dwelling. The veil is to be suspended from four gilded pillars, 20 cubits from the entrance and 10 from the western end of the structure. The larger of the two divisions of the dwelling is named the holy place. The smaller the holy of holies or most holy place. From the measurements given above, it will be seen that the most holy place—the true presence-chamber of the Most High, to which the holy place forms the ante-chamber—has the form of a perfect cube, 10 cubits (about 15 ft.) in length, breadth, and height, enclosed on all four sides and on the roof by the curtains and their cherubim.

(e) No provision has yet been made for closing the entrance to the Tabernacle. This is now done (v.³⁴.) by means of a hanging, embroidered in colours—a less artistic fabric than the tapestry of the 'cunning workman'—measuring 10 cubits by 10, and suspended from five pillars with bases of bronze. Its special designation, 'a screen for the door of the Tent' (v.³⁸ RV), its inferior workmanship, and its bronze bases, all show that strangely enough it is not to be reckoned as a part of the dwelling, of which the woven fabric is tapestry, and the only metals silver and gold.

6. Coming now to the furniture of the dwelling, and proceeding as before from without inwards, we find the holy place provided with three articles of furniture: (a) the table of shewbread, or, more precisely, presence-bread (25²³⁻³⁰ 37¹⁰⁻¹⁵); (b) the so-called golden candlestick, in reality a seven-branched lampstand (25³¹⁻⁴⁰ 37¹⁷⁻²⁴) (c) the altar of incense (30¹⁻⁷ 37²⁵⁻²⁸). Many of the details of the construction and ornamentation of these are obscure, and reference is here made, once for all, to the fuller discussion of these difficulties in the article already cited (DB iv. 662 ff.).

(a) The table of shewbread, or presence-table (Nu 4⁷), is a low table or wooden stand overlaid with pure gold, 1½ cubits in height. Its top measures 2 cubits by 1. The legs are connected by a narrow binding-rail, one hand-breadth wide, the 'border' of Ex 25²⁴, to which are attached four golden rings to receive the staves by which the table is to be carried on the march. For the service of the table are provided 'the dishes, the spoons, the flagons, and the bowls thereof to pour withal' (25²⁹ RV), all of pure gold. Of these the golden 'dishes' are the salvers on which the loaves of the presence-bread (see SHEWBREAD) were displayed; the 'spoons' are rather cups for frankincense (Lv 24⁷); the 'flagons' (AV 'covers') are the larger, and the 'bowls' the smaller, vessels for the wine connected with this part of the ritual.

(b) The golden candlestick or lampstand is to be constructed of 'beaten work' (τερουσκε) of pure gold. Three pairs of arms branched off at different heights from the central shaft, and curved outwards and upwards until their extremities were on a level with the top of the shaft, the whole providing stands for seven golden lamps. Shaft and arms were alike adorned with ornamentation suggested by the flower of the almond tree (cf. diagram in DB iv. 663). The golden lampstand stood on the south side of the holy place, facing the table of shewbread on the north side. The 'tongs' of 25²⁸ are really 'snuffers' (so AV 37²²) for dressing the wicks of the lamps, the burnt portions being placed in the 'snuff dishes.' Both sets of articles were of gold.

(c) The passage containing the directions for the altar of incense (Ex 30¹⁻⁷) forms part of a section (chs. 30. 31) which, there is reason to believe, is a later addition to the original contents of the Priests' Code. The altar is described as square in section, one cubit each way, and two cubits in height, with projecting horns. Like the rest of the furniture, it was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold, with the usual provision of rings and staves. Its place is in front of the veil separating the holy from the most holy place. Incense of sweet spices is to be offered upon it night and morning (30⁷⁻⁸).

7. In the most holy place are placed two distinct yet connected sacred objects, the ark and the propitiatory or mercy-seat (25¹⁰⁻²² 37¹⁻⁹). (a) P's characteristic name for the former is the ark of the testimony. The latter term is a synonym in P for the Decalogue (25¹⁶), which was written on 'the tables of testimony' (31¹⁸), deposited, according to an early tradition, within the ark. The ark itself occasionally receives the simple title of 'the testimony,' whence the Tabernacle as sheltering the ark is named in P both 'the dwelling (EV 'tabernacle') of the testimony' (Ex 38²¹ etc.) and 'the tent of the testimony' (Nu 9¹⁵ etc.). The ark of the Priests' Code is an oblong chest of acacia wood, 2½ cubits in length and 1½ in breadth and height (5×3×3 half-cubits), overlaid within and without with pure gold. The sides are decorated with an obscure form of ornamentation, the 'crown' of Ex 25¹¹, probably a moulding (RVm 'rim or moulding'). At the four corners (v.¹² AV; RV, less accurately, 'feet') the usual rings were attached to receive the bearing-poles. The precise point of attachment is uncertain, whether at the ends of the two long sides or of the two short sides. Since it would be more seemly that the throne of J', presently to be described, should face in the direction of the march, it is more probable that the poles were meant to pass through rings attached to the short sides, but whether these were to be attached at the lowest point of the sides, or higher up, cannot be determined. That the Decalogue or 'testimony' was to find a place in the ark (25¹⁶) has already been stated.

(b) Distinct from the ark, but resting upon and of the same superficial dimensions as its top, viz. 2½ by 1½ cubits, we find a slab of solid gold to which is given the name kappōreth. The best English rendering is the propitiatory (vv.^{17B}), of which the current mercy-seat, adopted by Tindale from Luther's rendering, is a not inappropriate paraphrase. From opposite ends of the propitiatory, and 'of one piece' with it (v.¹⁹ RV), rose a pair of cherubim figures of beaten work of pure gold. The faces of the cherubim were bent downwards in the direction of the propitiatory, while the wings with which each was furnished met overhead, so as to cover the propitiatory (vv.¹⁸⁻²⁰).

We have now penetrated to the innermost shrine of the priestly sanctuary. Its very position is significant. The surrounding court is made up of two squares, 50 cubits each way, placed side by side (see above). The eastern square, with its central altar, is the worshippers' place of meeting. The entrance to the Tabernacle proper lies along the edge of the western square, the exact centre of which is occupied by the most holy place. In the centre of the latter, again, at the point of intersection of the diagonals of the square, we may be sure, is the place intended for the ark and the propitiatory. Here in the very centre of the camp is the earthly throne of J'. Here, 'from above the propitiatory, from between the cherubim,' the most holy of all earth's holy places, will God henceforth meet and commune with His servant Moses (25²²). But with Moses only; for even the high priest is permitted to enter the most holy place but once a year, on the great Day of Atonement, when he comes to sprinkle the blood of the national sin-offering 'with his finger upon the mercy-seat' (Lv 16¹⁴). The ordinary priests came only into the holy place, the lay worshipper only into 'the court of the dwelling.' In the course of the foregoing exposition, it will have been seen how these ascending degrees of sanctity are reflected in the materials employed in the construction of the court, holy place, most holy place, and propitiatory respectively. It is not without significance that the last named is the only article of solid gold in the whole sanctuary.

8. These observations lead naturally to a brief exposition of the religious symbolism which so evidently pervades every part of the wilderness sanctuary. Its position in the centre of the camp of the Hebrew tribes 'as already been more than once referred to. By this the Priestly writer would emphasize the central place which the rightly ordered worship of Israel's covenant God must occupy in the theocratic community of the future.

The most assured fruit of the discipline of the Babylonian Exile was the final triumph of monotheism. This triumph we find reflected in the presuppositions of the Priests' Code. One God, one sanctuary, is the idea implicit throughout. But not only is there no God but Jahweh; Jahweh, Israel's God, 'is one' (Dt 6⁴ RVm), and because He is one, His earthly 'dwelling' must be one (Ex 26⁹ RV, cf. § 5 (a)). The Tabernacle thus symbolizes both the oneness and the unity of J'.

Nor is the perpetual striving after proportion and symmetry which characterizes all the measurements of the Tabernacle and its furniture without a deeper significance. By this means the author undoubtedly seeks to symbolize the perfection and harmony of the Divine character. Thus, to take but a single illustration, the perfect cube of the most holy place, of which 'the length and breadth and height,' like those of the New Jerusalem of the Apocalypse (21¹⁶), 'are equal,' is clearly intended to symbolize the perfection of the Divine character, the harmony and equipoise of the Divine attributes.

Above all, however, the Tabernacle in its relation to the camp embodies and symbolizes the almost unapproachable holiness of God. This fundamental conception has been repeatedly emphasized in the foregoing sections, and need be re-stated in this connexion only for the sake of completeness. The symbolism of the Tabernacle is a subject in which pious imaginations in the past have run riot, but with regard to which one must endeavour to be faithful to the ideas in the mind of the Priestly author. The threefold division of the sanctuary, for example, into court, holy place, and holy of holies, may have originally symbolized the earth, heaven, and the heaven of heavens, but for the author of Ex 25 ff. it was an essential part of the Temple tradition (cf. TEMPLE, § 7). In this case, therefore, the division should rather be taken, as in § 7 above, as a reflexion of the three grades of the theocratic community, people, priests, and high priest.

9. Reluctantly, but unavoidably we must return, in conclusion, to the question mooted in § 2 as to the relation of the gorgeous sanctuary above described to the simple 'tent of meeting' of the older Pentateuch sources. In other words, is P's Tabernacle historical? In the first place, there is no reason to question, but on the contrary every reason to accept, the data of the Elohist source (E) regarding the Mosaic 'tent of meeting.' This earlier 'tabernacle' is first met with in Ex 33⁷⁻¹¹: 'Now Moses used to take the tent and to pitch it [the tent is frequentative] without the camp, afar off from the camp . . . and it came to pass that every one which sought the Lord went out unto the tent of meeting which was without the camp.' To it, we are further informed, Moses was wont to retire to commune with J', who descended in the pillar of the cloud to talk with Moses at the door of the tent 'as a man talketh with his friend' (see also the references in Nu 11¹⁶⁻²⁰ 12¹⁰, 14¹⁰). Only a mind strangely insensible to the laws of evidence, or still in the fetters of an antiquated doctrine of inspiration, could reconcile the picture of this simple tent, 'afar off from the camp,' with Joshua as its single non-Levitical attendant (33¹¹), with that of the Tabernacle of the Priests' Code, situated in the centre of the camp, with its attendant army of priests and Levites. Moreover, neither tent nor Tabernacle is rightly intelligible except as the resting-place of the ark, the symbol of J's presence with His people. Now, the oldest of our extant historical sources have much to tell us of the fortunes of the ark from the time that it formed the glory of the Temple at Shiloh until it entered its final resting-place in that of Solomon (see ARK). But nowhere is there the slightest reference to anything in the least resembling the Tabernacle of §§ 4-8. It is only in the Books of Chronicles, in certain of the Psalms, and in passages of the pre-exilic writings which have passed through the hands of late post-exilic editors that such references are found. An illuminating example occurs in 2 Ch 13¹⁶ compared with 1 K 3²².

Apart, therefore, from the numerous difficulties presented by the description of the Tabernacle and its furniture, such as the strangely inappropriate brazen altar (§ 4 (b)), or suggested by the unexpected wealth of material and artistic skill necessary for its construction, modern students of the Pentateuch find the picture of the desert sanctuary and its worship irreconcilable with the historical development of religion and the cultus in Israel. In Ex 25 and following chapters we are dealing not with historical fact, but with 'the product of religious idealism'; and surely these devout idealists of the Exile should command our admiration as they deserve our gratitude. If the Tabernacle is an ideal, it is truly an ideal worthy of Him for whose worship it seeks to provide (see the exposition of the general idea of the Tabernacle in § 3, and now in full detail by McNeill as cited, § 5 above). Nor must it be forgotten, that in reproducing in portable form, as they unquestionably do, the several parts and appointments of the Temple of Solomon, including even its brazen altar, the author or authors of the Tabernacle believed, in all good faith, that they were reproducing the essential features of the Mosaic sanctuary, of which the Temple was supposed to be the replica and the legitimate successor. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.—1. OT references.—In Ex 23¹⁶ 34²² it is called the Feast of Ingathering, and its date is placed at the end of the year.

In Dt 16¹³⁻¹⁵ its name is given as the Feast of Tabernacles or Booths (possibly referring to the use of booths in the vineyard during the vintage). It is to last 7 days, to be observed at the central sanctuary, and to be an occasion of rejoicing. In the 'year of release,' i.e. the sabbatical year, the Law is to be publicly read (Dt 31¹⁰⁻¹²). The dedication of Solomon's Temple took place at this feast; in the account given in 1 K 8⁶⁶ the seven-day rule of Deut. is represented as being observed; but the parallel narrative of 2 Ch 7⁹⁻¹⁰ assumes that the rule of Lev. was followed.

In Lv 23³⁴ and Nu 29¹²⁻³⁹ we find elaborate ordinances. The feast is to begin on 15th Tishri (October), and to last 8 days, the first and the last being days of holy convocation. The people are to live in booths improvised for the occasion. A very large number of offerings is ordained; on each of the first 7 days 2 rams and 14 lambs, and a goat as a sin-offering; and successively on these days a diminishing number of bullocks: 13 on the 1st day, 12 on the 2nd, and so on till the 7th, when 7 were to be offered. On the 8th day the special offerings were 1 bullock, 1 ram, 7 lambs, and a goat as a sin-offering.

We hear in Ezr 3⁴ of the observance of this feast, but are not told the method. The celebration in Neh 8¹⁶ followed the regulations of Lev., but we are expressly informed that such had not been the case since Joshua's days. Still, the feast was kept in some way, for Jeroboam instituted its equivalent for the Northern Kingdom in the 8th month (1 K 12²⁸⁻³¹).

2. Character of the feast.—It was the Jewish harvest-home, when all the year's produce of corn, wine, and oil had been gathered in; though no special offering of the earth's fruits was made, as was done at the Feasts of Unleavened Bread and Pentecost. (The reason was perhaps a desire to avoid the unseemly scenes of the Canaanite vintage-festival, by omitting such a significant point of resemblance; cf. Jg 9⁷.) It was also regarded as commemorating the Israelites' wanderings in the wilderness. It was an occasion for great joy and the giving of presents; it was perhaps the most popular of the national festivals, and consequently the most generally attended. Thus Zec 14¹⁶ names as the future sign of Judah's triumph the fact that all the world shall come up yearly to Jerusalem to keep this festival.

3. Later customs.—In later times novel customs were attached to the observance. Such were the daily procession round the altar, with its sevenfold repetition on the 7th day; the singing of special Psalms; the procession on each of the first 7 days to Siloam to fetch water, which was mixed with wine in a golden pitcher, and poured at the foot of the altar while trumpets were blown (cf. Jn 7³⁷); and the illumination of the women's court in the Temple by the lighting of the 4 golden candelabra (cf. Jn 8¹²). The 8th day, though appearing originally as a supplementary addition to the feast, came to be regarded as an integral part of it, and is so treated in 2 Mac 10⁶, as also by Josephus. A. W. F. BLUNT.

TABITHA.—See DORCAS.

TABLE.—See HOUSE, § 8; MEALS, §§ 3. 4. For 'Table of Shewbread' see SHEWBREAD, TABERNACLE, § 6 (a), TEMPLE, §§ 5. 9. 12.

TABLE, TABLET.—1. Writing tablet is indicated by the Heb. lûach, which is also applied to wooden boards or planks (Ex 27³ 38⁷ in the altar of the Tabernacle, Ezk 27⁹ in a ship, Ca 8⁹ in a door) and to metal plates (in the bases of the lavers in Solomon's Temple, 1 K 7²⁶). It is, however, most frequently applied to tables of stone on which the Decalogue was engraven (Ex 24¹ 31¹⁸ etc.). It is used of a tablet on which a prophecy may be written (Is 30⁴, Hab 2²), and in Pr 3³ 7³ and Jer 17¹ figuratively of the 'tables of the heart.' In all these passages, when used of stone, both AV and RV translate 'table' except in Is 30⁴ where RV has 'tablet.' lûach generally appears in LXX and NT as plax (2 Co 3⁷, He 9⁴). The 'writing table' (RV 'tablet') of Lk 1⁴ was probably of wax.

2. A female ornament is indicated by Heb. kûmâz, AV 'tablets,' RV 'armlets,' RVm 'necklaces,' Ex 35²², Nu 31⁵⁰—probably a pendant worn on the neck.

The word 'tablets' is also the tr. of botê hannepesh in AV Is 32⁹ (RV 'perfume boxes,' lit. 'houses of the soul'). It is doubtful if nepesh actually means 'odour,' but from meaning 'breath' it may have come to mean scent or smell. On the other hand the idea of life may suggest that some life-giving elixir, scent, or ointment was contained in the vessels; but the meaning is doubtful.

The 'tablet' (qillayôn) inscribed with a stylus to Mahershalal-hash-baz, Is 8¹ (AV 'roll'), signifies a polished surface. The word occurs again in Is 3² where it probably refers to 'tablets of polished metal' used as mirrors (AV 'glasses'). W. F. BORD.

TABOR.—1. A town in the tribe of Zebulun, given to Levites descended from Merari (1 Ch 6⁷⁷). Its site is unknown. Perhaps it is to be identified with Chisloth-tabor in the same tribe (Jos 19¹²). 2. A place near Ophrah (Jg 8¹⁶). 3. The Oak (AV 'plain') of Tabor was on the road from Ramah S. to Gibeah (1 S 10²). 4. See next article. H. L. WILLETT.

TABOR (MOUNT).—A mountain in the N.E. corner of the plain of Esdraelon, some 7 miles E. of Nazareth. Though only 1843 feet high, Tabor is, from its isolation and remarkable rounded shape, a most prominent object from great distances around; hence, though so very different in size from the great mountain mass of Hermon, it was yet associated with it (Ps 89¹²). It was a king among the mountains (Jer 48¹³). It is known to the Arabs as Jebel el-Tûr, lit. 'the mountain of the mount,' the same name as is applied to the Mount of Olives. From the summit of Tabor a magnificent outlook is obtained, especially to the W., over the great plain of Esdraelon to the mountains of Samaria and Carmel. It was on the borders of Zebulun and Issachar (Jos 19¹² 22); it was certainly an early sanctuary, and probably the reference in Dt 33¹⁴ 19 is to this mountain. Here the forces under Deborah and Barak rallied to fight Sisera (Jg 4⁶ 12). Whether the reference in Jg 8¹⁸ is to this mountain is doubtful. In later history Tabor appears chiefly as a fortress. In the 3rd cent. B.C., Antiochus the Great captured the city Atabyrium which was upon Tabor, and afterwards fortified it. Between B.C. 105 and 78 the place was again in Jewish hands, but in B.C. 53 Gabinius here defeated Alexander, son of Aristobulus II., who was in revolt. A hundred and ten years later Josephus fortified the hill against Vespasian, but after the Jewish soldiers had been defeated by the general Placidus, the place surrendered. During the Crusades it was for long in the hands of the Christians, but fell to the Moslems after the battle of Hattin, and was fortified in 1212 by the successor of Saladin—a step which led to the inglorious and ineffectual 5th Crusade.

The tradition that Tabor was the scene of the Transfiguration goes back to the 3rd cent., but has little evidence in its favour. Although not directly recorded, the condition of the hill before and after would lead one to suppose that it was an inhabited site at the time of Christ, while the requirements of the Biblical narrative (Mk 8²⁷ 9²⁻¹⁰, Lk 9²³⁻²⁶) suggest a site near Caesarea Philippi, such, for example, as an isolated spur of Hermon.

Mount Tabor to-day is one of the best-wooded spots in W. Palestine, groves of oaks and terebinths not only covering the hillsides, but extending also over a considerable area of hill and valley to the N.; game abounds in the coverts. The Franciscans and the Greek Church have each erected a monastery-hospice on the summit, and extensive excavations have been made, particularly by members of the former order. The foundations of a great wall of circumvallation—probably that of Josephus (BJ iv. i. 8)—have been followed, many ancient tombs have been cleared, and the remains of several churches of the 4th and of the 12th centuries have been unearthed. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

TABRET (see art. TABER) is AV tr. of tōph in Gn 31²⁷, 1 S 10¹⁸, Is 51² 24³ 30², Jer 31⁴, Ezk 28¹³. The same Heb. word is tr. 'timbrel' in Ex 15²⁰, Jg 11³¹, 2 S 6⁵, 1 Ch 13⁸, Job 21¹², Ps 81² 149³ 150⁴. It might have been well to drop both 'timbrel' and 'tabret,' neither of which conveys any clear sense to a modern ear, and adopt some such rendering as 'tambourine' or 'hand-drum'. The AV rendering of Job 17⁸ 'aforetime I was as a tabret,' has arisen from a confusion of tōpheth 'splitting' with tōph 'tambourine.' The words mean 'I am become one to be spit on in the face' (RV 'an open abhorring').

TABRIMMON.—The father of Benhadad (1 K 15¹⁸).

TACHES.—An old word of French origin used by AV to render the Heb. qērāṣīm, which occurs only in P's description of the Tabernacle (Ex 26¹¹, 33 35¹¹ etc.). The Gr. rendering denotes the rings set in eyelets at the edge of a sail for the ropes to pass through. The Heb. word evidently signifies some form of hook or clasp (so RV) like the Roman fibula.

TACKLING in Is 33²² means simply a ship's ropes; in Ac 27¹⁸ it is used more generally of the whole gearing (RVm 'furniture').

TADMOR (Palmyra).—In 2 Ch 8⁴ we read that Solomon built 'Tadmor in the [Syrian] desert.' It has long been recognized that Tadmor is here a mistake for 'Tamar in the [Judæan] desert' of the corresponding passage in 1 Kings (9¹⁸). The Chronicler, or one of his predecessors, no doubt thought it necessary to amend in this fashion a name that was scarcely known to him. (That it is really the city of Tadmor so famous in after times that is meant, is confirmed by the equally unhistorical details given in 2 Ch 8⁴ regarding the Syrian cities of Hamath and Zobah.) Hence arose the necessity for the Jewish schools to change the Tamar of 1 K 9¹⁸ in turn into Tadmor [the Q-rē in that passage], so as to agree with the text of the Chronicler. The LXX translator of 1 K 9¹⁸ appears to have already had this correction before him. Nevertheless it is quite certain that Tamar is the original reading. But the correction supplies a very important evidence that at the time when Chronicles was composed (c. B.C. 200), Tadmor was already a place of note, around the founding of which a fabulous splendour had gathered, so that it appeared fitting to attribute it to Solomon. This fiction maintained itself, and received further embellishments. The pre-Islamic poet Nāḥigha (v. 22 ff., ed. Ahlwardt, c. A.D. 600) relates that, by Divine command, the demons built Solomon's Tadmor by forced labour. This piece of information he may have picked up locally; what he had in view would be, of course, the remains, which must have been still very majestic, of the city whose climax of splendour was reached in the 2nd and 3rd cent. A.D.

Tadmor, of whose origin and earlier history we know nothing, lay upon a great natural road through the desert, not far from the Euphrates, and not very far from Damascus. It was thus between Syria, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia proper. Since water, although not in great abundance, was also found on the spot, Tadmor supplied a peaceable and intelligent population with all the conditions necessary for a metropolis of the caravan trade. Such we find in the case of Palmyra, whose identity with Tadmor was all along maintained, and has recently been assured by numerous inscriptions. The first really historical mention of the place (B.C. 37 or 36) tells how the wealth of this centre of trade incited M. Antony to a pillaging campaign (Appian, Bell. Civ. v. 9).

The endings of the two names Tadmor and Palmyra are the same, but not the first syllable. It is not clear why the Westerns made such an alteration in the form. The name Palmyra can hardly have anything to do with palm. It would, indeed, be something very remarkable if in this Eastern district the Lat. palm was used at so early a date in the formation of names. The Oriental form Tadmor is to be kept quite apart from tāmār, 'palm.' Finally, it is unlikely that the palm was ever extensively cultivated on the spot.

Neither in the OT nor in the NT is there any other mention of Tadmor (Palmyra), and Josephus names it only when he reproduces the above passage of Chronicles (Ant. vii. vi. 1). The place exercised, indeed, no considerable influence on the history either of ancient Israel or of early Christianity. There is therefore no occasion to go further into the history, once so glorious and finally so tragic, of the great city, or to deal with the fortunes of the later somewhat inconsiderable place, which now, in spite of its imposing ruins, is desolate in the extreme, but which still bears the ancient name Tadmor (Tadmur, Tudmur). TH. NÜLDEKE.

TAHAN.—An Ephraimite clan (Nu 26³⁵ (39), 1 Ch 7²⁴); gentile name Tahanites in Nu 26³⁵ (39).

TAHASH.—A son of Nahor (Gn 22²⁴).

TAHATH.—1. A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch 6²⁴). 2. Two (unless the name has been accidentally repeated) Ephraimite families (1 Ch 7²⁰). 4. An unidentified 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 33²⁴).

TACHEMONITE (AV Tachmonite).—See HACHMONI.

TAPHANES (Jer 2⁶ 43⁷, 44¹ 46¹⁴, Ezk 30¹⁸ [Tephaphnes], in Jth 1⁹ AV Taphnes).—An Egyptian city, the same as the Greek Daphnæ, now Tell Defne. The Egyptian name is unknown. It lay on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, which is now silted up, and the whole region converted into a waste. Petrie's excavations showed that Daphnæ was founded by Psammetichus I. on the 26th Dyn. (B.C. 664–610). According to Herodotus, it was the frontier fortress of Egypt on the Asiatic side, and was garrisoned by Greeks. In its ruins was found an abundance of Greek pottery, iron armour, and arrowheads of bronze and iron, while numerous small weights bore testimony to the trade that passed through it. The garrison was kept up by the Persians in the 5th cent., and the town existed to a much later period. After the murder of Gedaliah (a.c. 586), Johanan took the remnant of the Jews from Jerusalem, including Jeremiah, to Tahpanhes.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

TAHPENES (1 K 11¹⁹).—The name of Pharaoh's wife, whose sister was given to Hadaad the Edomite. It has the appearance of an Egyptian name, but has not yet been explained. The name of her son Genubath is not Egyptian. The Pharaoh should be of the weak 21st Dynasty.

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

TAHREA.—A grandson of Mephibosheth (1 Ch 9⁴¹); in 8³⁶ (prob. by a copyist's error) Tarea.

TAHTIM HODSHI, THE LAND OF.—A place east of Jordan, which Joab and his officers visited when making the census for David (2 S 24⁶). It is mentioned between Gilead and Dan-jaan. The MT, however, is certainly corrupt. In all probability we should read ha-Hittim-Kadeshah—'to the land of the Hittites, towards Kadesh [sc. Kadesh on the Orontes].'

TALE.—'Tale' in AV generally means 'number or sum,' as Ex 51⁸. 'Yet shall ye deliver the tale of bricks.' And the verb 'to tell' sometimes means 'to number,' as Gn 15⁵. 'Tell the stars, if thou be able to number them,' where the same Heb. verb is translated 'tell' and 'number.'

TALEBEARING.—See SLANDER.

TALENT.—See MONEY, WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

TALITHA CUMI.—The command addressed by our Lord to the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5⁴¹), and interpreted by the Evangelist, 'Maiden, I say unto thee, arise.' The relating of the actual (Aramaic) words used by Jesus is characteristic of St. Mark's graphic narrative; cf. 7¹¹, 14³⁶ 15²⁴.

TALMAI.—1. A clan resident in Hebron at the time of the Hebrew conquest and driven thence by Caleb (Nu 13²², Jos 15¹⁴, Jg 1¹⁰). 2. Son of Ammihur (or Ammihud), king of Geshur, and a contemporary of David, to whom he gave his daughter Maacah in marriage (2 S 3³ 13⁷, 1 Ch 3²).

TALMON.—The name of a family of Temple gatekeepers (1 Ch 9¹⁷, Ezr 2⁴², Neh 7⁴ 11¹⁹ 12²⁶); called in 1 Es 5²⁸ Tolman. See, also, TELEM.

TALMUD ('learning').—1. Origin and character.—The Jews have always drawn a distinction between the 'Oral Law,' which was handed down for centuries by word of mouth, and the 'Written Law,' i.e. the Pentateuch or Five Books of Moses. Both, according to Rabbinical teaching, trace their origin to Moses himself. It has been a fundamental principle of all times that by the side of the 'Written Law,' regarded as a summary of the principles and general laws of the Hebrew people, there was this 'Oral Law' to complete and explain the 'Written Law.' It was an article of faith that in the Pentateuch there was no precept and no regulation, ceremonial, doctrinal, or legal, of which God had not given to Moses all explanations necessary for their application, together with the order to transmit them by word of mouth. The classical passage on this subject runs: 'Moses received the (oral) law from Sinai, and delivered it to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets to the men of the Great Synagogue' (Pirke Avoth, l. 1). This has long been known to be nothing more than a myth; the 'Oral Law,' although it no doubt contains elements which are of great antiquity—e.g. details of folklore—really dates from the time that the 'Written Law' was read and expounded in the synagogues. Thus we are told that Ezra introduced the custom of having the Torah ('Law') read in the synagogues at the morning service on Mondays and Thursdays (i.e. the days corresponding to these); for on these days the country people flocked to the towns from the neighbouring districts, as they were the market days. The people had thus an opportunity, which would otherwise have been lacking to them, of hearing the Law read and explained. These explanations of the Law, together with the results of the discussions of them on the part of the sopherim ('scribes'), formed the actual 'Oral Law.' The first explanatory term applied by the Jews to the 'Oral Law' was midrash ('investigation'), and the Bible itself witnesses to the way in which such investigations were made and expounded to the people: 'Also Joshua and Bani . . . and the Levites, caused the people to understand the law; and the people stood in their place. And they read in the book, in the law of God, with an interpretation; and they gave the sense, so that they understood the reading' (Neh 8⁷⁻⁹). But it is clear that the 'investigations' must have led to different explanations; so that in order to fix authoritatively what in later days were considered the correct explanations, and thus to ensure continuity of teaching, it became necessary to reduce these to writing; there arose thus (soon after the time of Shammai and Hillel) the 'Former Mishna' (Mishna Rishonah), Mishna meaning 'Second' Law. This earliest Mishna, which, it is probable, owed its origin to pupils of Shammai and Hillel, was therefore compiled for the purpose of affording teachers both a norm for their decisions and a kind of book of reference for the explanation of difficult passages. But the immense amount of floating material could not be incorporated into one work, and when great teachers arose they sometimes found it necessary to compile their own Mishna; they excluded much which the official Mishna contained, and added other matter which they considered important. This was done by Rabbi Aqiba, Rabbi Meir, and others. But it was not long before the confusion created by this state of affairs again necessitated some authoritative, officially recognized action. It was then that Jehudah ha-Nasi undertook his great redaction of the Mishna, which has survived substantially to the present day. Jehudah ha-Nasi was born about A.D. 135 and died about A.D. 220; he was the first of Hillel's successors to whose name was added the title ha-Nasi ('the Prince'); this is the way in which he is usually referred to in Rabbinical writings; he is also spoken of as 'Rabbi,' i.e. master par excellence, and occasionally as ha-Qadosh, 'the Holy,' on account of his singularly pure and moral life. Owing to his authority and dignity, the Mishna of Jehudah ha-Nasi soon superseded all other collections, and became the only one used in the schools; the object that Jehudah had had in view, that, namely, of restoring uniform teaching, was thus achieved. The Mishna as we now have it is not, however, quite as it was when it left Jehudah's hands; it has undergone modifications of various kinds: additions, emendations, and the like having been made even in Jehudah's lifetime, with his acquiescence, by some of his pupils. The language of the Mishna approximates to that of some of the latest books of the OT, and is known by the name of 'Neo-Hebraic'; this was the language spoken in Palestine during the second century A.D.; it has a considerable intermixture of foreign elements, especially Greek words Hebraized.

The Mishna is divided into six Sedarim (Aram. for 'Orders'), and each Seder contains a number of treatises; each treatise is divided into chapters, and these again into paragraphs. The names of the six 'Orders,' which to some extent indicate their contents, are: Zera'im ('Seeds'), containing eleven treatises; Mo'ed ('Festival'), containing twelve treatises; Nashim ('Women'), containing seven treatises; Nezikin ('Injuries'), containing ten treatises [this 'Order' is called also Yeshu'oth ('Deeds of help')]; Qodashim ('Holy things'), containing eleven treatises; and Toh'aroth ('Purifications'), containing twelve treatises.

Now the Mishna forms the basis of the Talmud; for just as the Mishna is a compilation of expositions, comments, etc., of the Written Law, and embodies in itself the Oral Law, so the Talmud is an expansion, by means of comment and explanation, of the Mishna; as the Mishna contains the Pentateuch, with all the additional explanatory matter, so the Talmud contains the Mishna with a great deal more additional matter. 'The Talmud is practically a mere amplification of the Mishna by manifold comments and additions; so that even those portions of the Mishna which have no Talmud are regarded as component parts of it. . . . The history of the origin of the Talmud is the same as that of the Mishna—a tradition, transmitted orally for centuries, was finally cast into definite literary form, although from the moment in which the Talmud became the chief subject of study in the academies it had a double existence (see below), and was accordingly, in its final stage, redacted in two different forms' (Bacher in JE xii. 3^b). Before coming to speak of the actual Talmud itself, it may be well to explain some terms without an understanding of which our whole subject would be very inadequately understood:—

Halakhah.—Under this term the entire legal body of Jewish oral tradition is included; it comes from a verb meaning 'to go,' and expresses the way 'of going' or 'acting,' i.e. custom, usage, which ultimately issues in law. Originally it was used in the plural form Halakhoth, which had reference to the multifarious civil and ritual laws, customs, decrees etc., as handed down by tradition, which were not, however, of Scriptural authority. It was these Halakhoth which were codified by Jehudah ha-Nasi, and to which the term Mishna became applied. Sometimes the word Halakhah is used for 'tradition,' which is binding, in contradistinction to Din, 'argument' (lit. 'judgment'), which is not necessarily binding.

Haggadah (from the root meaning 'to narrate').—This includes the whole of the non-legal matter of Rabbinical literature, such as homilies, stories about Biblical saints and heroes; besides this it touches upon such subjects as astronomy, astrology, medicine, magic, philosophy, and all that would come under the term 'folklore.' This word, too, was originally used in the plural Haggadoth. Haggadah is also used in a special sense of the ritual for Passover Eve.

Gemara.—This is an Aramaic word from the root meaning 'to learn,' and has the signification of 'that which has been learned,' i.e. learning that has been handed down by tradition (Bacher in JE, art. 'Talmud'); it has also the meaning 'completion'; in this sense it came to be used as a synonym of Talmud.

Baraita.—This is an apocryphal Halakhah. When Jehudah ha-Nasi compiled his Mishna, there was a great deal of the Oral Tradition which he excluded from it (see above); other teachers, however, the most important of whom was Rabbi Chijja, gathered these excluded portions into a special collection; these Halakhoth, which are known as Baraitoth, were incorporated into the Talmud; the discussions on them in the Talmud occupy many folios.

Tannaim ('Teachers').—This was the technical name applied to the teachers of the Mishna; after the close of the Mishna period those who explained it were no more called 'Teachers,' but only 'Commentators' (Amoraim); the dicta of the Tannaim could not be questioned excepting by a Tannaite, but an exception was made in the case of Jehudah ha-Nasi, who was permitted to question the truth of Tannaite pronouncements.

There are two Talmuds, the 'Jerusalem' or 'Talmud of Palestine' and the 'Babylonian,' known respectively by their abbreviated forms 'Yerushalmi' and 'Babli.' The material which went to make up the Yerushalmi had been preparing in the academies, the centres of Jewish learning, of Palestine, chief among which was Tiberias; it was from here that Rabbi Jochanan issued the Yerushalmi, in its earliest form, during the middle of the 3rd cent. A.D. The first editor, or at all events the first compiler, of the Babli was Rabbi Ashi (d. A.D. 430), who presided over the academy of Sura. Both these Talmuds were constantly being added to, and the Yerushalmi was not finally closed until the end of the 4th cent., the Babli not until the beginning of the 6th. The characteristics which differentiated the academies of Palestine from those of Babylonia have left their marks upon the two Talmuds: in Palestine the tendency was to preserve and stereotype tradition, without permitting it to develop itself along natural channels; the result was that the Yerushalmi became choked with traditionalism, circumscribed in its horizon, and in consequence was regarded with less veneration than the Babli, and has always occupied a position of subordinate importance in comparison with this latter. In the Babylonian academies, on the other hand, there was a wider outlook, a freer mental atmosphere, and, while tradition was venerated, it was not permitted to impede development in all directions; the Babli therefore absorbed the thought and learning of all Israel's teachers, and is richer in material, and of more importance generally, than the Yerushalmi. In order to give some idea of what the Talmud is, and of the enormous masses of material gathered together there, the following example may be cited, abbreviated from Bacher (op. cit. xii. 5). It will be remembered that the Talmud is a commentary on the Mishna. In the beginning of the latter occurs this paragraph: 'During what time in the evening is the reading of the Shema' begun? From the time when the priests go in to eat their leaven (Lv 22⁷) until the end of the first watch of the night, such being the words of R. Eliezer. The sages, however, say until midnight, though R. Gamaliel says until the coming of the dawn.' This is the text upon which the Yerushalmi then comments in three sections; the first section contains the following: a citation from a baraita with two sayings from R. Jose to elucidate it; remarks on the position of one who is in doubt whether he has read the Shema; another passage from a baraita, designating the appearance of the stars as an indication of the time in question; further explanations and passages on the appearance of the stars as bearing on the ritual; other Rabbinical sayings; a baraita on the division between day and night, and other passages bearing on the same subject; discussion of other baraitas, and further quotations from important Rabbis; a sentence of Tannaite origin in no way related to the preceding matters, namely, 'One who prays standing must hold his feet straight,' and the controversy on this subject between Rabbis Levi and Simon, the one adding, 'like the angels,' the other, 'like the priests'; comments on these two comparisons; further discussion concerning the beginning of the day; Haggadic statements concerning the dawn; a conversation between two Rabbis; cosmological comments; dimensions of the firmament, and more Haggadic comments in abundance; a discussion on the night-watches; Haggadic material concerning David and his harp. Then comes the second section, namely, a Rabbinical quotation; a baraita on the reading of the Shema in the synagogue; other Rabbinical and Haggadic matter; further Haggadic sayings; lastly, section 3 gives R. Gamaliel's view compared with that of another Rabbi, together with a question which remains unanswered.

This is, of course, the merest skeleton of an example of the mass of commentary which is devoted to the Mishna, section by section. Although the Haggadic element plays a much less important rôle than the Halakhic, still the former is well represented, and is often employed for purposes of edification and rebuke, as well as for instruction. The following outline of a Haggadic passage from the Yerushalmi will serve as an example; it is intended as a rebuke to 'Scandal-mongers,' and a text (Dt 1¹²) is taken as a starting-point, namely, 'How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance and your burden and your strife?' It then continues: 'How did our forefathers worry Moses with their cumbrances?

In that they were constantly slandering him, and imputing evil intentions to him in everything that he did. If he happened to come out of his house rather earlier than usual, it was said: "Why has he gone out so early to-day? There has no doubt been some quarrelling at home!" If, on the other hand, he went out a little later than usual, it was said: "What has been occupying him so long indoors? Assuredly he has been concocting plans to oppress the people yet more!" (Bernfeld, Der Talmud, p. 46). Or, to give one other example: in pointing out the evils which come from a father's favouring one son above the others, it is said: 'This should not be done, for because of the coat of many colours which the patriarch Jacob gave his favourite son Joseph (Gn 37¹⁵), all Israel went down into Egypt' (ib. p. 47).

Haggadoth flourish, as regards quality, more in the Yerushalmi than in the Babli; for in the Babylonian schools intellectual acumen reigned supreme: there was but little room for the play of the emotions or for the development of poetical imagination: these were rather the property of Palestinian soil. Therefore, although the Haggadic element is, so far as quantity is concerned, much fuller in the Babli than in the Yerushalmi, it is, generally speaking, of a far less attractive character in the former than in the latter. 'The fact that the Haggadah is much more prominent in Babli, of which it forms, according to Weiss, more than one-third, while it constitutes only one-sixth of Yerushalmi, was due, in a sense, to the course of the development of Hebrew literature. No independent mass of Haggadoth developed in Babylon, as was the case in Palestine; and the Haggadic writings were accordingly collected in the Talmud' (JE xii. 12). But the Haggadah, whether in the Yerushalmi or in the Babli, occupies in reality a subordinate place, for in its origin, as we have seen, the Talmud was a commentary on the Mishna, which was a collection of Halakoth; and although the Haggadic portions are of much greater human interest, it is the Halakic portions that form the bulk of the Talmud, and that constitute its importance as the fountain-head of Jewish belief and theology.

2. Authority of the Talmud.—Inasmuch as the Oral Law, which with its comments and explanations is what constitutes the Talmud, is regarded as of equal authority with the Written Law, it will be clear that the Talmud is regarded, at all events by orthodox Jews, as the highest and final authority on all matters of faith. It is true that in the Talmud itself the letter of Scripture is always clearly differentiated from the rest; but, in the first place, the comments and explanations declare what Scripture means, and without this official explanation the Scriptural passage would lose much of its practical value for the Jew; and, in the second place, it is firmly believed that the oral laws preserved in the Talmud were delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai. It is therefore no exaggeration to say that the Talmud is of equal authority with Scripture. The eighth principle of the Jewish creed runs: 'I firmly believe that the Law which we possess now is the same which has been given to Moses on Mount Sinai.' In commenting on this in what may not unjustly be described as the official handbook for the orthodox Jewish Religion, the writer says: 'Many explanations and details of the laws were supplemented by oral teaching; they were handed down by word of mouth from generation to generation, and only after the destruction of the second temple were they committed to writing. The latter are, nevertheless, called Oral Law, as distinguished from the Torah or Written Law, which from the first was committed to writing. Those oral laws which were revealed to Moses on Mount Sinai are called "Laws given to Moses on Mount Sinai"' (M. Friedländer, The Jewish Religion [revised and enlarged ed., 1900], p. 136). It is clear from this that the Written Law of the Bible, and the Oral Law as contained in the Talmud, are of equal authority. The Talmud is again referred to as 'the final authority in Judaism' by the writer of a later exposition of the Jewish faith (M. Joseph, Judaism as Creed and Life, 1903, p. vii.). One other authoritative teacher may be quoted: 'As a document of religion the Talmud acquired that authority which was due to it as the written embodiment of the ancient tradition, and it fulfilled the task which the men of the Great Assembly set for the representatives of the tradition when they said, "Make a hedge for the Torah"' (Aboth, i. 2). Those who professed Judaism felt no doubt that the Talmud was equal to the Bible as a source of instruction and decision in problems of religion, and every effort to set forth religious teachings and duties was based on it.' And speaking of the present day, the same writer says: 'For the majority of Jews it is still the supreme authority in religion' (Bacher in JE xii. 26).

3. The Talmud and Christianity.—Much that is written in the Talmud was originally spoken by men who were contemporaries of Christ; men who must have seen and heard Him. It is, moreover, well known what a conflict was waged in the infant Church regarding that question of the admittance of Gentiles, the result of which was an irreconcilable breach between Jew and Gentile, and an ever-increasing antagonism between Judaism and Christianity. These facts lead to the supposition that references to Christ and Christianity should be found in the Talmud. The question as to whether such references are to be found or not is one which cannot yet be said to have been decided one way or the other. The frequent mention of the Minim is held by many to refer to Christians; others maintain that by these are meant philosophizing Jews, who were regarded as heretics. This is not the place to discuss the question; we can only refer to two works, which approach it from different points of view, and which deal very adequately with it: Christianity in Talmud and Midrash, by R. T. Herford (London, 1903), and Die religiösen Bewegungen innerhalb des Judenthums im Zeitalter Jesu, by M. Friedländer (Berlin, 1905).

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

TAMAR.—1. A Canaanite woman, married to Er and then to his brother Onan (see MARRIAGE, 4). Tamar became by her father-in-law himself the mother of twin sons, Perez and Zerah (Gn 38, Ru 4¹, 1 Ch 2⁴, Mt 1³). 2. The beautiful sister of Absalom, who was violated and brutally insulted by her half-brother, Amnon (2 S 13¹⁵). 3. A daughter of Absalom (2 S 14²⁷). 4. See next article.

TAMAR.—In Ezk 47¹⁹ 48²⁸ the S.E. boundary-mark of the restored kingdom of Israel. No proposed identification has been successful, since no place of this name has been found in the region required, that is, near the S. end of the Dead Sea. It is possibly the same place that is mentioned in 1 K 9¹⁸ as one of the S. fortresses built up by Solomon. Here a variant Heb. reading has Tadmor (wh. sec.)—a manifest error, which is perhaps borrowed from the parallel passage: 2 Ch 8⁴.

J. F. McCURDY.

TAMARISK ('Eshel).—This name occurs in RV (only) three times; Gn 21¹⁸ AV 'grove', mg. 'tree'; 1 S 22⁴ AV 'tree', mg. 'grove'; 1 S 31¹⁵ AV 'tree'. The RV rendering is based upon an identification of the Heb. 'Eshel with the Arab. 'adhl. RVm gives 'tamarisk' for heath of EV in Jer 17⁶ (cf. 48⁶), but probably a species of juniper is intended here. There are some eight species of tamarisks in Palestine; they are most common in the Maritime Plain and the Jordan Valley. Though mostly but shrubs, some species attain to the size of large trees. They are characterized by their brittle feathery branches and minute scale-like leaves.

TAMMUZ (Ezk 8¹⁴) was a Babylonian god whose worship spread into Phœnicia. The name appears to be Sumerian, Dumuzi, Tamuzu, and may mean 'son of life.'

He was a form of the Sun-god and bridegroom of Ishtar. He was celebrated as a shepherd, cut off in early life or slain by the boar (winter). Ishtar descended to Hades to bring him back to life. He was mourned on the second of the month Tammuz (June). His Canaanite name Adonai gave rise to the Greek Adonis, and he was later identified with the Egyptian Osiris. In Am 8¹⁰ and Zec 12¹⁰ the mourning for 'the only son' may be a reference to this annual mourning, and the words of the refrain, 'Ah me, ah me!' (Jer 22²⁸) may be recalled.

TANHUMETH.—The father (?) of Seraiah, one of the Heb. captains who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 K 25²², Jer 40⁸).

TANIS (Jth 1¹⁰).—See ZOAN.

TANNER.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS, 5.

TAPHATH.—Daughter of Solomon and wife of Ben-abinadab (1 K 4¹).

TAPPUAH.—1. A 'son' of Hebron (1 Ch 2⁴⁹). Probably the name is that of a town in the Shephelah (Jos 15²⁴). It was probably to the N. of Wady es-Sunt, but the site has not been recovered. 2. See EN-TAPPUAH. 3. One of the towns W. of Jordan whose kings Joshua smote (Jos 12¹⁷). It was perhaps the same place as No. 2 above; but this is by no means certain. See also TIPSAH and TEPHON.

TARALAH.—An unknown town of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁷).

TAREA.—See TAHREA.

TARES (Gr. zizania, Arab. zuwān) are certain kinds of darnel growing plentifully in cornfields. The bearded darnel (Lolium temulentum) most resembles wheat. The seeds, though often poisonous to human beings on account of parasitic growths in them, are sold as chicken's food. When harvest approaches and the tares can be distinguished, they are carefully weeded out by hand by women and children (cf. Mt 13³⁰⁻⁴⁰).

TARGUMS.—Originally the word targum meant 'translation' in reference to any language; but it acquired a restricted meaning, and came to be used only of translation from Hebrew into Aramaic. As early as the time of Ezra we find the verb used in reference to a document written in Aramaic (Ezr 4⁷), though in this passage the addition 'in Aramaic' is made, showing that the restricted meaning had not yet come into vogue. As early as the time of the Second Temple the language of the Holy Scriptures, Hebrew, was not understood by the bulk of the Jewish people, for it had been supplanted by Aramaic. When, therefore, the Scriptures were read in synagogues, it became necessary to translate them, in order that they might be understood by the congregation. The official translator who performed this duty was called the meturgeman or targoman, which is equivalent to the modern dragoman ('interpreter'). The way in which it was done was as follows:—In the case of the Pentateuch (the 'Law') a verse was read in Hebrew, and then translated into Aramaic, and so on to the end of the appointed portion; but in the case of the prophetic writings three verses were read and then translated. Whether this system was the custom originally may be doubted; it was probably done in a less formal way at first. By degrees the translation became stereotyped, and was ultimately reduced to writing; and thus the Targums, the Aramaic translations of the Hebrew Bible, came into existence. The various Targums which are still extant will be enumerated below. As literary products they are of late date, but they occupy a highly important place in post-Biblical Jewish religious literature, because they embody the traditional exegesis of the Scriptures. They have for many centuries ceased to be used in the synagogue; from the 9th cent. onwards their use has been discontinued. It is, however, interesting to note an exception in the case of Southern Arabia, where the custom still survives; and in Bokhara the Persian Jews read the Targum, with the Persian paraphrase of it, to the lesson from the Prophets for the last day of the Passover Feast, namely, 15¹⁰⁻¹². There are Targums to all the books of the Bible, with the exception of Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah; as these are to a large extent written in Aramaic, one can understand why Targums to these books should be wanting. Most of the Targums are mainly paraphrases; the only one which is in the form of a translation in the modern sense of the word is the Targum of Onkelos to the Pentateuch; this is, on the whole, a fairly literal translation. Isolated passages in the Bible which are written in Aramaic, as in Genesis and Jeremiah, are also called Targums. The following is a list of the Targums which are in existence:

1. Targum of Onkelos to the Pentateuch, called also Targum Babli, i.e. the Babylonian Targum.
2. The Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch, called also Targum Jerushalmi, i.e. the Jerusalem Targum.
3. The 'Fragment Targum' to the Pentateuch.
4. The Targum of Jonathan to the prophetic books (these include what we call the historical books).
5. The Targum Jerushalmi to the prophetic books.
6. The Targum to the Psalms.
7. The Targum to Job.
8. The Targum to Proverbs.
- 9-13. The Targums to the Five Megilloth ('Rolls'), namely: Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther; the Book of Esther has three Targums to it.
14. The Targum to Chronicles.

For printed editions of these, reference may be made to the bibliographies given in Schürer, HJP i. i. pp. 160-163, and in the JE xii. 63.

To come now to a brief description of these Targums: The Targum of Onkelos is the oldest of all the Targums that have come down to us; it is for the most part a literal translation of the Pentateuch, only here and there assuming the form of a paraphrase. The name of this Targum owes its origin to a passage in the Babylonian Talmud (Megillah, 3a), in which it is said: 'The Targum to the Pentateuch was composed by the proselyte Onkelos at the dictation of Rabbi Eliezer and Rabbi Joshua'; and in the Jerusalem Talmud (Megillah, 71c) it is said: 'Aquila the proselyte translated the Pentateuch in the presence of Rabbi Eliezer and Rabbi Joshua. That Aquila is the same as Onkelos can scarcely admit of doubt. In the tractate Abodah zara, 11a, we are told that this Onkelos was the pupil of Rabbi Gamaliel the Elder, who lived in the second half of the 1st cent. A.D. Seeing that this Targum rests on tradition, it will be clear that we have in it an ancient witness to Jewish exegesis; indeed, it is the earliest example of Midrashic tradition that we possess; and not only so, but as this Targum is mainly a translation, it is a most important authority for the pre-Massoretic text of the Pentateuch. This shows of what high value the Targum of Onkelos is, and that it is not without reason that it has always been regarded with great veneration. It is characteristic of the Targum of Onkelos that, unlike the other Targums, the Midrashic element is greatly subordinated to simple translation; when it does appear it is mainly in poetic passages, though not exclusively (cf. Gn 49, Nu 24, Dt 32. 33, which are prophetic in character. The idea apparently was that greater licence was permitted in dealing with passages of this kind than with those in which the legal element predominated. As with the Targums generally, so with that of Onkelos, there is a marked tendency to avoid anthropomorphisms and expressions which might appear derogatory to the dignity of God; this may be seen, for example, in Gn 11⁴, where the words 'The Lord came down,' which seemed anthropomorphic, are rendered in this Targum, 'the Lord revealed Himself.' Then again, the transcendent character of the Almighty is emphasized by substituting for the Divine Person intermediate agencies like the Memra, or 'Word' of God, the Shekinah, or 'Glory' of God, to which a more or less distinct personality is imputed; in this way it was sought to avoid ascribing to God Himself actions or words which were deemed unfitting to the inexpressible majesty and transcendence of the Almighty. A good example of this, and one which will also illustrate the general character of this Targum, is the following; it is the rendering of Gn 3rd. 'And they heard the voice of the Word (Memra) of the Lord God walking in the garden in the evening of the day; and Adam and his wife hid themselves from before the Lord God among the trees of the garden. And the Lord God called to Adam and said: "Where art thou?" And he said: "The voice of Thy Word (Memra) I heard in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I would hide."'

The other Targum to the Pentateuch, the Targum Jerushalmi, has come down to us in two forms: one in a complete form, the other only in fragments, hence the name of the latter which is generally used, the 'Fragment Targum.' The fragments have been gathered from a variety of sources, from manuscripts and from quotations found in the writings of ancient authors. But owing to its fragmentary character this Targum is of much less value than the 'Targum Jerushalmi.' This latter is sometimes erroneously called the 'Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel on the Pentateuch'; but though this Jonathan was believed to be the author of the Targum to the Prophets which bears his name (see below), there was not the slightest ground for ascribing to him the authorship of the Targum to the Pentateuch ('Targum Jerushalmi'). The mistake arose in an interesting way. In its abbreviated form this Targum was referred to as 'Targum J'; this 'J,' which of course stood for 'Jerushalmi,' was taken to refer to 'Jonathan,' the generally acknowledged author of the Targum to the Prophets; thus it came about that this Targum to the Pentateuch, as well as the Targum to the Prophets, was called the Targum of Jonathan. So tenaciously has the wrong name clung to this Targum, that a kind of compromise is made as to its title, and it is now usually known as the 'Targum of pseudo-Jonathan.' In one important respect this Targum is quite similar to that of Onkelos, namely, in its avoidance of anthropomorphisms, and in its desire not to bring God into too close contact with man; for example, in Ex 34th we have these words: 'And the Lord descended in a cloud, and stood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the Lord.' But this Targum paraphrases the verse in a roundabout way, and says that 'Jehovah revealed Himself in the clouds of the glory of His Shekinah,' thus avoiding what in the original text appeared to detract from the dignity of the Almighty. This kind of thing occurs with great frequency, and it is both interesting and important, as showing the evolution of the idea of God among the Jews (see Oesterley and Box, The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue, ch. viii. [1907]). But in other respects the 'Targum Jerushalmi' (or 'Targum of pseudo-Jonathan') differs from that of Onkelos, especially in its being far less a translation than a free paraphrase. The following extract will give a good idea of the character of this Targum; it is the paraphrase of Gn 18th: 'And the glory of the Lord was revealed to him in the valley of Mamre; and he, being ill from the pain of circumcision, sat at the door of the tabernacle in the heat of the day. And he lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, three angels in the resemblance of men were standing before him; angels who had been sent from the necessity of three things—because it is not possible for a ministering angel to be sent for more than one purpose at a time—one, then, had come to make known to him that Sarah should bear a man-child; one had come to deliver Lot; and one to overthrow Sodom and Gomorrah. And when he saw them, he ran to meet them from the door of the tent, and bowed himself to the earth.'

The Targum of Jonathan to the Prophets owes its name to an ancient tradition, according to which Jonathan ben Uzziel composed it 'from the mouths of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi' (Megillah, 3a); this is merely a figurative way of saying that the traditional interpretation, as supposed to have been handed down by these prophets, was embodied in written form by Jonathan. The latter was a pupil of Hillel, and wrote a Targum (according to the passage just referred to) for the purpose of removing 'all impediments to the understanding of the Scriptures' (JE viii. 238). It is said of this Jonathan that when he sat down and occupied himself with the study of the Law, every bird that happened to fly over his head was burned; the reason of this was that so many angels gathered around him in order to hear the words of the Law from his mouth (Succah, 28a [Weber, Jud. Theol., p. xviii.]). That Jonathan had the Targum of Onkelos before him when he wrote is proved by the fact that whole passages from Onkelos are incorporated verbatim in his Targum. As a pupil of Hillel, Jonathan lived during the middle and end of the 1st cent. A.D., so that the date of his Targum may safely be stated to be the end of the first century. An interesting example of this Targum is the following paraphrase of Is 52nd 15: 'Behold, my servant the Messiah shall prosper, he shall be exalted and extolled, and he shall be very strong. Like as the house of Israel anxiously hoped for him many days, (the house of Israel) which was poor among the nations, their appearance and their brightness being worse than that of the sons of men, thus shall he scatter many nations; before him kings shall keep silence; they shall put their hands upon their mouths, for that which had not been told them shall they see, and that which they had not heard they shall consider.' In the whole of the following chapter 53 'it is curious to notice that the passages which refer to the humiliation of the Servant are interpreted of the people of Israel, while those which speak of the glory of the Servant are referred to the Messiah' (Oesterley and Box, op. cit. p. 49).

Of much later date, and also of less importance than the Targums of Onkelos, pseudo-Jonathan, or Jonathan, is the Targum Jerushalmi to the Prophets. According to JE xii. 61, 'Most of the quotations given in the Targum Jerushalmi are Haggadic additions, frequently traceable to the Babylonian Talmud, so that this Palestinian Targum to the Prophets belongs to a later period, when the Babylonian Talmud had begun to exert an influence upon Palestinian literature.' There are not many remains extant of this Targum; most of the extracts in existence are citations in the writings of Rashi and David Kimchi; the largest number of extracts found together are those in the eleventh century Codex Ruchlinianus, edited by Lagarde, Propheta Chaldaice.

Of the remaining Targums not much need be said; those to the Psalms, Proverbs, and Job show a close relationship and are usually assigned to the same author; they belong to the latter half of the seventh century. They are to a large extent translations, though a considerable Haggadic element is to be found in them, especially in the Targum to Job. The Targums to the five Megillot are likewise post-Talmudic; in all five translation plays a subordinate part, the prevailing element being Midrashic; this reaches its height in the Song of Songs. Of the three Targums to Esther, the second, known as Targum Sheni, has always been extremely popular. The latest of all the Targums is that to Chronicles; it is strongly Haggadic, and is of but little importance.

'The Targums are important not only for the light they throw on Jewish theology, but also, especially, as a thesaurus of ancient Jewish exegesis; in this way they often throw much interesting light on the use of the OT by the NT writers; in particular, it can be shown that the NT often agrees with the ancient Syna gogue in interpreting certain passages Messianically which later were expounded differently in orthodox Jewish circles' (Oesterley and Box, op. cit. p. 50).

TARPELITES.—One of the peoples settled in the cities of Samaria (Ezr 4⁹); text doubtful.

TARSEISH.—1. See following article. 2. A Benjamite family (1 Ch 7¹⁰). 3. One of the seven princes who had the right of access to the royal presence (Est 1¹⁶). 4. The name of a precious stone (Ex 28²⁰ 39¹³, Ezk 1⁶ 10⁶ 28¹³, Ca 5¹⁴, Dn 10⁶). See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

TARSEISH is frequently mentioned in the OT, but its position is never definitely indicated. From Jon 1² 4¹ we may infer that it was far from Palestine, probably in the extreme west of the Mediterranean. If Sheba and Dedan stand for the commerce of the East, Tarshish may stand for that of the West (Ezk 38¹³). The Greeks were in touch with Tartessus in the 7th and 6th cents. B.C. (Herod. i. 163, iv. 152). The inclusion of Tarshish among the 'sons' of Javan (Gn 10⁴, 1 Ch 1⁷) may refer to this. The Onomasticon speaks of Tharseis hē Baitikē. Bochart (Phalag, iii. 7) identifies this with the Andalusian plain in S.W. Spain, watered by the Baetis (mod. Guadalquivir). The Greek name Tartēssos may possibly come through an Aram. form Tartsh, from the Phoen. Tarshish. It may have denoted a city (Strabo, iii. 147 ff.). The name Tarsion occurs in a commercial treaty (Polyb. iii. 24) referring to a city of the Carthaginians in Spain.

Max Müller (Hastings' DB, s.v.) favours a suggestion of Cheyne, that Tarshish may be identical with Tiras (Gn 10⁹). Vocalizing Turshush with Josephus (Ant. i. vi. 1; he identifies with Cilician Tarsus, which to the present writer appears impossible), we get the Tyrsenians, Tyrrenians, or Etruscans—intrepid, piratical people, called Tursha by the ancient Egyptians.

In either case Tarshish would be fitly named with 'the isles,' a term covering not only islands in our sense, but also land bordering on the sea (Ps 72¹⁰, Is 60⁶ 66¹⁹). The wealth of Tarshish consisted of silver, iron, tin, and lead (Jer 10⁹, Ezk 27¹³).

'Ships of Tarshish' did not necessarily belong to or trade with Tarshish. The name is used of the ships of Jehoshaphat and Ahaziah, which sailed for Ophir from Ezion-geber (1 K 22⁴, 2 Ch 20²⁶). The Chronicler's explanatory phrase (v. 27) is erroneous. The cargo brought by Solomon's 'navy of Tarshish' shows that its voyages must have been eastward, not westward (1 K 10², 2 Ch 9²¹). The name probably denoted specially large merchant vessels, designed for distant voyages (Ps 48⁷, Is 2¹⁶ 23¹, Ezk 27²⁶). W. EWING.

TARSUS, the capital of the Roman province of Cilicia (Ac 22³) in the S.E. of Asia Minor, and the birthplace of St. Paul, is a place about which more might be known than is known if only the necessary money were forthcoming to excavate the ancient city in the way that Pompeii, Olympia, Pergamum, and other cities have been excavated. It would be impossible to exaggerate the value which would accrue to the study of St. Paul's life and writings and of Christian origins, if such a work were satisfactorily carried out. It may be commended to the whole Christian Church as a pressing duty of the utmost importance. Tarsus, as a city whose institutions combined Oriental and Western characteristics, was signally fitted to be the birthplace and training ground of him who was to make known to the Gentile world the ripest development of Hebrew religion.

Tarsus (modern Tersous) is situated in the plain of Cilicia, about 70 to 80 feet above sea level, and about 10 miles from the S. coast. The level plain stretches to the north of it for about 2 miles, and then begins to rise gradually till it merges in the lofty Taurus range, about 30 miles north. The climate of the low-lying city must always have been oppressive and unfavourable to energetic action, but the undulating country to the north was utilized to counteract its effects. About 9 to 12 miles north of the city proper there was a second Tarsus, within the territory of the main Tarsus, in theory a summer residence merely, but in reality a fortified town of importance, permanently inhabited. It was to periodical residence in this second city among the hills that the population owed their vigour. In Roman times the combined cities of Tarsus contained a large population, probably not much less than a million.

The history of the Maritime Plain of Cilicia was determined by the mutual rivalries of the three cities, Mallus on the Pyramus, Adana on the Sarus, and Tarsus on the Cydnus. The plain is mainly a deposit of the second of those rivers, and contains about 800 square miles of arable land, with a strip of useless land along the coast varying from 2 to 3 miles in breadth. The site of Mallus is now unknown, as it has ceased to have any importance; but the other two cities retain their names and some of their importance to the present day. In ancient times Mallus was a serious rival of Tarsus, and was at first the great harbour and the principal Greek colony in Cilicia. The struggle for superiority lasted till after the time of Christ, but the supremacy was eventually resigned to Tarsus. The river Cydnus flowed through the middle of the city. This river, of which the inhabitants were very proud, was liable to rise very considerably when there had been heavy rains in the mountains, but inundation in the city was in the best period very carefully guarded against. Between A.D. 527 and 563 a new channel was cut to relieve the principal bed, which had for some time previously been insufficiently dredged, and it is in this new channel that the Cydnus now flows, the original channel having become completely choked. About five or six miles below the modern town the Cydnus flowed into a lake; this lake was the ancient harbour of Tarsus, where were the docks and arsenal. At the harbour town, which was called Aulai, all the larger ships discharged, and in ancient times buildings were continuous between the north of this lake and the city of Tarsus. Much engineering skill must have been employed in ancient times to make a harbour out of what had been a lagoon, and to improve the channel of the river. A great deal was done to conquer nature for the common benefit, and it was not only in this direction that the inhabitants showed their perseverance. This city also cut one of the greatest passes of ancient times, the 'Cilician Gates.' Cilicia is divided from Cappadocia and Lycaonia by the Taurus range of mountains, which is pierced from N.W. to S.E. by a glen along which flows the Tchakut Su. This glen offers a natural road for much of its course, but there are serious difficulties to overcome in its southern part. The Tarsians built a waggon road over the hills there, and cut with the chisel a level path out of the solid rock on the western bank of the stream. The probable date of this engineering feat was some time between B.C. 1000 and 500.

It is possible (but see TARSHISH) that Tarsus is meant by the Tarshish of Gn 10⁴, and that it is there indicated c. B.C. 2000 as a place where Greeks settled. The difference in the form of the name need cause no difficulty in accepting this identification. The name is originally Anatolian, and would quite easily be transliterated differently in Greek and Hebrew. All the evidence is in harmony with the view that at an early date Greeks settled there among an originally Oriental community. Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, captured Tarsus about the middle of the 9th cent. B.C.; afterwards kings ruled over Cilicia, with the Persian kings as overlords. In B.C. 401 there was still a king, but not in B.C. 334, when Alexander the Great entered the country. He found a Persian officer directly governing the country. Of the character of the kingdom we know nothing. Thus for about five centuries Tarsus was really an Oriental city. Greek influence began again with Alexander the Great, but made very slow progress. During the fourth century Tarsus was subject to the Greek kings of Syria of the Seleucid dynasty. It continued during the third century in abject submission to them. The peace of B.C. 189 changed the position of Cilicia. Previous to that date it had been in the middle of the Seleucid territory. Now it became a frontier country. About B.C. 175-164 Tarsus was re-organized by Antiochus IV Epiphanes as an autonomous city under the name Antioch-on-the-Cydnus (cf. 2 Mac 4:30f. 36). It is extremely probable that the exact date of this re-foundation was B.C. 171-170; the new name lasted only a few years. Not only Tarsus, but a number of other Cilician cities also were re-organized at this time, but Tarsus received the most honourable treatment.

The population of this re-constituted Tarsus, in addition to what remained of the earlier population, consisted of Dorian Greeks from Argos. That the Greek element in the population was mainly Dorian is proved by the fact that the chief magistrates bore the Dorian title damiourgos. A mythology was invented to prove that this Dorian element was much earlier. It is almost certain that, in accordance with the regular Seleucid practice, a large body of Jews also was added to the population by Antiochus. These would be incorporated as citizens in a new tribe by themselves, to enable them to practise their own religion unhindered. There may have been some Jews resident in Tarsus as strangers, but the majority must have been citizens with full burghers' rights. St. Paul, and probably the 'kinsmen' of Ro 16:7, 11, 21, were citizens of Tarsus enrolled in the Jewish tribe. The later hostility of Antiochus to the ultra-Jewish party in Palestine cannot be alleged as an adequate reason against the view that he constituted, in B.C. 171-170, a large body of Jews citizens of Tarsus in a tribe by themselves. At that earlier date he regarded himself as the best friend of the Jews, and was so regarded by the more educated among themselves. As the Seleucid empire decayed, the Greek element in Tarsus became weaker, and the Asiatic spirit revived. About B.C. 83 its influence swept over Cilicia with the armies of Tigranes, king of Armenia, under whose power Tarsus fell. For about twenty years it continued under Oriental domination, till the re-organization of the East by Pompey the Great in B.C. 65-4. The Roman province Cilicia had been instituted about B.C. 104 or 102, but Tarsus was not then included in it. It was established mainly to control piracy in the Levant, and included the south and east of Asia Minor, but was not sharply defined in extent. In B.C. 25 the province GALATIA (wh. see) was established by Augustus, and Cilicia in the narrow sense became a mere adjunct of Syria. Tarsus was the capital even of the large province Cilicia, and remained that of the smaller under the Empire, which brought many blessings to the provinces and their cities. Experience of the barbarian Tigranes caused a revulsion in favour of Hellenism, and the Tarsians were enthusiastic for the Empire, which carried on the work of Hellenism. Cassius forced them, in B.C. 43, to take his and Brutus' side against Octavian and Antony, but they returned to their former loyalty on the earliest opportunity. Tarsus was made a free city (that is, it was governed by its own laws) by Antony, who met Cleopatra here. This privilege was confirmed by Octavian in or after B.C. 31. It is likely that Pompey, Julius Caesar, Antony, and Augustus all conferred Roman citizenship on some Tarsians, and these would take new names from their benefactors: Gnaeus Pompeius from Pompey, Gaius Iulius from Julius Caesar or Augustus, Marcus Antonius from Antony. The Roman administration probably trusted more to the Jewish than to the Greek element. The latter was capricious, and was restrained by the Stoic Athenodorus, a Tarsian, who had the influence of Augustus behind him. The Oriental element seems to have thus become more assertive, and about A.D. 100 it was predominant. This Athenodorus lived from about B.C. 74 till A.D. 7. He was a Stoic philosopher, distinguished for his lectures and writings. He gained a great and noble influence over Augustus, who was his pupil, and he remained in Rome from B.C. 45 till B.C. 15 as his adviser; in the latter year he retired to Tarsus. There he attempted by persuasion to reform local politics; but, being unsuccessful, he used the authority granted him by Augustus, and banished the more corrupt of the politicians. A property qualification was now required for possession of the citizenship. (Among these citizens the Roman citizens formed an aristocracy.) Athenodorus was succeeded by Nestor, an Academic philosopher (still living A.D. 19). These men had influence also in the university, which was more closely connected with the city than in modern times. A new lecturer had to be recognized by some competent body. There was a great enthusiasm in Tarsus and neighbourhood for learning and philosophy, and in this respect the city was unequalled in Greece. It was here that St. Paul learned sympathy with athletics, and tolerance for the good elements in pagan religion. The principal deity of Tarsus corresponded to the Greek Zeus: he is the old Anatolian deity, giver of corn and wine. There was also a working Anatolian divinity, who was identified with Heracles, subordinate to the other. The former is represented as sitting on a chair, with left hand resting on a sceptre, and the right holding corn or grapes. The other stands on a lion, wears bow-case and sword, and holds a branch or flower in his right hand, a battleaxe in his left. Sometimes he is represented within a portable shrine. A. SOUTER.

TARTAK.—An idol introduced by the Avvites into Samaria when Sargon of Assyria transported them thither (2 K 17:30). This deity is mentioned along with another called Nibhaz, and, according to the Babylonian Talmud, was worshipped in the form of an ass. In Assyro-Babylonian mythology no such deity is at present provable; moreover, the geographical position of the Avvites is uncertain, and their city may have been in one of the western States of Asia. The Greek text 'A' replaces Tartak by Naibas, but this may be merely a corruption of Nibhaz.

T. G. PINCHES.

TARTAN.—The title borne by two Assyrian officers, one of whom was sent by Sargon to Ashdod (Is 20:1), while the other, with the Rab-saris and the Rab-shakeh, was sent by Sennacherib to demand from Hezekiah the surrender of Jerusalem (2 K 18:17). The word is a transcription in Heb. of the Assy. tartānu or turtānu, the title borne by the commander-in-chief of the army.

L. W. KING.

TASSEL.—See FRINGES.

TATTENAI.—The name of the governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia under Darius Hystaspis (Ezr 5:8, 9, 12). He is called in 1 Es 6:2, 7, 27 (28) 71 Sisinnos, which is simply a reproduction in Greek of a Persian name Thithinaia (orig. Thathanata?), with aspirated t.

TAVERNER'S BIBLE.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS, § 21.

TAVERNS, THREE (Latin Tres Tabernæ).—A name of uncertain origin, which might be translated 'three shops' or 'three huts.' It was a station on the Applan Road (built B.C. 321) which went from Rome to the S. along the west coast. This was the principal road for all travellers to or from the S. and E., except those who embarked at Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber. The village was about 33 Roman miles from Rome, and to this point many Christians walked, or drove, to meet St. Paul on his arrival in Italy from the E. (Ac 28:14).

A. SOUTER.

TAW.—The twenty-second letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 22nd part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

TAXES, TAXING.—See KING, 2 (5) PUBLICAN, 'TRIBUTE, QUIRINIUS; (cf. a'sc p. 559).

TEACHER, TEACHING.—See EDUCATION.

TEBAH.—A 'son' of Nahor (Gn 22nd). See TIBMATH.

TEBALIAH.—A Merarite gatekeeper (1 Ch 26th).

TEBETH.—See TIME.

TEHAPHNEHES (Ezk 30th).—See TAHPANHES.

TEHINNAH.—The 'father' of Ir-nahash (1 Ch 4th).

TEIL TREE.—Is 6th, AV mistranslation of 'terebinth' (wh. see, and cf. art. OAK (1)).

TEKEL.—See MENE MENE TEKEL UPHARSIN.

TEKOA (2 Ch 11th etc.); Tekoah, 2 S 14th. 4. 9 [AV], 1 Mac 9th [RV; AV Thecoe].—A fortress city on the edge of the wilderness to which it gave its name (2 Ch 20th). From here came the 'wise woman' sent by Joab to plead for Absalom (2 S 14th. 4. 9); Rehoboam fortified it (2 Ch 11th), and apparently it continued to be a fortress (Jer 6th); Amos 'was among the herdmen of Tekoa' (Am 1st). Tekoa is mentioned also in LXX in Jos 15th, and in the genealogies in 1 Ch 4th. The site is now Khurbet Teq'a, an extended but shapeless mass of ruins crowning the summit of a hill (2790 ft. above sea level), 5 miles S. of Bethlehem. It is on the extreme edge of the cultivated lands. Bethlehem, the Mt. of Olives, and Nebi Samw'el (Mizpah) are all visible from it.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

TEL-ABIB (perh. 'hill of corn').—A place on the Chebar (Ezk 3th); site unknown.

TELAH.—An Ephraimite (1 Ch 7th).

TELAIM ('the lambs').—The place at which Saul concentrated his forces, and numbered his fighting men before his campaign against the Amalekites (1 S 15th). The LXX reads Gilgal for Telaime, and Josephus (Ant. vi. vii. 2) also makes Gilgal the place of assembly. A more suitable locality for the place of assembly would, however, be in the Negeb, or South; and here lay Telem (Jos 15th), with which Telaime is probably identical.

TELAASSAR ('Asshur's hill or mound').—This city is mentioned with Gozan, Haran, and Rezep, and is spoken of as a place inhabited by 'the children of Eden' (2 K 19th, Is 37th). The Assyrian inscriptions apparently mention two places so called, one being Til-ashshuri, mentioned by Tiglath-pileser III., which had a renowned temple dedicated to Merodach, and is stated to have been a Babylonian foundation. The other, written Til-ashurri, is referred to by Esarhaddon as having been conquered by him (the people of Mithranu, he seems to say, called it Pitānu). It was inhabited by the people of Barnaku or Parnaku—a name which Delitzsch points out as similar to the Parnach of Nu 34th. This Til-ashurri is supposed to have lain near the land of Mitanni (Upper Mesopotamia), which would find support if Mithranu be connected with the Mehru mentioned by Tukulti-Ninib (-Nirig) 1. T. G. PINCHES.

TELEM.—1. A gatekeeper who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10th); called in 1 Es 9th Tolbanes; perhaps the same as Talmon of Neh 12th. 2. See TELAIM.

TEL-HARSHA.—A Babylonian town of unknown site (Ezr 2nd, Neh 7th); called in 1 Es 5th Thelersas.

TELL.—See TALE.

TELMELAH ('hill of salt').—A Babylonian town of unknown site (Ezr 2nd, Neh 7th); called in 1 Es 5th Thermeleth.

TEMA.—In Gn 25th (1 Ch 1st), a son of Ishmael. The country and people meant are still represented by the same name—the modern Taima, a large oasis about 200 miles S.E. of the head of the Gulf of 'Akabah, and the same distance due N. of Medina in W Arabia. It was an important community in ancient times, mentioned in Assyrian annals of the 8th cent. B.C., and later inhabited in part by Aramaeans, who have left inscriptions. It was noted for its caravan traffic (Job 6th Is 21st), as might be expected from its position on the great trade routes. J. F. MCCURDY.

TEMAH.—A family of Nethinim (Ezr 2nd, Neh 7th)—1 Es 5th Thomei.

TEMAN.—A tribe (and district) of Edom, whose importance is indicated by its eponym being the eldest son of the eldest son (Eliphaz) of Esau (Gn 36th. 14; cf. v. 42), and by its being taken along with Bozrah (wh. see) to represent the whole land of Edom (Am 1st; cf. Ob 9). Ezk 25th implies that Edom stretches from Teman to Dedan, from which we infer that the former lay in the north-east of the territory claimed by Edom, that is, to the S.E. of Moab. Its inhabitants were renowned for wisdom (Jer 49th), and the chief of Job's counsellors was Eliphaz 'the Temanite' (Job 2nd).

J. F. MCCURDY.

TEMENI.—The 'son' of Ashhur (1 Ch 4th).

TEMPERANCE.—1. In the RV 'temperance' is the tr. of the Gr. word enkrateia, the root-meaning of which is 'power over oneself,' 'self-mastery.' It is a comprehensive virtue, and on this account 'self-control,' the tr. of RVm, is to be preferred (Ac 24th, Gal 5th, 2 P 1st). The corresponding adjective is found only in 1 Ti 3rd, and the verb only in 1 Co 7th 9th. The negative form of the adjective is translated 'without self-control' (2 Ti 3rd), and of the noun 'excess' (Mt 23rd), and 'incontinency' (1 Co 7th). The RV tr. another Gr. word (nēphaios) 'temperate' in 1 Ti 3rd. 11, Tit 2nd; its root-meaning points to the avoidance of intemperance in the form of drunkenness, but in actual usage it condemns all forms of self-indulgence. This extension of its significance must be remembered in expounding the passages in which the corresponding verb is found, for the RV always tr. it (nēphein) 'to be sober' (1 Th 5th. 4, 2 Ti 4th, 1 P 1st 4th 5th).

2. From the philosophical point of view, 'self-control' is mastery over the passions; it is the virtue which holds the appetites in check; the rational will has power to regulate conduct without being unduly swayed by sensuous appetites. From the NT point of view the grace of 'self-control' is the result of the Holy Spirit's indwelling; it is the Spirit-controlled personality alone that is 'strengthened with power' (Eph 3rd, cf. 5th) to control rebellious desires and to resist the allurements of tempting pleasures.

3. The NT passages in which reference is made to this virtue form an instructive study. 'O Felix, with an adulteress by his side, St. Paul discoursed of 'self-control,' directing his stern condemnation against the vice of unchastity (cf. 1 Co 7th. 9). But to every form of 'excess' (Mt 23rd) it is directly opposed. In 1 Ti 3rd 'not given over to wine' (paroinos, AV 'brawler,' cf. RVm) balances 'temperate' (v. 3, cf. v. 8), and from this chapter it is plain that the Apostle regards violent quarrelling (v. 3), false and reckless speech (v. 8), self-conceit (v. 8), greed of filthy lucre (v. 8), as well as fondness for much wine (v. 8), as manifold forms of intemperance by whose means men 'fall into reproach and the snare of the devil' (v. 7).

4. 'Self-control,' in its widest sense, as including mastery over all tempers, appetites, and passions, has a prominent place in two NT lists of the Christian graces. In 2 P 1st, faith is regarded as the germ of every virtue; it lays hold of the 'divine power' which makes possible the life of godliness (v. 3). The evolution of faith in 'manliness, knowledge, self-control' is the reward of its 'diligent' culture (v. 5). This 'self-control,' as Principal Iverach says, 'grows out of knowledge, it is using Christian knowledge for the guidance of life' (The Other Side of Greatness, p. 110). In Gal 5th, 'self-control' closes the list of the graces which are all 'the fruit of the Spirit,' just as 'drunkenness and revellings' close the list of 'the works of the flesh' (v.²¹). The flesh and the Spirit!—these, indeed, are 'contrary the one to the other' (v.¹⁷). The flesh triumphs when the Spirit is quenched; but the Spirit's victory is gained, not by suppressing, but by controlling, the flesh. Those who are 'led by the Spirit' (v.¹⁸), who 'live by the Spirit' and 'by the Spirit also walk' (v.²⁵) attain, in its perfection, the grace of complete 'self-control.' J. G. TASKER.

TEMPEST.—See GALILEE [SEA OF], 3; WHIRLWIND.

TEMPLE.—1. The first Temple mentioned in connexion with the worship of J^h is that of Shiloh (1 S 1⁹), 'where the ark of God was' (3^d) in the period of the Judges, under the guardianship of Eli and his sons. It was evidently destroyed by the Philistines after their decisive victory which resulted in the capture of the ark, as recorded in 410^{BC}; for the descendants of Eli are found, a generation afterwards, acting as priests of a temple at Nob (21st, 22nd). With the capture of Jerusalem by David, and the transference thither of the ark, a new political and religious centre was provided for the tribes of Israel.

2. SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.—The site.—The successive Temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod were buildings of moderate dimensions, and were built, by every token, on one and the same site. Now, there is only one place in Jerusalem where this site is to be looked for, namely, on that part of the eastern hill which is now occupied by the large platform, extending to some 35 acres, known as the Haram esh-Sharif or 'Noble Sanctuary' (see JERUSALEM, and below, § 11). There has, however, been considerable difference of opinion in the past as to the precise spot within the Haram area on which the 'holy house' itself was reared. Thus a few British writers, among whom Fergusson, the distinguished architect, and W. Robertson Smith, in his article 'Temple' in the EBR, are the most influential, have maintained that the Temple and its courts occupied an area about 600 ft. square in the south-western portion of the Haram. But the great majority of scholars, both at home and abroad, are agreed in placing the Temple in close connexion with the sacred rock (es-Sakhra) which is now enclosed in the mosque named after it 'the Dome of the Rock,' also, less appropriately, 'the Mosque of Omar.'

The remarkable persistence of sacred sites in the East is a phenomenon familiar to all students of religion, and there can be little doubt that the Chronicler is right in identifying the site of 'the altar of burnt-offering for Israel' (1 Ch 22¹) with the spot 'by the threshing-floor of Ornan' (in 2 S 24¹⁶ Araunah) the Jebusite, 'where the angel of the plague stayed his hand, and on which David by Divine command erected his altar of commemoration (see, further, § 6 (b)). This being so, the location of the Temple immediately to the west of the rock follows as a matter of course. The only possible alternative is to regard the rock as marking the site, not of the altar of burnt-offering, but of 'the holy of holies' of the successive Temples—a view beset with insuperable difficulties.

3. The Temple building—Its arrangement and dimensions.—The Temple and its furniture are described in 1 K 6:1-38 7:1-41—two passages which are, unfortunately, among the most difficult in the OT, by reason of the perplexing technical terms employed and the unsatisfactory nature of the received text.

All recent study of these passages in commentaries and elsewhere is based on Stade's brilliant essay in his ZATW iii. 129 ff., with which cf. Stade and Schwally's edition of 'Kings' in Haupt's SBOT. Other aids, in addition to the standard commentaries, and works on archaeology by Nowack, Benzinger, etc., are Kittel's Bibl. Hebraica, Burney's Notes on the Heb. Text of the Books of Kings, and Father Vincent's exegetical notes in RB, Oct. 1907. To these must now be added G. A. Smith, Jerusalem (1908), vol. ii. (with plans), which deals fully with all the Temples (see Index, s.v. 'Temple').

The Temple proper was an oblong building, 60 cubits in length by 20 in breadth (1 K 6²), with a porch in front, facing eastwards, of the same width as the main building and 10 cubits in depth. These, however, are inside measurements, as is evident from vv.^{20, 21, 27}. The corresponding outside measurements depend, of course, upon the thickness of the walls, which is nowhere stated. But inasmuch as Ezekiel, the Temple of whose vision is in all essential points a replica of that of Solomon, gives 6 cubits as the thickness of its walls (Ezk 41⁴), except the walls of the porch, which were 5 cubits thick (40⁴⁸), those of the first Temple are usually assumed to have been of the same dimensions. Less they could scarcely have been, if, as will presently appear, rebatelements of three cubits in all have to be allowed in the lower half, since a thickness of three cubits in the upper half seems necessary, in view of the thrust of a heavy roof of 20 cubits' span.

The interior was divided into two chambers by a transverse partition, implied in 6²¹, but disregarded in the inside measurements given in v.². The anterior chamber, termed the hekhal, and corresponding to the holy place in the Tabernacle, measured 40 cubits by 20, being twice as large as the inner chamber, the ābūh (EV 'oracle') or most holy place, which was only 20 cubits by 20 (v.²⁰). The latter in fact formed a perfect cube, since its height was also 20 cubits, as compared with that of 'the holy place,' which was 30 cubits (6²). Assuming that this was also the height of the porch, the whole building, we may conjecture, was covered by a flat roof of uniform height throughout, leaving an empty space 10 cubits in height over the inner chamber.

On all sides, except the front which was occupied by the porch, the Temple proper was surrounded by a lateral building of three storeys, the whole 15 cubits high (so the emended text of v.¹¹), each storey containing a number of small chambers for storage purposes. The beams forming the floors and ceilings of these side chambers were not let into the Temple wall, but were supported by making three successive rebatelements of a cubit each in the wall (v.⁶). The chambers accordingly increased a cubit in width in each storey, from 5 in the lowermost storey to 6 and 7 in those above. The entrance to the side chambers was on the south side of the building. The nature and position of the windows which were made 'for the house' are alike uncertain. Openings fitted with lattice work are probably intended (v.⁴). Their position was most likely in the side walls above the roof of the lateral building.

The question of the area covered by the complete building now described has usually been answered hitherto by a reference to Ezekiel's Temple, which was exactly 100 cubits by 50. But a careful comparison of the measurements of the two Temples makes it extremely probable that the numbers just given are due to Ezekiel's fondness for operating with 50 and its multiples. The present writer is convinced that the prophet has not only increased the depth of the porch from 10 to 12 cubits (Ezk 40⁹ LXX), but has likewise added to the thickness of the walls of the side-chambers and of the interior partition wall. For if the former are taken as 3 cubits in thickness, as compared with Ezekiel's 5, i.e. of the same dimensions as the upper half of the Temple walls, and the partition as 1 cubit thick in place of 2 (Ezk 41¹), we find the area of the whole building to be 96 cubits by 48, the same relative proportion (2:1), it will be noted, as is found in Ezekiel. Similarly, the outside width of the naos or sanctuary proper (32 cubits) stood to the total width as 2:3.

In the existing uncertainty as to the length of the cubit employed by Solomon's architects, it is impossible to translate these dimensions into feet and inches with mathematical exactness. If the long cubit of c. 20½ inches employed by Ezekiel (see Ezk 40⁶ and cf. 2 Ch 3³) is preferred, the total area covered will be 164 ft. by 82 ft., while the dimensions of 'the holy place' will be approximately 70 by 35 by 50 ft. in height, and those of 'the most holy place' 35 by 35 by 35 ft. A serious objection to this adoption of the longer cubit, which was not foreseen when the art 'Weights and Measures' in Hastings' DB IV. (see p. 907 f.) was written, is presented by the detailed measurements of the interior of Herod's Temple in Josephus and the Mishna (see below, § 12). These are numerically the same as those of the first Temple, but the cubit employed in the 1st cent. was the short cubit of 17 1/8 inches, as the present writer has shown by an inductive study of the Herodian masonry (Expt xx. [1908], p. 24 ff.). Now, it is certain that the actual dimensions of Herod's Temple were not less than those of Solomon's, as they would be if the cubits were in the ratio of 6 to 7. It is more than probable, therefore, that the dimensions above given should be reduced by one-sixth—the Chronicler notwithstanding; in other words, 140 by 70 ft. will be the approximate area of the building, 60 by 30 ft., and 30 by 30 ft.—that of the 'holy' and 'most holy place' respectively.

4. The interior of the Temple.—The entrance to the Temple was through the open porch or vestibule on the eastern front. 'For the entering of the temple' was provided a large folding-door of cypress wood (6²⁴), each leaf divided vertically into two leaves, one of which folded back upon the other. According to v.²⁸ in its present form, the leaves were ornamented with carved figures of cherubim, palms, and flowers, all overlaid with gold (but see below). The stone floor was covered with planks of cypress wood. That the latter should have been plated with gold (v.³⁰) is scarcely credible. The walls of both chambers were lined with boards (literally 'ribs') of cedar wood, 'from the floor of the house to the rafters of the ceiling' (so read v.¹⁵). There is no mention in this verse, it will be noted, of any ornamentation of the cedar panels, which is first found in vv.¹⁸ and ²⁰; but the former verse is absent from LXX, and vv.²⁸⁻³⁰ are recognized by all as a later addition. The ceilings, as we should expect, were formed of beams of cedar (v.⁹, ¹⁵). Over all was probably laid an outer covering of marble slabs.

The inner chamber of the Temple was separated from 'the holy place,' as has already been shown, by a partition wall, presumably of stone, which we have assumed above to have been a cubit in thickness. In it was set a door of olive wood, described obscurely in v.³¹, which seems to say that its shape was not rectangular like the entrance door (see the Comm. on vv.³¹, ³³), but pentagonal; in other words, the lintel of the door, instead of being a single cross-beam, consisted of two beams meeting at an angle. In the centre of the chamber, facing the entrance (2 Ch 3¹⁸), stood two cherubim figures of olive wood, each 10 cubits high, with outstretched wings. The latter measured 10 cubits from tip to tip, so that the two sets of wings reached from the north to the south wall of 'the most holy place' (1 K 6²³⁻²⁸). It is entirely in accordance with ancient practice that these symbolic figures should be overlaid with gold (v.²⁸).

But with regard to the excessive introduction of gold plating by the received text throughout, including even the Temple floor, as we have seen, there is much to be said in favour of the view, first advanced by Stade, that it is due to a desire on the part of later scribes to enhance the magnificence of the first Temple. In the original text the gold plating was perhaps confined to the cherubim, as has just been suggested, or to these and the doors, which appear to have had a gold sheathing in the time of Hezekiah (2 K 18¹⁶).

5. The furniture of the Temple.—If 1 K 7¹⁶⁻²¹ is set aside as a later addition (see the Comm.), the only article of Temple furniture is the altar of cedar introduced in the composite text of vv.³⁰⁻³². As there are good grounds for believing that a special altar of incense was first introduced into the second Temple (see § 9), the former is now identified by most writers with the table of showbread (see SHEWBREAD; and TABERNACLE, § 6 (a)). Its position is evidently intended to be in the outer chamber in front of the entrance to the inner shrine. The same position 'before the oracle' (debt 7¹⁶) is assigned to the ten 'candlesticks,' properly lampstands (TABERNACLE, § 6 (b)), five probably being meant to stand on either side of the entrance. Although, from the date of the passage cited, we may hesitate to ascribe these to Solomon, they doubtless at a later time formed a conspicuous part of the Temple furniture (cf. Jer 52¹⁹).

TEMPLE

On the completion of the Temple, the sacred memorial of earlier days, the already venerable ark of J^h, was brought from the tent in which David had housed it and placed within 'the most holy place,' where it stood overshadowed by the wings of the cherubim (1 K 8¹⁸). Another sacred object of like antiquity, the brazen serpent (see SERPENT [BRAZEN]), found a place somewhere within the Temple.

6. The court of the Temple and its furniture.—(a) The court and gates.—The Temple of Solomon formed part of a large complex of buildings, comprising an arsenal, a judgment-hall, the palace with its harem, and finally the royal chapel, the whole surrounded by 'the great court' of 1 K 7⁹, ¹². Within this enclosure, at its upper or northern end, was 'the inner court' of

(after Stade and Benzinger).

6²⁸ 7¹² within which, again, stood the Temple (8⁶⁴). It is of importance to note that this single court of the Temple was open to the laity as well as to the priests (8⁶²), as is specially evident from Jer 35¹⁵, 36¹⁰ etc.

Several gates of this court are mentioned by later writers, but their precise position is uncertain. The main entrance was doubtless in the east wall, and may be indicated by 'the king's entry without' of 2 K 16¹⁸, and 'the king's gate eastward' of 1 Ch 9¹⁸. The 'gate of the guard' (2 K 11¹⁹), on the other hand, may be looked for in the south wall separating the Temple court from 'the other court' (1 K 7⁹) in which the royal palace was situated (cf. Ezk 43¹⁷). There were also one or more gates on the north side (Ezk 8³ 9¹, Jer 20² 'gate of Benjamin,' etc.). Cf. art. JERUSALEM, II. 4.

(b) The altar of burnt-offering.—It is surprising that no reference is made in the early narrative of 1 K 7 to the making of so indispensable a part of the apparatus of the cult. In the opinion of most critics, this omission is due to the excision from the original narrative of the relative section by a much later editor, who assumed that the brazen altar of the Tabernacle accompanied the ark to the new sanctuary (but see Burney, Notes on Heb. Text, etc., 102 f.). The Chronicler, whether informed by his text of 1 K. or otherwise, tells us that Solomon's altar of burnt-offering (1 K 9²⁵) was of brass (cf. the 'brazen altar' 8²⁴), 20 cubits in length and breadth and 10 in height (2 Ch 4¹). Its position was on the site of the earlier altar of David (2 Ch 3¹), which, it may be asserted with confidence, stood somewhere on the sacred rock still to be seen within the Mosque of Omar (see § 2 above). The precise position which the altars of the first and second Temples occupied on the surface of the rock, which measures at least some 50 ft. by 40 ft., must remain a matter of conjecture. Herod's altar was large enough almost to cover the rock (§ 11 (c)). This question has recently been made the subject of an elaborate investigation by Kittel in his Studien zur heb. Archäologie (1908, 1-85). Solomon's altar was superseded in the reign of Ahaz by a larger altar of more artistic construction, which this sovereign caused to be made after the model of one seen by him at Damascus (2 K 16¹⁰⁻¹⁶).

(c) The brazen sea.—In the court, to the south of the line between the altar and the Temple (1 K 7²⁹), stood one of the most striking of the creations of Solomon's Phœnician artist, Hiram-abi of Tyre. This was the brazen sea (7²³⁻²⁵, 2 Ch 4²⁻⁵), a large circular basin or tank of bronze, 10 cubits 'from brim to brim' and 5 in depth, with the enormous capacity of 2000 baths, or more than 16,000 gallons. Ever should this prove an exaggerated estimate, the basin must have bulged very considerably in the middle, and the medial diameter must have been at least twice that of the mouth. The brim curved outwards like the calyx of a flower, and underneath it the body of the 'sea' was decorated with two rows of gourd-shaped ornaments. The basin rested on the backs of twelve bronze oxen, which, in groups of three, faced the four cardinal points. Notwithstanding 2 Ch 4⁵, written centuries after it had disappeared (Jer 52^{17, 20}), recent writers are inclined to give the brazen sea a purely symbolical significance. But whether it is to be interpreted as a symbol of the primeval abyss (Gn 1⁷) and of J^h's power as Creator, or in the terms of the Babylonian mythology as symbolizing the upper or heavenly sea, bounded by the zodiac with its twelve signs (the 12 oxen), or otherwise, must be left to the future to decide (cf. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II. 65 f.).

(d) The brazen lavers.—A similar symbolical significance is probably to be assigned to the ten lavers of bronze (1 K 7²⁷⁻²⁹). These were smaller editions of the brazen sea, being only four cubits in diameter, holding only 40 baths (c. 325 galls.), and resting on wheeled carriers, or bases. The peculiarly difficult description of the latter has been the subject of special study by Stade (ZATW, 1901, 145 ff., with which cf. Haupt's SBOT), and more recently by Kittel (op. cit. 189-242). It must suffice here to say that each carrier was 4 cubits in length and breadth and 3 cubits in height. The sides were open frames composed of uprights of bronze joined together by transverse bars or rails of the same material, the whole richly ornamented with palm trees, lions, oxen, and cherubim in relief. Underneath were four wheels of bronze, 1½ cubits in diameter, while on the top of each stand was fitted a ring or cylinder on which the laver directly rested.

(e) The pillars Jachin and Boaz.—Nowhere is the symbolical element in these creations of Hiram-abi's art more apparent than in the twin pillars with the mysterious names Jachin and Boaz, which were set up on either side of the entrance to the Temple porch. They have been discussed in the art. JACHIN AND BOAZ (where 'chapter' is explained) (see also Kittel's art. 'Temple' in PRE, xix. [1907] 493 f.).

7. General idea and plan of Solomon's Temple.—The building of the Temple occupied seven years and six months (1 K 6³⁷⁻³⁸). After standing for three centuries and a half it was burned to the ground by the soldiers of Nebuchadnezzar in B.C. 587-6, having first been stripped of everything of value that could be carried away. Before passing to a study of its successor, it may be well to note more precisely the purpose for which it was erected, and the general idea underlying its plan. As expressly implied by the term 'the house' (bayith) applied to it by the early historian, the Temple was intended to be, before all else, the dwelling-place of Israel's God, especially as represented by the ark of J^h (see, for this, 2 S 7², 2 S 7²⁶). At the same time it was also the royal chapel, and adjoined the palace of Solomon, precisely as 'the king's chapel' at Bethel was part of the residence of the kings of Israel (Am 7¹³). There is no reason for supposing that Solomon had the least intention of supplanting the older sanctuaries of the land—a result first achieved by the reformation of Josiah (2 K 23).

As regards the plan of the new sanctuary as a whole, with its threefold division of court, holy place, and holy of holies (to adopt, as before, the later terminology), its origin is to be sought in the ideas of temple architecture then current not only in Phœnicia, the home of Solomon's architects and craftsmen, but throughout Western Asia. Syria, as we now know, was influenced in matters of religious art not only by Babylonia and Egypt, but also by the so-called Mycenaean civilization of the Eastern Mediterranean basin. The walled court, the porch, fore-room, and innermost cella are all characteristic features of early Syrian temple architecture. Whether or not there lies behind these the embodiment of ideas from the still older Babylonian cosmology, by which the threefold division of the sanctuary reflects the threefold division of the heavenly universe (so Benzinger, Heb. Arch., 2 330, following Winckler and A. Jeremias), must be left an open question. In certain details of the furniture, such as the wheeled carriers of the lavers and their ornamentation, may also be traced the influence of the early art of Crete and Cyprus through the Phœnicians as intermediaries.

8. THE TEMPLE OF EZEKIEL'S VISION (Ezk 40-43).—Although the Temple of Ezekiel remained a dream, a word may be said in passing regarding one of its most characteristic features, on account of its influence on the plan of the actual Temples of the future. This is the emphasis laid throughout on the sacrosanct character of the sanctuary—a reflexion of the deepening of the conception of the Divine holiness which marked the period of the Exile. The whole sacred area covered by the Temple and its courts is to be protected from contact with secular buildings. One far-reaching result of this rigid separation of sacred and secular is the introduction of a second Temple court, to which the priests alone, strictly speaking, are entitled to access (Ezk 40²⁸). For the details of Ezekiel's sketch, with its passion for symmetry and number, see the Comm. and Witton Davies' art. 'Temple' in Hastings' DB iv. 704 ff.

9. THE TEMPLE OF ZERUBBABEL.—The second Temple, as it is frequently named, was built, at the instigation of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, under the leadership of Zerubbabel. According to the explicit testimony of a contemporary (Hag 2³), the foundation was laid in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 520)—a date now generally preferred to that of the much later author of Ezr 3³⁸. The building was finished and the Temple dedicated in B.C. 516. We have unfortunately no description of the plan and arrangements of the latter, and are dependent for information regarding it mainly on scattered references in the later canonical and extra-canonical books. It may be assumed, however, that the altar of burnt-offering, previously restored by the exiles on their return (Ezr 3²), occupied the former site, now consecrated by centuries of worship, and that the ground plan of the Temple followed as nearly as possible that of its predecessor (cf. G. A. Smith, op. cit. II. ch. xii.).

As regards the furnishing of Zerubbabel's Temple, we have not only several notices from the period when it was still standing, but evidence from the better known Temple of Herod, in which the sacred furniture remained as before. Now, however scantily the former may have been furnished at the first, we should expect that after the introduction of the Priests' Code under Ezra, the prescriptions therein contained for the furniture of the Tabernacle would be carried out to the letter. And this is indeed to a large extent what we find. Thus only one golden lampstand illuminated 'the holy place' (1 Mac 1²¹) instead of ten in the former Temple. The table of shewbread succeeded 'the altar of cedar' of 1 K 6²⁰ (for which see § 5 above). The golden altar of incense, which belongs to a later stratum of P (TABERNACLE, § 6 (c)), was most probably introduced at a somewhat late date, since pseudo-Hecataeus in the 3rd cent. B.C., quoted by Josephus (c. Apion. [ed. Niese] i. 198 f.), knows only of 'an altar and a candlestick both of gold, and in weight two talents'—the former presumably the altar or table of shewbread. There is no reason, however, to question the presence of the incense altar by the second century, as attested by 1 Mac 1²⁶. (cf. 4¹⁰), according to which Antiochus Epiphanes robbed the Temple of 'the golden altar and the candlestick of light . . . and the table of shewbread,' where the first of these must be identified with the altar in question (see, against the scepticism of Wellhausen and others, the evidence collected by Schürer, GF v. ii. [1907] 342 f. [= 3 285f.]).

In one point of cardinal importance the glory of the second house was less than that of the first. No attempt was made to construct another ark; 'the most holy place' was empty. A splendid curtain or veil replaced the partition wall between the two divisions of the sanctuary, and is mentioned among the spoils carried off by Antiochus (1 Mac 1²²). In another way the second Temple was distinguished from the first; it had two courts in place of one, an inner and an outer (4³⁸, 4⁹ 9⁶⁴), as demanded by Ezekiel. This prophet's further demand, that the laity should be entirely excluded from the inner court, was not carried out, as is evident from the experience of Alexander Jannæus. Having given offence to the people while officiating at the altar on the occasion of the Feast of Tabernacles, he was pelted with the citrons which they carried. Alexander in consequence had the altar and Temple railed off to keep the worshippers henceforth at a more respectful distance (Jos. Ant. xiii. xii. 5).

The altar was no longer of brass but of unhewn stone (1 Mac 4⁴⁷), as required by Ex 20²⁴, and attested by the earlier writer above cited (ap. Jos. c. Apion., l.c.), who further assigns to it the same dimensions as the Chronicler gives to the brazen altar of Solomon (§ 6 (b)). In B.C. 168, Antiochus iv., as already stated, spoiled and desecrated the Temple, and by a crowning act of sacrilege set up a small altar to Zeus Olympus on the altar of burnt-offering. Three years later, Judas the Maccabee, after re-capturing Jerusalem, made new sacred furniture—altar of incense, table of shewbread, the seven-branched candlestick, and other 'new holy vessels.' The stones of the polluted altar were removed and others substituted, and the Temple dedicated anew (1 Mac 4⁴⁸). With minor alterations and additions, chiefly in the direction of making the Temple hill stronger against attack, the Temple remained as the Maccabees left it until replaced by the more ambitious edifice of Herod.

10. If only for the sake of completeness, a brief reference must be made at this point to two other temples for the worship of J^h erected by Jewish settlers in Egypt during the period covered by the previous section. The earlier of these has only recently come to light, through the discovery of certain Aramaic papyri on the island of Elephantine. The three last, published by Sachau in Drei aramäische Papyriurkunden (2nd ed. 1908), describe this temple to Yāhū (Jahweh) which existed at Elephantine before Cambyes invaded Egypt in B.C. 525, and had been destroyed at the instigation of Egyptian priests in B.C. 411. It was probably re-built soon after 408. The story of the other, erected at Leontopolis in the Delta by Onias, son of the Jewish high priest of the same name, in the reign of Antiochus iv., has been told by Josephus, who describes it as a replica, 'but smaller and poorer,' of the Temple of Zerubbabel (BJ vii. x. 2 ff., Ant. xiii. lii. 1 ff.). This description has recently been confirmed by the excavation of the site, the modern Tel el-Yehudiyeh, by Flinders Petrie (Petrie and Duncan, Hyksos and Israelite Cities, 1906, 19-27, with plans and models, plates xxiii.-xxv.); not the least interesting feature of this temple in partibus infidelium is the fact that it seems to have been built according to the measurements of the Tabernacle. This is altogether more probable than the view expressed by Petrie, that Onias copied the dimensions of the Temple of Jerusalem (op. cit. 24).

11. THE TEMPLE OF HEROD.—It was in the eighteenth year of his reign that Herod obtained the permission of his suspicious subjects to re-build the Temple of Zerubbabel. The Temple proper was re-built by a thousand specially trained priests within the space of eighteen months; the rest of the buildings took years to finish, indeed the last touches were given only six or seven years before the final catastrophe in A.D. 70, when the whole was destroyed by the soldiers of Titus. For a fuller study of several of the points discussed in this section, see the present writer's articles on 'Some Problems of Herod's Temple' in Expt xx. [1908], 24 ff.

(a) The outer court, its size, cloisters, and gates.—It is advisable in this case to reverse the order of study adopted for the first Temple, and to proceed from the courts to the Temple proper. In this way we start from the existing remains of Herod's enterprise, for all are agreed that the Haram area (see above § 2) and its retaining walls are in the main the work of Herod, who doubled the area of Zerubbabel's courts by means of enormous substructure (Jos. BJ i. xxi. 1). There are good grounds, however, for believing that, as left by Herod, the platform stopped at a point a little beyond the Golden Gate in the eastern wall, its northern boundary probably running in proximity to the north wall of the present inner platform of the Haram. (The latter has been considerably extended in this direction since Herod's day, and is indicated by double dotted lines on the accompanying plan.) This gives an area of approximately 26 acres compared with the 35 acres, or thereby, of the present Haram. The measurements were, in round numbers, 390 yards from N. to S. by 330 yards from E. to W. on the north, and 310 yards E. to W. on the south. If the figures just given represent, with approximate accuracy, the extended area enclosed by Herod, the outer court, called in the Mishna 'the mountain of the house,' and by later writers, 'the court of the Gentiles,' will have appeared to the eye as almost a square, as it is stated to be, although with divergent measurements, by our two chief authorities, the Mishna treatise Middoth (lit. 'measurements,' tr. in Barclay's Talmud, and in PEFS, 1886-87), and Josephus (BJ v. v., Ant. xv. xi. and elsewhere).

The climax of Herod's architectural triumphs was reached in the magnificent colonnades which surrounded the four sides of this court. The colonnade along the south wall, in particular, known as 'the Royal Porch' (or portico, stoa), was 'exceeding magnificent' (1 Ch 22⁸). It consisted of four rows of monolithic marble columns of the Corinthian order, forming three aisles; the two side aisles were 30 ft. in breadth and 50 ft. in height, while the central aisle was half as broad again as the other two and twice as high (Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 5, but see Expt, l.c.). The ceilings of the roofs were adorned with sculptured panels of cedar wood. On the other three sides of the court the colonnades had only two aisles, that along the east wall bearing the name of Solomon's Porch (Jn 10²³, Ac 3¹¹ 5¹²), probably from a tradition that it occupied the site of one built by that monarch.

The main approaches to the court were naturally on the west and south. The principal entrance from the west was by the gate of Kiponos (Midd. i. 3), the approach to which was by a bridge over the Tyropeon, now represented by Wilson's arch. On the south were the two gates represented by the present 'double' and 'triple' gates, and named the Huldah (or 'mole') gates, because the visitor passed into the court by sloping tunnels beneath the royal porch. These ramps opened upon the Court of the Gentiles about 190 ft. from the south wall (see plan and, for details, ExpT, l.c.).

(b) The inner courts and their gates.—The great court was open to Jew and Gentile alike, and, as we learn from the Gospels, was the centre of a busy life, and of transactions little in accord with its sacred purpose. The sanctuary in the strict sense began when one reached the series of walls, buildings, and courts which rose on successive terraces in the northern half of the great enclosure. Its limits were marked out by a low balustrade, the sōrēg, which ran round the whole, and was provided at intervals with notices warning all Gentiles against entering the sacred enclosure on pain of death (cf. St. Paul's experience, Ac 21²⁸). From the sōrēg, flights of steps at different points led up to a narrow terrace, termed the chēl (XYZ in plan), 10 cubits wide, beyond which rose a lofty retaining wall enclosing the whole sanctuary, to which Jews alone had access.

The great wall by which the sanctuary was converted into a fortress, was pierced by nine gateways—H 1-9 on the plan—over which were built massive two-storeyed gate-houses 'like towers' (Jos. BJ v. v. 3), four in the N., four in the S., and one in the E. wall. The most splendid of all the gates was the last mentioned, the eastern gate, which was the principal entrance to the Temple. From the fact that it was composed entirely of Corinthian brass, and had been the gift of a certain Nicanor of Alexandria, it was known as 'the Corinthian gate' (Jos.), and 'the gate of Nicanor' (Mish.). There is little doubt that it is also 'the Beautiful Gate of the temple' (Ac 3^{2, 10}), as shown by Schürer in his exhaustive study (ZNTW, 1906, 51-58). The other eight gates were 'covered over with gold and silver, as were the jambs and lintels' (Jos. BJ v. v. 3), at the expense of Alexander, the Jewish alabarch of Alexandria (c. A.D. 20-40). All the gates were 20 cubits high by 10 wide, according to the Mishna (Josephus says 30 by 15).

Entering by the 'Beautiful Gate', H 5, one found oneself in the colonnaded court of the women—so called because accessible to women as well as men. This was the regular place of assembly for public worship (cf. Lk 1¹⁰). The women were accommodated in a gallery which ran round the court (Midd. ii. 5), probably above the colonnades as suggested in the plan. Along by the pillars of the colonnades were placed thirteen trumpet-shaped boxes to receive the offerings and dues of the faithful. These boxes are 'the treasury' into which the widow's mites were cast (Mk 12⁴²).

The west side of this court was bounded by a wall, which divided the sanctuary into two parts, an eastern and a western. As the level of the latter was considerably higher than that of the eastern court, a magnificent semicircular flight of fifteen steps led up from the one to the other. At the top of the steps was an enormous gateway, 50 cubits by 40, allowing the worshippers an uninterrupted view of the altar and the Temple. The leaves of its gate were even more richly plated with silver and gold by Alexander than the others, and hence many have identified this gate with 'the gate that was called Beautiful' (but see Schürer, loc. cit. and ExpT, xx. [1908]).

(c) The court of the priests and the great altar.—There is some uncertainty as to the arrangements of the western court, which we have now reached, owing to the divergent data of our two authorities, Josephus and the Mishna. The simplest solution is perhaps to regard the whole western court as in one sense the court of the priests, 'the court par excellence of the Mishna' (Midd. v. 1, etc.). Alexander Jannæus, we learned (§ 9), rallied off the Temple and altar, and restricted the male Israelites to the outer edge of the then inner court. This arrangement was retained when the courts were laid out anew by Herod. In Middoth ii. 6 a narrow strip by the entrance—only 11 cubits in width, but extending the whole breadth of the court from N. to S.—is named the court of Israel. Josephus, however, is probably right in representing the latter as running round three sides of the western court (as on plan BBB). Its small size was a reminder that the laity—apart from those actually taking part in the sacrifices, who had, of course, to be allowed even within the still more sacred precincts of the priests' court—were admitted on suffrance to the western court; the eastern court, or court of the women, was, as has been indicated, the proper place of worship for the laity. Along the N. and S. walls of the enclosure were built chambers for various purposes connected with the Temple ritual (Midd. v. 3, 4), chambers and gatehouses being connected by an ornamental colonnade. Those whose location can be determined with some degree of certainty are entered on the plan and named in the key thereto.

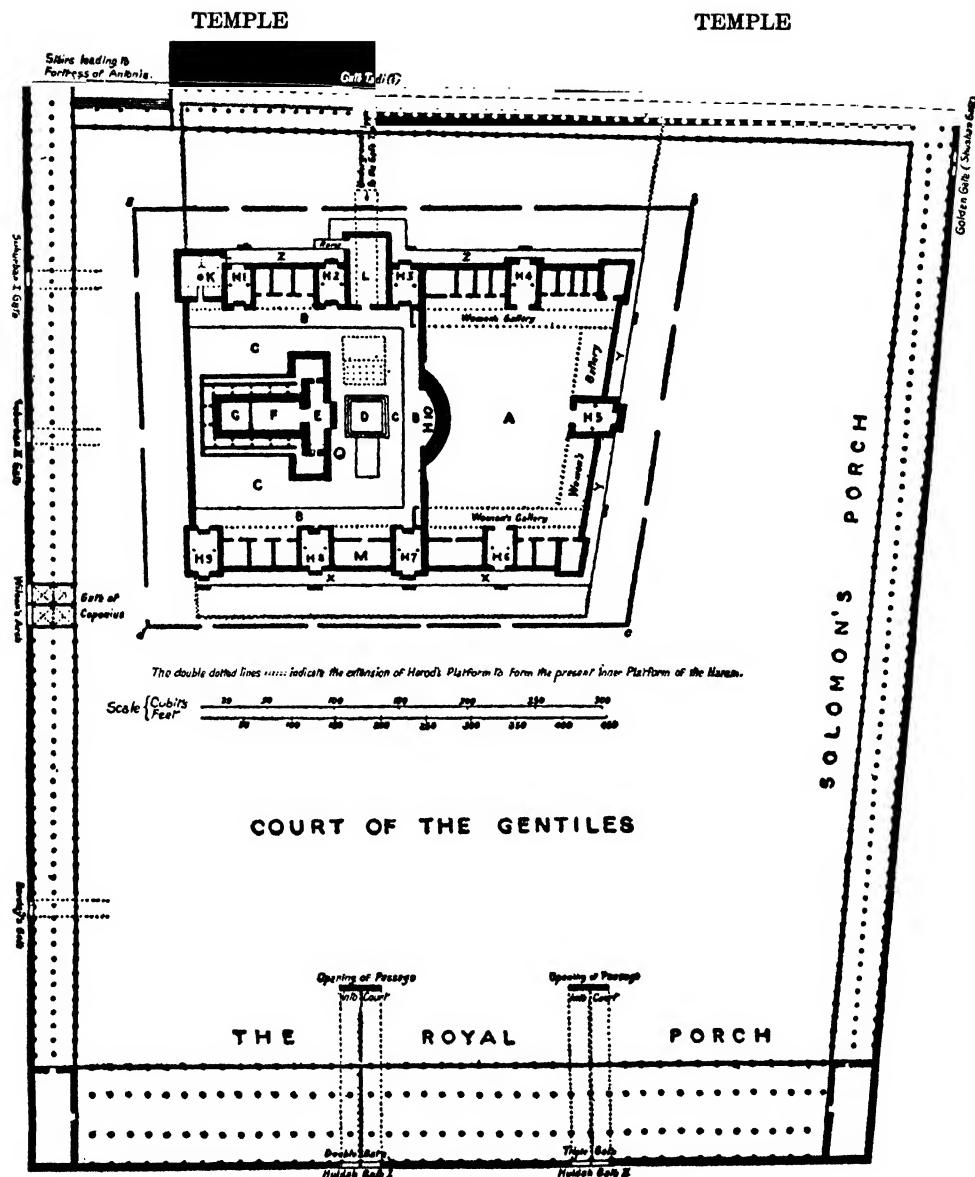

The inner court is represented in the Mishna as a rectangle, 187 cubits by 135, the outer or women's court as an exact square, 135 cubits by 135 (and so on most plans, e.g. DB iv. 713). But the rock levels of the Haram, the oblique line of the E. side of the platform—due probably to the lie of the rock required for the foundation of the massive E. wall—and the repeated appearance of 11 and its multiples (note that 187 = 11 × 17) in the details of the totals in Middoth v. 1, all combine to justify a suspicion as to the accuracy of the figures. On the accompanying plan the whole inner court, b and c, is entered as 170 cubits long from E. to W., and 160 broad. The outer court, A, has a free space between the colonnades of 135 by an average of about 110. The total dimensions of the sanctuary, including the surrounding buildings and the terrace (chēl) are as follows: (1) length from W. to E. across the rock, 315 cubits or 462 ft.; (2) width from N. to S. 250 cubits or 367 ft. The data on which these measurements are based will be found in the essays in the Exp. Times, already frequently referred to.

In the latest, and in some respects the best, plan of Herod's Temple by Waterhouse in Sanday's Sacred Sites of the Gospels, the data of the Mishna are set aside, and a large 'court of men of Israel' is inserted in the western court in addition to those above described. Against this view it may be urged, (1) that it requires its author to remove the eastern court, which was an essential part of the sanctuary, from a place on the present inner platform of the Haram; (2) the consequence of this is to narrow unduly the space between the Beautiful Gate and Solomon's Porch. If there is one statement of the Mishna that is worthy of credit, it is that 'the largest free space was on the south, the second largest on the east, the third on the north, and the smallest on the west' (Midd. ii. 1). But, as the plan referred to shows, this is not the case if the court of the women is removed so far to the east by the insertion of a large 'court of Israel'. The plan is also open to criticism on other grounds (cf. G. A. Smith, op. cit. ii. 508 ff.).

The altar of burnt-offering, D, was, like that restored by Judas the Maccabee, of unhewn stone, and measured at the base 32 cubits by 32 (47 feet square, thus covering almost the whole of the sacred rock, see § 6 (b)), decreasing by three stages till the altar-hearth was only 24 cubits square. The priests went up by an inclined approach on the south side in accordance with Ex 20²⁶. To the north of the altar was the place where the sacrificial victims were slaughtered and prepared for the altar. It was provided with rings, pillars, hooks, and tables. A laver, O, for the priests' ablutions stood to the west of the approach to the altar.

12. The Temple building.—A few yards beyond the great altar rose the Temple itself, a glittering mass of white marble and gold. Twelve steps, corresponding to the height (12 half-cubits) of the massive and probably gold-covered stereobate on which the building stood, led up to the porch.

The porch was probably 96 cubits in height and of the same breadth at the base. The Mishna gives its height, including the 6 cubits of the podium or stereobate, as 100 cubits.

KEY TO PLAN OF HEROD'S TEMPLE AND COURTS.

- a b c d*, the surrounding balustrade (sdrzg). X Y Z, the terrace (chēl).
A, Court of the Women. BBB, Court of Israel. CCC, Court of the Priests.
D, altar of burnt-offering. E F G, porch, holy place, and holy of holies. O, the laver.
H, 1-9, Gates of the Sanctuary (Middoth, i. 4, 5), viz.: 1, gate of the House Moked; 2, Corban gate; 3, gate Nitsus; 4, the gate of Nicanor, or the Beautiful Gate; 5, the water gate; 6, gate of the firstborn; 7, the fuel gate; 8, the 'upper gate,' wrongly called the gate of Nicanor.
K, the guardhouse Moked (=hearth). L, the 'northern edifice that was between the two gates' (see BJ vi. ii. 7 [Niese, § 150]). Here, it is suggested, the sacrificial victims were examined by the priests, having been brought in either by the underground passage shown on the plan, or by the ramp also shown. The upper storey may have contained the important 'chamber of the councillors' (parhedrin) (Yōmā, i. 1).

M, the chamber Gazith, in which the priests on duty assembled for prayer (Tamēd, iv. end). There are not sufficient data for fixing the location of the other chambers mentioned in the Mishna. Their distribution on the plan is purely conjectural.

TEMPLE

The real depth was doubtless, as in Solomon's Temple (§ 3), 10 cubits in the centre, but now increased to 20 cubits at the wings (so Josephus). As the plan shows, the porch outflanked the main body of the Temple, which was 60—the Mishna has 70—cubits in breadth, by 18 cubits at either wing. These dimensions show that Herod's porch resembled the pylons of an Egyptian temple. It probably tapered towards the top, and was surmounted by an Egyptian cornice with the familiar cavetto moulding (cf. sketch below). The entrance to the porch measured 40 cubits by 20 (Middoth, iii. 7), corresponding to the dimensions of 'the holy place.' There was no door.

The 'great door of the house' (20 cubits by 10) was 'all over covered with gold,' in front of which hung a richly embroidered Babylonian veil, while above the lintel was figured a huge golden vine (Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 3, BJ v. v. 4). The interior area of Herod's Temple was, for obvious reasons, the same as that of its predecessors. A hall, 61 cubits long by 20 wide, was divided between the holy place (40 by 20, but with the height increased to 40 cubits [Middoth, iv. 6]) and the most holy place (20 by 20 by 20 high). The extra cubit was occupied by a double curtain embroidered in colours, which screened off 'the holy of holies' (cf. Midd. iv. 7 with Yōmd. v. 2). This is the veil of the Temple referred to in Mt 27⁵¹ and || (cf. He 6¹⁹ etc.).

DIAGRAMMATIC SECTION OF TEMPLE AND PORCH.

As in Solomon's Temple, three storeys of side-chambers, prob. 30 cubits in height, ran round three sides of the main building. But by the provision of a passage-way giving access to the different storeys, and making a third outside wall necessary, the surface covered by the whole was now 96 cubits in length by 60 in breadth, not reckoning the two wings of the porch. Over the whole length of the two holy places a second story was raised, entirely, as it seems, for architectural effect.

The total height of the naos is uncertain. The entries by which the Mishna makes up a total of 100 cubits are not such as inspire confidence; the laws of architectural proportion suggest that the 100, although also given by Josephus, should be reduced to 60 cubits or 88 feet, equal to the breadth of the naos and lateral chambers. On the plan the lowest side chambers are intended to be 5 cubits wide and their wall 3 (both as in § 3), the passage-way 3, and the outside wall 3, giving a total width of 14 + 6 + 20 + 6 + 14 = 60 cubits (Jos. v. v. 4; cf. DB iv. 715 for the corresponding figures of Midd. iv. 7). The result of taking the principles of proportion between the various parts as the decisive factor when Josephus and the Mishna are at variance is exhibited in the above diagram, which combines sections through the porch and holy place.

The furniture of 'the holy place' remained as in former days. Before the veil stood the altar of incense; against the south wall the seven-branched golden lampstand, and opposite to it the table of shewbread (Jos. BJ v. v. 5). A special interest attaches to the two latter from the fact, known to every one, that they were among the Temple spoils carried to Rome by Titus to adorn his triumph, and are still to be seen among the sculptures of the Arch of Titus.

'The most holy place' was empty as before (Jos. ib.), save for a stone on which the high priest, who alone had access to this innermost shrine, deposited the censer of incense on the Day of Atonement (Yōmd. v. 2).

All in all, Herod's Temple was well worthy of a place among the architectural wonders of the world. One has but to think of the extraordinary height and strength of the outer retaining walls, parts of which still claim our admiration, and of the wealth of art and ornament lavished upon the porticoes and buildings. The artistic effect was further heightened by the succession of marble-paved terraces and courts, rising each above and within the other, from the outer court to the Temple floor. For once we may entirely credit the Jewish historian when he tells us that from a distance the whole resembled a snow-covered mountain, and that the light reflected from the gilded porch dazzled the spectator like 'the sun's own rays' (Jos. BJ v. v. 6).

13. The daily Temple service in NT times.—This article may fitly close with a brief account of the principal act of Jewish worship in the days of our Lord, which centred round the daily or 'continual' (Heb. tamtd, Ex 29⁴²) burnt-offering, presented every morning and every evening, or rather mid-afternoon, throughout the year, in the name, and on behalf, of the whole community of Israel (see Ex 29³⁸⁻⁴², Nu 28³⁻⁸). A detailed account of this service, evidently based on reliable tradition, is given in the Mishna treatise Tamtd, of which English translations will be found in Barclay's Talmud, and in PEFSL 1885, 119 ff. (cf. also the full exposition given by Schürer, GJV ii. 288-299 = 345-357 [HJP II. i. 273-299]).

The detachment of priests on duty in the rotation of their 'courses' (Lk 1⁵) slept in the 'house' Mok-d (Ḥon on plan). About cock-crow the priests who wished to be drawn for the morning service bathed and robed, and thereafter repaired to the chamber Gazith (ḤM) in order to determine by lot those of their number who should 'officiate.' By the first lot a priest was selected to remove the ashes from the altar of burnt-offering, and prepare the wood, etc., for the morning sacrifice. This done, 'the presiding official said to them, Come and draw (to decide) (1) who shall slay, (2) who shall toss (the blood against the altar), (3) who shall remove the ashes from the incense altar, (4) who shall clean the lampstand, (5)-(10) who shall carry the parts of the victim to the foot of the altar (six parts are specified), (11) who shall prepare the (meal-offering) of fine flour, (12) the baked offering (of the high priest), and (13) the wine of the drink-offering' (Mishna, Tamtd, iii. 1).

At the hour of dawn the preparations here set forth were begun, and the Temple gates thrown open. After the victim, a yearling lamb, had been slain, the incense altar prepared and the lamps trimmed, the officiating priests assembled in the chamber Gazith for a short religious service, after which there commenced the solemn acts of worship in which the tamtd culminated—the offering of incense and the burning of the sacrificial victim. The priest, chosen as before by lot (Lk 1⁵), entered the Temple with a censer of incense, and, while the smoke was ascending from the altar within the Holy Place, the worshippers without prostrated themselves in adoration and silent prayer. After the priestly benediction had been pronounced from the steps of the porch (Tamtd, vii. 2), the several parts of the sacrifice were thrown upon the altar and consumed. The pouring of the drink-offering was now the signal for the choir of Levites to begin the chanting of the Psalm for the day. At intervals two priests blew on silver trumpets, at whose sound the people again prostrated themselves. With the close of the Psalm the public service was at an end, and the private sacrifices were then offered.

The order of the mid-afternoon service differed from the above only in that the incense was offered after the burning of the victim instead of before. The lamps, also, on the 'golden candlestick,' were lighted at the 'evening' service.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

TEMPTATION.—The English words 'tempt' and 'temptation' are in the OT—with the exception of Mal 3¹⁸, where a synonym bāchan is used,—the tr. of various forms of the root nissāh, which is most frequently rendered 'prove.' In Gn 22¹ RV tr. 'God did prove Abraham.' But RV retains 'temptation' for (a) God's testing of Pharaoh's character and disposition (Dt 4², RVm 'trials' or 'evidences'; cf. 7¹⁰ 29³); (b) Israel's distrustful putting of God Himself to the proof (Dt 6¹⁶; cf. Ex 17² 7, Nu 14²², Ps 78¹⁸ u. 44). In Ps 95⁸ RV rightly keeps 'Massah' as a proper name, the reference being to the historic murmuring at Rephidim (Ex 17¹; cf. Dt 33⁸, Ps 81⁷).

Driver (ICC, on Dt 6¹⁶) points out, in a valuable note, that 'nissāh is a neutral word, and means to test or prove a person, to see whether he will act in a particular way (Ex 16⁴, Jg 22³ 3¹), or whether the character he bears is well established (1 K 10¹). God thus proves a person, or puts him to the test, to see if his fidelity or affection is sincere (Gn 22¹, Ex 20²⁰, Dt 8¹³; cf. Ps 26¹); and men test, or prove Jehovah when they act as if doubting whether His promise be true, or whether He is faithful to His revealed character (Ex 17² 7, Nu 14²², Ps 106⁴; cf. Is 7¹²).'

2. The Gr. word peirasmos is the usual LXX rendering of nissāh. It is also 'a neutral word,' though in the NT it sometimes means enticement to sin (Mt 4¹, 1 Co 7³, Rev 2¹⁰ etc.; cf. 'the tempter,' Mt 4¹, 1 Th 3⁵). In the RV it is almost always tr. 'temptation,' with the occasional marginal alternative 'trial' (Ja 1², 1 P 1⁶); the exceptions are Ac 20⁹, Rev 3¹⁰, where 'trial' is found in the text. The Amer. RV substitutes 'try' or 'make trial of' ('trial') for 'tempt' ('temptation') 'wherever enticement to what is wrong is not evidently spoken of' (see Appendix to RV, note vi.); but 'temptation' is retained in Mt 6¹⁸—Lk 11⁴, where the range of the petition cannot be thus limited; cf. Ja 1².

3. In expounding the prayer 'Bring us not into temptation,' and other passages in which the word has a wider meaning than enticement to sin, the difficulty is partially, but only partially, to be ascribed to the narrowing of the significance of the English word since 1611. If, as Driver thinks, 'to tempt' has, in modern English, acquired the sense of provoking or enticing a person in order that he may act in a particular way (= Heb. hissith), there is no doubt that 'tempt' is often 'a misleading rendering.' Into such temptation the heavenly Father cannot bring His children; our knowledge of His character prevents us from tracing to Him any allurements to evil. The profound argument of St. James (1¹³) is that God is 'Himself absolutely unsusceptible to evil,' and therefore He is 'incapable of tempting others to evil' (Mayor, Com., in loc.). But the difficulty is not removed when the petition is regarded as meaning 'bring us not into trial.' Can a Christian pray to be exempted from the testing without which sheltered innocence cannot become approved virtue? Can he ask that he may never be exposed to those trials upon the endurance of which his blessedness depends (Ja 1¹²)? The sufficient answer is that He who was 'in all points tempted like as we are' (He 4¹⁴) has taught us to pray 'after this manner.' His own prayer in Gethsemane (Mt 26⁴¹) and His exhortation to His disciples (v.⁴¹), prove, by example and by precept, that when offered in subjection to the central, all-dominating desire 'Thy will be done,' the petition 'Bring us not into temptation' is always fitting on the lips of those who know that 'the flesh is weak.' Having thus prayed, those who find themselves ringed round (Ja 1², peri) by temptations will be strengthened to endure joyfully. Their experience is not joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, Divine wisdom enables them to 'count it all joy' as being a part of the discipline which is designed to make them 'perfect and entire, lacking in nothing.'

On the Temptation of our Lord see JESUS CHRIST, p. 447.

TEN.—See NUMBER, § 7.

TEN COMMANDMENTS.—1. The traditional history of the Decalogue.—The 'ten words' were, according to Ex 20, proclaimed vocally by God on Mt. Sinai, and written by Him on two stones, and given to Moses (24¹² 31¹⁸ 32¹⁵ 10; cf. Dt 5²² 9¹⁰ 11). When these were broken by Moses on his descent from the mount (Ex 32¹, Dt 9¹⁷), he was commanded to prepare two fresh stones like the first, on which God re-wrote the 'ten words' (Ex 34¹ 28, Dt 10² 4). This is clearly the meaning of Ex, as the text now stands. But many critics think that v.²⁸ originally referred not to the 'ten words' of Ex 20, but to the laws of 34¹⁻²⁸, and that these laws were J's version of the Decalogue. It must suffice to say here that if, as on the whole seems likely, v.²⁸ refers to our Decalogue, we must distinguish the command to write the covenant laws in v.²⁷, and the words 'he wrote' in v.²⁸, in which case the subject of the latter will be God, as required by 34¹. The two stones were immediately placed in the ark, which had been prepared by Moses specially for that purpose (Dt 10¹⁻⁵ [probably based on JE]). There they were believed to have permanently remained (1 K 8⁹, Dt 10⁵) until the ark was, according to Rabbinical tradition, hidden by Jeremiah, when Jerusalem was finally taken by Nebuchadnezzar.

2. The documentary history of the Decalogue.—A comparison of the Decalogue in Ex 20 with that of Dt 5 renders it probable that both are later recensions of a much shorter original. The phrases peculiar to Dt 5 are in most cases obviously characteristic of D, and must be regarded as later expansions. Such are 'as the Lord thy God commanded thee' in the 4th and 5th 'word,' and 'that it may go well with thee' in the 5th. In the last commandment the first two clauses are transposed, and a more appropriate word ('desire') is used for coveting a neighbour's wife. Here evidently we have also a later correction. Curiously enough Ex 20, while thus generally more primitive than Deut., shows signs of an even later recension. The reason for keeping the Sabbath, God's rest after creation, is clearly based on Gn 2¹⁻³, which belongs to the post-exilic Priestly Code (P). The question is further complicated by the fact that several phrases in what is common to Ex 20 and Deut. are of a distinctly Deuteronomistic character, as 'that is within thy gates' in the 4th commandment, 'that thy days may be long' 'upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee' in the 5th. We see, then, that the Decalogue of Ex. is in all probability the result of a double revision (a Deuteronomistic and a Priestly) of a much more simple original. It has been suggested that originally all the commandments consisted of a single clause, and that the name 'word' could be more naturally applied to such. In favour of this view, beyond what has been already said, it is argued that this short form would be more suitable for inscription on stone.

3. How were the 'ten words' divided?—The question turns on the beginning and the end of the Decalogue. Are what we know as the First and Second, and again what we know as the Tenth, one or two commandments? The arrangement which treats the First and Second as one, and the Tenth as two, is that of the Massoretic Hebrew text both in Ex. and Dt., and was that of the whole Western Church from the time of St. Augustine to the Reformation, and is still that of the Roman and Lutheran Churches. Moreover, it may seem to have some support from the Deuteronomic version of the Tenth Commandment. Our present arrangement, however, is that of the early Jewish and early Christian Churches, and seems on the whole more probable in itself. A wife, being regarded as a chattel, would naturally come under the general prohibition against coveting a neighbour's goods. If, as already suggested, the original form of the commandment was a single clause, it would have run, 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house' (see 8 (x.)).

4. The contents of each table.—If, as suggested, the original commandments were single clauses, it is most natural to suppose that they were evenly divided between the two tables—five in each. This view is adopted without hesitation by Philo, and it is not contradicted by our Lord's division of the Law into the love of God and the love of one's neighbour. It would be difficult to class parents in the category of neighbour, whereas the reverence due to them was by the ancients regarded as a specially sacred obligation, and was included, by both Greeks and Romans at any rate, under the notion of piety.

5. Order of the Decalogue.—The Hebrew texts of Ex 20 and Dt 5 agree in the order—murder, adultery, theft—as the subjects of the 6th, 7th, and 8th Commandments. The LXX (best MSS) in Ex. have the order—adultery, theft, murder; in Dt.—adultery, murder, theft. This last is borne out by Ro 13^a and by Philo, and may possibly have been original.

6. Mosaic origin of the Decalogue.—The chief difficulty arises out of the Second Commandment. There can be little doubt that from primitive times the Israelites were monolatrous, worshipping J^h as their national God. But it is argued that this does not appear to have prevented them from recognizing to some extent inferior divine beings, such as those represented by teraphim, or even from representing their God under visible symbols. Thus in Jg 17^a we find Micah making an image of Jahweh, without any disapproval by the writer. David himself had teraphim in his house (1 S 19¹³⁻¹⁶); Isaiah speaks of a pillar as a natural and suitable symbol of worship (Is 19¹²); Hosea classes pillar, ephod, and teraphim with sacrifices as means of worship, of which Israel would be deprived for a while as a punishment (Hos 3⁴). The frequent condemnation of ashêroth (sacred tree-images, AV 'groves') suggests that they too were common features of Semitic worship, and not confined to the worship of heathen gods. But it may reasonably be doubted whether these religious symbols were always regarded as themselves objects of worship, though tending to become so. Again, it may well have been the case that under the deteriorating influences of surrounding Semitic worship, the people, without generally worshipping heathen gods, failed to reach the high ideal of their traditional religion and worship. We may fairly say, then, that the Decalogue in its earliest form, if not actually Mosaic, represents in all probability the earliest religious tradition of Israel.

7. Object of the Decalogue.—Looking from a Christian point of view, we are apt to regard the Decalogue as at any rate an incomplete code of religion and morality. More probably the 'ten words' should be regarded as a few easily remembered rules necessary for a half-civilized agricultural people, who owed allegiance to a national God, and were required to live at peace with each other. They stand evidently in close relation to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21-23), of which they may be regarded as either a summary or the kernel. With one exception (the Fifth, see below, 8 (v.)) they are, like most rules given to children, of a negative character—'thou shalt not,' etc.

8. Interpretation of the Decalogue.—There are a few obscure phrases, or other matters which call for comment.

(i.) 'before me' may mean either 'in my presence,' condemning the eclectic worship of many gods, or 'in preference to me.' Neither interpretation would necessarily exclude the belief that other gods were suitable objects of worship for other peoples (cf. Jg 11²⁴).

(ii.) 'the water under the earth.' The Israelites conceived of the sea as extending under the whole land (hence the springs). This, being in their view the larger part, might be used to express the whole. Fish and other marine animals are, of course, intended.

'unto thousands,' better 'a thousand generations,' as in RVm. The punishment by God of children for the faults of parents was felt to be a moral difficulty, and was denied by Ezekiel (ch. 18). Similar action by judicial authorities was forbidden by Deut. (24¹⁶; cf. 2 K 14⁶). But the words show that if evil actions influence for evil the descendants of the evil-doer either by heredity or by imitation, the influence of good actions for good is far more potent.

(iii.) 'Thou . . . in vain,' i.e. 'for falsehood.' This may mean 'Thou shalt not perjure thyself' or 'Thou shalt not swear and then not keep thy oath.' The latter seems to be the current Jewish interpretation (see Mt 5³⁷). Philo takes it in both senses.

(iv.) 'within thy gates,' i.e. 'thy cities' (see 2). 'for in six days,' etc. We find in OT three distinct reasons for the observance of the Sabbath. (1) The oldest is that of the Book of the Covenant in Ex 23¹², 'that thine ox and thine ass may have rest, and the son of thine handmaid and the stranger may be refreshed.' In Ex 20 and Dt 5 the rest of the domestic animals and servants appears as part of the injunction itself. (2) In Dt 5 there is added as a secondary purpose, 'that thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest as well as thou'; whereas the chief purpose of the observance is as a commemoration of the Exodus. (3) Ex 20, revised after the Exile at or after the time that the Priestly Code was published, bases the observance on the Sabbath rest of God after the Creation (Gn 2¹⁻³ P).

(v.) 'Honour thy Father,' etc. It is not improbable that this commandment has been modified in form, and was originally negative like all the rest, and referred like them to a prohibited action rather than to a correct feeling, as, very possibly, 'Thou shalt not smite,' etc. (cf. Ex 21¹⁷⁻¹⁹). At a later time such an outrage would have been hardly contemplated, and would naturally have given way to the present commandment. The word 'honour' seems, according to current Jewish teaching (see Lightfoot on Mt 15⁸), to have specially included feeding and clothing, and Christ assumes rather than inculcates as new this application of the commandment. The Rabbinical teachers had encouraged men in evading a recognized law by their quibbles.

(x.) 'Thou shalt not . . . house.' Deut. transposes the first two clauses, and reads 'desire' with wife. The teaching of Ex 20 is, beyond question, relatively the earliest. The wife was originally regarded as one of the chattels, though undoubtedly the most important chattel, of the house, or general establishment.

On the Decalogue in the NT see art. LAW (IN NT).

F. H. WOODS.

TENT.—Apart from the traditions of the patriarchs as 'quiet' men, 'dwelling in tents' (Gn 25²⁷ RVm), the settled Hebrews preserved a reminder of their nomad ancestry in such phrases as 'going to one's tent' for 'to go home' (Jg 19⁹), and in the recurring call, 'to thy tents' (i.e. to your homes), O Israel' (1 K 12¹⁴ etc.). For an interesting case of adherence to the 'nomadic ideal' on religious grounds, see RECHARITES.

The Hebrew tent, even in later days, cannot have differed much from the simple Bedouin tent of to-day, made by sewing together strips of the native goats' hair cloth (cf. Ca 14¹ 'I am black as the tents of Kedar'). These 'curtains' (Jer 4²⁰, Ex 26² and oft.) are held up by poles, generally 9 in number, arranged in three rows of three, and 6-7 ft. high, which are kept in position by ropes—the 'cords' of EV, and the 'tent-cord' of Job 4²¹ RV—attached to 'stakes' or 'tent-pins' driven into the ground by a mallet (Jg 4²¹). The larger the tent, the longer the cords and the stronger the stakes, according to the figure, Is 54². The tent, then as now, was probably divided into two parts by hanging a curtain from the three middle poles along the length of the tent—the front division open and free to all, the back closed and reserved for the women and the privacy of domestic life (Jg 15¹, Ca 3⁴; cf. Gn 18¹).

In time of war we read both of booths (2 S 11¹¹, so RV rightly for AV 'tents') and of tents (2 K 7¹, Jer 37¹⁰). The Assyrian sculptures represent the soldiers' tents as conical in shape, supported by a central pole with two arms. On the famous bronze sheathing of the palace gates at Balawat, representing every detail of the conduct of war, the royal pavilion (1 K 20¹²⁻¹⁶) is frequently represented. It was rectangular in shape, with ornamental wooden pillars with floral capitals at the four corners. The walls were probably of linen, and the roof evidently of tapestry or other rich material edged with tassels (see the plates in Billerbeck's Die Palastore Salmannassars II., 1908).

In early times a special tent was pitched for a newly wedded pair (Ps 19⁴, Jl 2¹⁴; cf. 2 S 16²²), as is still the custom among the Arabs. The canopy under which Jewish couples are married at the present day still retains the name, as it is a survival of the ancient chuppah or bridal tent.

Priscilla and Aquila, as well as the Apostle Paul, were tentmakers (Ac 18³). See SPINNING AND WEAVING, §§1, 4 (c). For the tent of meeting (RV) see TABERNACLE. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

TEPHON.—One of the towns in Judaea fortified by Bacchides (1 Mac 9⁹). Tephon was probably an old Tappuah; but whether it was Tappuah 1 or 2, or Beth-tappuah, is uncertain.

TERAH.—The father of Abraham, Nahor, and Haran (Gn 11²⁴⁻³², 1 Ch 1²⁴, Lk 3³⁴). Along with his three sons he is said to have migrated from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran, where he died. In Jos 24² it is said that he 'served other gods'—a statement which gave rise to some fanciful Jewish haggadōth about Terah as a maker of idols. 2. A station of the Israelites (Nu 33²⁷⁻²⁸).

TERAPHIM.—See IMAGES; ISRAEL, p. 412^b; also p. 569^a.

TEREBINTH does not occur at all in AV, and only thrice in RV, being substituted in Is 6¹³ for 'tell tree,' in Hos 4¹³ for 'elm,' and in Sir 24¹⁶ for 'turpentine tree.' Strong reasons, however, can be urged for rendering by 'terebinth' in a great many instances where EV has 'oak' (see OAK). The terebinth or turpentine tree (Sir 24¹⁶)—Pistacia terebinthus, the butm of the Arabs—is one of the most imposing trees in Palestine. In almost every locality where it is allowed to attain its full growth—30 to 40 feet high—it is associated with a sacred tomb or grove; many such groves are still deeply venerated in Galilee. Dwarfed trees occur everywhere among the oak brushwood. The tree has pinnate, lance-shaped leaves and small reddish clusters like immature grape clusters; it is also often covered with curious red galls—like pieces of coral. The dark overhanging foliage affords a grateful shade in summer, but in autumn the leaves change colour and fall off. Cf. MAMRE. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

TERESH.—A chamberlain of Ahasuerus (Est 2²¹); called in Ad. Est. 12¹ Tharra.

TERTIUS.—St. Paul's amanuensis who wrote Romans and added a personal salutation (16²²). It was the Apostle's custom to employ a scribe (no doubt dictating shorthand notes, a common practice), but to add a short autograph himself. The autographs probably are: Ro 16²²⁻²⁷, 1 Co 16²¹⁻²⁴ (expressly), 2 Co 13¹², Gal 6¹¹⁻¹⁶ (expressly), Eph 6²¹, Ph 4²¹⁻²³, Col 4¹⁸ (expressly), 1 Th 5²⁸⁻³¹, 2 Th 3¹⁷ (expressly). In the Pastoral Epistles and Philemon, which are personal letters, the presence of autograph passages is more uncertain.

A. J. MACLEAN.

TERTULLUS.—This name (a diminutive of Tertius) is that of the advocate hired by the Jews to speak for them against St. Paul before Felix (Ac 24¹). From his name we should judge him to be a Roman; probably he was not a Jew. It has been conjectured (Dean Milman) that his speech is a translation from the Latin, though Greek was allowed in the law courts. It is a gross piece of flattery, for the Jews were in constant opposition to Felix. It accuses St. Paul of stirring up disturbances, of being the ringleader of an unlawful sect, and of profaning the Temple (cf. the reply in 25⁸).

A. J. MACLEAN.

TESTAMENT.—The word is not found in the OT. In the text of the RV of the NT it occurs only twice (He 9¹⁷), and is used to translate the Gr. word diathēkē, elsewhere rendered 'covenant' (with 'testament' in the margin). In He 9¹⁵⁻²⁰ diathēkē is three times translated 'covenant,' and twice 'testament.' An indication of the difficulty involved in its interpretation is given in the marginal note: 'The Greek word here used signifies both covenant and testament.'

In classical Greek diathēkē means 'a testamentary disposition,' and synthēkē 'a covenant.' The latter word connotes an agreement between two persons regarded as being on an equal footing (syn-); hence it is unsuitable as a designation of God's gracious covenants with men. The LXX therefore use diathēkē as the equivalent of the Heb. word for 'covenant' (bērit), its most frequent application being to the Divine covenants, which are not matters of mutual arrangement between God and His people, but are rather 'analogous to the disposition of property by testament.' In the LXX diathēkē was extended to covenants between man and man, but Westcott says: 'There is not the least trace of the meaning "testament" in the Greek Old Test. Scriptures, and the idea of a "testament" was indeed foreign to the Jews till the time of the Herods' (Com. on Hebrews, Additional Note on 9¹⁷).

In the NT 'covenant' is unquestionably the correct translation of diathēkē when it occurs 'in strictly Biblical and Hebraic surroundings' [see COVENANT]. But, as Ramsay has pointed out, there was a development in the meaning of the word after the publication of the LXX. This development was 'partly in the line of natural growth in Greek will-making, . . . partly in the way of assimilation of Roman "deas on wills" (Hist. Com. on Galatians, p. 360). Therefore the question which the interpreter must ask is, 'What ideas did the word convey to the first readers of the NT writings?'

The Revisers' preference for 'testament' in He 9¹⁷ is strongly confirmed by the fact that 'the Roman will . . . appeared in the East as a document which had no standing and no meaning until after the testator's death, and was revocable by him at pleasure.' But whilst the Epistle to the Hebrews was written to those who knew only the Roman will, the Epistle to the Galatians was written at a time when in Hellenized Asia Minor 'irrevocability was a characteristic feature' of Greek will-making. The Galatian will had to do primarily with the appointment of an heir; no second will could invalidate it or 'add essentially novel conditions.' Such a will furnished St. Paul (3¹⁵) with an analogy; like God's word, it was 'irrevocable.' It might be supplemented in details, but 'in essence the second will must confirm the original will' (Ramsay, op. cit. p. 349 ff.).

In the NT, testamentum is the uniform Lat. tr. of diathēkē. Frequently, therefore, it means 'covenant' (Lk 1², Ac 7⁸, Ro 11²⁷ etc.). This use of the Latin word is the explanation of the fact that, as early as the second cent. of our era, the books of the Old and New Covenants were spoken of as the Old and New Testaments.

TETH

TETH.—The ninth letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 9th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

TETRARCH.—The transliteration of a Gr. word (tetrarchēs) whose literal meaning is 'the ruler of a fourth part.' As a title it lost its strict etymological force, and was used of 'a petty prince,' or 'the ruler of a district.' In the NT 'Herod the tetrarch' is Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great; he ruled over Galilee and Peræa (Mt 14¹, Lk 3¹, 9¹, Ac 13¹), and is popularly styled 'king' (Mk 6¹⁴, Mt 14⁹). Two other tetrarchs are mentioned in Lk 3¹; viz., Herod Philip, the brother of Antipas, who ruled over the Ituræan and Trachonitic territory; and Lysanias, who was Tetrarch of Abilene 'in the fifteenth year of Tiberius' (see Schürer, HJP I. II., App. 1). J. G. TASKER.

TEXT, VERSIONS, AND LANGUAGES OF OT.—

1. LANGUAGES OF THE OT.—The OT, except certain small sections, was written in Hebrew, and it has been preserved in its original language. But Jer 10¹, Dn 2-7²⁸, Ezr 4²⁻⁶ 7¹²⁻²⁶ are in Aramaic, though it is disputed in the case of Dn 2-7²⁸ whether this was the original language, or that of an Aramaic version which has replaced a Hebrew original. Hebrew and Aramaic alike belong to the group of languages known as Semitic, of which Assyrian (or the language of the ancient Assyrians and Babylonians) and Arabic are also important members.

2. The Hebrew language: Character and History.—Hebrew is closely allied to Phœnician, to the language of the Moabites represented by Meshah's inscription (c. B.C. 800), and to the language spoken in Canaan before (as well as after) the Hebrew invasion, known in part from the Canaanite glosses in the Tell el-Amarna tablets (c. B.C. 1400), in part from Canaanitish names contained in ancient monuments, as, for example, the list of places in Canaan recorded as among his conquests by Thothmes III. (c. B.C. 1600). It is held by some scholars that the conquering Israelites adopted the language of Canaan, having previously spoken a language more nearly akin to Arabic (so, e.g., Hommel, AHT 120, 218). From the time at least when they were once well settled in the country, Hebrew was alike the colloquial and the literary language of the Israelites. Some difference, such as is usual, no doubt always existed between the colloquial and the literary language, though our knowledge of the colloquial is only such as we can draw by inference from the literature. But there came a time when Hebrew ceased to be the colloquial language, being replaced by Aramaic, and survived only as a literary language. The disuse of Hebrew in favour of Aramaic cannot be precisely dated, and was probably enough gradual; according to 2 K 18²⁶, in the time of Isaiah (8th cent. B.C.), Aramaic was unintelligible to the Jewish populace, but as a language of diplomacy was spoken by Assyrian and Jewish officials alike. Apparently as late as Nehemiah (5th cent. B.C.) the colloquial language of the Jews in Palestine was still Hebrew, called 'Jewish' (Neh 13²⁴ as in 2 K 18²⁶). In the first century A.D., as the few sayings of the popular language preserved in the NT (such as Talitha cumi) prove, it was Aramaic. Between these two dates, and, as we may infer from the increasing influence of Aramaic on the later books of the OT, considerably nearer the earlier than the later date, the change was made. Long before Aramaic replaced Hebrew as the spoken language, it exercised an influence through the spoken on the written language such as is commonly exercised by the language of one neighbouring people on another,—that is to say, Hebrew borrowed words from Aramaic, as English borrows words from French and French from English. The Northern Kingdom was first brought into closer proximity with Aramaic-speaking peoples, and later the Southern Kingdom; and Aramaisms have consequently been regarded as pointing to a northern, or to a relatively late, origin of the writings in which they occur. Certainly any large presence of Aramaisms, and in particular any conspicuous Aramaizing of the syntax, due to the influence on their writings of the language which the later writers commonly spoke, such as we find, for example, in Daniel and Ecclesiastes, points to a late date.

Other languages besides Aramaic contributed to the vocabulary of Hebrew: Assyrian, indirectly through the Canaanites from the earliest times to an extent not easily to be defined, and later directly; Persian, after the Persian conquest of Babylon in 538; Greek, after the time of Alexander (332 B.C.); and Latin, after the establishment of Roman suzerainty over Judæa in the first century B.C. Latin words are found in the Hebrew of the Mishna, but not in the OT; a few Greek words in the latest writings of the OT (particularly Daniel, about B.C. 167) and very many in the Mishna; Persian words in some of the post-exilic literature (Esther, Canticles, Tobit).

3. The Hebrew alphabet vowelless.—The Hebrew alphabet used by the OT writers consisted of twenty-two consonants: it contained no vowels, in this resembling Phœnician, Moabitic, and the ancient Arabic and Syriac alphabets. Our knowledge of the pronunciation of Hebrew words, as far as the vowels are concerned, depends on three main sources: (1) Jewish tradition, which is embodied in vowel signs invented between the 4th and 9th centuries A.D., and written under, over, or in the consonants of the ancient text; (2) the Greek versions, which transliterate a large number of Hebrew words, especially, but by no means only, the proper names; (3) the Assyrian texts: these, being written in a language which expressed in writing vowel sounds as well as consonantal, give us the vowels of such Hebrew names as they cite.

Though in the oldest Hebrew MSS of the Bible the consonants of the original text are accompanied by the vowels which express at once the traditional pronunciation and the traditional interpretation of the text, it is now as generally accepted that the vowels formed no part of the original text as that the earth revolves round the sun. Down to the 17th century it was otherwise; and that century was marked by a final and keen discussion of this point.

4. Transliteration of Hebrew adopted in this article.—Since considerable importance attaches to this Jewish tradition as to the pronunciation, it will be necessary to represent the vowels in our discussion of the text, but it is important also to indicate their secondary origin and subordinate position. Throughout this article, then, the Hebrew consonants will be represented by equivalent or approximately equivalent English capitals, except the 1st and 16th letters of the Hebrew alphabet, which, being gutturals with no approximate equivalent in English, will be retained in their Hebrew form (א, פ), and may be passed over unpronounced by the English reader. The vowels will be represented by English small letters printed under the consonant after which they are to be pronounced; thus DRR, pronounced dabar. The Jewish scholars distinguished by different signs between long and short vowels; no attempt will be made here to mark these distinctions, and the peculiar half-vowels, the shéva's, as they are termed, will be left unrepresented. Letters doubled in pronunciation, but without a vowel between them, were represented by the letter written once, not twice. The Hebrew vocalists distinguished these doubled letters by inserting a dot in the middle of them. This dot or dagheesh will be represented here by the sign | above the letter: thus DRR, pronounced didber.

5. Date of the addition of vowels to the OT text.—The date at which the vowels were attached to the consonants of the Hebrew text can be determined only within broad limits. It was after the beginning of the 5th cent. A.D., for the way in which Jerome speaks leaves no room for doubt that the Hebrew Scriptures in his day were unvocalized; it must have been before the 10th cent., for the fully developed system is employed in the earliest Hebrew Biblical MSS, which date from the beginning of the 10th cent. (or, according to some, from the 9th cent.).

6. Earlier attempts to represent vowel sounds.—Long before the invention of vowel points certain consonants had been used, though neither systematically nor consistently, to indicate the vowel sounds: thus H was used to indicate a, and sometimes e; W to indicate o or u, Y to indicate i. This practice in some measure goes back to the times, and doubtless also to the actual usage, of some of the writers of the OT; but in many cases these consonants used to indicate vowels were added by scribes or editors. This we learn from the fact that passages which happen to occur twice in the OT differ in the extent to which, and the particular instances in which, these letters are employed. Ps 18 occurs not only in the Psalter, but also in 2 S 22; the Psalm expresses these consonants used vocally 17 times where 2 Sam. does not, e.g. 2 Sam. writes KDMNY (v. 4) and HHSYM (v. 31), where the Ps. writes KDMWNY and HHWSYM. In some cases Rabbinic discussions prove that words now written with these vowel letters were once without them; so, e.g., it appears from a discussion attributed to two Rabbis of the 2nd cent. A.D. that in Is 51st the word LNMWY ('my nation' RV) was at that time written without the W, thus LNMY. The importance of this fact for the textual criticism will appear later.

7. Character of evidence for the text of OT.—The text of the OT has been transmitted to us through circumstances singularly different from those which mark the transmission of the NT text; and the results are a difference in the relative value attaching to different classes of evidence, and a much less close and sure approach to the original text when the best use has been made of the material at our disposal. Quotations play a much less immediate and conspicuous part in the criticism of the OT than in the criticism of the NT; and here we may confine our attention to the nature of the evidence for the text of the OT furnished by (1) Hebrew MSS, (2) ancient Versions.

8. (1) Hebrew MSS.—One well-established result of the examination of Hebrew MSS is that all existing MSS are derived from a single edition prepared by Jewish scholars in accordance with a textual tradition which goes back substantially to the 2nd cent. A.D., but became increasingly minute. This is proved by the existence in all MSS of the same peculiarities, such as the occurrence at certain places of letters smaller or larger than the normal, of dots over certain letters, or broken or inverted letters. For example, the H in the word BHRNM (Gn 24) is written small in all Hebrew MSS; it was doubtless written originally so by accident or owing to pressure of room; but under the influence of a school of Jewish scholars, of whom R. Akiba in the 2nd cent. B.C. was a leading spirit, all such minutiae of the Scripture acquired a mystic significance. Thus the word just cited really means 'when they were created,' but the small H was taken to mean that the words were to be translated 'in the letter H he (i.e. God) created them' (the heavens and the earth), and this in turn led to much curious speculation. As another illustration of this method of interpretation, which was so important in securing from the 1st or 2nd cent. A.D. onwards a remarkably accurate transmission of the text, the case of the word WYYZR in Gn 27 may be cited. The word means 'And he formed'; an alternative orthography for the word is WYZR (with one Y). Why, it was asked, was it here written with two Y's? Because, it was answered, God created man with two YZRS (i.e. two natures), the good nature and the bad. In order to secure the perpetuation of the text exactly as it existed, a mass of elaborate rules and calculations was gradually established; for example, the number of occurrences of cases of peculiar orthography, the number of words in the several books, the middle word in each book, and so forth, were calculated and ultimately embodied in notes on the margins of the MSS containing the Scriptures. This textual tradition is known as the Massorah, and those who perpetuated it as Massoretes. The Massorah also includes a certain number of variant or conjectural readings; in this case the one reading (Kethibh 'written') stands in the text, but provided with vowels that do not belong to the consonants in the text, but to the consonants of the alternative reading (Qere 'read') given in the margin. E.g., in Job 9th the word BMW, which means 'with,' should, if vocalized, have the vowel e over the W; but in the Hebrew text the vowel actually supplied to the word is e under the M, which is the vowel that really belongs to the marginal reading BMY, and this means 'in the water of.' These Massoretic variants are for the most part relatively uninteresting. The value of the Massorah in perpetuating a form of the Hebrew text for many centuries has doubtless been great; but it has also long served to obscure the fact that the text which it has perpetuated with such slight variation or mutilation was already removed by many centuries from the original text and had suffered considerably.

In spite of the Massorah, certain minute variations have crept into the Hebrew MSS and even into the consonantal text. The vowels, it must be repeated, are merely an interpretation of the original text of Scripture, and not part of it, and different Hebrew MSS show as a matter of fact two distinct systems of vocalization, with different symbols.

9. The earliest MSS.—Among the earliest Hebrew Biblical MSS are the Prophetarum posteriorum codex Babylonicus Petropolitinus, dated A.D. 916; a codex of the Former and Latter Prophets now in the Karaite synagogue at Cairo, and written, if correctly dated, in A.D. 895; a codex of the entire Bible, written by Samuel ben Jacob, now at St. Petersburg, and written, if the dating be genuine, in A.D. 1009.

10. Critical editions of the Massoretic text.—The most accurate reproductions of the Massoretic text are the edition of the Hebrew Bible by S. Baer and Fr. Delitzsch and that by C. D. Ginsburg. These are critical editions of the Massoretic text, but make no attempt to be critical editions of the OT text, i.e. they make no use whatever of the Versions or of any other evidence than the Massoretic tradition.

11. The Samaritan Pentateuch.—Before passing from the evidence of Hebrew MSS we have to note that for the Pentateuch, though unfortunately for the Pentateuch only, we have the invaluable assistance of a Hebrew text representing an entirely different recension. This is the Samaritan Pentateuch. The Samaritan Pentateuch is a form of the Hebrew text which has been perpetuated by the Samaritans. It is written in the Samaritan character, which far more closely resembles the ancient Hebrew characters than the square Hebrew characters in which the Massoretic MSS are written, and is without vowels. The available MSS of the Samaritan Pentateuch are considerably later than the earliest Massoretic MSS; nor is it probable that the copy at Nâblus, though perhaps the earliest Samaritan MS in existence, is earlier than the 12th or 13th cent. A.D. But the value of the recension lies in the fact that it has descended since the 4th cent. B.C. in a different circle, and under different circumstances, from those which have influenced the Massoretic MSS. Though in some respects, as for example through expansion by insertion of matter from parallel passages, the Samaritan is more remote than the Jewish from the original text, it has also preserved better readings, often in agreement with the LXX. An instance is Gn 4th; here in the ordinary Hebrew MSS some words spoken by Cain have certainly dropped out; the fact is obscured in the RV (text), which mistranslates; the Hebrew text really reads, 'And Cain said to Abel his brother'; the Samaritan text and the LXX have the additional words, 'Let us go into the field'; this is probably right (see next clause).

12. The Samaritan Targum.—No thoroughly critical edition of the Samaritan Pentateuch at present exists. The material for establishing a critical text consists of the several MSS and also of the Samaritan Targum—a translation of the Samaritan recension into an Aramaic dialect. The colloquial language of the Samaritans, like that of the later Jews, was different from that in which the Scripture was written.

13. Papyrus fragment of OT text.—Thanks to a recent discovery, we have a further witness to a fragment of the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch. This is the Nash papyrus. The papyrus is apparently not later than the 2nd cent. A.D.; and it contains the Ten Commandments and Dt 6¹¹ in Hebrew. The text, which is of course unvocalized, is several times in agreement with the LXX against the Massoretic text. This fragment was edited by Mr. S. A. Cook in PSBA (Jan. 1903).

14. (2) Versions: Earliest MSS.—We come now to the second main branch of evidence for the text of the OT. The evidence of Versions is of exceptional importance in the case of the OT. In the first place, the actual MSS of the Versions are much older than the earliest Hebrew MSS; the earliest Hebrew MSS date from the 10th cent. A.D., but there are Greek MSS of the OT of the 4th cent. A.D. and there is a Syriac MS of the greater part of the Pentateuch of the date A.D. 464. But secondly, and of even greater importance, the Versions, and especially the LXX, represent different lines of tradition; in so far as the original text of the LXX itself can be established, it is a witness to the state of the text some two to four centuries before the date at which the stereotyping of the Hebrew text by the Massoretes took place.

The Versions of the OT are either primary, i.e. made direct from the Hebrew text, or secondary, i.e. made from a Version. Secondary Versions are of immediate importance in establishing the true text of the primary version from which they are made; and only indirectly witness to the Hebrew text. Among them the Old Latin Version is of exceptional importance in determining the text of the LXX. On this and other versions of the LXX, see GREEK VERSIONS OF OT, § 11.

15. Brief account of the Primary Versions.—The Primary Versions of the OT, arranged in (approximately) chronological order, are as follows:—

(1) The earliest Greek Version, commonly known as the Septuagint. The earliest part of this version, namely, the translation of the Pentateuch, goes back to the 3rd century B.C. The remaining parts of the OT were translated at different later periods; but the version was probably, in the main at least, complete before the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. See GR. VERSIONS OF OT.

(2) The Targums. These Aramaic versions may be considered next, inasmuch as they rest on a tradition earlier than the date of the versions yet to be mentioned; it is probable, however, that no Targum was actually committed to writing till some centuries later, after the later Greek versions, perhaps, too, after the Syriac Version, had been made.

The quotation from Ps 22¹ in Mt 27⁴⁶ || Mk 15³⁴ is in Aramaic; and Eph 4⁸ agrees more closely with the Targum than with the Hebrew text of Ps 68¹. From these facts we may perhaps infer that an Aramaic version had to some extent become orally fixed by the 1st cent. A.D.

The Targums are in large part very free, and even diffuse, paraphrases rather than translations of the Hebrew text. They owe their origin to the custom of explaining the Hebrew passages of Scripture read in the synagogues in the language spoken by the people, which was Aramaic. The earliest (as is most generally believed) and least paraphrastic of these versions is the Targum of Onkelos on the Pentateuch; it does not appear to have been committed to writing before the 5th cent. A.D., and is first mentioned by name by Saadiah Gaon in the 9th century. Far more paraphrastic is the Targum of the Pentateuch known as the Targum of Jonathan, or the Jerusalem Targum. Fragments of yet a third Targum of the Pentateuch survive, and are known as the 2nd Jerusalem Targum. Quite distinct from these is the Samaritan Targum, which is a translation of the Samaritan recension of the Hebrew text (see § 11). The chief Targum of the Prophets is that known as the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel; it is not much younger than the Targum of Onkelos, and is by some considered to be even earlier. There are also fragments of another Targum of the Prophets. Targums of the Haglographa (with the exception of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel) exist, and there are two of the Book of Esther. Cf. art. TARGUMS.

The text of the Targums will be found in Walton's (and other) polyglots, with a Latin translation. Onkelos has been separately edited by Berliner (1884), and the Prophets and Haglographa by Lagarde (1872, 1874). See, further, Hastings' DB, art. 'Targum.' There is an English translation of the Targums of the Pentateuch by Etheridge (2 vols., London, 1862-1865).

(3), (4), and (5) The Greek Versions (which have survived in fragments only) of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, all of the 2nd cent. A.D. See GREEK VERSIONS OF OT, §§ 16-18.

(6) The Syriac Version, commonly called the Peshitta. The date at which this version was made is unknown. The earliest extant MS of part of this version is, as stated above, of the year 464 A.D.; and the quotations of Aphraates (4th cent. A.D.) from all parts of the OT agree with the Peshitta. The character of the version differs in different books, being literal in the Pentateuch and Job, paraphrastic for example in Chronicles and Ruth. The text in the main agrees closely with the Massoretic Hebrew text, though in parts (e.g. in Genesis, Isaiah, the Minor Prophets, and Psalms) it has been influenced by the LXX.

(7) The Vulgate.—The Old Latin Version was a translation of the LXX. To Christian scholars acquainted with Hebrew the wide differences between the LXX and versions derived from it and the Hebrew text then current became obvious. As it seemed suitable to Origen to correct the current LXX text so that it should agree more closely with the Hebrew, so at the close of the 4th century Jerome, after first revising the Old Latin, making alterations only when the sense absolutely demanded it, prepared an entirely fresh translation direct from the Hebrew text. The Vulgate is derived from this direct translation of Jerome's from the Hebrew in the case of all the canonical books of the OT except the Psalms; the Psalms appear commonly in editions of the Vulgate in the form of the so-called Gallican Psalter: this was a second version of the Old Latin, in which, however, after the manner of Origen's Hexaplaric text, the translation was brought nearer to the current Hebrew text by including matter contained in the later Greek versions but absent from the LXX, and obelizing matter in the LXX which was absent from the later versions. Jerome's Latin version of the Psalms, made direct from the Hebrew, has been edited by Lagarde (Psalterium juxta Hebraeos Hieronymi, 1874). On the extent to which editions of the Vulgate differ from Jerome's translation, see VULGATE. In some cases additional matter (e.g. 1 S 14⁴¹, on which passage see § 24) has been incorporated from the Old Latin.

The effect of the substitution of Jerome's version from the Hebrew text for the Old Latin version of the LXX was to give the Church a Bible which was more elegant and intelligible and in much closer agreement with the Hebrew text current in the 4th cent. A.D., but which at the same time was in many passages more remote from the original text of the OT.

18. Two groups of versions. Pre-eminence of the Septuagint.—Judged from the standpoint of their importance for recovering the original text of the OT, and for the kind of service which they render to OT textual criticism, the primary versions fall into two groups: (1) the LXX, (2) the rest. The LXX differs, and often differs widely, from the Massoretic text; the remaining versions closely agree with it: the LXX dates from before the Christian era and, what is more significant, from before the rise of the Massoretic schools; the remaining versions date from after the Christian era, and, with the possible exception of the Syriac, from after the close of 1st cent. A.D. The agreement of these versions made direct from the Hebrew text at various dates subsequent to 100 B.C. confirms the conclusion suggested above, that since that date the Hebrew text has suffered relatively little in course of transmission. Such variations as do occur in these versions from the Hebrew consist largely (though not exclusively) of variations in the interpretation of the consonants, i.e. while presupposing the same consonants as the present Hebrew text, they presuppose also that these consonants were pronounced with other vowels than those which were added to the text after the 5th cent. A.D. These variations therefore do not, strictly speaking, represent variants in the text of the OT, but merely in the commentary on that text, which at the time the versions were made was still oral, and only later was committed to writing in the form of vowels attached to the consonants, of which alone the Scripture proper consisted.

A fuller discussion of the versions of the OT other than the LXX would carry us into minutiae of the subject which do not belong to a brief sketch such as the present. On the other hand, the LXX claims further attention even here.

17. The early history of the Hebrew text.—The history of the Hebrew text since the 2nd cent. A.D. is uneventful; it is a history of careful transmission which has preserved the text from any serious deterioration since that date. But the fortunes of the text before that date had been more varied and far less happy. They cannot be followed completely, nor always with certainty. But the main fact is abundantly clear, that between the ages of their several authors and the 2nd cent. A.D. the Hebrew Scriptures had suffered corruption, and not infrequently very serious corruption. Nor is this surprising when it is remembered that the text in that period consisted of consonants only, that in the course of it the character of the writing was changed from the Old Hebrew to the square character still in use (the difference between the two being greater than that between old black letter type and the Roman type now commonly used), that in the earlier part of the period copies of the books cannot have been numerous, and that in times of persecution copies were hunted for and destroyed (1 Mac 1st). We are here concerned, of course, merely with such changes as crept into the text accidentally, or such minor changes as the introduction of the expressed for the implicit subject, which belong to the province of textual criticism. The larger changes due to the editing and redacting or union of material belong to the province of higher criticism, though in the case of the OT it is particularly true that at times the line between the two is not sharply defined. Our chief clues to the earlier history of the Hebrew text, and to the solution of the problems connected with it, will be found in a comparison of the Hebrew text with the Septuagint version, and in certain features of the Hebrew text itself. The remainder of this article will be devoted to elucidating and illustrating these two points.

18. The Hebrew Text between c. B.C. 250 and c. A.D. 100. The LXX and the Massoretic Text.—The materials for forming a judgment on the general character of the changes undergone during this period by the Hebrew text, and for the existence of early variant readings in particular passages, are to be drawn mainly from a comparison of the LXX with the Hebrew texts. A much smaller amount of material is to be derived from the quotations in the NT and other early Jewish works, such as the Book of Jubilees, written, according to Dr. Charles, at the close of the 2nd century B.C.; but so far as it goes this material bears witness of the same general character as that of the LXX.

19. A correct solution of the main problem here raised depends on three things: (1) the establishment of the original text of the LXX; (2) the detection of the Hebrew text which lay before the translators; and (3) in cases where the Hebrew text there recorded differs from the present Hebrew text, the determination of the more original of the variants. A complete solution of the problems will never be reached, for it will be no more possible to establish beyond dispute the original text of the LXX than the text of the NT; the detection of the underlying Hebrew text must inevitably often remain doubtful; and when variants are established, there will be in many cases room for differences of opinion as to their relative value. But though no complete solution is to be hoped for, a far greater approximation to such a solution than has yet been reached is possible. A good beginning (though no more) towards the recovery of the original text of the LXX has been made (see GREEK VERSIONS OF OT, § 13), but of really systematic work on the recovery of the underlying Hebrew text there has been far too little. What commonly happens is that in particular passages where the sense of the LXX and of the Hebrew text differs, the Greek is re-translated without exhaustive reference to the methods of the translators, and the re-translation thus obtained is cited as the variant. In many cases the true variant even thus has undoubtedly been obtained, but in many others a closer and more systematic investigation of the methods and idiosyncrasies of the translators has shown or will show that, through misinterpretation, the support of the LXX has been cited for variants which there is no reason for believing ever had any existence.

20. Distinction between real and apparent variants.—A difference in sense between the Greek version and the Hebrew text as subsequently interpreted by no means necessarily points to a variation in the Hebrew text that underlay the version.

For example, parts of the three Hebrew verbs šbh (to lead captive), and yšb (to dwell) and of šwb (to return) are indistinguishable in the Hebrew consonantal text; the letters WYŠB may have among others the following meanings, and he dwelt, and he returned, and he brought back, and he took captive.

The substitution of one of these meanings for the other occasionally reduces the Greek version to nonsense; inconvenient as this must have been for those who used that version, or versions, like the Old Latin, made from it, it presents no difficulty to those who are attempting to recover the Hebrew original of the Greek version. It may sound paradoxical, yet it is to a large extent true, that for textual criticism the LXX is most useful when it makes least sense; for when a passage makes no sense in the Greek, but can be explained as a translation from the Hebrew, we have the best of reasons for believing that we have before us the original text of the Greek, and through it can recover a Hebrew text of early date. Copyists and translators do not deliberately turn sense into nonsense, and sense does not frequently, through mere accidents of transmission, become the particular form of nonsense that can be accounted for by a misunderstanding of a Hebrew original.

As a further illustration we may refer to the Greek translation of the letters BY; these very commonly occur with the meaning in me, but they also represent a particle of entreaty Oh! or I pray!; this particle occurs but rarely, about a dozen times altogether, and its existence was unknown to some of the Greek translators. In the Pentateuch and Joshua it is correctly rendered; but elsewhere it is rendered 'in me' with ridiculous results, as the English reader will see if he substitutes these words for 'Oh' in Jg 6th, 1 S 1st

But again, there is no difficulty in seeing beneath the nonsense of the Greek the true sense and the actual reading of the Hebrew. The ignorance of the translators is as useful to the textual critic as their knowledge.

21. Euphemistic translations.—But there are many variations in sense which point to no real textual variants, though both Hebrew and Greek in themselves yield a good sense.

The last clause of the 19th Psalm in the AV, 'O Lord, my strength and my redeemer,' reads admirably; but though the translators give us no clue to the fact, it is not a translation of the Hebrew, it is a translation of the LXX. The Hebrew reads 'My rock and my redeemer' (so RV). In this case the LXX rendering is due not to ignorance, but to religious scruple; their rendering is a euphemism. So in Gn 5th the Greek version substitutes 'Enoch was well-pleasing to God' (hence He 11th) for the anthropomorphic 'walked with God' of the Hebrew text; in these cases, if we had not also the Hebrew text we could not discover the original from the LXX with certainty, or, perhaps, even be sure that the translators were paraphrasing and not translating.

22. Relative values of Greek version and Hebrew text.—These illustrations may suffice to show both that much care is required in using the LXX for the recovery of the Hebrew underlying it, and also that it is wide of the mark to depreciate the textual value of the version by emphasizing the ignorance of the translators. Before either the fullest or the securest use of the version can be made, an immense amount of work remains to be done; but the importance of doing this work is clear, for even the most cautious deductions have already proved that the text underlying the LXX and the present Hebrew text differ widely, and that in many instances the LXX text is superior. The relative values differ in the case of different books; and to avoid misunderstanding it should be added that in no case would a simple translation of the LXX bring us as near to the sense of the original document as a translation from the Hebrew text; nor would it be possible, unless the Hebrew text had survived, to detect by means of the LXX the correct text and the sense of the original. Issues are sometimes confused, and the distinctive characteristics and virtues of our two chief witnesses to the text of the OT obscured, in discussions as to the relative values of the LXX and the Massoretic text. Perhaps the most important general point to remember is that neither the one nor the other would be nearly as valuable by itself as it is when used in combination with the other.

23. Examples of important readings preserved by the Greek Version only.—We may now pass to some illustrations of important variations in which the LXX has clearly preserved an earlier text than the Hebrew. These are much less numerous in the Pentateuch than elsewhere; probably the Law, as the most important Scripture, received at an early period something approaching to that great care in transmission which was later extended to the entire OT. It is the more remarkable, therefore, that in one section of the Pentateuch (Ex 35-39) we find striking differences in the arrangement of sections in the Hebrew and Greek texts. Other instances of different arrangement or of marked differences in the extent of the material occur in the Books of Job and Jeremiah (see, further, Swete, Introd. to the OT in Greek, 221 ff.). This type of difference connects the textual with the higher criticism of these books, and cannot be pursued further here.

24. In some cases matter subsequently lost (through homoteleuton or otherwise), and now absent from the Hebrew text, survives in the Greek.

A striking illustration of this occurs in 1 S 14th. The Hebrew text underlying the Greek version reads, 'Saul said unto Jahweh, the God of Israel [wherefore hast thou not answered thy servant to-day? If this iniquity be in me, or in Jonathan my son, O God of Israel, give Thummim, but if this iniquity be in thy servant Israel, give Thummim.]' The words in square brackets are absent from the Hebrew text, but certainly belonged to the original, and the origin of the error is clear: the scribe's eye accidentally passed from the first occurrence of 'Israel' to the third, and the intervening words were lost. With the loss of these the sense of the last two words 'give Thummim' became obscure, and the punctuators, followed by RV, gave them an indefensible interpretation.

25. In other cases the Greek version is nearer to the original by its relative brevity; the additional matter now present in the Hebrew text was subsequently interpolated.

As an instance of this we may cite 1 K 6th,²¹ which RV, following the Hebrew text, renders, 'And he covered the altar [with cedar]. So Solomon overlaid the house within with pure gold: and he drew chains of gold across] before the oracle; and he overlaid it with gold.' The bracketed words are absent from the Greek; it is probable that of these words 'with cedar' stood in the original text, but that the rest were absent. The Greek text has also for the first four words above (before the bracket) the (superior) reading, 'And he made an altar.'

26. At times, when either the sense or the text of both the Hebrew and the Greek is remote from the original, it is possible, from a comparison between the two, to recover the original.

An interesting example of this is furnished by Is 37th. — 2 K 19th. RV, following the Heb. text, renders, 'They were as the grass of the field, and as corn (Is. 'a field of corn') blasted before it be grown up. But I know thy sitting down and thy going out and thy coming in.' The Hebrew text of the underlined words is LPNY QMH WSBTK; the Hebrew equivalent of 'I know' stands much lower in the sentence, and though it may with difficulty be taken as in the RV, more naturally demands a different object. A reading of the Greek text preserved only in a Syriac version of it, but nevertheless probably the original reading of the Greek text, has, for the same underlined words, 'before thy rising up, and thy sitting down'; this presupposes the Hebrew LPNY QMK WSBTK, which differs from the present Hebrew text by one letter only. The Hebrew text here presupposed is probably original, but has been misunderstood by the translators. The first word, if vocalized as in the Hebrew text and by the Greek translators LPNY, means before, but if vocalized LPNY it means before me.

Adopting the latter vocalisation, we recover (at least so far as the three words are concerned) the original sense. 'They were as grass of the field . . . and as corn that is blasted. Before me is thine uprising and thy down sitting (cf. Ps 130th); and thy going out and thy coming in I know. So great is the difference in sense that the corruption of a single letter may make in a text which contained only consonants, and no marks of punctuation whatever. The true reading of the Hebrew in this case was first divined by Wellhausen; it remained for Mr. Burkitt to point out that it was the reading of the Greek translators.

27. The Hebrew text before the date of the Greek version.—If the Hebrew text suffered to a very considerable extent in the ways just illustrated, during the three or four centuries that intervened between the time when the LXX version was made and the time when the Hebrew text was stereotyped and the later Greek versions were made, by nothing short of a stupendous miracle could the text have been preserved free from errors of transmission, during the centuries that separate the original autographs from the date of the Greek version. This intervening period differs, of course, widely in length; between the age of Isaiah and the Greek translation of the Book of Isaiah lay some six centuries; between the age of Deborah (Jg 5) and the translation of Judges little short of a thousand years; between the age of David (2 S 1st) and the translation of Samuel 800 or 900 years. On the other hand, between the compilation of the Hexateuch, or the first composition of books such as Ecclesiastes or Daniel, and the translations in the several cases, not more than a couple of centuries elapsed.

28. Means of detecting early corruption of Hebrew text.—Though the general fact that the present Hebrew text contains corruptions that date from these earlier centuries cannot reasonably be questioned, the detection of the actual cases of early corruption is necessarily difficult, and only within limits is it possible. We are obviously far worse situated in attempting to determine corruptions of this date than corruptions of later date; the LXX often indicates the presence of the later corruptions, but we have no external clue to the earlier corruptions. We have to rely entirely on indications in the Hebrew text itself. One of these indications will of course be the occurrence of nonsense, for the original autographs were intended to convey an intelligible meaning. Another indication will be the occurrence of bad grammar—unless in the case of a particular writer there is reason for supposing that he was not master of the language which he wrote. An interesting illustration of the way in which the latter indication may serve is furnished by some of the references to the ark.

The ark is called in Hebrew HARN the ark, where the first letter is the Hebrew article; or NRN BRYT YHWH the ark of the covenant of the Lord; where a word in Hebrew is defined by a following genitive it cannot be preceded by the article, so in this second phrase we have NRN, not HARN. Now, in certain passages (e.g. Jos 3¹⁷), our present Hebrew text has the grammatically impossible combination HARN BRYT YHWH; some corruption then is present here; and it is probable that the original text had only NRN the ark, and that the two following words are due to the intrusion into the text of an annotator's explanation.

29. Negative and positive judgments: the justification of conjectural emendation and its limitations.—The ultimate task of textual criticism is to recover as far as possible the actual words of the original; an intermediate task of the textual criticism of the OT is to establish all the real variants of the Hebrew text underlying the Greek version, and in each case to determine the relative value of the variants. In this way the text which was the common source of the Greek translators and that of the Jewish scholars of the 2nd cent. A.D. is as far as possible recovered. So far negative and positive judgments must necessarily accompany one another; we say, Here the Hebrew text is right, and the Greek text wrong, or vice versa. But when we have recovered that common source of the Hebrew and Greek texts, it is wise to distinguish sharply between negative and positive critical judgments. The general fact that there are early errors in the Hebrew text must, as we have seen, be admitted; and, further, no sound criticism of the Hebrew text can proceed far without being compelled to say, This or that is corrupt, even though the Greek version agrees with the Hebrew text or cannot be shown to have differed from it. In some cases where this negative judgment can be passed with confidence, it may be possible with scarcely less confidence to pass to the positive statement. These words are a corruption of these other words; that is to say, the text in such cases can be restored by conjecture; but in many cases where the first judgment—These words are not the original text—must be passed, the second judgment ought only to take the form—It is possible that such and such words or something like them were in the original text. In brief, we can more often detect early corruption than restore the text which has been corrupted. The reason should be obvious. Nonsense (to take the extreme case) must be due to corruption, but the sense which it has obscured may altogether elude us, or, at best, we may be able to discern the general sense without determining the actual words.

There can be no question that it is nonsense to say, as the Hebrew text does, that Saul, who was anointed king to meet a national emergency, was a year old when he began to reign (1 S 13¹); but it is impossible to say whether the original text attributed to him twenty, thirty, forty, or any other particular number of years. Nonsense is unfortunately more serious in the original language than in a version; we may pass easily from nonsense in the LXX to the actual original consonants of the Hebrew text, which merely require, when thus recovered, to be correctly interpreted; but if the Hebrew letters themselves yield nonsense, we are reduced to guessing, and frequently with little hope of guessing right.

30. The preceding paragraphs should have suggested the justification for conjectural emendation in the textual criticism of the OT, and at the same time they should have indicated its limitations. As against a conjectural emendation, it is in no way to the point to urge that the Hebrew text and all the versions are against it; for the agreement of the Hebrew text and the versions merely establishes the text as it was current about, let us say, B.C. 300. The principle of conjecture is justified by the centuries of transmission that the Hebrew text had passed through before that date. It may be worth while to notice also the degree of truth and the measure of misunderstanding involved in another common objection to conjectural emendations. Tacitly or openly it takes this form: Critics offer different emendations of the same passage; not all of these can be right; therefore the Hebrew text is not to be questioned. The real conclusion is rather this, The fact that several scholars have questioned the text renders the presence of corruption probable, that they differ in their emendations shows that the restoration of the original text is uncertain. The idiosyncrasy of a single scholar may lead him to emend the text unnecessarily; the larger the number who feel compelled to pronounce it unsound, the greater the probability that it is unsound, however difficult or uncertain it may be to pass beyond the negative judgment to positive reconstruction of the text.

31. Evidence of parallel texts within the OT.—We have now to consider in what ways beyond those indicated in § 28 the Hebrew text, taken by itself, gives indication of the presence of corruptions, or, on the other hand, of having been accurately preserved, and how it is to be used in order to approximate most closely to the original text, and through it to the original intention of the authors of the several books.

Of most importance, so far as it is available, is the evidence of double texts within the OT. There are certain passages that occur twice over in the OT: e.g. Ps 18 is found also in 2 S 22; Ps 14 recurs as Ps 53; 2 K 18¹²⁻²⁰ is (for the most part) repeated in Is 36-39; 2 K 24¹⁸⁻²⁵ and 25²⁷⁻³⁰ in Jer 52, and large parts of Samuel and Kings are incorporated in Chronicles. The variations between these parallel texts are of two kinds: some are due to the editor who incorporates in his own the matter common to his work and the earlier work from which he derives it; for example, in drawing on the Books of Samuel and Kings, the Chronicler often abbreviates, expands, or modifies the passages he borrows, with a view to adapting them to his special purpose; or, again, the editor who included the 14th Psalm in the collection in which Ps 53 stands, substituted 'God' for 'Jahweh' (PsALMS, § 2 (2)). With these changes, which it is the province of higher criticism to consider and explain, we are not here concerned. But the second type of variations is due to accidents of transmission, and not infrequently what is evidently the earlier reading is preserved in the later work; and the explanation is very simple: the earlier books were more read and copied; and the more a book is used, the worse is its text' (Benzinger). In certain cases there is room for doubt as to the type to which particular variations belong, so, for example, in several variations as between 2 K 18-21 and Is 36-39. As an illustration of the nature and extent of variations between two parallel texts of the OT, we may rather more fully analyze the variations in Ps 18 and 2 S 22. In a few cases the Greek version of both passages agrees with the Hebrew of one, and here the presumption is that the Hebrew text of the other passage has suffered corruption after the date of the Greek version; but in the majority of cases in which the Hebrew variations can be represented in Greek, the Greek version of Ps 18 agrees with the Hebrew text of the Psalm, and the Greek version of 2 S 22 with the Hebrew text of that passage. In these instances the presumption is that the variation had arisen before the date of the Greek version. There are in all more than 80 variations. Of these just over 20 are cases of vowel letters (§ 6) present in the one text, and absent from the other; in the great majority of instances it is the Psalm that has the vowel letters, and 2 S 22 that lacks them.

Among the remaining variations are cases of the following kinds:—(1) Omissions or additions: Ps 18¹ is absent from 2 S., so also is v. 36^b; on the other hand, 2 S 22^{2c} is absent from the Psalm. In about a dozen other instances single words present in one text are absent from the other; (2) in two or three cases a word has been lost through the substitution for it of a word repeated in a parallel or neighbouring line: so 'billows' in Ps 18⁴ has accidentally given place to 'cords' from v. 5 (cf. 2 S.); (3) the variations from Ps 18^{11b, 42b} in 2 S 22^{12, 43} are due to the confusion of similar letters; (4) Ps 18^{23a} differs from 2 S. in respect of the Divine name used (in v. 24 the Ps. has Eloah, 2 S. El); (5) inversion of words (not shown in EV), Ps 18⁴⁴; there are also cases of inversion of letters; (6) use of different synonyms, Ps 18⁴⁴. The variation of Ps 18^{44b} from 2 S 22^{43b} is more complicated, and the significance of several of the variations is clear only in the Hebrew.

32. Evidence of mutilated literary forms.—(1) Acrostics.—Thus the comparison of parallel texts furnishes one line of evidence of the way in which the Hebrew text had suffered in transmission before the date of the Greek version. Another proof may be found in the mutilated form in which certain fixed literary forms survive in the present Hebrew text. Most conclusive is the case of the acrostic poems (see ACROSTIC). At times two considerations converge to prove a particular passage corrupt. For example, the early part of Nah 1 consists of a mutilated acrostic: in the middle of v. 4 a word beginning with D should occur; instead, the word NMLL beginning with N is found; but this word NMLL occurs again in the parallel line: in the light of Ps 18⁴ (see previous §, instance 2) it is probable that NMLL in the first has been accidentally substituted for a parallel word which began with D.

33. (2) Rhythm and strophe.—It is possible that further study of the laws of Hebrew rhythm or metre may give us a valuable instrument for the detection of corruption; much has already been attempted in this way, and in some cases already with results of considerable probability. Similarly, in some cases the strophic division of poems admits of conclusions that are again, if not certain, yet probable. Thus in Is 9^{4-10^a} and 5²⁶⁻²⁹ we have a poem in five strophes marked off from one another by a refrain [ISAIAH [BOOK OF], p. 390^a]: in the present text the first strophe consists of 13, the second of 14, the third of 14, the fourth of 14, and the fifth of 15 lines; the probability is that originally each strophe was exactly equal, and that the first strophe has lost a line, and that the fifth has been enlarged by the interpolation of a line.

34. Limited extent of corruption of text of OT.—The considerations adduced in the two preceding paragraphs have a double edge. They show, it is true, that the Hebrew text has in places suffered considerably; but they also indicate certain limits within which corruption has taken place, or, to state it otherwise, the degree of integrity which the transmitted text has preserved. If in the ways just indicated we can detect the loss or intrusion of lines or words, or the substitution of one word for another, we can elsewhere claim a strong presumption in favour of a poem having preserved its original length and structure. For example, the majority of the acrostics have come down to us with little or no mutilation that affects their length or the recurrence at the right place of the acrostic letters. Similarly the very possibility of determining rhythm must rest on a considerable amount of the text having reached us free from far-reaching corruption. A further consideration of a different kind may be found in the fact that a large number of proper names (which are peculiarly exposed to transmissal corruption) as handed down in the Hebrew text have been paralleled in ancient material brought to light by modern discovery. In many cases it is beyond question that names have suffered in the course of transmission; but the correct transmission of rare, and in some cases strange, names is significant.

35. Secondary nature of vowel letters: bearing on textual criticism.—So long as we deal with parallel texts, we are not brought face to face with the question of how to deal with a Hebrew text resting on a single authority. Yet the great bulk of the OT is of this class. How, then, is it to be dealt with, especially when there is no control over it to be obtained from fixed literary forms? The first duty of sound criticism is to disregard, or at least to suspect, all vowel letters (see § 6). We cannot, indeed, assert positively that the original writers made no use of these letters, for we find them employed in certain cases in early inscriptions (Moabite stone, Siloam inscription); but in view of the evidence of the parallel texts of the Hebrew Bible, of the LXX, and of Rabbinic references, it is certain that in a large number of cases these vowel letters have been added in the course of transmission. The consequence is that we cannot claim any particular vowel letter for the original author; he may have used it, he may not; particularly in the case of earlier writers, the latter alternative is as a rule the more probable. In other important respects the form of the present Hebrew consonantal text differs from what there is reason to believe was its earlier form.

36. Similarity of certain letters a source of confusion.—We have seen above (§ 17) that the alphabet in which existing Hebrew MSS are written differs widely from that in use at the time when the OT was written; the letter yod, proverbially the smallest (Mt 5¹⁸) in the alphabet in use since the Christian era, was one of the larger letters of the earlier script. It is necessary in doubtful passages to picture the text as written in this earlier script, and to consider the probability of a text differing from the received text merely by letters closely resembling one another in this earlier script.

Thus the letters D and R are similar in most Semitic alphabets, in some they are indistinguishable; for example, in the Assuan papyri, Jewish documents of the 6th cent. B.C. recently discovered and published (1907), D and R cannot be clearly distinguished, and it is disputed, and is likely to be disputed, whether a particular word which occurs several times is DGL or RGL. It becomes important, therefore, in dealing with the Hebrew text of the OT to consider the variants which arise by substituting D's for R's. The Heb. words for Syria and Edom are Rm and MDM respectively; the context alone is really the only safe clue to the original reading in any particular passage, and the mere fact that the present Hebrew text reads the one or the other is relatively unimportant; thus, for example, the Heb. text is obviously wrong in 2 S 8¹⁴, and probably in 2 Ch 20².

37. Division of text into words secondary.—Finally, it must be remembered that there is good reason for believing that the division of the consonants of one word from those of another has not been a constant feature of the text. Consequently we cannot safely assume that the present division corresponds to that of the original writers.

38. The starting-point of criticism in attempting to detect the earliest errors in the text.—From all this it follows that sound criticism requires us to start from this position: the original writers wrote in a different script from the present, used no vowel signs, no marks of punctuation, and even vowel letters but sparingly; either they themselves or copyists wrote the texts continuously without dividing one word from another, or at least without systematically marking the divisions. Consequently the canon that the history of the text justifies is that that division of consonants and that punctuation of clauses and sentences must in all cases be adopted which, everything considered, yields the most suitable sense; obvious as this canon may appear, it by no means always obtains recognition in practice; the weight of Jewish tradition is allowed to override it. And yet there are most obvious cases where the Hebrew text gives a division of consonants or clauses which are not the original, but have arisen from accident or particular theories of exegesis. Further, where no division of the existing consonants yields any sense, or but an improbable sense, it must be considered whether the substitution of similar consonants will. Whether the text thus obtained has any or much probability of being the original will depend on many considerations.

39. Illustrations of such errors.—We shall conclude with some illustrations of the variations in text or sense that arise when the foregoing considerations are allowed due weight. It is not to be understood that in all cases the variations from the traditional interpretation (1-3) or text (4) are certainly the true interpretation or text, but they all have a claim to be seriously regarded.

(1) In some cases simply a fresh punctuation of the sentences without any alteration of the consonants whatever gives an important variation in sense. A good instance is Is 1²⁻¹⁴; even in the present text the denunciation of ritual worship is severe; probably it was once more severe. Thus, without any change in the text, we may render—

'When ye come to see my face,

Who hath required this at your hand?

No more shall ye trample my courts;

The bringing of oblations is a vain thing;

Incense is an abomination to me;

New moon and sabbath, the calling of assembly, I cannot away with.

Iniquity and the solemn meeting, your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth.'

For *W*N iniquity the Greek version has ZWM fast(s). We probably have in the history of this passage a series of attempts to soften down the severity and absoluteness of the prophetic denunciation of the externalities of religion.

(2) In the Hebrew Bible the word for man NYS is distinguished from the word for fire NS by the insertion of the vowel letter Y; but in the Moabite stone, the Sileam inscription (written in Jerusalem in the age, as is commonly supposed, of Isaiah), and in Phoenician inscriptions, it is regularly written without the Y, and is thus indistinguishable from the word for 'fire.' Where either of these words occurs, therefore, we must decide by the context only which was intended. In Is 9¹ did Isaiah mean, 'and the people are as the food (so literally, not 'fuel,' RV) of fire,' or 'as the food of man'? By the change of a single letter in the word rendered 'food,' we obtain for the whole phrase 'like those that devour men,' i.e. like cannibals—a reading suggested by Duham, and, for reasons which cannot here be discussed, worthy of consideration. An even clearer instance of confusion of the two words N(Y)S and NS is Ezk 8²: for 'fire' (first occurrence in RV) read 'a man.'

(3) Mutilation of the sense of the original is sometimes occasioned by incorrect division of words in the present Hebrew text. In some cases the Revisers, who generally preferred to retain the obviously incorrect sense in the text, give the correct sense in the margin: see, e.g., Gn 49², Ps 25⁷ 42², Hos 6², Jer 23² (RV second marginal note on the ver.); at other times they give only a rendering of the present Hebrew, and, to ease off a certain roughness or actual inaccuracy in the mutilated original, they sometimes translate with more or less disregard of Hebrew grammar or idiom. In Ps 73⁴ a mere re-division of words gives a reading more original than the present text: 'For they have no torments: sound and plump is their body.' A striking variant appears as soon as the second and third words of Is 10⁴ are re-divided (KRP HT instead of KRP TH): the first clause of the verse then reads, 'Beltis croucheth, Osiris is dismayed,' and this is adopted by many as the sense intended by Isaiah. This is not certain, though the Hebrew as at present divided scarcely admits of translation, and the renderings of RV are illegitimate. Another variant of some importance appears when we divide the words in Is 8² differently (viz. KRK K PMNW NL instead of KRK K PMNW NL): the verse closes not with a proper name in the vocative, but with a statement—'The outstretching of his wings shall fill the breadth of the land, for God is with us' (cf. v. 12).

(4) Parallelism or the context often gives great probability to conjectural readings that differ from the Hebrew text by a letter or two, even though the change is not (clearly) supported by the Greek version. For example, in Dt 33² the word MMRBT is probably an error for MMRBT (M having accidentally been written once instead of twice, and B twice instead of once); then the line reads 'from Meribah Kadesh,' which is a good parallel to 'Paran.'

earliest of English versions proper (Wyclif's) was made from the Vulgate. Between the time of Wyclif and of the numerous English versions of the 16th cent. (see ENGLISH VERSIONS) the study of Hebrew, which, since the age of Jerome, had practically vanished from the Christian Church, was re-introduced. The AV, in which the series of Reformation translations culminated, is a primary version of the Hebrew text with occasional unacknowledged substitution of the sense of the LXX for that of the Hebrew (see for an example § 21 and below). It was only natural that at first translation from the original language should seem the last word in Biblical translation; but several scholars of the 17th cent. already appreciated the value of the versions and the faultiness of the Hebrew text, and perceived that any translation that attempted to approximate to the sense of the original writers was doomed to fall unnecessarily far short of its aim if it slavishly followed the existing Hebrew text. Unfortunately the appreciation of these facts had not become general even towards the end of the 19th cent., with the result that the Revisers of the OT felt themselves justified in practically renouncing the use of the versions (not to speak of critical conjecture), so far as the text of their translation is concerned. Some of the evidence of the versions is given by them, yet very unsystematically, in the margins. The Revisers have explained their standpoint in their preface: 'As the state of knowledge on the subject is not at present such as to justify any attempt at an entire reconstruction of the text on the authority of the versions, the Revisers have thought it most prudent, to adopt the Massoretic Text as the basis of their work, and to depart from it, as the authorized Translators had done, only in exceptional cases. . . . In some few instances of extreme difficulty a reading has been adopted on the authority of the Ancient Versions, and the departure from the Massoretic Text recorded in the margin.' In spite of this determination to be prudent, the Revisers have in one instance admitted an exceedingly questionable conjecture: in 1 S 13¹ they insert—in italics and between square brackets, it is true—the word 'thirty'; yet this word, though found in a few Greek MSS (not, however, in the earlier text of the LXX, rather unfortunately described by the Revisers as 'the unrevised LXX'), is really due to a pure guess; as a reading the word 'thirty' possesses exactly the same value as would any other number not obviously unsuitable. In addition to this peculiarly unhappy excursion into what is, if not technically yet in reality, conjectural emendation of the most hazardous character the Revisers make few acknowledged departures from the Hebrew text even when it is most obviously corrupt. Instances will, however, be found in Ruth 4¹, 1 S 6¹⁵ 27¹⁰, 2 S 18³, Ps 8¹ 59², Mic 4¹³; in some of these cases the AV had previously (without acknowledgment) abandoned the Hebrew text; in all, the Revisers were well advised in doing so. But the more general effect of the attitude adopted by the Revisers to the question of the Hebrew text may be illustrated by their treatment of the passages cited in their preface as cases in which the AV abandoned the Hebrew text.

In 2 S 16³, AV has 'It may be the Lord will look on mine affliction,' which may represent the original text, the last word of the original Hebrew in that case having been BYNY; but the present Hebrew text has BYNW, which means 'on my iniquity,' and the Hebrew (as also the RV) margin has BYNY on my eye (interpreted as meaning 'on my tears'; so Avim). Here the RV relegates the rendering 'on my affliction' to the margin, and gives in the text the scarcely defensible rendering of the Hebrew text 'on the wrong done unto me.' In 2 Ch 3¹ the Hebrew text, at some time after the date of the Greek version, has been reduced to nonsense by the accidental misplacement of a word. AV follows the LXX, and is intelligible; RV in rendering the crucial word half follows the Hebrew text, and shrinking from the full effect of this, half mistranslates, yet with the total result of being nearly as unintelligible as the Hebrew ('in the place that David had appointed' is not a legitimate rendering of the words correctly rendered in RV marg.). Both AV and RV insert (in italics) 'the Lord': this probably stood in the original text, still stands in the Greek version, but is not even suggested in the Hebrew text. In 2 Ch 22 RV (rightly) adopts in its text the reading of the parallel passage in Kings for the first part of the ver.; but retains in the second part of the ver. the obviously wrong reading of the Hebrew text—Azariah (Greek version and 2 K^x—Ahaziah). In Job 37¹ AV gives what probably approximates to the original sense, though it is not a translation of the Hebrew text. RV correctly renders the Hebrew text as now divided; otherwise divided (cf. above, § 37), it would mean 'that all men may know he hath done it.' In Ezk 46¹⁰ AV tacitly adopts a slight emendation (YZN for YZNW); RV retains the Hebrew text so far as the verb is concerned, but in order to make some sense illegitimately inserts (in italics) 'together'—illegitimately because 'together' is as little suggested by the Hebrew as it would be by the English. In Am 5² AV has been led astray by the LXX; RV (text) is nearer the original sense. In Hag 1², as in Ezk 46¹⁰, the Revisers, to avoid placing in their margin the exceedingly probable reading which stands on their margin, have inserted words (in italics) which are not even remotely suggested in the Hebrew, and have in another respect translated questionably.

From the foregoing examples it will appear that in some cases the AV in effect approximates more closely to the original text and sense than the RV text, though the RV generally, perhaps always, in its margin gives the rendering of AV (or an equivalent rendering). It is interesting to add that in some cases Wyclif's, though (and indeed because) a secondary version, follows a more satisfactory text than either AV or RV (so, e.g., in 1 S 14⁴, where it has the words that have accidentally fallen out of the present Hebrew text; see § 24). The instances in which the RV gives a translation that is either entirely indefensible or questionable or improbable, to save the appearance of abandoning the Hebrew text, might be greatly multiplied. Such mistranslation, or questionable translation, was indeed necessarily involved in the carrying out of the principles adopted. For, owing to the state in which the Hebrew text has come down to us, a translator is not infrequently shut up to one of these four options: (1) he may leave the doubtful words of the Hebrew text untranslated; (2) he may translate from the Hebrew text as emended by the help of the versions or conjecture; (3) he may render unintelligible words in Hebrew by equally unintelligible words in English; or (4) he may mistranslate the Hebrew. If he adopts the third option he obviously will not reproduce the original writer's meaning; if the fourth, he will probably not do so, and if he does, it will be by accident; if he adopts the second, he no doubt runs a risk, and sometimes a considerable risk, of still failing to recover the original sense; the first option alone is safe, and in certain cases would best promote the fullest possible understanding of an entire passage. The Revisers have occasionally adopted the third, but generally the fourth, of these options.

Between the age of the AV and that of the RV, Biblical scholarship advanced particularly in two directions: (1) in the critical study of the Hebrew text; (2) in the understanding of the principles and vocabulary of the Hebrew language. For example, in the light of the comparative study of language, meanings of many words which Hebrew tradition had lost became clear. The RV made full use (in its margins, if not in its text) of the results due to the second line of advance, and is in consequence greatly superior to the AV. At the same time, in order to utilize this first knowledge, it was compelled to abandon Hebrew tradition, and in some cases even that tradition as embodied in the Hebrew vowels. In consequence the RV is a version of rather mixed character; it is a less faithful rendering into English of the Hebrew traditional understanding of the OT than the AV; on the other hand, for reasons already explained, it represents the original meaning of the OT writers only very partially and much less completely than is possible. In sum, then, the English reader, if he wishes to read in the OT the meaning attached to it by Jewish tradition, should use the AV and not the RV; if he wishes to understand the meaning of the original writers of the OT, the RV will bring him much nearer his desire than the AV, especially if he makes wise use of the margins (cf. Driver, Book of Job, Introduction, p. xxiv. ff.); but it is only by making use of such translations as have been referred to at end of certain articles of this work (see PSALMS; ISAIAH [BK. OF]; HOSEA [BK. OF]; MICAH [BK. OF]) that he will be able to avail himself of such means as exist for the English reader of passing, so far as is possible, beyond tradition to the word of Scripture itself.

Any full treatment of the subject of this article naturally involves a knowledge of Hebrew. Of works on the text, in addition to the relevant articles in the larger dictionaries, it may suffice to refer here to Buhl, Canon and Text of the OT (T. & T. Clark); Driver, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel, Introduction. Critical editions of the Massoretic text have been mentioned above, § 10. A critical edition of the Hebrew text of the entire OT remains a desideratum. So far as published it is met by Haupt's Sacred Books of the OT. Meantime, the best Hebrew Bible for use is Kittel's, which prints the Massoretic text, but within small compass presents in the footnotes a large mass of well-selected variants suggested by the versions or conjecture. Some of the points briefly dealt with in the foregoing article are more fully discussed in other articles in the present work; see in particular GREEK VERSIONS, VULGATE, ENGLISH VERSIONS, WRITING. G. H. GRAY.

TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—1. The text of the NT as read in ordinary copies of the Gr. Testament, and as translated in the AV of 1611, is substantially identical with that printed by Stephanus (Robert Estienne) in 1550, and by the Elzevirs in their popular edition of 1624. To this text the Elzevirs in their next edition (1633) applied the phrase 'Textum ergo habes nunc ab omnibus receptum'; and by the name of Textus Receptus (TR) or Received Text, it has since been generally known. The edition of Stephanus was based upon the two earliest printed texts of the NT, that of Erasmus (published in 1516), and that of the Complutensian Polyglot (printed in 1514, but not published until 1522); and he also made use of 15 MSS, mostly at Paris. Two of these (Codd. D and L, see below, § 7) were of early date, but not much use was made of them; the others were minuscules (see § 5) of relatively late date. The principal editor of the Complutensian Polyglot, Lopez de Stunica, used MSS borrowed from the Vatican; they have not been identified, but appear to have been late, and ordinary in character. Erasmus, working to a publisher's order, with the object of antipating the Complutensian, depended principally upon a single 12th cent. MS for the Gospels, upon one of the 13th or 14th for the Epistles, and upon one of the 12th for the Apocalypse. All of these were at Basle, and were merely those which chanced to be most accessible.

The TR is consequently derived from (at most) some 20 or 25 MSS, dating from the last few centuries before the invention of printing, and not selected on any estimate of merit, but merely as being ready to the editor's hands. They may be taken as fairly representative of the great mass of Gr. Test. MSS of the late Middle Ages, but no more. At the present time we have over 3000 Greek MSS of the NT, or of parts of it, and they range back in age to the 4th cent., or even, in the case of a few small fragments, to the 3rd. The history of Textual Criticism during the past two centuries and a half has been the history of the accumulation of all this material (and of the further masses of evidence provided by ancient translations), and of its application to the discovery of the true text of the NT; and it is not surprising that such huge accessions of evidence, going back in age a thousand years or more behind the date of Erasmus' principal witnesses, should have necessitated a considerable number of alterations in the details of the TR. The plan of the present article is, first to set forth a summary of the materials now available, and then to indicate the drift of criticism with regard to the results obtained from them.

2. The materials available for ascertaining the true text of the NT (and, in their measure, of all other ancient works of literature) fall into three classes: (1) Manuscripts, or copies of the NT in the original Greek; (2) Versions, or ancient translations of it into other languages, which were themselves, of course, originally derived from very early Greek MSS, now lost; (3) Quotations in ancient writers, which show what readings these writers found in the copies accessible to them. Of these three classes it will be necessary to treat separately in the first instance, and afterwards to combine the results of their testimony.

3. Manuscripts.—It is practically certain that the originals of the NT books were written on rolls of papyrus, that being the material in universal use for literary purposes in the Greek- and Latin-speaking world. Each book would be written separately, and would at first circulate separately; and so long as papyrus continued to be employed, it was impossible to include more than a single Gospel or a group of short Epistles in one volume. Consequently there could be no collected 'New Testament' at this early stage, and no question (so far as the conditions of literary transmission were concerned) of fixing a Canon of books to be included in such a collection. Papyrus is a material (made from the pith of the stem of the Egyptian water-plant of that name) which becomes brittle with age, and quite unable to resist damp; consequently papyrus MSS have almost wholly perished,—from friction and use if they remained above ground, from moisture if they were buried beneath it. Only in Middle and Upper Egypt, where the soil is extraordinarily dry, have buried papyri survived. Literary works and business documents have been dug up of late years in Egypt in very large numbers, ranging from about B.C. 500 to A.D. 700, so that the styles of writing in use at the time when the NT books were written are well known to us; but Christianity and its literature are not likely to have penetrated much beyond Lower Egypt in the first two centuries of their existence, and consequently it is perfectly natural that no manuscripts of the NT of this period are now extant. From the latter part of the 3rd cent. A.D. a few small fragments have been recovered, which show that some of the NT books were known in Middle Egypt at that date; but the only papyrus MS as yet discovered which can be said to have substantial textual importance, is one (Oxyrhynchus Pap. 657, 3rd-4th cent.) containing about a third of Hebrews, which is the more valuable because Cod. B is defective in that book. Besides the natural causes just mentioned for the disappearance of early Biblical MSS, it should be remembered that Christian books (especially the official copies in the possession of Churches) were liable to destruction in times of persecution.

4. These conditions, which amply account for the disappearance of the earliest MSS of the NT, were fundamentally altered in the 4th century. The acceptance of Christianity by the Roman Empire gave a great impulse to the circulation of the Scriptures; and simultaneously papyrus began to be superseded by vellum as the predominant literary material. Papyrus continued to be used in Egypt until the 8th cent. for Greek documents, and, to a lesser and decreasing extent, for Greek literature, and for Coptic writings to a still later date; but the best copies of books were henceforth written upon vellum. Vellum had two great advantages: It was much more durable, and (being made up in codex or book-form, instead of rolls) it was possible to include a much greater quantity of matter in a single manuscript. Hence from the 4th cent. it became possible to have complete copies of the NT, or even of the whole Bible; and it is to the 4th cent. that the earliest extant Biblical MSS of any substantial size belong.

TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

5. Vellum MSS are divided into two classes, according to the style of their writing. From the 4th cent. to the 10th they are written in uncials, i.e. in capital letters, of relatively large size, each being formed separately. In the 9th cent. a new style of writing was introduced, by the adaptation to literary purposes of the ordinary running hand of the day; this, consisting as it did of smaller characters, is called minuscule, and since these smaller letters could be easily linked together into a running hand, it is also commonly called cursive. In the 9th cent. the uncial and minuscule styles are found co-existing, the former perhaps still predominating; in the 10th the minuscules have decidedly triumphed, and the uncial style dies out. Minuscules continue in use, with progressive modifications of form, until the supersession of manuscripts by print in the 15th cent.; at first always upon vellum, but from the 13th cent. onwards sometimes upon paper.

6. Uncial MSS being, as a class, considerably older than the minuscules, it is natural to expect that the purest and least corrupted texts will be found among them; though it is always necessary to reckon with the possibility that a minuscule MS may be a direct and faithful representative of a MS very much older than itself. Over 160 uncial MSS (including fragments) of the NT or of parts of it are known to exist, of which more than 110 contain the Gospels or some portion of them. In the apparatus criticus of the NT they are indicated by the capital letters, first of the Latin alphabet, then of the Greek, and finally of the Hebrew, for which it is now proposed to substitute numerals preceded by 0. Further, since comparatively few MSS contain the whole of the NT, it is found convenient to divide it into four groups: (1) Gospels, (2) Acts and Catholic Epistles, (3) Pauline Epistles, (4) Apocalypse; and each group has its own numeration of MSS. The uncial MSS which contain all of these groups, such as those known as A and C, retain these designations in each group; but when a MS does not contain them all, its letter is given to another MS in those groups which it does not contain. But here again it is now proposed to adopt a simpler system, by which nearly every MS will have one letter or number to itself, and one only.

7. A selection of the most important uncial MSS will now be briefly described, so as to indicate their importance in the textual criticism of the NT:

8. Codex Sinaiticus, originally a complete codex of the Greek Bible. Forty-three leaves of the OT were discovered by Tischendorf in the monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai in 1844, and acquired by him for the University Library at Leipzig; while the remainder (156 leaves of the OT, and the entire NT, with the Epistle of Barnabas and part of the 'Shepherd' of Hermas, on 148 leaves) were found by him in the same place in 1859, and eventually secured for the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. The Bible text is written with four columns to the page (the narrow columns being a survival from the papyrus period); and palaeographers are now generally agreed in referring the MS to the 4th cent., so that it is one of the two oldest MSS of the Bible in existence. Tischendorf attributes the original text of the MS to four scribes, one of whom he believes (though, in the opinion of many, this is very questionable) to have been also the scribe of the Codex Vaticanus (B); and the corrections to six different hands, of whom the most important are κ^a (about contemporary with the original scribe), and κ^{bc} and Neb (of the 7th cent.). The corrections of κ^a were derived (according to a note affixed to the Book of Esther) from a MS corrected by the martyr Pamphilus, the disciple of Origen and founder of the library of Caesarea. It has been held that κ^a itself was written at Caesarea, but this cannot be regarded as certain. The character of its text will be considered in § 40 ff. below.

A. Codex Alexandrinus, probably written at Alexandria in the 5th cent., and now in the British Museum. From an uncertain, but early, date it belonged to the Patriarchs of Alexandria; it was brought thence by Cyril Lucar in 1621, when he became Patriarch of Constantinople, and was presented by him to Charles I. in 1627, and so passed, with the rest of the Royal Library, to the British Museum in 1577. It contains the whole Greek Bible, with the exception of 40 lost leaves (containing Mt 11-25, Jn 6⁵⁰⁻⁸³, 2 Co 4¹⁴⁻¹²); it also originally contained the two Epistles of Clement and the Psalms of Solomon, but the Psalms and the conclusion of the Second Epistle have disappeared, together with one leaf from the First Epistle. The text of the NT is written by three scribes, with two columns to the page; there are many corrections by the original scribes and by an almost contemporary reviser (A*).

B. Codex Vaticanus, No. 1209 in the Vatican Library at Rome, where it has been since about 1481. It is probably the oldest and the best extant MS of the Greek NT, and its evidence is largely responsible for the changes of text embodied in the English RV. It is written in a small, neat uncial, probably of the 4th cent., with three columns to the page. It originally contained the whole Bible (except the Books of Maccabees), possibly with additional books, like N and A; but it has lost from He 9¹⁴ to the end of the NT, including the Pastoral Epistles (but not the Catholic Epistles, which follow the Acts and hence have escaped) and Apocalypse.

C. Codex Ephraemi, in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris. This is a palimpsest, i.e. a manuscript of which the original writing has been partially washed or scraped off the vellum in order to use it again to receive other writing. In this case the original writing was the text of the Greek Bible, written in the 5th cent., in one broad column to the page; and this was sacrificed in the 12th cent. in order to inscribe on the same vellum some treatises by St. Ephraem of Syria. Only 64 leaves of the OT now survive, and 145 of the NT (out of 238); and often it is impossible to decipher the original writing. The MS is therefore only fitfully and intermittently of service.

D. Codex Bezae, in the University Library at Cambridge, to which it was presented in 1581 by Theodore Beza, who obtained it in 1562 from the monastery of St. Irenaeus at Lyons. It contains the Gospels and Acts, in Greek and Latin, the former occupying the left-hand pages and the latter the right. It is mutilated, Ac 22²⁹ to end being lost, together with all, except a few words of the Catholic Epistles, which followed. It is generally assigned to the 6th cent., though some would place it in the 5th. Its place of origin has been variously supposed to be southern France, southern or western Italy, or Sardinia, but the evidence is not decisive in favour of any of these. Its text is very remarkable, containing a large number of additions and some notable omissions as compared with the TR; in some places the Latin version seems to have been accommodated to the Greek, and in others the Greek to the Latin. As will be shown below, its type of text belongs to a family of which the other principal representatives are the Old Latin and Old Syriac versions.

Ds. Codex Claromontanus, in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris. Contains the Pauline Epistles in Greek and Latin, written probably in the 6th century. The Latin text is practically independent of the Greek. Before the Epistle to the Hebrews is a list of the books of the NT, with the number of stichoi (or normal lines of 16 syllables each) in each of them, which must be descended from a very early archetype, since it places the books in an unusual order, and includes in the list several uncanonical books (cf. descriptions of N and A); the order is Mt., Jn., Mk., Lk., Ro., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Eph., 1 and 2 Tim., Tit., Col., Philem., 1 and 2 Pet., Ja., 1, 2, 3 Jn., Jude, Barnabas, Apoc., Acts, Hermas, Acts of Paul, Apoc. of Peter (Th., He., and Phil. being omitted). The MS was in the monastery of Clermont, whence it was acquired by Beza, who was also owner of D. It may probably have been written in Italy. Other Græco-Latin MSS of the Pauline Epistles are E² F² G², which all go back to the same archetype as Ds.

Ea. Codex Laudianus, in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. Contains the Acts, in Greek and Latin, the latter holding the place of precedence on the left. Probably 7th cent.; was in Sardinia at an early date, and may have been written there; thence came to England (probably with Theodore of Tarsus in 669), and was used by Bede. The Greek text is somewhat akin to that of D; the Latin has been accommodated to the Greek, and is of little independent value. It is the earliest MS extant that contains Ac 8³⁷, though the verse was in existence in the time of Irenaeus (late 2nd century).

E₂. Codex Coislinianus 202. Fragmentary remains of a copy of the Pauline Epistles, written in the 6th (or perhaps the 7th) century. Originally at Mt. Athos, in the Laura monastery, where 8 leaves still remain. The rest was used as material for binding MSS, which became scattered in various quarters; 22 leaves are at Paris; 3 each at St. Petersburg, Moscow, and Kiev; and 2 at Turin. The text of 22 more pages has been more or less completely recovered from the 'set-off' which they have left on the surviving leaves. The MS represents the text of the Pauline Epistles as edited by Euthalius of Sulca in the 4th century.

L. Codex Regius, in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris. Contains the Gospels; of the 8th century. It is remarkable as containing the shorter conclusion of Mk. (see RVm) as well as the usual longer one (16¹⁻²⁰); and its readings often agree with those of B against TR.

N. Codex Petropolitanus. Contains the Gospels, written in large silver letters on purple vellum, in the 6th century. Forty-five leaves have long been known (33 at Patmos, 6 in the Vatican, 4 in the British Museum, and 2 at Vienna); and 182 more leaves came to light in 1896 in Asia Minor, and are now at St. Petersburg. Rather less than half the original MS is now extant, including portions of all Gospels. The MS forms part of a group with three other purple MSS, Σ, Σ², and Φ, all probably having been originally produced at Constantinople, and descended from a single not remote ancestor.

R. Codex Nitriensis, in the British Museum. A palimpsest copy of I.k. of the 6th cent., imperfect. The text differs frequently from the TR.

T. A number of fragments from Egypt, mostly bilingual, in Greek and Coptic (Sahidic). The most important (T or T² in the library of the Propaganda at Rome) consists of 17 leaves from I.k. and Jn., of the 5th cent., with a text closely akin to that of B and N. T² (otherwise 099) has the double ending to Mark.

Z. Codex Dublinensis, at Trinity College, Dublin. A palimpsest, containing 295 verses of Mt., of the 6th cent., probably from Egypt, with a text akin to N.

Δ. Codex Tischendorfianus III., in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. Contains I.k. and Jn., of the 9th cent.; Mt. and Mk., written in minuscules, are at St. Petersburg (Evan. 566). This MS is chiefly notable for a subscription stating that its text was derived 'from the ancient copies at Jerusalem.' Similar subscriptions are found in about 12 minuscule MSS.

Σ. Codex Rossanensis, at Rossano in Calabria, 6th century. Contains Mt. and Mk., written in silver letters on purple vellum, with illustrations. Its text is closely akin to that of N, both being probably copies of the same original.

Σ² (in future to be known as O). Codex Sinopensis, in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris; of the 6th cent.; 43 leaves from Mt 7-24, written in gold letters on purple vellum, with 5 illustrations similar in style to those in Σ. It was picked up for a few francs by a French naval officer at Sinope in 1899. Its text is akin to that of N and Σ.

Φ. Codex Bezae, at Belgrade in Albania: the fourth of the purple MSS, and belonging to the same school as the others, and probably of the same date. Contains Mt. and Mk., in a text akin to N and Σ, but not so closely related to them as they are to one another.

These are all the uncials of which it is necessary to give separate descriptions. A new MS of the Gospels, apparently of the 5th cent., and containing a text of considerable interest, was found in Egypt in 1907, and is now in America, but is still unpublished. Large fragments of a 6th cent. MS of the Pauline Epistles were found at the same time.

8. Passing to the minuscules, we find the number of witnesses overwhelming. The last inventory of NT MSS (that of von Soden) contains 1716 copies of the Gospels, 531 of Acts, 628 of Pauline Ep., and 219 of Apoc.; and of this total, as stated above, less than 160 are uncials. The minuscule MSS are usually indicated by Arabic numerals,* separate series being formed for the four divisions of the NT. The result of this is that when a MS contains all four parts (which is the case only with about 40 MSS) it is known by four different numbers; thus a certain MS at Leicester bears the numbers Evan. 69, Act. 31, Paul. 37, Apoc. 14. It is, of course, impossible to give any individual account of so great a mass of MSS; indeed, many of them have never been fully

* A new numeration has been introduced by von Soden, with the object of indicating the contents and date of each MS; but it is more cumbersome than the previous system. Thus A becomes 64, and Evan. 69 becomes 4506. On the other hand, each MS always has the same designation, and the difficulty of finding enough letters for the uncial MSS is obviated. A revision of the old numeration, so as to secure the same objects without abandoning the familiar symbols, if the more important MSS, has just been issued by Gregory and has received the adhesion of most NT scholars.

examined. But it is the less necessary, because by far the greater number of the minuscule MSS contain the same type of text, that, namely, of the TR. The fact that at least 95 out of every 100 minuscule MSS contain substantially the TR may be taken as universally admitted, whatever may be the inferences drawn from it; and it is only necessary to indicate some of those which depart most notably from this normal standard, and ally themselves more or less with the early uncials.

Thus in the Gospels 33 * is akin to the text found in B⁸; so, to a lesser extent, is the group of the four related MSS, 1-118-131-209; also 59, 157, 431, 496, 892; while the type of text found in D and in the Old Latin and Old Syriac versions has left its mark notably upon 473, and more or less on 235, 431, 700, 1071, and on a group of related MSS (known from the scholar who first called attention to it as the 'Ferrar group') consisting of 13, 69, 124, 346, 348, 543, 713, 788, 826, 828. In Acts and Cath. Epp., 61 and 31 are the most notable adherents of B, while 31, with 137, 180, 216, 224, also shows kinship with D. A group consisting of Act. 15, 40, 83, 205, 317, 328, 329, 393 seems to represent an edition of Acts prepared by Euthalius of Sules in the 4th century. In Paul, the most noteworthy minuscules are 1, 17, 31, 47, 108, 238; the Euthalian edition is found in 81, 43, 93, 379, 381. In Apoc. (where uncials are scarce and minuscules consequently more important) the best are 1, 7, 28, 35, 38, 68, 79, 87, 95, 96. No doubt, as the minuscule MSS are more fully examined, more will be discovered which possess individual characteristics of interest; but with the large number of uncials of earlier date on the one hand, and the general uniformity of the great mass of minuscules on the other, it is not very likely that much important textual material will be derived from them. It may be possible to establish relationships between certain MSS (as in the case of the Ferrar group), and to connect them with certain localities (as the Ferrar group appears to be connected with Calabria); but not much progress has yet been made in this direction.

9. One other class of MSS remains to be mentioned, namely the Service-Books or Lectionaries, in which the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles were divided into portions to be read on each day throughout the ecclesiastical year. These books fall into two classes, according as they contain the lessons from the Gospels (Evangelia or Evangelitaria †) or from the Acts and Epistles (Praxapostoli). Nearly 1100 MSS of the former class are known, and 300 of the latter. Over 100 of these are uncials, but with hardly an exception they are of relatively late date (9th cent. or later), the uncial style being retained later for these liturgical books than elsewhere. Of the value of their evidence little can definitely be said, since few of them have been properly examined. A priori they might be of considerable value, since service-books are likely to be conservative, and also to preserve local peculiarities. They might be expected, therefore, to be of great value in localizing the various types of text which appear in the MSS, and in preserving early variants from a period before the establishment of a general uniformity. As a matter of fact, however, these claims have not yet been substantiated by any actual examination of lectionaries, and it may be questioned whether, as a whole, any of them goes back to a period before the extinction of the local and divergent texts.

The standard lists of NT MSS are those of C. R. Gregory (Prolegomena to Tischendorf's NT Grace, ed. 8, 1894, reproduced in German, with additions, in his Textkritik des NT, 1900), and F. H. A. Scrivener (Introduction to the Criticism of the NT, 4th ed. by E. Miller, 1894). The new list of H. von Soden (Die Schriften des NT, vol. i. pt. i. 1902) contains rectifications and additions to Gregory's list, with a new numeration. For Gregory's revised list, which, it may be hoped, will be accepted as the standard, see Die griechischen Handschriften des NT (Leipzig, 1908).

10. Versions.—The second class of authorities, as indicated in § 2, is that of Versions, or translations of the NT into languages other than Greek. It is only the earlier versions that can be of service in recovering the original text of the NT; modern translations are of importance for the history of the Bible in the countries to which they belong, but contribute nothing to textual criticism. The early Versions may be divided into Eastern (Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, Arabic, Ethiopic, etc.) and Western (Latin and Gothic), but the distinction is of little importance. Age is a more important factor than locality, and the two oldest and, on the whole, most important (though not necessarily the most trustworthy) are the Old Latin and Old Syriac versions, which, moreover, are in many respects akin to one another. Next in importance are the Coptic versions and the Latin Vulgate; and the Armenian and the later Syriac versions are also of considerable value. It will be convenient to describe the several versions under their respective countries in the first instance, and to defer the discussion of their characters and affinities until the tale of our authorities is complete.

A. SYRIAC VERSIONS.—

11. The Old Syriac Version (OS).—The evidence for the character, and even the existence, of the primitive version of the NT in Syriac is of comparatively recent discovery. Before 1842 the earliest extant Syriac version was the Peshitta (see below), to which, however, a much higher antiquity was assigned than is now generally admitted. In that year, however, Dr. W. Cureton discovered, among the manuscripts brought to the British Museum from the convent of S. Maria Deipara in the Nitrian desert in Egypt, an imperfect Gospel text very different from the Peshitta. This (which was not finally published by Cureton until 1858) was known for 50 years as the 'Curetonian Syriac,' and the relative age of it and the Peshitta was a matter of controversy among scholars. In 1892 two Cambridge ladies, Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, discovered in the monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai a palimpsest MS, which was subsequently recognized from their photographs as containing a text closely akin to the Curetonian. Comparison of the two showed that they represented different recensions of the same version, the Lewis or Sinaitic MS (Syr.-Sin.) containing the earlier form of it. Neither is complete. The Curetonian (Syr.-Cur.) contains nothing of Mk. except 16¹⁷⁻²⁰, just sufficient to show that the last twelve verses were present in this form of the version, though they are absent from Sin.; of Jn. it has only about five chapters, and there are large gaps in Mt. and Luke. Sin. contains a large part of all four Gospels, but none is intact. Both MSS are assigned to the 5th cent., Sin. being probably the earlier; but the version which they represent must go back to a much more remote age. In text they are akin to the Codex Bezae and its allies, and are among the most important witnesses to this type of text.

12. The Diatessaron.—The question of the age of this version is complicated by that of its relations to another very early embodiment of the Gospels in Syriac. Tatian, an Assyrian Christian and a disciple of Justin Martyr, compiled (probably about A.D. 170) a Harmony of the four Gospels, known by the name of the Diatessaron. Whether it was originally composed in Greek or in Syriac is uncertain. The Greek name which it bore, and the fact that a Latin version of it was in existence, are arguments in favour of a Greek origin; on the other hand, Tatian's activity was mainly in the East, the Diatessaron circulated most extensively in Syria, where it was almost the sole form of the Gospels in use until the 5th cent., and a commentary on it was written by the Syrian Father Ephraem. It was certainly in Syria that it was most influential, and it is in its evidence as to the Syriac version that its textual importance now consists. It is only of late years that its evidence has been available at all. Until 1880 it existed only in name, and the very fact that it was a compilation from our four canonical Gospels was a matter of controversy. In that year, however, Dr. E. Abbot called attention to the fact that in 1876 Dr. G. Moesinger had published a Latin translation of an Armenian treatise which had been printed so long ago as 1836, and which was in fact St. Ephraem's commentary on the Diatessaron. Subsequently two copies of an Arabic version of the Diatessaron itself were discovered, in Rome and in Egypt, and from these the text was published in 1888,—in a form modified, it is true, by transmission through many centuries and an Arabic version, but still making it possible to draw some conclusions as to the text and character of Tatian's work.

* The numeration here used is that of Gregory (before the revision mentioned in the last note). That of Scrivener coincides as far as Evan. 449, Act. 181, Paul. 229, Apoc. 101, and again generally from Evan. 775, Act. 265, Paul. 342, Apoc. 123 onwards.

† The Greek term for a Gospel lectionary is Evangelia, a volume containing the four Gospels being called a Tetraevangelion. The Latin name for a lectionary is Evangelarium. Evangelistarium, which is sometimes used, means properly a table of lections.

It is now certain, as a result of the recovery of the Diatessaron, that the Gospels existed in a Syriac dress in the second half of the 2nd cent.; but whether the Diatessaron was the earliest form of the Syriac Gospels, or whether the version represented by Syr.-Sin. and Syr.-Cur. was previously in existence and formed the basis of Tatian's compilation, is still uncertain. The opinion of Syriac scholars at the present day appears to be in favour of the priority of the Diatessaron. Even so the origin of the Old Syriac version can hardly be placed later than A.D. 200, and all its characteristics stamp it as representing a very early type of the Gospel text. For some two centuries it existed side by side with the Diatessaron, the former being known as Evan-geion-da-Mepharreshê ('the Gospel of the Separated') and the latter as Evan-geion-da-Mehalleê ('the Gospel of the Mixed'); and then both alike were superseded by the Peshitta. There is some slight evidence (chiefly in the Armenian version, which was derived from the Syriac, and in references in Syriac authors) of the existence of an Old Syriac version of Acts and Paul (Cath. and Apoc. formed no part of the original Syriac NT); but for textual purposes they no longer exist.

13. The Peshitta.—Previous to the discovery of Syr.-Cur., the Peshitta was believed to be the oldest Syriac version, and was sometimes regarded as the queen of all the versions. Its date was supposed to be referable to the 2nd century. Even when the superior claims of Syr.-Cur., and still more of Syr.-Sin., came to be generally (though not quite universally) admitted, the Peshitta was assigned to the 4th cent. at latest, on the ground that traces of it were supposed to be found in the Biblical quotations of St. Ephraem, who died in A.D. 378. Since, however, it has been shown (by Prof. Burkitt, S. Ephraem's Quotations from the Gospel, 1901) that the treatises in which the use of the Peshitta is observable are not the genuine work of Ephraem, this evidence fails to the ground, and there is now nothing to prove the existence of the Peshitta before the 5th century. Its origin may now be assigned with some confidence to Rabbûla, bishop of Edessa 411-435, who is recorded to have made a translation of the NT from Greek into Syriac, and to have been active in suppressing the use of the Diatessaron. This new translation, which was to some extent based on the Old Syriac, but was assimilated to the type of Greek text then current, completely superseded its predecessors, and from this point onwards its use in Syriac literature is universal. It appears in both branches of the Syrian Church (Nestorian and Monophysite), whose quarrel dates back to 431. The name Peshitta means 'the simple,' but whether it was used to distinguish it from its predecessors or its successors is uncertain.

MSS of the Peshitta go back to the century of its origin. The earliest with an actual date, (which is also the earliest dated Biblical MS in existence) is a copy of some books of the Pentateuch, written in 464 (now in the British Museum; and the two earliest NT MSS may be assigned to about the same date. Of the Gospels, 125 copies in this version are on record; of Acts and Cath. 58, and of Paul. 67; Apoc. (with the four minor Catholic Epp.) was not included in the Syriac canon. The later MSS reproduce the earlier very faithfully, so that the latest edition (by G. H. Gwilliam, 1901) does not substantially differ from the first (A. Widmanstadt, 1555).

14. The Philoxenian Syriac.—Unlike the Latin Vulgate, the Peshitta was not entirely unchallenged in its supremacy. In 508, Philoxenus, Jacobite bishop of Mabug in eastern Syria, caused a new translation of the NT to be made by one Polycarp; but of this nothing has come down to us except the four minor Catholic Epp., which were incorporated into the Peshitta to fill the gap caused by their original omission there, and a single MS of the Apoc. (at Trinity College, Dublin; identified by Dr. Gwynn, and published in 1897). The style of Philox. was free and idiomatic, and the Greek text on which it was based was that of the majority of late MSS.

15. The Harklean Syriac.—In 616 a complete revision of Philox. was made by Thomas of Harkel, who converted its idiomatic freedom into extreme literalness, and added various readings in critical notes, which show an acquaintance with a Greek MS or MSS having a text akin to that of Cod. Bezae and its allies. About 35 MSS of Harkl. are known, dating from the 7th and 8th cent. onwards. The Apoc. which is now incorporated with the Peshitta is probably derived from this version.

16. The Palestinian Syriac.—Yet another Syriac version exists, but in a different dialect from those hitherto described; for, whereas they all belong to E. Syria, with its centre at Edessa, this is in the Western Aramaic characteristic of Palestine and its neighbourhood. The extant MSS of it (which are few and generally fragmentary, and mostly discovered within the last 15 years) are mainly lectionaries, and its textual importance is slight. Prof. Burkitt has argued, apparently with good reason, that it owes its origin to the efforts of Justinian and Heraclius to abolish Judaism in Palestine in the 6th cent., and that it came again into prominence in the 11th century. The three principal MSS of it are dated in 1030, 1104, and 1118.

On the Syriac versions see especially articles by Woods and Gwilliam in Studia Biblica, vols. i. and iii.; A. S. Lewis, The Four Gospels translated from the Sinaitic Palimpsest, 1894; Gwynn, Apocalypse of St. John in a Syriac Version, 1897; F. C. Burkitt, op. cit., and Evan-geion-da-Mepharreshê, 1904, and art. on 'Text and Versions' in Encyc. Biblica.

17. The Armenian Version.—In connexion with the Syriac NT it will be convenient to mention also the Armenian, which was largely dependent upon it. The earliest translation of which we have definite knowledge seems to have been made by Sahak and Mesrop about A.D. 400, from a Syriac text of the Old Syriac family. After 431 this version was revised by the help of Greek MSS received from Constantinople, which were apparently akin to B¹, and thereby the original features of the version were much obscured. The earliest extant MSS belong to the 9th and 10th cent. (from A.D. 887). These usually omit the last 12 verses of Mk.; but one, which has them, has a marginal note assigning them to 'the Elder Ariston,' i.e., presumably Ariston, a disciple of our Lord known to us by a mention in Papias.

On the Armenian version see F. C. Conybeare, art. in Hastings' DB. and J. Armitage Robinson, Euthaliana, 1895.

B. LATIN VERSIONS.

18. The Old Latin Version (OL).—As Christianity spread westward, it inevitably came into contact with the Latin-speaking population of the Roman Empire; and a translation of the NT into Latin might naturally be looked for at an early date. Indeed, since the gospel was preached in Rome by St. Paul himself, it might seem reasonable to suppose that Latin versions of the Christian literature would have been required almost as soon as it came into being. But this would be to overlook the bilingual character of the Roman Empire, even in Italy. The educated classes spoke and wrote Greek freely; the uneducated classes were largely recruited from the East, and spoke Greek more naturally than Latin. The evidence of the predominantly Greek character of the primitive Roman Church is clear. St. Paul wrote to it in Greek. The names of those whom he salutes are mainly Greek. The first twelve bishops in the list of the Roman episcopate (down to A.D. 189) are Greek. Clement, the third in the list after St. Peter, writing in the name of the Roman Church to their brethren in Corinth, wrote in Greek. All the early literature of the Roman Church is Greek. The same may be said, so far as our knowledge goes, of the Church in Gaul. The report on the martyrdoms at Vienne, which the Christians of that province sent to their brethren in other countries, was written in Greek. Irenæus (c. 135-202), the most famous representative of the Gallican Church in the 2nd cent., came from Asia Minor, and wrote his works in Greek. All the traditions of Gallia Narbonensis were Greek, not Latin.

TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

19. The need for a Latin version of the Christian books was consequently not so pressing as might be supposed. Nevertheless there was one large and important province in which Greek had no place, and where Latin was alike the literary and the spoken language. This was Africa, where the Mediterranean coast, and especially the district which is now Tunis, was inhabited by a large Latin-speaking population. When Christianity was first introduced into the province is uncertain; but in the 2nd cent. it was strong and flourishing there, and had for its spokesman the most eloquent of early Christian writers, Tertullian (c. 150-220). Two lines of argument combine to show that the earliest Latin version of the NT known to us had its home in Africa. The first mention of the existence of a Latin version occurs in Tertullian; and that type of text which, of all those represented by our extant OL MSS, appears on internal grounds to be the earliest, is identical with the Biblical quotations in the writings of Tertullian's junior contemporary and compatriot, Cyprian (c. 200-258). Whether the version was actually made in Africa cannot be determined with certainty. It is true that its Latinity agrees with that of certain African writers of the 2nd cent. (Apuleius, Arnobius, Lactantius, besides Tertullian and Cyprian); but it so happens that there is very little non-African Latin of that period in existence for comparison with it. The kinship which the text of the OL has with the Old Syriac has caused Antioch to be suggested (by Sanday) as the original home of the version, that being a metropolis where Syrian and Latin elements met, and whence versions of the Scriptures in either tongue might radiate from a common centre. But with a strong general resemblance between the two versions, there is also a considerable amount of divergence in details, so that one cannot be certain that the connexion is not more remote. What is certain is that the earliest form of Latin version known to us was circulating in Africa in the first half of the 3rd century.

20. The extant MSS of the OL are mainly fragments; for after the supersession of this version by the Vulgate its MSS naturally fell into neglect, and survived only fortuitously. The number of them is a little over 40, and they are habitually indicated by the small letters of the Latin alphabet. The following are the most important:

a. Codex Vercellensis, at Vercelli, containing the Gospels (Mt., Jn., Lk., Mk., the usual Latin order), somewhat mutilated, assigned to the 4th century.

b. Codex Veronensis, at Verona, containing the Gospels on purple vellum; 5th century.

d. The Latin text of Codex Bezae in the Gospels and Acts, and of Cod. Claromontanus in the Pauline Epistles.

e. Codex Palatinus, at Vienna, containing the Gospels, considerably mutilated; 5th century. One leaf is at Dublin. In the Acts, e is the Latin text of Cod. Laudianus; in Paul., that of Cod. Sangermanensis.

TEXT OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

f. Codex Brizianus, at Brescia, of the Gospels, on purple vellum; 6th century.

ff. Codex Corbeiensis, at Paris, containing the Gospels, but imperfect. Generally assigned to the 6th cent., but by its latest editor (E. S. Buchanan, Journ. of Theol. Studies, 1905-6) to the 5th.

g. Codex Gigas, at Stockholm; a complete Bible, of the 13th cent., with Acts and Apoc. in an OL text. Written in Bohemia, and a remarkable example of a late survival of OL.

h. Palimpsestus Floriacensis, at Paris; palimpsest fragments, formerly at Fleury, of Acts, Cath. Epp., Apoc., in an African text.

k. Codex Bobiensis, at Turin, where it fortunately escaped from the recent fire with slight injury. Contains Mk 8-16 (ending at 16³), Mt 1-15; probably 5th cent. (according to Burditt, 4th cent.). Contains the OL version in its earliest form, closely akin to that found in the writings of Cyprian.

m. The Speculum of pseudo-Augustine, which contains copious quotations from the NT. It is probably of Spanish origin, and should be reckoned rather with the Fathers than with the MSS.

q. Codex Monacensis, at Munich, containing the Gospels; 6th or 7th century.

The remaining MSS are, for the most part, only small fragments, of a few leaves each. The Apoc. is also found, almost complete, in the commentary of Primasius, written in Africa in the 6th century.

21. With these MSS must be reckoned the quotations of the early Latin Fathers, notably Tertullian (who, however, appears often to have made his own translations, and is also too inexact to be of much service in this respect), Cyprian, Hilary, Lucifer of Cagliari, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Tyconius, Priscillian, and (as just noted) Primasius. It is usual to classify all these authorities (MSS and Fathers) under the three heads of (1) African, (2) European, (3) Italian; the African type of text being the earliest and also the roughest in style and vocabulary, the European being so far modified in both these respects as to be supposed by some scholars to be due to a fresh translation, and the Italian being a revision of the European, and itself providing the basis for Jerome's Vulgate.

The question is complicated by the fact that no two MSS represent quite the same type of text. All (except perhaps k) have undergone modification in some respect, either by the corrections introduced by scribes in early times, or by contamination with the Vulgate. Cyprian and k, so far as they go, represent the African text of the Gospels in what appears to be a fairly pure form; e and m come next to them; h is a good African authority in Acts and Apoc., and Priscillian, Tyconius, and Primasius in the Epp. and Apoc. q and b are the leading representatives of the European family in the Gospels, with the Latin version of Irenæus; in Acts, g and Lucifer. O, the Italian group, f is the most pronounced, and has been taken by Wordsworth and White as the best representative of the OL text which Jerome had before him when he undertook his revision of the Latin NT; next to f in this character comes q. The Latin texts in the bilingual MSS have to be used with caution, as they show signs of assimilation to the Greek. The remaining MSS are either too fragmentary to be of much service, or too mixed in their text to be classified definitely with any family.

In general character, as already indicated, the OL version (especially in its earliest form) belongs to the same class of authorities as the Old Syriac and Codex Bezae, the class, namely, which is distinguished by rather striking divergences from both the TR and the text represented by BN. The character and claims of this type of text will be considered later; here it will be sufficient to point out the high antiquity which can be established for it through the OL (and still more through the consensus, so far as it exists, between OL and OS), and the great amount of divergence which exists between the several MSS which contain it. It is not possible, even approximately, to reconstruct the original OL text; it is even a matter of dispute whether it had one original or more. What is certain is that it underwent constant revision and alteration, and that the few and fragmentary MSS which have come down to us, and of which no two agree even approximately with one another, do but reflect a state of textual confusion which was rampant in the Latin Bibles of the 4th century.

22. The Vulgate.—This state of confusion is described in emphatic terms by the great Latin Fathers of the 4th cent., Jerome (c. 345–420) and Augustine (354–430), and it was to the former that the task fell of attempting to reduce the chaos to order. The credit of inspiring the work which was to become the Bible of the West for a thousand years is due to Pope Damasus (pope, 366–84). At his request, Jerome, the leading Biblical scholar of the day, who had devoted many years to the study of the Scriptures in the East in their original tongues, undertook, as he says in his preface to the NT, to 'make a new work out of an old one' by revising the existing Latin texts with reference to the original languages. He began with the Gospels, about the year 382; and at first his revision was on conservative lines. Where the existing text fairly represented the sense of the original, he let it stand, without enforcing complete accuracy; only where errors affected the sense did he feel bound to make alterations. The Greek manuscripts which he employed as his guides appear to have been similar in character to B^x. The revision of the Gospels was completed in 383; that of the Epistles followed, but was conducted more superficially than the previous work, partly, no doubt, because the divergences in the extant texts were less pronounced in these books. At about the same time he was commencing his work on the OT by a revision of the Psalter; but for the history of this see TEXT OF THE OT, 15 (7).

23. The later history of the Vulgate (as Jerome's version eventually came to be called) is the subject of a separate article. Here it is only necessary to mention that the received text of it, which is found in all ordinary Latin Bibles, is that which was officially sanctioned by Pope Clement VIII. in 1592; and that the one critical edition of it is that now being produced by Bishop Wordsworth of Salisbury and Prof. H. J. White, in which the Gospels and Acts have already been published (1889–1905). Their estimate of the principal MSS of the Vulgate is the necessary basis of the following description of a selection from among them:

A. Codex Amiatinus, in the Laurentian Library at Florence, containing the whole Bible. Its history (which was only established in 1887) is unusually well known. It was written in the north of England, at Wearmouth or Jarrow, by order of Ceolfrid, abbot of these monasteries, early in the 8th cent., and was taken by him in 716 as a present to Pope Gregory. Ceolfrid died on the way, but his companions completed the gift, and in Italy the MS has since remained; for some time it was at Monte Amiata, whence its name. Its text was probably derived from one or more MSS brought to England from Italy; and it is generally regarded as the best extant MS of the Vulgate.

C. Codex Cavensis, at La Cava, near Naples; 9th century. Contains the whole Bible, written in Spain, and is the best representative of the Spanish family of Vulgate MSS.

A. Codex Dunelmensis, in Durham Cathedral Library; 7th or 8th century. Contains the Gospels, with a text akin to that of A.

F. Codex Fuldensis, at Fulda in Germany; between 541 and 546. Written by order of Bishop Victor of Capua. Contains the whole NT, the Gospels being arranged in the same manner as in Tatian's Diataxaron, on the basis of a copy of a Latin version of that work accidentally found by Bishop Victor.

H. Codex Hubertianus, and Θ. Codex Theodulfianus, contain the edition of the Vulgate produced by Bishop Theodulf of Orleans, for which see art. VULGATE.

K. Codex Carolinus, and V. Codex Vallicellianus, similarly represent the edition of Alcuin. (See ib.)

O. Codex Ozoniensis, in the Bodleian (formerly at St. Augustine's, Canterbury); 7th century. Contains the Gospels, in a text affected by Irish influences.

Q. Codex Kenanensis, the Book of Kells, at Trinity College, Dublin; prob. 8th century. Contains the Gospels, lavishly decorated in the Celtic style. Its text, naturally, is of the Irish type.

S. Codex Stonyhurstensis, at Stonyhurst College; 7th century. Contains Jn. alone, in a text akin to that of A. Formerly at Durham, and probably written in that neighbourhood.

V. See K, above.

Y. Codex Lindisfarnensis, in the British Museum; contains the Gospels; written at the end of the 7th cent., in honour of St. Cuthbert (d. 687), with beautiful Anglo-Celtic ornamentation. Some liturgical directions inserted in it show that it was copied from a MS written in Naples, no doubt one brought to England by Hadrian, abbot of a monastery near Naples, who came to England with Archbishop Theodore in 689. Closely akin in text to A.

Z. Codex Harleianus, in the British Museum; 6th or 7th century. A well-written copy of a good text, but of a different family from A.

These are the principal MSS of the Vulgate in the Gospels. A, C, F, Θ, K, T, V are also used by Wordsworth and White in the Acts. To them may be added—

G. Codex Sangermanensis, at Paris; 9th century. Contains the whole Bible, but is particularly good in Acts, so that Wordsworth and White state that their text agrees with it oftener than with any other MS.

O. Codex Oroniensis, in the Bodleian Library; 8th century. Known as the 'Selden Acts'. The text is of the Irish type.

The MSS of the Pauline Epistles and Apocalypse have not yet been classified, but the MSS described above as containing the whole NT will no doubt re-appear among the principal authorities for these books also.

24. As indicated above, the Codex Amiatinus (A) is regarded as the best MS of the Gospels, and with it go the other Northumbrian MSS, ASY, with F in attendance. A second group of MSS, which, generally speaking, is of inferior merit, is headed by Z, and includes several MSS not described above. CT represent the Spanish type of text, which had an important influence on the history of the Vulgate, and Q the not less important Irish type. In Acts, Wordsworth and White give the first place to G, with CA and F in close attendance. These three last-named MSS represent different groups, the A group being generally preferable to the F group; but no one MS or group has a monopoly of merit. In general character, as stated above, the Vulgate tends to agree with the type of Greek text represented by B^x. It is clear that the Greek authorities which Jerome regarded as the most trustworthy were of this type; but since (in the NT) his revision retained a considerable quantity of the OL version, which is largely of a different type, the result, as it now stands, is of a composite character. By reason of this composite character, and also of its relatively late date, the Vulgate is not of the same textual importance as OS or OL; nevertheless it is to be remembered that Jerome must have made use of Greek MSS at least as old as the oldest which we now possess. The historical importance of the Vulgate will be dealt with in a separate article.

Of the OL version the most comprehensive account is that given by H. A. Kennedy in Hastings' DB. See also Burkitt, The Old Latin and the Itala (Cambridge, 1896), the prefaces by Wordsworth, Sanday, and White to their editions of Old Latin Biblical Texts (parts i–iv., Oxford, 1883–97), and articles by Gebhardt (in PRE3, 1897) and Corssen (in Bursian's Jahresbericht über die Fortschritt der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, bd. 101, 1899). On the Vulgate see Westcott's art. in Smith's DB, White's chapter in Scrivener's Introduction, ed. 4 (which deals with both versions), and the prefaces to Wordsworth and White's edition of the Vulgate, now in progress (Oxford, 1889 ff.).

C. COPTIC VERSIONS.—

25. Coptic is the literary form of the vernacular language of Egypt, the descendant of the ancient tongue which we know first in its hieroglyphic, and later in its demotic form, but differing from them in adopting the Greek alphabet, with the addition of certain letters to represent sounds not employed in Greek. Coptic is the outcome of the Greek settlement in Egypt, which took place under the empire of the Ptolemys and continued under that of Rome; and along with the Greek characters the native tongue adopted also a considerable number of Greek words. When this form of writing came into being is uncertain. It appears in a primitive form in a certain horoscope, now in the British Museum, the date of which is probably A.D. 95; and it is reasonable to suppose that it became established as a literary medium in the course of the 2nd century. It is quite possible that its growth was promoted by the need of its services in making the gospel known to native converts. Christianity was no doubt introduced into Egypt even in Apostolic times, but it would have come in the first instance to the Jews of Alexandria and the Greek-speaking population generally. Even when it penetrated farther, and addressed the native population in its own tongue, its message would at first have been oral, and the earliest Coptic versions of the NT may well have been merely oral paraphrases, such as were the earliest Anglo-Saxon versions in our own country. The first mention of Coptic Scriptures occurs in the Life of St. Antony, who is said to have heard the Gospel read in church as a boy about A.D. 270; and since he was not acquainted with Greek, this must have been a Coptic version, whether oral or written. Early in the 4th cent. the monks of the order established by Pachomius were required by their rule to study the Scriptures; and this, at any rate, implies the existence of a written Coptic version. In the 3rd cent., therefore, at latest, and possibly by the end of the 2nd (since the Coptic versions unquestionably have some very early characteristics), a Coptic translation of the NT (except the Apocalypse) was in circulation.

26. The Egyptian language was not uniform throughout the country, but possessed various local dialects. Two of these are well marked, and possess a respectable quantity of literature, almost wholly theological. These are the Bohairic, or dialect of Lower Egypt, and the Sahidic, or dialect of Upper Egypt. The former derives its title (first conferred on it by Athanasius, bishop of Cos in Upper Egypt in the 11th cent.) from the Arabic name of a district near Alexandria, the latter from the Arabic name for Upper Egypt. Between the two lie several dialects collectively known as Middle Egyptian, with local varieties in the Fayyum, at Akhmim, and elsewhere, which certainly possessed a translation (or translations) of the Bible, but of which very little is known at present, for lack of materials.

27. The Sahidic Version (Sah., formerly Thebaic).—It was formerly held that the Bohairic version (Boh.) was the first in point of age, since it was the version of Lower Egypt, which would have been the first to receive Christianity; but Coptic scholars are now generally agreed that the order of precedence must be inverted. Lower Egypt was very largely Greek-speaking, and the language in which the Septuagint was already familiar would have been sufficient for a considerable time. In Upper Egypt, though there were considerable Greek communities there also, and in the principal towns Greek must have been generally understood, the population as a whole must have been more Egyptian, and an Egyptian version of the NT would have been required there sooner than in the neighbourhood of Alexandria. The characteristics of the Sahidic version also suit this hypothesis of an earlier date. It is rougher and less literary in style than the Bohairic, and its text is of a very early type, akin in many details (though not as a whole) to the OL and OS; in the OT its text is in some books pre-Origenian. Unfortunately it is known to us only in fragments. It was ultimately superseded by Boh. and dropped out of use; and, with the exception of some small but complete volumes recently acquired by the British Museum, all that we now have of it are isolated leaves of vellum or papyrus which have been rescued from the buried towns and monasteries of Egypt. The Apocalypse is the only book of the NT that exists complete in a single MS, though some books approach completeness. But the number of extant fragments is large and increasing, and from these it will be possible soon to put together an almost continuous Sahidic NT. The earliest MSS appear to go back to the 5th cent., but none is of sufficient size and importance to merit individual description. Some are bilingual, containing Greek and Sahidic texts in parallel columns; the most important of these has been described above (§ 7) under the heading T.

28. The Bohairic Version.—This, which ultimately became the accepted Bible of the Coptic Church, is much better known than Sah., and is preserved in a considerable number of MSS. The date of its origin, however, is quite uncertain. In favour of an early date is the fact that the Apocalypse was apparently not originally contained in it; this book seems to have been generally accepted after the end of the 3rd cent. but was regarded with some doubt before. In the OT, Boh. contains the insertions made by Origen, which implies a date not earlier than the latter part of the 3rd century. In general, the text represented by it is of the same character as that found in B^h; and this again points to a date not substantially later than the first half of the 4th century. The cent. from A.D. 250 to 350 seems, therefore, the most probable period for its origin; though some writers (notably Guidi) think that Coptic Christianity (as distinct from Greek) did not develop in Lower Egypt until the middle of the 6th cent., and consequently that all Bohairic literature is subsequent to this date.

The Bohairic version follows the Greek very closely, being more faithful and less free than Sah.; hence it is trustworthy evidence of the readings of the Greek MSS from which it was made. These MSS, as indicated above, were of the same general character as B^h, and especially B. Divergent readings of the type represented by OL and OS, which are found not infrequently in Sah., are practically absent from Boh. The earliest Boh. MS of the Gospels is the Curzon Catena (an intermixture of text and commentary) in the Pantheon Library, which is dated A.D. 889; the oldest and best continuous MS of the Gospels is Huntington MS 17, in the Bodleian, dated 1174. Several others are of the 12th and 13th cents.; but none goes back to anything like the age of the fragments of Sah. Many of them have Arabic versions in the margins. An excellent edition of Boh. has recently been completed by the Rev. G. Horner (Oxford, 1898 and 1905), who is now engaged on Sah.

29. The Middle Egyptian Versions.—Of these very little is yet known, though enough to establish their existence. Our knowledge rests upon a few fragments of vellum and papyrus which have come to light of late years, notably in the Fayyum, in the neighbourhood of Akhmim, and in that of Memphis. These differ in dialect from both Boh. and Sah., and also to some extent among themselves; but they are more akin to Sah. than to Boh. Also the NT text found in them differs from both Boh. and Sah.; and evidence has been found of the existence of more than one Middle Egyptian version. The largest NT fragment as yet extant is a 6th cent. palimpsest in the British Museum (Or. MS. 5707), containing parts of Jn 3 and 4 in Greek and Middle Egyptian, with a good text.

30. Other versions exist—Georgian, Ethiopic, Arabic, Persian, Gothic; but on these it is not necessary to dwell. The first two have been too little studied to be practically available, and the others are too late in origin, and too secondary, or even tertiary, in their character, to be of much use. The versions that are of first-rate importance are those that have been described above,—the Syriac, Latin, and Coptic versions. Of these the Old Latin and Old Syriac take the first place, both on account of their age, and because they are the chief extant representatives of a very early and important type of text, as will be seen below. Next in textual importance are Sah. and Boh., which give us the evidence of Egypt, the country which has perhaps played the largest part in the history of the Greek Bible. Then follow the Latin Vulgate and the Syriac Peshitta, each just too late and too composite in character to be of first-rate importance as evidence of the primitive Greek text, but each the authorized Bible of a great Church. Finally, evidence of some value is to be obtained from the later Syriac and the Armenian versions.

See articles by Forbes Robinson in Hastings' DB, and Burdett in Encyc. Bibl. (s.v. 'Text and Versions'); IQ, 31. Patristic Quotations.—The third class of evidence available for textual purposes is that which is derived from the quotations from the NT in the writings of the early Fathers. If we can be sure that a writer is quoting from a MS lying before him, then his quotation gives us the reading of a MS which in many cases must have been earlier than any which we now possess. Sometimes we can be fairly sure of this, as when the quotation occurs in a continuous commentary on a single book; or when the writer expressly emphasizes a certain reading as against other variants; or when he quotes the same passage several times in the same way. In other cases it is impossible to be certain that he is not quoting from memory; and this makes quotations from the Synoptic Gospels especially fallacious, since it is so easy to confuse the wordings of the different Evangelists. There is always the danger also that a copyist may have assimilated the wording of a quotation to the form with which he was himself familiar. Consequently evidence of this class, though highly valuable when its surroundings guarantee it from suspicion, has to be handled with great caution. In one respect Patristic quotations have a special value, because they can be both dated and placed. The dates of the earliest MSS and versions are uncertain, within half a century or more, while the date of any given Patristic work can generally be fixed within a few years. The advantage of being assignable to a certain country is one which Patristic quotations share with versions, but it is of great importance in fixing the origin and range of certain types of text. In both respects it will be found that the evidence of the Fathers is of great value in elucidating the textual history of the NT. It is impossible to treat the subject at length here, but the names and dates of some of the most important Fathers may be mentioned, and subsequent sections will show what sort of part they play in the operations of textual criticism.

32. The earliest Patristic writings, such as the Epistles of Clement, Barnabas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, and the 'Shepherd' of Hermas, contain very few quotations from the NT, and those few are inexact (see NT in Apost. Fathers [Oxf. Soc. of Hist. Theol.]). In the third quarter of the 2nd cent. we have the writings of Justin Martyr and Tatian, and we know something of the Gospel text used by the heretic Marcion. From about 180 onwards the evidence becomes much fuller. Irenæus (whose principal work was written between 181 and 189) worked mainly at Lyons, though his home was in Asia Minor. Western texts are also represented by Tertullian (about 150-220), Cyprian (about 200-258), and Hippolytus (flourished about 220); the two former being African writers, and the last-named of Rome. In Egypt there are the two very important theologians, Clement of Alexandria (about 160-220) and Origen (185-253), and the two scholars who succeeded to the latter's literary inheritance, and founded the library of Cæsarea largely upon the basis of his works, Pamphilus (d. 309) and Eusebius (about 270-340). In Syria the most notable names are those of Aphraates (flourished about 340) and especially Ephraem (d. 378); in Asia Minor, Gregory Thaumaturgus (d. 265), Basil of Cæsarea (329-79), Gregory of Nyssa (flor. about 370), and Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 389); in Palestine, Cyril of Jerusalem (bishop, 351-86), and especially Chrysostom (347-407). Returning to the West, the important writers, from a textual point of view as well as from others, are Hilary of Poitiers (bishop, 354-68), Lucifer of Cagliari (d. 371), Ambrose of Milan (bishop, 374-97), Tyconius (an African writer of the end of the 4th cent.), Priscillian (a Spaniard, d. 385); and, finally, the two great Fathers of the Western Church, Jerome (about 345-420) and Augustine (354-430). Later than the first quarter of the 5th cent. it is not necessary to go; for the settlement of the great issues in the textual history of the NT had taken place before this date.

A list of ecclesiastical writers and their principal works is given by Gregory (Prolegomena and Textkritik). An index of Patristic quotations was compiled by Dean Burgon and is now in the British Museum. Critical texts of the Latin and Greek Fathers are being issued under the direction of the Vienna and Berlin Academies respectively.

33. Such are the materials—MSS, Versions, Patristic Quotations—with which the textual critic has to deal; but it is only within comparatively recent years that his resources have become so extensive. Two centuries of diligent work were spent in the collection of the evidence of Greek MSS; the most important of all the Codex Vaticanus (B), has become fully known only within the last forty years, and the next most important (N) was discovered only in 1859 and published in 1862. Of the two most important versions, the Old Syriac was wholly unknown before 1848, and quite inadequately known until 1894; while the Old Latin, though known and studied in the 18th cent. (when Sabatier published his Bibliorum sacrorum Latinae versiones antiquae, Rhodini, 1743), cannot be said to have been rightly understood and classified before the publications of several scholars who are still living. For many of the Fathers, we still are without editions which can be trusted with regard to their Scripture quotations. The textual criticism of the NT, as now understood, is consequently a science of comparatively modern growth. As was shown above (§ 1), the earliest editions of the Greek NT were in no sense critical texts. It is true that MSS were collated for them, but only such MSS as chanced to be easily at the disposal of the editor. No search was made for specially good or old MSS, and (except for a very slight use of Cod. Bezae by Stephanus) the TR was made and established before any of the great uncial MSS had been examined. This is the more remarkable because B was used as the main basis of the text which became the standard text of the Septuagint, that, namely, which was printed at Rome in 1587; but it chanced that no Roman edition of the NT was issued, and consequently the great Vatican MS was little known and less used until the 19th cent. was far advanced.

34. At stated in § 1, the TR of the NT took final shape in the editions of Stephanus in 1550 and the Elzevirs in 1624. It was not until after the latter date that the scientific collection of evidence began. The Codex Alexandrinus (A) was brought to England in 1627, and a collation of it (with D D₂, and several minuscules) first appeared in the great Polyglot Bible (edited by Brian Walton in 1657. Walton's Polyglot (modelled, so far as its plan and scope were concerned, on the Antwerp Polyglot of 1571-72, and the Paris Polyglot of 1630-33, but greatly superior to both in its textual material) may be said to be the fountain-head of the textual criticism of the NT. It was followed during the next century and a half by a series of editions in which, while no attempt was made to modify the actual text, an increasing number of MSS was laid under contribution to supply materials for the apparatus criticus. The first of these was that of Dean Fell in 1675; the greatest was that of John Mill in 1707, which was remarkable not only for the number of Greek MSS quoted in it, but for its use of the versions, its collection (for the first time) of Patristic quotations, and its valuable prolegomena. In the 18th cent. Bentley (whose first appearance in the field of Biblical criticism was stimulated by Mill's great work) made large collections for a new edition, but was unable to make use of them. J. J. Wettstein, a Swiss assistant of Bentley, produced in 1751-52 an edition in which our present notation of the MSS was first introduced; and the list was considerably extended by C. F. Matthæi (1782-88), F. K. Alter (1786-87), A. Birch (1788-1801), and, finally, J. M. A. Scholz (1830-36), with whom the first stage of NT textual criticism may be said to have come to a close.

35. During this first, and most necessary, stage of the collection of evidence, which extends from 1657 to 1830, little was done in the way of classifying the materials thus obtained, or laying down the principles upon which they should be employed and interpreted. There are, however, some notable exceptions. Mill, in his Prolegomena, discussed the true reading of many passages. J. A. Bengel, in 1734, divided the MSS and Versions into two families, which he called African and Asiatic, and asserted the superiority of the former, consisting of the few most ancient witnesses, over the latter, which included the great mass of later authorities. In this we find the germ of the principle of the classification of authorities, which is now the guiding principle of textual criticism, whether Biblical or classical. It was opposed by Wetstein, who anticipated the advocacy of the TR in our own time by Dean Burgon and others, maintaining that all the most ancient MSS had been contaminated from the Latin, and that only the later authorities were worthy of attention. J. S. Semler (1767) developed Bengel's theory, making a triple classification of authorities, as Alexandrian, Eastern (i.e. Antiochian and Constantinopolitan), and Western; and this was elaborated by his pupil J. J. Griesbach (1774-75), who adopted the same classification, but carried much further the assignment of the then extant MSS and Versions to their several classes. Both in his classification and in his estimate of the characteristics of the various families Griesbach went far to anticipate the theory of Westcott and Hort, which is the foundation of contemporary criticism.

36. None of the scholars hitherto named, however, put his principles to the test by producing a worked Greek text of the NT. This step, which marked the opening of a new era in textual criticism, was taken in 1831 by K. Lachmann, a distinguished classical scholar, who, like Bentley before him, but with greater success, resolved to apply to the text of the NT the principles which were admitted as sound in the case of the Greek and Latin classics. This method consisted of selecting some of the oldest authorities (MSS, versions, and Fathers), and forming his text solely from them, while ignoring the great mass of later witnesses. In putting faith mainly in the most ancient witnesses, in spite of their numerical inferiority, Lachmann only did what every editor of a classical text would do; but he departed from sound principle, first, by absolutely ignoring all evidence outside his selected group; and, secondly, by adopting in all cases the reading given by the majority of his selected authorities, without regard to the internal probabilities of the various readings, or applying any of the tests which textual science provides for discriminating between alternatives the external evidence for which is approximately equal. Moreover, the knowledge of the earlier authorities at Lachmann's disposal was by no means so complete as that which we have at the present day. For these reasons Lachmann's text could not long hold its ground precisely as it stood; nevertheless it did very great service in breaking the monopoly of the TR, and in preparing the way for further progress.

37. The next stage in this progress is marked by the names of Constantine Tischendorf and S. P. Tregelles. As the discoverer of the Codex Sinaiticus, Tischendorf achieved the most sensational success in textual history; but he also did admirable service by his collation of almost all the uncial MSS of any importance (except that he was allowed only very limited access to B), and his collection of evidence in his successive editions of the NT (culminating in the 8th, published in 1869-72) remains the fullest apparatus criticus to the present day. His own printed text of the NT fluctuated considerably from one edition to another, and his judgment between various readings was hardly equal to his industry in collecting them; still in the main he followed the best authorities, and his edition remains one of the principal examples of a text constructed on critical lines. The prolegomena to his 8th edition was compiled after his death by Dr. C. R. Gregory, and is a perfect storehouse of bibliographical information; in its latest form (published as an independent work, in German, under the title of Textkritik des neuen Testaments, Leipzig, 1900) it is the standard book of reference on the subject.

38. Tischendorf's industry as a collator was rivalled by that of his English contemporary, Tregelles, who collated all the extant uncial MSS and some of the chief minuscules, so that his results serve to check and test those of Tischendorf. In his text (published in 1857-72) he confined himself almost wholly to the uncials, with the Versions and Fathers, completely ignoring the TR. In fact, he followed very much the same principles as Tischendorf, and his edition is serviceable chiefly as a means of testing Tischendorf's judgment, and of showing how far two scholars, working independently on the same evidence, arrive at the same results. Unfortunately his text of the Gospels was published before the discovery of \aleph , and his knowledge of B was even less than that of Tischendorf.

39. The evidence accumulated by Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Tregelles, aided by the public interest excited by such discoveries as those of the Codex Sinaiticus and the Curetonian Syriac, produced a general sense of dissatisfaction with the TR, and in England led to an increasing desire for a revision of the AV in the light of modern knowledge, culminating in 1870 in the appointment of the Committees which produced the RV (for which see art. ENGLISH VERSIONS, §§ 35-37). Meanwhile two English scholars were at work on the text of the NT, whose results were destined not only to affect very greatly the revision of the English Bible, but also to lay the foundations of all the textual work of the succeeding generation, and whose influence remains paramount to this day. These were B. F. Westcott (afterwards Bishop of Durham) and F. J. A. Hort. Their joint work began as far back as 1853, when they were colleagues at Cambridge; and it bore fruit in 1881, when their text of the NT appeared on May 12th (five days before the publication of the RV of the NT), and the Introduction, embodying the principles upon which their text was based, in the following September. This volume (written by Hort, but representing the views of both scholars) is the text-book of modern textual criticism as applied to the Greek Bible.

40. The principles of WH are an extension of those of Semler and Griesbach, as described above (§ 35), and rest upon a classification of our authorities into families, and a discrimination between the merits of these families. It is in the Gospels and Acts that the textual phenomena are most plainly marked, and it is to them that the characteristics to be described apply most fully; but they are likewise true, in a lesser degree, of the other books of the NT. If the apparatus criticus of the Gospels be studied, it will be found that certain MSS and Versions tend to agree with one another, and to form groups distinguishable from other groups. Four such groups are in fact distinguished by WH, as follows; the reasons for the names assigned to them will appear shortly. (a) The Syrian family, often headed in the Gospels by the manuscripts A and C, but more fully and characteristically represented by the later uncials, such as EFKMS, etc., and by the great mass of the minuscules, by the Peshitta version, and by most of the Fathers from Chrysostom downwards; from this family, in its fully developed form, is descended the TR. (b) The Neutral family, of which the main representative is B, often supported by \aleph , by LRTZ, by the minuscule

Evan. 33, and some other minuscules in a lesser degree, by Boh. and sometimes Sah. and frequently by the quotations of Origen; in Acts, Epp., and Apoc., A and C generally join this group. (v) The Alexandrian family, a sort of sub-species of β , not continuously found in any one MS, but represented by the readings of some MSS of the β group when they differ among themselves, and especially when they differ from B; LT, and AC when they are not Syrian, may be taken as the leading members of the family. (6) The Western family, headed by D among the uncials (with E² in Acts and D₂ in Paul.) and Evan. 473 among a small group of minuscules, but most authentically represented by the Old Latin and Old Syriac versions, and especially by k and Syr.-Sin.; it also largely colours Sah., and is found in almost all the early Fathers, notably Justin, Irenaeus, Cyprian, and Clement.

41. These being the main divisions which are found to exist among our authorities, the next step is to discriminate between them, so as to determine which is the most generally trustworthy. Here it is (in addition to the greater minuteness of the examination and analysis of the individual authorities) that the original and epoch-making character of the work of WH is most conspicuous. The first proposition—and one which strikes at the root of the claims of the TR—is this, that no specifically 'Syrian' reading occurs in the NT quotations of any Father before Chrysostom. In other words, wherever the Syrian family marks itself off from the others by a reading of its own, that reading cannot be shown to have been in existence before the latter part of the 4th century. The importance of this proposition is obvious, and it is noteworthy, as showing the value of Patristic evidence, that the proof of it rests wholly on the quotations found in the Fathers. The inevitable conclusion is that the Syrian text is a secondary text, formed (according to WH in Syria, and especially in Antioch) in the course of the 4th century. This secondary character is also established by an examination of representative Syrian readings (for these, see especially J. O. F. Murray's art. 'Textual Criticism of the NT' in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol.). As compared with the rival readings of other groups, they show the ordinary signs of editorial revision, such as the modification of harsh or strange phrases, assimilation of one version of an incident with another, greater literary smoothness, and the like. A special proof of secondariness is found in what WH call conflate readings, when one group of authorities has one reading and another has a second, and the Syrian text combines the two. The shortest and simplest example is Lk 24³³, where \aleph BCL Boh. read eulogountes ton theon, D, OL, and Augustine ainountes ton theon, while A and the general mass of late uncials and minuscules have ainountes kai eulogountes ton theon. (For other examples of this type see Hort's Introduction, and Murray, loc. cit.) The conclusion, therefore, is that the witnesses belonging to the Syrian family, although they predominate enormously in numbers, possess little intrinsic weight when opposed to witnesses of the other groups.

42. As between the remaining groups the discrimination is not so easy, and must be made by other methods. The Patristic evidence can show us that the Western text (originally so named because the principal representatives of it were the OL version, the Latin Fathers, and the bilingual MSS) was spread over all the principal provinces to which Christianity penetrated,—Syria, Egypt, Rome, Gaul, Africa,—and that it goes back as far as we have any evidence, namely to the middle of the 2nd century. On the other hand, it points to Egypt as the special stronghold of the Neutral text, and the sole home of the Alexandrian. All, however, are of such antiquity that the preference can be given to none on this ground alone. It is necessary, therefore, to look at the internal character of the several texts. Of the Western text WH say (Introd. § 170): 'Any prepossessions in its favour that might be created by its imposing early ascendancy are for the most part soon dissipated by continuous study of its internal character.' The chief characteristics with which they charge it are a love of paraphrase; a tendency to interpolate words, sentences, and even paragraphs; free changes or insertions of conjunctions, pronouns, and prepositional phrases; and generally an extreme licence in handling the original text. Alexandrian readings, on the other hand, consist mainly of slight linguistic changes, made in the interest of literary style; they are thus comparatively unimportant, and give rise to little controversy. Over against these various divergences stands the text which WH call Neutral, because it shows few or none of the signs of aberration which characterize the other groups. This text is found predominantly in B, the character of which is so superior that its evidence always deserves the most careful consideration, even when it stands alone.

43. Such is, in briefest summary, the theory with regard to the textual history of the NT propounded by WH. On its first promulgation it was bitterly assailed by the advocates of the TR; but against these its triumph, in the opinion of nearly all students of the subject, has been decisive. More recently the tendency has been to depreciate the pre-eminence of the β or Neutral Text, as being merely the local text of Egypt, and to exalt the δ or Western family, on the ground of its wide and early diffusion and the apparently primitive character of some of its special readings. A further topic of criticism has been the terminology of WH. The term 'Syrian' has been condemned as liable to be confused with 'Syriac'; 'Western' as wholly misleading, since that type of text was widely prevalent in the East also, and probably took its rise thence; 'Neutral' as begging the question of the superior character of the family so described. These criticisms may be briefly dismissed; there is good foundation for them, but they are matters of form rather than of substance. 'Antiochian' might be substituted for 'Syrian' with advantage, and the Egyptian status of the 'Neutral' text might be admitted without abandoning its claims to superiority; but no good substitute for 'Western' has yet been proposed. In some ways it would be better to abandon epithets altogether, and to call the several families by the names of the α -text, the β -text, the γ -text, and the δ -text, as indicated in § 40; or the nomenclature of WH may be retained, but regarded simply as so many labels, devoid of any significant connotation.

44. It is more important to say something with regard to the comparative claims of the β and α texts in the first instance, and the β and δ texts subsequently. With regard to the former controversy, which raged with great warmth after the publication of the RV of the NT, the advocates of the α or Syrian or TR (chief among whom were Dean Burgon, his disciple and literary heir the Rev. E. Miller, and the Rev. G. H. Gwilliam, the editor of the Peshitta) rest their case mainly on the numerical preponderance of the manuscripts of this type, which they take as indicating the choice, deliberate or instinctive, of the early Church, and as implying the sanction and authority of Divine Providence. But to argue thus is to maintain that the textual history of the Bible is fundamentally different from that of all other books of ancient literature, and that the reasoning faculties given to us by God, which are generally recognized as guiding us to the truth with regard to the textual history of classical literature, are not to be employed with regard to the textual history of the NT. There is nothing strange or abnormal in the rejection of a relatively large number of late authorities in favour of a relatively small number of ancient authorities: on the contrary, it is a phenomenon common to nearly all works of ancient literature that have come down to us, the sole difference being that the NT manuscripts, early and late, are far more numerous than those of any classical work, so that the ordinary phenomena are exhibited on a much larger scale. If once it be admitted that the ordinary principles of literary criticism are to be applied to the NT, then the rejection of the TR in favour of one of the earlier families follows as a matter of necessity. It may be added that the course of discovery since the publication of WH's theory has furnished the best possible test of such a theory, that of wholly new and unforeseen witnesses, and that it has received therefrom much confirmation and no refutation. The discovery of the Sinaitic Syriac, the fuller scrutiny of the versions, the testing of the Patristic quotations (e.g. in the case of Ephraem Syrus, who was formerly supposed to have used the Peshitta), the papyrus and vellum fragments from Egypt and Sinai, the examination of more of the minuscule MSS, all these have brought additional support to readings of the β , γ , and δ families, for which the evidence previously available was sometimes very scanty, while they have done nothing to carry back the date of the distinctively Syrian readings beyond the period assigned to them by WH, namely, the age of Chrysostom.

45. One point remains to be dealt with in this connexion, namely, the question of the origin of this 'Syrian' text, which thus dominated the NT tradition for considerably over a thousand years. The view of WH is that it was due to deliberate editorial revision, operating probably in two stages, the first revision taking place early in the 4th cent., the second at some time after the middle of that century. Against this hypothesis it has been objected that, if such revisions took place, we should have expected to find some record of them in early Christian literature. We know the names of several editors of the Greek OT during this very century [see GR. VERSIONS OF OT]; is it likely that two revisions of the NT could have been executed and yet have left no trace in history? It has been urged that there is no record of how another great textual change was carried out, namely, the substitution in the Greek OT of Theodotion's version of Daniel for that of the LXX; and it is no doubt true that where the whole available literature likely to deal with such a subject is so scanty, the argument from silence is very precarious. Still it must be allowed to carry some weight, and not a few critics would substitute for Hort's double revision a process of gradual change spread over a considerable period. Such a gradual change would be due to a general consensus of opinion as to the right way to deal with divergent texts, namely, to combine them when possible, and otherwise to soften down harshnesses, to harmonize contradictions, and to give greater smoothness to the literary style. In favour of this hypothesis it may be noted that the MSS themselves show signs of a gradual and progressive development of the α text. The earliest MSS which (in the Gospels) can be classed with this family, A and C, exhibit its characteristics sporadically, not continuously, and not infrequently side with MSS of the β and δ families against readings found in the overwhelming mass of later witnesses. The 6th cent. MSS, $\zeta\eta\theta$, show the α text in a somewhat more advanced stage; but it is not until we reach the later uncials, such as EFKMSII, that we find it fully developed in the form which we know as the TR. But whether we adopt the hypothesis of a definite revision or that of a gradual process of change in order to account for the existence of the α text, the fact of the existence of such a text remains, and its character as a secondary text of relatively late origin must be taken to be one of the established results of criticism.

46. The ordinary English student of the Bible is able readily to appreciate the points at issue in the controversy between the α and β texts, because they are substantially represented to him by the differences

(so far as they are differences in text, and not merely in rendering) between the AV and the RV; for though the RV does not go the whole way with the 'Neutral' text, nevertheless its textual departures from the AV are in that direction, and give an adequate general idea of its character. In dealing with the δ text, however, there is no such ready means of realizing its character, since it is not embodied in any English version, or even in any edition of the Greek text.* Its features must be gathered by an inspection of the apparatus criticus of such works as the 'Variorum' edition of the English Bible, or the Oxford edition (with Sanday's appendixes) of the Greek. Even here it is not all plain sailing, since no one MS gives a full and consistent representation of the δ text, and the authorities which are predominantly of this character not infrequently disagree with regard to particular readings. Generally it may be said that the Old Syriac (especially Syr.-Sin.) and Old Latin (especially k, e, and Cyprian) represent the oldest form of the δ text, while Codex Bezae (D), its chief champion among Greek MSS, has it in a more advanced (and more extravagant) form.

From these some idea of its divergences from the α and β texts may be gathered (though it must be remembered that sometimes α and δ are found in agreement against β , owing to the eclectic compilers of a having adopted a δ reading from the alternatives presented to them; and sometimes, on the other hand, β and δ concur in the preservation of some early reading which has been dropped or altered in α). Thus OL and OS (with $\kappa\beta$) omit 'firstborn' in Mt 1², and the words 'bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you' and 'despitefully use you' in Mt 5⁴⁴, while D in both cases has the omitted words; Syr.-Cur. has the doxology to the Lord's Prayer, while D and most OL MSS omit it; OS omits Mt 16² and 17²¹ (with $\kappa\beta$), while OL and D retain both; in Mt 18¹¹, D, OL, and Syr.-Cur. agree with the α group in retaining the verse, while Syr.-Sin. sides with the β group in omitting it; after Mt 20²⁸ a long additional passage (akin to Lk 14⁸⁻¹¹) is inserted in D⁹, OL, and Syr.-Cur. (Syr.-Sin. is defective). Mk 16⁷⁻²⁰ is omitted by k and Syr.-Sin., inserted by D, Syr.-Cur., and most MSS of the OL. At Lk 6⁵ D inserts the incident of the man working on the Sabbath day, but OS is defective here, and OL has no trace of it; in Lk 9⁵⁴ the TR is derived from the δ text (D, OL, Syr.-Cur.), but Syr.-Sin. agrees with the β group in omitting the words 'and said, Ye know not what spirit ye are of, etc.'; D and some OL MSS omit Lk 22²⁰, while other OL MSS and OS transpose vv. 17, 18 to this place; Syr.-Sin. omits Lk 22⁴³⁻⁴⁴, but D, OL, and Syr.-Cur. retain them; in Lk 23⁴⁵ some words are added to the end by OS and ϕ ; in Lk 24^{6-12, 38}, where D and OL have remarkable omissions (which WH are inclined to accept, even against the testimony of B), both MSS of OS contain the omitted passages; but they concur with D and OL in omitting 24⁴⁰. These examples serve to show both the character of the δ text and the way in which its authorities are divided among themselves,—a point of considerable importance; while in Acts the divergences of the δ text (here mainly represented by D and OL, the OS not being extant) are even greater, so much so as to have given rise to the hypothesis that it represents a different edition of the book, due to the author himself.† The vagaries of individual members of the δ group are occasionally still more striking than those which have been quoted; as when two OL MSS (α and ϕ) insert in Mt 11¹⁵ the legend (apparently from the Ebionite Gospel) of the great light which flashed from Jordan at the baptism of Jesus, or when D c and Sah. state (at Lk 23³⁴) that the stone at the mouth of the sepulchre was 'such as scarce twenty men could roll.' In addition to these substantial additions to or alterations of the text, the verbal divergences are very numerous, proving that an excessive licence was taken, by scribes or editors, in dealing with the Gospel text.

47. Until quite recently, the special variants of the δ text were almost universally regarded as aberrations, which no one would think of accepting as readings of the original text. It is true that WH were disposed to believe that the passages omitted by the 'Western' authorities in the later chapters of Lk. are no authentic part of the Evangelist's original work, but are additions made at a very early date; but this is the only case in which they accepted testimony of this class as superior to that of B and its allies, and few other scholars would at that time have gone even so far as they did. For some time after the promulgation of WH's theory, the conflict raged over the comparative merits of the α and β types of text; and it was only as the superiority of the latter was more and more established that scholars began to investigate more fully the characteristics and claims of the remaining family (ignoring γ , as merely a sub-species of β), for which a very high antiquity could be demonstrated. The claims of the δ text received a considerable stimulus from the publication of more of the OL MSS (especially k), and above all from the discovery of Syr.-Sin., which is perhaps the most important single member of the group. Further attention was attracted to it by Blass' attempt to show that the δ text in Lk. and that in Acts represent different editions of those books, issued by Luke himself at different dates. At the present day, not a few scholars are inclined to attach considerable weight to the evidence of this family, and to hold that the β text, no less than the α , is due to editorial revision, and that the original form of the NT text is to be looked for in the OL and OS to a much greater extent than was previously supposed possible.

* A partial exception is furnished by Blass' texts of Mt., Lk., and Acts.

† For a fuller list of notable δ -readings, both in Evv. and Acts, see Kenyon, Handbook, pp. 76, 131-134, 293-299.

48. The main argument in favour of the δ text is its great age and wide circulation, as demonstrated by the Patristic evidence of the 2nd and 3rd centuries. It has to be borne in mind, however, that purity of text is due not so much to great age as to care in transmission, and that where such care has been wanting, corruption is both rapid and far-reaching. The papyrus MSS of the Greek classics, written in the first two centuries of the Christian era, which have recently come to light in large numbers, are almost always less accurate than the vellum MSS of the 10th and 11th cents.; the reason no doubt being that the papyri are generally cheap copies, circulating among private individuals in the upper provinces of Egypt, while the vellum MSS represent the tradition of the great libraries, in which transcripts would be made more accurately and revised more carefully. So with regard to the early Christian literature: we can well imagine that during the century and a half following the composition of the books, when Christianity was an unauthorized religion, liable to persecution and the destruction of its books, and when Christians themselves looked for a speedy Second Coming of the Lord, there would be little care and little opportunity for the precise collation of manuscripts, and a great possibility of verbal and even material variation in transcription. It is quite intelligible, therefore, that through the greater part of the Christian world inaccurate copies would circulate, and that the more careful preservation of the true text would run in a comparatively narrow channel. And if there was one part of the world in which such care might more than elsewhere be expected, it was Egypt, and especially Alexandria, the home of Greek textual criticism, and the home also of the Greek version of the OT. Hence, if the internal evidence points to the β text as the most accurate and authentic in character, the inference to be drawn therefrom is not materially shaken when we find signs that its birthplace was in Egypt, and that its early circulation was in that country, while texts of various shades of the δ type were prevalent elsewhere. That such was the character of the β text was the deliberate opinion of WH, who were perfectly aware of the early and wide attestation of the δ text; and their conclusion is supported by the quite independent investigations of B. Weiss, whose elaborate study (on very different lines) of the texts of the principal uncials led him to the conclusion that, whereas all the rest show marked indications of editorial revision in varying degrees, the text of B, though by no means free from scribal blunders, has the strongest signs of authenticity and originality. It is also to be remembered that it is impossible to form a coherent text of the δ type. The witnesses differ so much among themselves that it is easier to find a majority of them against any reading of that type than in favour of it. This appears even in Blass' attempt to form a δ text of Lk. and Acts, and in the other books the task is still more hopeless. Readings of the δ type, in short, have much more the character of results of a common tendency, working more or less independently in different places under similar circumstances, than of the descendants from a common original.

49. The natural conclusion, therefore, would seem to be that the β text still holds the position of superiority which was secured for it by the searching criticism of WH; and this, on the whole, is probably the prevalent view to-day. At the same time it must be admitted that individual readings of the δ class deserve more respectful consideration than heretofore. Reverting once more to the results obtained in the analogous field of classical literature, the evidence of early papyri, while it generally confirms the superiority of the MS or MSS which modern criticism has selected as the best of any given author, nevertheless tends to show that the truth is not always to be found in any one witness or group of witnesses. The best MSS sometimes make mistakes, and in such cases the true reading may be preserved in MSS which as a rule are inferior. To this possibility the critic must always be alive, and all the more so when the alternative reading is certainly a very early one, as those of the δ family often must be. Consequently an editor of the NT, though he would do well to pin his faith generally to the β family, is bound also to consider readings of the δ type on their merits; and that especially when support is found for them from more than one branch of the δ family. The Latin and Syriac branches of the family often differ; but when they agree, the reading which they support must certainly go back to a very early date. The Codex Bezae, the principal Greek member of the family, represents its characteristics in a somewhat extreme form, and readings supported by it alone must be regarded with much suspicion; but in combination with OL and OS it becomes a very important witness. If, in the future, earlier copies of the Gospels than are at present known to us should come to light, they may very probably represent the characteristics of this group to some extent; but it will still remain to be considered whether they seriously affect the pre-eminence of the small but select body of authorities to which WH gave, and gave justifiably, as it would seem, the name of 'Neutral.'

50. For literature bearing on the earlier sections of this article see notes at the end of §§ 9, 16, 24, 30, 32. The history and bibliography of textual criticism are best set out in Tregelles' Account of the Printed Text of the NT (1854); Scrivener's Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the NT (4th ed. 1894); and Gregory's Prolegomena to Tischendorf's edition (1894), and Textkritik des NT (1900). Shorter summaries of the historical matter, with fuller discussions of the textual problem as it stands since Westcott and Hort, will be found in Kenyon's Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the NT (1901), and Nestle's Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the Greek NT (Eng. tr. from the 2nd German ed. 1901); the latter is particularly good for bibliographical information. Hort's Introduction (forming vol. ii. of The NT in the Original Greek, by B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort, 1881) is, of course, invaluable for its statement of the principles of textual criticism, and for its exposition of the epoch-making theory of these two scholars. Murray's article in the Ext. Vol. of Hastings' DB is an elaborate vindication of WH's position, based largely upon the materials left behind by Hort. For an introduction to the subject on the smallest possible scale, Prof. K. Lake's Text of the NT (1900) can be strongly recommended.

The fullest apparatus criticus at present available is that in Tischendorf's NT Graecæ, 1869-72. A very serviceable select apparatus is given in Sanday's appendixes to the Oxford Greek Testament (1889), which also includes a full collation of WH. For English readers a select apparatus is provided in Eyre & Spottiswoode's Variorum Bible (NT by Sanday, Clarke, and Goodwin, revised in 1888). Of revised texts the most important are (1) Westcott and Hort (vol. 1. of the work cited above, also printed separately); (2) The Greek Testament with the readings adopted by the Revisers of the AV (Oxford, 1881, edited by H. Palmer); (3) Weymouth's Resultant Greek Testament (1886), based upon a comparison of all the principal editions from Lachmann to the RV; (4) Nestle's edition, based originally (Stuttgart, 1898) on a comparison of Tischendorf, WH, and Weymouth, on the principle of following always the reading of the majority, and giving select variants (without the authorities for them) at the foot; in later editions (1901, etc.) Weiss has been substituted for Weymouth. Nestle's text has since 1904 been adopted by the British and Foreign Bible Society, with a different apparatus, giving every variation of any importance from the TR and the text underlying the RV. It is now, therefore, easy to obtain a text of the NT based upon the best available witnesses, as arrived at by a consensus of the most competent critics, and unquestionably superior in accuracy and authenticity to the TR. A new edition of the NT, on a large scale, which promises to be of great importance, is being prepared by Prof. H. von Soden.

F. G. KENYON.

THADDÆUS.—This is the name of one of the Twelve Apostles as given in Mt 10³, Mk 3¹⁸. He is doubtless to be identified with the 'Judas [son] of James,' who appears in the Lukan lists (Lk 6¹⁶, Ac 1¹³; so RV, but AV renders 'brother of James'), and with the 'Judas, not Iscariot,' of Jn 14²², though some Syrian writers have made this last Judas to be the same as the Apostle Thomas (syriac reads here 'Thomas,' syriac reads 'Judas Thomas'), Thomas being confessedly only a surname, 'the Twin.'

In all four lists Thaddæus (or Judas) comes next to Simon the Cananean or Zealot, and may not improbably have been his brother or intimate friend (cf. the variant 'Judas Zelotes' in Mt 10⁴, noted below). It is the opinion of almost all modern scholars that neither is to be identified with any of the Brethren of our Lord, though Dom Chapman has lately published an elaborate argument to the contrary (JThSt vii. 412).

Instead of, or in addition to, 'Thaddæus,' we find the variant Lebbæus. In Mk 3¹⁸, Codex Bezae (D) and some Old Latin MSS have 'Lebbæus'; but all the best authorities, including syriac (syriac is wanting here), have 'Thaddæus,' and this is doubtless right. In Mt 10⁴ the oldest Greek MSS (A, B), the Vulgate, the Coptic, and some Old Latin MSS have 'Thaddæus,' while D, supported by the valuable Old Latin k and some other MSS, has 'Lebbæus.' Some other Old Latin MSS have 'Judas Zelotes,' and syriac has 'Judas son (sic) of James' (syriac is wanting here). Some inferior MSS and several Versions combine 'Lebbæus' and 'Thaddæus,' as AV ('L. whose surname was Th.'); but this is clearly a later explanation, and must be rejected. We see, then, that in Mt. 'Thaddæus' has the best attestation, and this alone is read in RV, from which 'Lebbæus' has completely disappeared. But how could 'Lebbæus' have been invented? It has been suggested (a) that some early scribe, taking 'Thaddæus' and 'Lebbæus' to be names of kindred meaning, the former from an Aramaic word denoting 'breast,' the latter from another denoting 'heart,' confused the two; or (b), with greater probability, that 'Lebbæus' is a form of 'Levi,' introduced by some scribe who did not know that Levi and Matthew were the same person. It does not affect these explanations if, with Dalman, we hold that these derivations are in fact wrong, for the scribes were not necessarily qualified to be good philologists.

After NT times Thaddæus (Syr. Taddai) was often confused with Addai, who was said to be one of the Seventy disciples, and who, being sent to Edessa, healed Abgarus (see Smith-Wace, Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. 875). In a list of Apostles given in Lagarde's Appendix to the Apostolic Constitutions (p. 283), Thaddæus, who is Lebbæus and Judas, is distinguished from 'Judas of James,' and is said to have preached at Edessa, to have been buried in Egypt, and to have been crucified.

THARRA.—See TERESH.

THASSI.—The surname of Simon the Maccabæe (1 Mac 2³). The meaning of the word is quite uncertain. As likely an interpretation as any is 'the zealous.'

THEATRE.—The name is Greek (lit. 'a place for viewing' [a spectacle]), and the thing appears to be of Greek origin also. From the cities of Greece proper, theatres spread all over the Greek and Roman world. The auditorium consisted regularly of a semicircular cavity cut on the side of a hill, much broader at the upper end than the lower. The seats were placed concentrically, being commonly carved out of the rock. The part level with the ground, the orchestra, was occupied by the choir. The stage and scene were on the diameter, and were of artificial construction, being very often like the front of a temple. The theatres were used for public meetings, as being generally the largest buildings in the cities (Ac 19²⁹⁻³¹; cf. also art. EPHEsus).

THEOPHILUS (lit. 'beloved of God').—The person to whom St. Luke's two works are addressed (Lk 1³, Ac 1¹). That Theophilus stands for a real person and is not a general name for the Christian reader is made probable by the title 'most excellent,' which, when strictly used, implies equestrian rank (Ramsay, St. Paul p. 388). It is used also of Felix (Ac 23²⁶ 24³) and of Festus (26³). But some take the title as a mere complimentary address, and therefore as telling us nothing of Theophilus himself. If it is used strictly, we may agree with Ramsay that Theophilus was a Roman official, and the favourable attitude of St. Luke to the institutions of the Empire is in keeping with this idea. If so, Theophilus would be the Christian, not the Roman, name of the person addressed.

THESSALONIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO THE.—

1. Occasion and date.—According to the narrative of Ac 17, St. Paul, in the course of his second missionary journey, went from Philippi to Thessalonica, and reasoned there in the synagogue for three Sabbaths, with the result that 'some of them were persuaded, and consorted with Paul and Silas; and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few' (v. 4). There follows a tumult of the Jews, and accusation against Jason, St. Paul's host, who is bound over to keep the peace. St. Paul is sent away by the brethren to Berea, and thence again to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy in Berea. From Athens he sent for them, waiting till they should arrive (17¹⁵, 16), but apparently they did not rejoin him till he had passed on to Corinth (18¹). At the time of his writing 1 Th. they are with him

THESSALONIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO

(1¹). Timothy having just arrived (3¹), not, however, from Berea, but from Thessalonica, whither he had been despatched by St. Paul from Athens (3¹. 2). It is clear, then, that the Epistle was written from Corinth, but in the compressed narrative of Acts, St. Luke has overlooked the fact that Timothy at least did join St. Paul in Athens, and was sent back to Thessalonica under impulse of the Apostle's deep concern for his converts, whom he could not re-visit personally, for 'Satan hindered us' (1 Th 3¹. 2 2¹⁷. 18). (Very possibly Jason's bond involved a pledge that St. Paul should not re-enter the city,—an absolute barrier, described as hindrance by Satan.) Further, the impression is conveyed by Acts that St. Paul's expulsion from Thessalonica followed immediately upon a three weeks' ministry in the synagogue, and a doubt naturally arises whether the church as described in 1 Th. could have been established in so short a time. Apart, however, from indications in the Epistle itself of a longer stay (e.g. 2¹⁷. 12), there are others:—(1) While in Thessalonica St. Paul received gifts more than once from his converts at Philippi (Ph 4¹⁸). (2) The synagogue ministry does not account for his astonishing success among the Gentiles (Ac 17¹, 1 Th 1¹). It is probable, therefore, that the Acts narrative is to be interpreted as implying a brief and almost fruitless appeal to the Jews, followed by a longer and more successful ministry to the Gentile population (cf. Ac 13¹⁴⁻¹⁶). It may be added that at Ac 17¹ there is considerable 'Western' authority for inserting 'and of' before 'Greeks,' thus giving three classes of converts besides the women—Jews, devout persons (i.e. proselytes), and Greeks (i.e. heathen). See also Ramsay, who constructs an 'eclectic' text (St. Paul the Traveller, pp. 226 note, 235 note 2).

The occasion of the letter, then, was the return of Timothy from his mission: its date falls within the eighteen months' sojourn in Corinth, as late as possible, to allow time for the history of the church as sketched in the Ep., and yet early enough to leave room for the circumstances of 2 Th., also written from Corinth. The varying schemes of Pauline chronology assign for the departure from Corinth the spring of some year between 50 and 54; perhaps 52 is the most probable date for 1 Thessalonians. With the possible exception of Galatians (which, if addressed to the churches of South Galatia, may have been written earlier), it is the earliest of extant Pauline writings.

2. Contents.—The Epistle does not lend itself to formal analysis. The least doctrinal and most personal of all St. Paul's letters to the churches, it is simply prompted by affectionate concern for the 'faith and love' of his recent converts, and for their 'good remembrance' of himself.

The tidings brought by Timothy that they 'stand fast' (3¹⁻⁵) leads the Apostle to begin with an outburst of thankful memories of his mission, in which every reminder of his ministry among the Thessalonians and of their enthusiastic response is both an appeal and an admonition. This, together with reference to his intense longing to see them and to the visit and return of Timothy, forms the first and main section of the Epistle (chs. 1-3), the final words gathering up all its desires into a prayer (3¹¹⁻¹³). Very simple yet profound expression is given to the Christian faith and hope (1¹. 10); there is reference to Jewish hostility (2¹⁴⁻¹⁶), but no controversial insistence on an anti-Judaic Christianity—a confirmation of early date. In ch. 4 there is warning against the besetting impurity of the Gentile world (4¹⁻⁸), and against a fanatical detachment from the ordinary duties and responsibilities of life (vv. 9-12). This is followed by a comforting assurance, rendered necessary by the belief in the speedy 'coming of the Lord' which St. Paul shared with his converts (v. 13), that those of the brethren who have already died will have part in that event equally with those who are yet alive (vv. 13-18). This theme is carried on to a warning to be watchful against the sudden coming of 'the day of the Lord,' as becometh 'sons of light and sons of the day' (5¹⁻¹¹). A general admonition to the church to respect its leaders and to cultivate peace (vv. 12-14) leads out into a beautiful series of short exhortations, like a 'string of glittering diamonds' (vv. 14-22), prayer and salutation (vv. 23-28), an injunction that the letter be read to all the brethren (v. 27), and final benediction (v. 28).

3. Authenticity.—(1) External testimony.—Echoes of 1 Th. have been traced in Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp,—none of them, however, certain. It is contained in the Syriac and Old Latin Versions, and named in the Muratorian Fragment. The earliest quotation is in Irenaeus, who attributes the Ep. to St. Paul, and specifies it as the 'First' to the Thessalonians: it is quoted by Clement of Alexandria, and frequently by Tertullian. If regard be had to the personal and non-theological character of the letter, this testimony is ample.

(2) Internal evidence.—The simplicity of the letter, the prevalence of the personal note over the doctrinal, its accord with the history in Acts (apart from the slight discrepancies already noted, which a 'forgery' would surely have avoided), and the agreement with Philippi and 2 Cor., in the writer's attitude of affectionate confidence towards these Macedonian Christians, all make strongly for genuineness, and the Ep. is, in fact, generally accepted by critics of all schools.

The assertion of an un-Pauline doctrinal standpoint (by Baur) takes for the standard of comparison the later Epp.—Gal., Cor., and Rom.—and ignores the gradual shaping of Pauline Christianity under stress of problems and controversies as yet hardly in sight. The Jewish opposition is not to St. Paul's distinctive teaching, but to his whole mission (2¹⁴⁻¹⁶): the declaration that because of persistent rejection of Christ 'the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost' (2¹⁶), by no means implies that Jerusalem is already destroyed (A.D. 70). The rapid progress of the Church at Thessalonica reflects the first enthusiasm of the new faith, and such primitive organization as it exhibits (5¹²) is consistent with the still earlier date of Ac 14². It is true, and in no way remarkable, that the expectation of an imminent Parousia (4¹⁵⁻¹⁷) is not repeated in St. Paul's later letters (2 Co 5¹, Ph 1²¹⁻²⁴ 3¹¹. 20. 21 4⁸, Col 1¹⁰. 12. 13). Would, then, a 'forger' of a later generation have attributed this to St. Paul?

There is really no reason to doubt that the Epistle gives a genuine and invaluable self-revelation of St. Paul the man. All the great Christian truths appear—the Divinity of Christ, His death for men, and resurrection, the Christian's union with Him, the gift of the Holy Spirit,—but less as doctrines than as vital elements of personal religion, the moving forces of St. Paul's own life and ministry. S. W. GREEN.

THESSALONIANS, SECOND EPISTLE TO THE.—1.

Occasion and date.—Scattered indications fix the letter (if genuine) as written from Corinth, not long after the First Epistle. For Timothy and Silas (Silvanus) are still with the Apostle (1¹, cf. 1 Th 1¹), whereas in Acts there is no further mention of Silas after St. Paul left Corinth. The former letter seems to be referred to (2¹⁵), and the allusions to St. Paul's ministry in Thessalonica suggest that this was almost as recent as when 1 Th. was written. Very possibly 3² is to be explained by the opposition encountered at Corinth, recorded in Ac 18. The reason for a second letter are hardly evident in any considerable difference of subject-matter; they appear to consist in tidings which had reached St. Paul as to (1) some misunderstanding of his teaching about the Parousia (2¹⁻³); (2) increase of persecution (1⁴⁻¹⁰); (3) disorderly conduct in some members of the Church (3¹¹); (4) letters forged in the Apostle's name (2² 3¹⁷).

2. Contents.—

Salutation (1¹⁻²); thanksgiving (with prayer) for their growth in faith and love in the midst of affliction patiently endured, with assurance of God's vengeance upon their persecutors (vv. 3-12); warning that the day of the Lord is not yet, but must be heralded by certain signs (2¹⁻¹²); renewed thanksgiving, exhortation, and prayer (vv. 13-17). St. Paul asks for their prayers (3¹⁻⁵), expresses his confidence in them (vv. 5-8), warns them against the 'disorderly' (vv. 9-16); and between repeated benedictions authenticates the letter by his signature (vv. 18-19).

3. Authenticity.—(1) External testimony. The evidence already cited for 1 Th. is reinforced by quotations in Polycarp, and possibly in Justin Martyr; that is, of the two Epistles the Second is the more strongly attested.

(2) Internal evidence. Circumstances have already been assigned to the letter, in themselves consistent and not improbable. To these may be added the close resemblance to 1 Th. in subject-matter and phrasing, so obvious that it need not here be detailed. A literary dependence of 2 Th. on 1 Th. is practically certain, for the interval necessary to justify a second letter at all forbids the supposition of unconscious repetition. If 2 Th. is by St. Paul, he must have re-read his former letter before writing this, and the question naturally arises whether it is likely that he would so reproduce himself. (The case of Colossians and Ephesians is not parallel: these were contemporary Epistles, and not addressed to the same Church.) Hence the resemblance to 1 Th. is made an argument against the Pauline authorship of 2 Th. Moreover, along with the resemblance are found other features which are regarded as un-Pauline and post-Pauline, with the result that the Second Epistle is widely rejected by those who admit the First. The grounds of this rejection must be briefly examined.

(a) Style. It is freely admitted that this argument is hazardous and indiscriminate: those who rely upon it would not perhaps quarrel with Jowett's dictum that 'objections of this kind are, for the most part, matters of taste or feeling, about which it is useless to dispute' (Com. on Th. i. 147). The argument must also reckon with those evident features of Pauline style and vocabulary which the closer resemblance of some two-thirds of the Ep. to 1 Th. carries with it, while in the remainder what is exceptional may be due to the new subject-matter. Still, it may be argued that some of the passages which are most closely parallel to 1 Th. show a loss of ease and simplicity which suggests that they have been worked over by another hand. There is a difference, hard to account for in the same writer saying the same thing after so short an interval; nor is the change such as marks advance towards the style of St. Paul's later letters.

(b) Subject-matter (apart from 2¹⁻¹²). As compared with 1 Th., very little appears in 2 Th. that is new or convincingly Pauline: something, too, of the warmth and glow of personal feeling has gone. The severity of tone in 1⁸⁻⁹ cannot perhaps be objected to, in view of 1 Th. 2¹⁵⁻¹⁶, while 3⁶⁻¹⁵ is sufficiently accounted for by an aggravation of the offence already rebuked (1 Th. 4¹¹⁻⁵⁴). The reference to an 'epistle as from us' (2²) suggests an earlier correspondence of St. Paul with his Churches, of which we have no knowledge, frequent enough to have already given rise to fraudulent imitation. This is not impossible, though the precaution of a certifying signature (3¹⁷) may seem, perhaps, a little inadequate.

(c) The passage 2¹⁻¹². The objection that this contradicts the eschatology of 1 Th. 5²⁻³ cannot be sustained. The earlier passage speaks of a coming of 'the day of the Lord,' sudden and unexpected: if this had been misinterpreted of a coming so imminent as to cause the ordinary duties of life to lose interest or claim, the Apostle might well, without inconsistency, remind the Thessalonians that he had warned them of signs which must first be fulfilled (2³⁻⁶).

A more serious doubt is raised by the apocalyptic character of the passage, unique in Paul, and held to show both dependence on later writings and allusion to post-Pauline history. So far, however, as the thought is exceptional, the section may fairly be regarded as a pendant to the equally exceptional section 1 Th. 4¹³⁻¹⁷ (cf. also Ro. 7¹⁻⁴, Gal. 4²⁻³), and as more likely to be original than attributed to Paul by a later imitator. The question rather is whether it can be accounted for by contemporary ideas, or betrays the facts and conceptions of a later time. The general thought is that the coming of Christ is to be heralded by an outburst of iniquity, described as the 'apostasy' ('falling away,' 2³), either headed by or personified as 'the man of sin' (RVm 'the man of lawlessness'), 'the son of perdition,' 'the lawless one' (vv. 7-9) whose character and coming are more fully described in vv. 9-12. Already 'the mystery of lawlessness' is at work (v. 7), but the crisis is delayed, as the Thessalonians know, by 'that which restraineth' (v. 6), 'one who restrains' (v. 7). In due season this restraint will be removed, that the lawless one may be revealed, to be slain by the Lord Jesus (vv. 8-9).

Now, of the elements of this conception, that of an 'apostasy' is not un-Pauline: it appears 2 Co. 11¹³⁻¹⁴, Ro. 16¹⁷⁻¹⁹ (as well as Ac 20²⁹⁻³⁰, and throughout the Pastoral Ep.), and is attributed to false teachers. The same idea occurs in Mt. 24¹⁰⁻¹², 2²⁴; 2 Pet. and Jude, 1 Jn. 2¹⁸⁻²², 4¹, 2 Jn. 7. This wide prevalence of the thought in the NT writings, and the constant prediction of 'many' false teachers, false prophets, false Christs, antichrists (1 Jn. 2¹⁸), may suggest as regards our passage (1) that it draws upon a common stock of eschatological ideas; (2) that 'the man of sin' is not necessarily a person but rather a type (cf. 1 Jn. 2¹⁸, 'many antichrists,' but v. 22 and elsewhere 'the antichrist'), symbolizing tendencies and movements, and therefore only at grave hazard to be identified with any definite historical personage. Hence the alleged reference to the legend of Nero redivivus' (Tac. Hist. ii. 8), with its implication of A.D. 68-70 as the earliest possible date for 2 Th., is quite without warrant.

It is true that our passage has close affinities with Revelation (especially 13¹⁻⁸, 19²⁰, 20⁴), but this does not necessarily mean dependence. For Ezk. 38, 39, Dn. 7-9, 11, 12, and later extra-canonical Jewish apocalyptic literature present, under varied historic colouring, the same conception of a final rally of the powers of evil before the last days, and of the triumph of Messiah over 'antichrist,' in Test. xii. Patr. this 'anti-christ' is 'Belial' or 'Beliar' (cf. 2 Co. 6¹⁵), in Rev. 'the beast' (symbol of the Roman Empire rather than exclusively of Nero), and it is not necessary to regard 'the man of sin' and equivalent expressions as more personal than these. What is really peculiar to 2 Th. is the assertion of a restraining power, holding in check the mystery of lawlessness already at work. Can this be explained as historical colour given by St. Paul to current apocalyptic tradition under the circumstances of A.D. 53 or thereabouts?

Now, at that date the Apostle of the Gentiles had lately experienced the determined enmity of the Jews to his whole Christian mission, at Thessalonica, Beroea, and Corinth. Though the Parousia is not yet (2 Th. 2²), St. Paul expects it within his own lifetime (1 Th. 4¹⁷). The traditional 'antichrist' is therefore already to be looked for (2 Th. 2⁷), and might well be discovered in Jewish hatred, bent on the very destruction of Christianity (1 Th. 2¹⁵⁻¹⁶), fortified by its secure hold of the national sanctuary (2 Th. 2⁴), and held in restraint only by the forces of order seated in the Roman power, or, possibly, in the better elements of Judaism itself (2⁸⁻⁷). Thus interpreted, the passage would be a development on apocalyptic lines of the outburst of 1¹⁰⁻¹², and no necessity would remain for the suggestion, quite unsupported by evidence, that 2¹⁻¹² either is an interpolation, or is itself a genuine Pauline fragment worked up into a spurious Epistle.

So far, then, as doubts concerning 2 Th. are reduced to argument, they can hardly prevail against the tradition of Pauline authorship. Whether misgivings as to style can be relieved by the suggestion that Timothy or Silas wrote in the Apostle's name is doubtful; at least, the repeated 'we' points to no such co-operation (cf. 1 Th. 2¹⁷⁻³¹). The trend of present critical opinion is perhaps indicated in Jülicher's judgment, that the difficulties 'can after all be most easily solved' under the view that the Epistle was written by St. Paul.

S. W. GREEN.

THESSALONICA (modern Saloniki).—An important city of the Roman province Macedonia, situated on the Via Egnatia, the overland route from Italy to the E., and at the north-eastern corner of the Thermaic Gulf. Its buildings rose above one another in tiers on the slopes of the hills. The situation is in every respect admirable, and must have been early occupied. This city was founded about B.C. 315, and named after a step-sister of Alexander the Great. Its greatness under Macedonian rule was even extended under Roman rule. It became the capital of the Roman province Macedonia, constituted B.C. 146. It was made a 'free city' in B.C. 42 (Ac 17⁵ knows this fact), and was ruled by its own magistrates under the rather rare title 'politarchs,' who were 5 or 6 in number. There were many Jews here, as the possession of a synagogue shows (Ac 17¹), and a number of proselytes (Ac 17⁴). The enemies of St. Paul raised a cry of treason, and a serious riot resulted. Some of Paul's friends had to give security that this would not be repeated. This forced Paul to leave the city. Members of the church here were Jason, Galus, Secundus, Aristarchus. See THESSALONIANS. A. SOUTER.

THEUDAS.—Mentioned by Gamaliel (Ac 5³⁶) as the leader of an unsuccessful rebellion of 400 men. Josephus [Ant. xx. v. 1] speaks of a Theudas who misled the people and gave himself out for a prophet, at least ten years after Gamaliel's speech; and also a little afterwards (§ 2) speaks of the sons of Judas the Galilean, the instigator of a rebellion in the time of Quirinius. Now St. Luke (Ac 5⁷) speaks successively of Theudas and Judas, and it is alleged that he erroneously put their names into Gamaliel's mouth owing to a misreading of Josephus. But the difference between the writers is so great that it is impossible to suppose that the one account depends on the other. If St. Luke depends on Josephus, where did he get his number '400 men' from? There may have been more than one Theudas, and Lightfoot suggests that the name might be used as the Greek equivalent of several different Hebrew ones. There certainly were, as Josephus tells us, many rebellions at this period. Or the name may be an interpolation in Josephus, taken from Acts by some Christian scribe (Blass); or one of the writers may have made a mistake in the name. But they could hardly be quoting, either from the other. A. J. MACLEAN.

THIGH

THIGH (Heb. yārēk, Gr. mēros).—The hollow of Jacob's thigh was strained as he wrestled at Peniel (Gn 32^a), and to this is attributed the Jewish custom (enjoined in the Mishna) of not eating 'the sinew of the hip' (v. 3^a). On the thigh the sword was girded (Ex 32⁷, Ps 45³, Ca 3³); Ehud's on the right thigh because he was left-handed (Jg 3^{16. 21}). Under the jealousy ordeal the woman's thigh falls away if she has been guilty of adultery (Nu 5²⁵). To smite 'hip and thigh' (lit. 'leg upon thigh') is a phrase denoting utter discomfiture accompanied by great slaughter (Jg 15⁸). Its origin is unknown, and its meaning much disputed. In Jer 31¹⁸ and Ezk 21¹² smiting upon one's thigh is a gesture of sorrow or terror. In Heb. (cf. AVm) of Gn 46²⁴, Ex 1⁸, Jg 8³⁰ a man's children are described as coming out of his thigh. This explains the oath taken by placing the hand under the thigh (Gn 24² • 47²⁹), a special sacredness being ascribed to the organs of generation. In NT 'thigh' occurs only in Rev 19¹⁵, where perhaps the meaning is that the name was written on that part of the garment which covered the thigh. J. C. LAMBERT.

THISBE.—The place from which Tobit was carried away captive by the Assyrians (To 12). Its position is described as being on the right hand (south) of Kedesh-naphtali in Galilee above Asher. No trace of the name has yet been found. Some commentators maintain that Thisbe was the home of Elijah 'the Tishbite,' but this is very doubtful.

THISTLES.—See THORNS.

THOCANUS (1 Es 9⁴¹) = Tikvah, Ezr 10⁴⁵.

THOMAS.—One of the twelve Apostles. The earlier Evangelists mention only his name (Mt 10^a = Mk 3¹⁸ = Lk 6¹⁶), but St. John has rescued him from oblivion. His question in the Upper Room (Jn 14⁵) proves him somewhat slow of understanding. He was querulous and gloomy, always disposed to look at the dark side. Thus, when Jesus on the evening of the Resurrection-day appeared to the Apostles in the room at Jerusalem where they were assembled with closed doors, Thomas was absent, buried in despair; and when he heard that they had seen the Lord, he would not believe it. He would not, he declared, be persuaded unless he saw and handled His pierced hands and side (Jn 20¹⁹⁻²⁵). The next Sunday evening Jesus appeared as before, and gave Thomas the evidence he had craved. 'My Lord and my God!' cried the doubter, leaping from the depth of despair to the summit of faith (Jn 20²⁸⁻²⁹). His doubts were removed, and he was one of the seven who journeyed north to meet the Lord at the Lake of Galilee (21²). Despondent though he was, Thomas was no coward, and he had a great devotion to Jesus. It was he who, when tidings of Lazarus' sickness were brought to Bethany beyond Jordan, and the rest, fearing the rage of the rulers, were disposed to let the Master venture alone into Judaea, put their cowardice to shame: 'Let us also go, that we may die with him!' (Jn 11¹⁶).

Thomas is not really a name but an epithet, meaning, like its Greek equivalent Didymus (Jn 11¹⁶ 20^a 21³), 'the Twin.' If, as Eusebius states, the Apostle's name was Judas, he would be styled 'the Twin' to distinguish him from Judas the son of James and Judas Iscariot. Tradition credits him with the authorship of a Gospel (see GOSPELS [APOCRYPHAL], 6). DAVID SMITH.

THOMEL.—See TEMAH.

THORNS, THISTLES, ETC.—So many words are used in the Heb. for thorny plants, and they are so variously translated, that it will be convenient to consider them all in one group. In the great majority of cases it is impossible to identify the special species referred to.

1. ātād, Jg 9¹⁴. AV 'bramble,' mg. 'thistle.' RVm 'thorn'; Ps 58⁸ AV and RV 'thorns.' In Gn 50¹¹, Atad occurs as a proper name. The ātād is probably the buckthorn (Rhamnus palestina), a lowly bush.
2. barqānīm (Jg 8⁷, 18 'briers'), some kind of thorn. Arab. berqān is the Centaurea scoparia, a thorny-headed composite common in Palestine.
3. dardar (Gn 3⁸, Hos 10⁹), some thistly or thorny plant. In modern Arab. shauket el-dardar is applied to the star thistles or knapweeds of which Centaurea calcitrapa and C. verutum are common Palestine forms.
4. chēdeq (Pr 15¹⁹ 'thorn', Mic 7⁴ 'brier'; cf. Arab. chadaq 'to enclose'), some prickly plant used as a hedge (Pr 15¹⁹).
5. chōach (2 K 14⁹, 2 Ch 25¹⁸, and Job 31¹⁰ 'thistle'; 2 Ch 33¹¹, Ca 2², and Hos 9⁶ 'thorns'; Is 34¹³ AV 'brambles'; 1 S 13⁸ 'thickets'; Job 41² 'thorn,' where 'hook,' as in RV, would be better), some shrub, species unknown, with very strong spines.
6. m'sukhāh, a thorn hedge (Mic 7⁴).
7. na'ūsūt (Is 71⁹ 'thorns,' 55¹³ 'thorn'), from Aram. na'als 'to prick'), a general term for a thorn.
8. sirīm (Ec 7⁴, Is 34¹¹, Hos 2², Nah 1¹⁰ 'thorn'). The reference to the 'cracking of thorns' suggests the thorny burnet, which is burned all over Palestine in lime-kilns. sirōh, Am 4², means 'hooks.'
9. sillōn (Ezk 28²⁴ 'brier'; sallōnīm, Ezk 2⁶ 'thorns').
10. sārābīm (Ezk 2⁶ 'briers,' lit. 'rebels,' as in mg., but text doubtful).
11. sirpād (Is 55¹³ 'brier,' lit. the 'burner,' hence perhaps 'nettle').
12. tsinnīm (Job 5⁸, Pr 22⁸ 'thorns'); tsennīm (Nu 33⁴, Jos 23¹³ 'thorns').
13. qōts (Gn 3¹⁵, Ex 22⁶, Jg 8⁷, 18 etc.), the commonest and most general word for 'thorns.'
14. qimmōs (Pr 24³¹ 'thorns'), elsewhere 'nettles.' See NETTLE.
15. nikkīm (Nu 33⁸ 'pricks'), cf. Arab. shauk 'thorn.'
16. shaylūh, only in Is. (5⁸ 7²¹ 9¹⁷ 10¹⁷ 27⁴), always with shāmīr ('brier'), and tr. 'thorns.'
17. shāmīr, in Is. (see above) always tr. 'brier'; cf. Arab. samur 'a thorny tree.'
18. rhamnos (Gr.), Bar 6⁷¹ (AV and RV 'thorn').
19. skolops (Gr.), 2 Co 12⁷ 'thorn' (RVm 'stake'). See MEDICINE, p. 600b; PAUL, p. 688^a.
20. akandhai (Gr.) = Heb. qōts, Mt 7⁶ 13⁷ 22⁷ etc. 'thorns.'
21. tribolos (Gr.), Mt 7⁶ 'thistle,' He 6⁸ 'brier.'

The variety of words used to describe these prickly plants is not surprising, when it is remembered that such plants are ubiquitous throughout Palestine, and for many months of the year are almost the only living uncultivated vegetation. They form the common food of goats and camels; they are burned (Ec 7²), specially the thorny burnet (Arab. billān), in ovens and lime-kilns, large areas of land being diligently cleared every autumn for this purpose. Gigantic thistles, sometimes as high as a horse's head, cover whole acres of fallow land and have to be cleared by fire before ploughing can begin. 'Thorns' of various kinds, e.g. brambles, oleasters, etc., are commonly used as hedges; and tangled masses of dead thorny branches from the Zisypus and similar trees are used, particularly in the Jordan Valley, as defences round fields, flocks, or tents (Pr 15¹, Mic 7¹ etc.). THOUGHT.—In 1 S 9¹, in Mt 6³ (as well as in the foll. vv. 37, 38, 41, 42), in 10¹⁹, in Mk 13¹, and in Lk 12⁴¹, 28, 32 the Eng. word 'thought' is used in AV in the old sense of 'grief or anxiety.' Thus Mk 13¹ 'Take no thought beforehand' does not mean do not think or plan, but be not burdened with anxiety beforehand.

THOUSAND.—See ARMY, 2; NUMBER, 5.

THRACE.—Some have proposed to identify Tiras (Gn 10²) with Thrace, but this identification is uncertain. A Thracian horseman is mentioned in 2 Mac 12³⁵ (about B.C. 163) assaying Gorgias, the governor of Idumæa under Antiochus Epiphanes, from capture. The name Thrace—it was not till A.D. 46 the name of a Roman province—was applied to all the country lying between the rivers Strymon and Danube. After the death of Lysimachus (B.C. 281—see THYATIRA), with whom the prospect of civilization for the country died, it continued barbarous, and was famous only for its severe climate and its soldiers. Of the latter there was a plentiful supply, and as soldiers of fortune they were to be found in the armies of the richer States. They were chiefly cavalry and light-armed infantry. (The name 'Thracian' was hence applied to gladiators armed in a particular way.) Kings who employed them in war frequently settled them in colonies after peace was declared. A. SOUTER.

THRASEUS.—The father of Apollonius (2 Mac 3⁵).

THREE.—See NUMBER, § 7.

THREE CHILDREN (SON OF).—See APOCRYPHA, 6.

THRESHING, THRESHING-FLOOR.—See AGRICULTURE, 3.

THRESHOLD.—See HOUSE, 6.

THRONE.—The OT tr. of Heb. kissē or kissēdh. It is used of any seat of honour: e.g. of the high priest (1 S 1⁵ 41¹, 18), of a judge (Ps 94²⁰), of a military officer (Jer 14⁶); but most frequently of a king (e.g. Pharaoh Ex 11⁵, David and Solomon 1 K 2¹³ etc.), and thus of God Himself (Ps 97 11⁴ 45⁶, Is 6¹). For a description of Solomon's throne see 1 K 10¹⁸⁻²⁰, 2 Ch 9¹⁷⁻¹⁹. Frequently 'throne' is used metaphorically for dignity, royal honour, and power. Thus 'the throne of David' often stands for the royal honour of David's house (2 S 7¹⁶). So God's 'throne' is His sovereign power (cf. Ps 45⁸ 93⁵).

The NT term thronos [once (Ac 12²¹) bēma, 'judgment-seat,' is tr. 'throne'] is similarly used. It is applied in Rev 20⁴ to the thrones of the assessors of the heavenly judge (cf. Mt 19²⁸||, Lk 22³⁰); but is most frequently used of the throne of God or Christ (Mt 5³⁴ || 19²⁸||, Lk 1², Ac 2³⁰ 7⁴⁹, He 1⁸ 4¹⁶ 8¹ 12², Rev 1⁶ 3²¹ etc.). For 'thrones' as a rank of angels, see art. DOMINION, and cf. POWER. W. F. BOYD.

THROUGHLY.—This is the older spelling of 'thoroughly.' In mod. editions of AV we find both forms used, 'thoroughly' in Ex 21¹⁹, 2 K 11¹⁸, and 'thoroughly' elsewhere; but in the original edition of 1611 the spelling is 'thoroughly' everywhere. There was no distinction in earlier Eng. between 'through' and 'thorough,' 'thoroughly' and 'thoroughly.' In the first ed. of AV Ex 14¹⁶ reads 'the children of Israel shall goe on dry ground thorow the mids of the Sea.'

THROM.—See SPINNING AND WEAVING, §§ 3, 5.

THUMB.—The thumb is associated with the great toe, and occurs in two different connexions. 1. We are told that Adonibezek's thumbs and great toes were cut off (Jg 1⁶), and that he himself had practised this mutilation on seventy kings (v. 7). The object seems to have been to render the vanquished monarchs unfit for war and thus for reigning in a warlike age. 2. In the ritual of the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29²⁰, Lv 8²³, 25) blood was sprinkled on 'the tip of the right ear, upon the thumb of the right hand and the great toe of the right foot.' The cleansed leper was similarly sprinkled with blood and oil (Lv 14¹⁴, 17, 28, 29). The action seems to have symbolized the consecration (or purification) of the whole man, the extremities only being touched, just as only the horns of the altar were sprinkled with the blood. W. F. BOYD.

THUMMIM.—See URIM AND THUMMIM.

THUNDER.—There is no finer description of a thunderstorm than that of Ps 29. In a land of high mountains and deep gorges, split throughout its length by the great cleft of the Jordan, the effect of thunder is peculiarly terrible. In Palestine it is confined almost entirely to winter (1 S 12¹⁷), but the writer once witnessed a terrific storm late in April, among the Gilead uplands. It is invariably accompanied by rain. According to poetic and popular ideas, thunder was the voice of God (Ps 104⁴, Job 37⁴ etc.), which a soul gifted with insight might understand and interpret (Jn 12²⁸; cf. Mk 11¹, Mt 3¹⁷ etc.). It is the expression of His resistless power (1 S 21⁶, Ps 18¹³ etc.), and of His inexorable vengeance (Is 30³⁰ etc.). Thunder plays a part in afflicting the Egyptians (Ex 9²³), at the delivery of the Law (19¹⁶ 20¹⁸), and in discomfiting the Philistines (1 S 7¹⁰). It is not guided by caprice, but by the will of God (Job 28²⁸ 38²⁵). It appears largely in the more terrible imagery of the Apocalypse. For 'Sons of Thunder,' see BOANERGES. W. EWING.

THYATIRA.—There is a long valley extending northward and southward and connecting the valleys of the Hermus and Calvus. Down this valley a stream flows southwards, and on the left bank of this stream was Thyatira. An important road also ran along this valley, the direct route between Constantinople and Smyrna, and the railway takes this route now. Thyatira was also in the 1st cent. A.D. a station on the Imperial Post Road (overland route) from Brundisium and Dyrrhachium by Thessalonica, Neapolis (for Philippi), Troas, Pergamum, Philadelphia . . . to Tarsus, Syrian Antioch, Casarea of Palestine, and Alexandria. In its connexion with Pergamum this road had always a great importance. Thyatira was built (in the middle of the valley, with a slight rising ground for an acropolis) by Seleucus, the founder of the Seleucid dynasty, whose vast kingdom extended from W. Asia Minor to the Himalayas. The city was founded between B.C. 300 and 282 as a defence against Lysimachus, whose kingdom bordered that of Seleucus on the N. and W., and the colonists were Macedonian soldiers. In 282, Phileteus revolted from Lysimachus and founded the kingdom of Pergamum. After the death of Lysimachus, Thyatira was a useful garrison to hold the road, in the interests first of the Seleucids and afterwards of the Pergamenians. The latter were safe from the former if they were in possession of Thyatira. The relation between Pergamum and Thyatira was thus of the closest. The city, though weak in position, was a garrison city, and had to be carefully fortified, and everything was done to foster the military spirit. The character of the city's religion is illustrated by the hero Tyrimnos, who is figured on its coins. He is on horseback and has a battle-axe on his shoulder. This hero is closely related to the protecting god of the city, whose temple was in front of the city. He was considered the divine ancestor of the city and its leading families, and was identified with the sun-god. He also had the title Pythian Apollo, thus illustrating the strange mixture of Anatolian and Greek ideas and names which is so common a feature in the ancient religions of Asia Minor. In conformity with this, he was represented as wearing a cloak fastened by a brooch, carrying a battle-axe, and with a laurel branch in his right hand, symbolizing his purifying power. (It is certain that the place was inhabited before the time of Seleucus, but merely as a village with a temple.) The city had Pythian games on the model of those in Greece proper, and in the 3rd cent. A.D. the Emperor Elagabalus was associated with the god in the worship connected with them, showing the closer relation which had been effected between the popular and the Imperial religion. It is probable that Seleucus I. had settled Jews in Thyatira, as he certainly did in some of the cities of Asia. Lydia of Thyatira (Ac 16⁴) had come within the circle of the synagogue, possibly in her native place.

Little is known of the history of the city. It surrendered to the Romans in B.C. 190. It was occupied by Aristonicus during his revolt in B.C. 133-2. It must have suffered severely and repeatedly during the fighting between Arabs and Christians, and Turks and Christians, in the Middle Ages. Its situation demands that it be captured and re-fortified by every ruling power. In Roman times it had been a great trading city, dating its greatest period of prosperity from about the time when the Seven Letters were written. There is evidence of more trade-guilds there than in any other Asian city: wool-workers, linen-workers, makers of outer garments, dyers, leather-workers, tanners, bronze-smiths, etc. Lydia probably belonged to one of those guilds. The purple in which Lydia dealt must have been a product of the region of Thyatira, and the well-known Turkey-red must therefore be meant. It is obtained from madder-root, which grows abundantly in that region. The name 'purple' had a much wider meaning among the ancients than among us. The bronze work of Thyatira was also remarkably fine (cf. Rev 21³).

The letter addressed to the Church at Thyatira (Rev 21³⁻²²) is the most obscure and difficult of all the seven, as we know so little of local conditions. It is remarkable that the city, which was the least of all the seven (with perhaps the exception of Philadelphia), should be promised strength and power. The exact nature of the Nicolaitans with their prophetess cannot be precisely determined. The principles they represented were regarded by the author as subversive of true Christianity.

THYINE WOOD (Rev 18¹²) is the citrus wood of the Romans, used for the manufacture of costly furniture. The tree Thuia articulata, in appearance like a cypress, about 25 feet high, was the source of this wood.

TIBERIAS.—A town built by Herod (A.D. 16-22) on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee (called the 'Sea of Tiberias' in Jn 6¹ 21¹, and in modern Arabic), and named in honour of the Roman Emperor. That it was erected over the site of an ancient graveyard (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 3) in itself proves that no city had previously existed here. This circumstance made it an unclean place to the Jews, and Herod was obliged to use force in order to people it with any but the lowest of the nation. It was designed entirely on Greek models, and the fact that it was in spirit and civilization entirely foreign is perhaps the reason why it is hardly alluded to in the Gospels—the sole reference being Jn 6²³. There is no evidence that it was ever visited by Christ. The city surrendered to Vespasian and by him was restored to Agrippa. After the fall of Jerusalem many of the Jews took up their abode in Tiberias, and by a strange reversal of fate this unclean city became a most important centre of Rabbinic teaching. Here lived Judah the Holy, editor of the Mishna. Here the 'Jerusalem Talmud' was compiled. In the neighbourhood are the tombs of 'Aqiba and of Malmonides.

Constantine built a church and established a bishopric at Tiberias, but Christianity never flourished there. The Arabs seized it in A.D. 637; the Crusaders lost it to Saladin in 1187. The city was almost destroyed by a great earthquake in 1837. The principal objects of interest are the ruins of a large castle (possibly Herodian), a very ancient synagogue, and—half an hour's journey to the south—the hot springs of Emmaus (the Hammath of Jos 19²⁴), mentioned by Josephus and Pliny. The city is dirty, and proverbial for its vermin. There is a population of about 4000, more than half of whom are Jews, principally refugees from Poland. There is here an important mission of the United Free Church of Scotland.

TIBERIUS, whose designation as Emperor was Tiberius Cæsar Augustus, was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero (a Roman noble) and Livia, whose second husband was the Emperor Augustus. He was born B.C. 42 and died A.D. 37. Augustus, as he grew old, appointed in succession four of his relatives as co-regents, or marked them out as his intended successors. It was clear that he did not desire the succession of his stepson Tiberius, who was reserved, morose, and unlovable. The successive deaths of his nominees compelled him to fall back upon Tiberius, who in A.D. 11 was made co-emperor. Three years later he succeeded to the purple. It is probable that the 'thirteenth year' in Lk 3¹ runs from the first of these dates, and thus means A.D. 25-26. Tiberius was an able general and a competent Emperor, but the unhappy experiences of his early life made him suspicious and timorous, and he put many of his rivals or supposed rivals to death. In his later years he was much under the influence of a villainous schemer Sejanus. He spent these years in retirement at Capri.

TIBHATH.—A city of Hadarezer, king of Zobah (1 Ch 18⁸). In 2 S 8⁸ the name of the town is Betah, but the original reading was probably Tebah, as in the Syriac version, and as a tribal name in Gn 22²⁴. The site of Tibhath is unknown, but it was possibly on the eastern slopes of Anti-Lebanon.

TIBNI.—A rival who disputed the throne for four years (compare 1 K 16¹⁸ with v. 23) with Omri.

TIDAL.—A king of Goliim, or 'the nations,' who accompanied Amraphel of Shinar and Arioch of Ellasar in the expedition made by Chedorlaomer of Elam against Sodom and the cities of the plain (Gn 14¹). This name is probably the Tudhul or Tudhula of a British Museum tablet of late date, which mentions also Kudur-lahmal (?) (Chedorlaomer?) and Durmah-ilāni son of Eri-Eaku (Arioch?). Tudhul is stated to have been son of Gazzal[ni?]. Whether it was he who smote (shattered) his father's head 'with the weapon of his hands,' the mutilation of the text leaves uncertain.

TIGLATH-PILESER (in 1 Ch 5⁶ 26 and 2 Ch 28¹⁰ corrupted to the form Tilgath-Pileser).—This Assyrian ruler, the Tukulti-apil-ēšarra of the monuments, was the third of the name. He began to reign about B.C. 745 (13th of Iyyar), and is supposed to have been a usurper. In the Babylonian chronological list he is called Pulu, the Pul of 2 K 15¹⁹, and the Poros of the Canon of Ptolemy. His reign was a very active and important one. Five months after his accession he marched into Babylonia to overthrow the power of the Aramaean tribes. In B.C. 744 he went to Nainri to punish the tribes who harassed the Assyrian border. In B.C. 743 he defeated the forces of Sarduris II. of Ararat at Arpad. Among those who gave tribute on this occasion were Rezin of Damascus, Hiram of Tyre, and Pisiris of Carchemish. Arpad, however, revolted again, and was for three years the objective of Tiglath-pileser's expeditions (B.C. 742-740). In 739 he went to Ulluba in Mesopotamia, and the presence of his armies there enabled him, in B.C. 738, to make head against Syrian and Phœnician resistance. On this occasion he subjected Kullani, supposed to be the Calno of Is 10⁹. Rost suggests that Azriau or Izriau (Azariah) of Judah played some part in this expedition, and among those who gave tribute was Menahem of Samaria (2 K 15¹⁹). In B.C. 737 his objective was the Medes, in many of whose cities he set up bas-reliefs with the royal image. After this (B.C. 736) his forces were again directed against Mesopotamia, and reached the mountain of Nal. This led the way to the conquest of Ararat in B.C. 735. 'n

B.C. 734 the Assyrian army invaded Philistia (Philistia)—according to Rost, the Mediterranean coastland S. of Joppa. Gaza was captured, and Hanun, the king, having fled, Tiglath-pileser mounted the throne and set up his image in the palace there. In B.C. 733 came the turn of Damascus and also of Israel, the immediate cause being affairs in Judah. Azariah had died, and after the short reign of his son Jotham, Jehoahaz or Ahaz came to the throne. Taking advantage of the change, Pekah of Israel made an alliance with Rezin of Damascus to attack Judah, and captured Elath (2 K 16⁴⁴). Feeling that Judah would be compelled to submit to the allied powers in the end, Ahaz turned to Assyria, sending the best of his own treasures and those of the Temple at Jerusalem to make a worthy present to the Assyrian king (2 K 16⁸), who therefore came to his aid. Pekah and Rezin withdrew their forces from Judah, but, instead of uniting against the common foe, awaited the Assyrian king's attack each in his own territory. Marching by the coast-route, Tiglath-pileser assured himself of the submission of his vassals in N. Phoenicia and attacked N. Israel, capturing Ijon, Abel-beth-maacah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, Galilee, and all the land of Naphtali (2 K 15²⁹). These names are not preserved in the annals, though 'the broad (land of) . . . -li' may be, as Hommel suggests, the last named. Pekah saved his land from further harm by paying tribute, but things went harder with Rezin, his ally, who shut himself up in Damascus. The siege which followed ended, in 732, in the capture of the city; 591 towns, including Hadara, Rezin's own city, were razed to the ground. An attack upon Samsi, queen of the Arabians, followed, the result being that a number of tribes—Sabæans, Mas'æans, etc.—hastened to propitiate the Assyrian king with gifts. Idi-b'il, a N. Arabian prince, was made governor on the Musrian border. Meanwhile a number of Israelitish nobles, with Hoshea as leader, revolted, and Pekah fled, but seems to have been murdered. Hoshea thereupon mounted the throne, and bought the recognition of the Assyrian king, who had continued to ravage Syria. Mitinti of Ashkelon, seeing the fate of Rezin of Damascus, seems to have gone mad. He was succeeded by his son Rukipti, who tried to atone for his father's disaffection by sending tribute and gifts. Metenna of Tyre likewise became tributary. After the fall of the capital, Damascus became an Assyrian province. According to 2 K 16⁹, the people were taken captive to Kir, and Rezin was slain. It was in Damascus that Ahaz made homage to the conqueror, and seeing there an altar which took his fancy, had one made like it. Tiglath-pileser, confident, seemingly, of his hold upon Palestine, did not again invade the country. Its States remained for many years more or less tributary to Assyria, according as that power seemed strong or weak. In B.C. 731 Tiglath-pileser was attracted by events in Babylonia. Ukin-zér, a Chaldean prince, having seized the Babylonian throne, the Assyrian king besieged him in his capital Sipila, which he captured in B.C. 729, taking Ukin-zér prisoner. In B.C. 728 Tiglath-pileser became king of Babylon, but beyond 'grasping the hand of Bel' (Merodach) as its ruler, took part in no further important event. He probably died when making an expedition against a city whose name is lost; and Shalmaneser IV. mounted the throne (25th of Tebeth, B.C. 727). When at home, Tiglath-pileser resided in Nineveh or in Calah, where he restored the central palace in Hittite style, decorating it with bas-reliefs and the annals of his reign. This building was partly destroyed by Esarhaddon. T. G. PINCHES.

TIGRIS.—Only in RVm of Gn 24¹⁴ and Dn 10⁴, where both AV and RV have Hiddekel (wh. see). The Tigris rises a little S. of Lake Göljik and flows southward to Diarbekr. After passing Diarbekr it receives the eastern Tigris (which rises in the Niphates mountains) at Osman Kleul. Then it flows through narrow gorges into the plateau of Mesopotamia, where it receives from the east the Greater and Lesser Zab, the Adhery or Radanu, and the Diyaleh or Tornadotus. On the E. bank, opposite Mosul, were Nineveh and Calah, a little N. of the junction of the Tigris and Greater Zab; and on the W. bank, N. of the Lesser Zab, was Assur (now Kalah Sherghat), the primitive capital of Assyria. The Tigris is about 1150 miles in length, and rises rapidly in March and April owing to the melting of the snows, falling again after the middle of May. Cf. also EDEN [GARDEN OF].

TIKVAH.—1. The father-in-law of Huldah (2 K 22⁴); called in 2 Ch 34²² Tokhath. 2. The father of Jahzeiah (Ezr 10¹⁵); called in 1 Es 9⁴ Thocanus.

TILE, TILING.—The former occurs only in Ezk 4¹ for 'brick'—the usual rendering of the original. For plans of a city drawn on 'bricks' or 'tablets' of soft clay, which were afterwards baked hard, see 'Ezekiel,' in SBOT, in loc. 'Tiling' is found only in Lk 5¹⁸ AV, for which RV has 'through the tiles.' St. Luke seems here to have adapted the narrative of Mk. (for which see House, § 5) to the style of roof covered with tiles (see 'Tegula' in Rich's Dict. of Antiq.), with which his Western readers were more familiar; or 'through the tiles' is here simply synonymous with 'through the roof' (cf. our expression 'on the tiles').

TILGATH-PILNESER.—See TIGLATH-PILESER.

TILON.—A son of Shimon (1 Ch 4³⁰).

TIMEÆUS.—Father of Bartimeus (Mk 10⁴).

TIMBREL.—See TABRET, and MUSIC, etc., 4 (3) (a).

TIME.—The conception that we seem to gather of time from the Holy Scriptures is of a small block, as it were, cut out of boundless eternity. Of past eternity, if we may use such an expression, God is the only inhabitant; in future eternity angels and men are to share. And this 'block' of time is infinitesimally small. In God's sight, in the Divine mind, 'a thousand years are but as yesterday' (Ps 90⁴; cf. 2 P 3⁸ 'one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day'). Time has a beginning; it has also, if we accept the usual translation of Rev 10⁶ 'there shall be time no longer,' a stated end. The word 'time' in Biblical apocalyptic literature has another meaning—'time' stands for 'a year' both in Daniel (4¹⁶, 22, 33, 37, 72), where the plural 'times' seems to stand for two years) and in Rev 12¹⁴ (derived from Dn 7²⁵).

When once the idea of time formed itself in the human mind, subdivisions of it would follow as a matter of course. The division between light and darkness, the rising, the zenith, and the setting of the sun and the moon, together with the phases of the latter, and the varying position of the most notable stars in the firmament, would all suggest modes of reckoning time, to say nothing of the circuit of the seasons as indicated by the growth and development of the fruits of the field and agricultural operations. Hence we find in Gn 1 day and night as the first division of time, and, because light was believed to be a later creation than matter, one whole day is said to be made up of evening and morning; and the day is reckoned, as it still is by the Jews and, in principle, by the Church in her ecclesiastical feasts, from one disappearance of the sun to the next, the divisions between day and night being formed by that appearance and disappearance. In this same cosmogony we meet with a further use of the lights in the firmament of heaven; they are to be 'for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years' (Gn 1¹⁴). The day would thus be an obvious division of time for intelligent beings to make from the very earliest ages. As time went on, subdivisions of this day would be made, derived from an observance of the sun in the heavens—morning, second or midday, and evening; and, by analogy, there would be a midnight. The only other expression we meet with is 'between the two evenings' (Ex 12⁶), used most probably for the time between sunset and dark, though others take it as equivalent to 'the time of the going down of the sun,' i.e. any time in the afternoon: any shorter subdivisions of time were not known to the Jews till they were brought into contact with Western civilization and the Roman military arrangements. The only exception to this is the 'steps' on the dial of Ahaz (2 K 20³⁴). In the passages in Daniel where the word hour occurs in the EV, the term is quite an indefinite one, the 'one hour' of Dn 4¹⁹ in AV becoming 'a while' in RV. The Aram. word used in that book was used in the New Hebrew for the word 'hour.' In the Apocrypha the word 'hour' is quite indefinite. But in the NT we find the Western division of the day into twelve hours, reckoning from sunrise to sunset, quite established. 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' said our Lord, in an appeal to the Jews (Jn 11⁹). Westcott holds that in St. John's Gospel (13³⁶ 4⁵, 52 19¹⁴) the modern mode of reckoning the hours from midnight to midnight is followed. The strongest passage in support of this view is 19¹⁴. These twelve hours were divided into the four military watches of three hours each (cf. Mt 14²³ 'the fourth watch of the night'), as distinguished from the three watches which seem to have prevailed among the Jews ('If he shall come in the second watch, and if in the third,' Lk 12³⁹). The only other measure of time, quite indefinite and infinitesimal, is the 'moment,' common to OT, Apocr., and NT ('we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye,' 1 Co 15⁵²). To-morrow (Ex 8²²) and yesterday (Ex 5¹⁴), and even yesternight (Gn 31¹⁹), would soon take their place on either side of to-day. The Hebrew word meaning literally 'the day before yesterday,' is generally used vaguely of previous time, 'heretofore.'

The next obvious division of time would be the month. The phases of the moon would be watched, and it would soon be noticed that these recurred at regular intervals. Each appearance of the new moon would be noted as the beginning of a new period. The first mention of the new moon in Biblical history is in 1 S 20⁵, though 'the beginnings of the months' are mentioned in the ritual laws of Nu 10¹⁰ 28¹⁴. Of the two Heb. words for 'month,' one is identical with the word for 'moon,' the other means 'newness.' Though the actual period of each moon is rather more than 29 days, the actual time of its visibility could scarcely be more than 28 days. The first appearance of the new moon would be eagerly watched for and made a matter of rejoicing. We find, in fact, that a keen lookout was kept for it, and the 'new moon' feast was kept with great rejoicings, as well as, apparently in later times, a 'full moon' feast ('Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, At the full moon, on our solemn feast day,' Ps 81²).

Given this period of 28 days, together with the recurrent phases of the moon, it would naturally be subdivided, like the day itself, into four divisions or weeks of seven days each. The first occurrence of a week is in Gn 29²⁷, though the Creation is represented as having been completed, including the rest of the Almighty, in a period of seven days, and periods of seven days occur in the history of the Flood. Of the two Heb. names for 'week' one is derived from the number seven, and the other is identical with 'Sabbath,' the day which completes the Jewish week. The NT takes over the latter word, and makes a Greek noun of it, whilst to the Christian and to the Christian Church, the first day of the week becomes the important day, instead of the seventh, and is for Christians the day of gathering together 'to break bread' (Ac 20⁷), and of making collections for the needs of the faithful (1 Co 16²), and also wins for itself the name of 'the Lord's day' (Rev 1¹⁰). The word 'week' was given other applications.

The seventh year completed a week of years and was a sabbath; seven times seven years formed seven sabbaths of years, i.e. forty-nine years, and was followed by the jubilee. From the constant occurrence of the tenth day of the month in the dating of events, it has been supposed that the month of 30 days was also subdivided into periods of ten days each (see, e.g., Ex 12², Lv 16²⁹, Jos 4¹⁰, 2 K 25¹ etc.).

There are no names in the OT for the days of the week except for the seventh—the Sabbath. In the Apocrypha (Jth 8⁶) there is a name for Friday which is translated 'the eve of the Sabbath'; so in Mk 15⁴ 'the day before the Sabbath.' This day is also called the Preparation (Mt 27⁶⁴, Mk 15⁴, Lk 23⁵⁴, Jn 19¹⁴). In Roman Catholic service-books Good Friday is still called 'Feria Sexta in Parasceue' (i.e. the Preparation), and the following Saturday 'Sabbatum Sanctum.'

Whilst these various divisions of time were being arrived at, there would be, concurrently with them, the obvious recurrence of the seasons in their due order. One of the promises represented as having been made by God to Noah immediately after the Flood was that seedtime (i.e. spring), summer, harvest (i.e. autumn), and winter should not cease (Gn 8²²). This is the earliest time in the world's history to which a knowledge of the seasons is attributed in the Bible. Afterwards summer and winter are frequently mentioned. In AV the word 'spring,' to mean that season, occurs only in Wis 2¹ and 'autumn' not at all, though the word translated 'winter' in Am 3¹⁵, Jer 36²², might equally be rendered 'autumn,' as the time referred to is the border time between autumn and winter. It would in due course be noticed that the seasons recurred practically after a series of twelve moons or months; hence would come in the division of time into years of twelve lunar months. A year of 360 days is implied in the history of the Flood (Gn 6–8), but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given of the scheme of years and chronology in the genealogical account of antediluvian times (Gn 5).

The twelve months of the year would be given names. The Biblical names we find for them are:

1. Abib (Ex 13⁴), the month of the green ears of corn, about the same as our April, called in post-exilic times, in correspondence with its Bab. name, Nisan (Neh 2¹). This was the month in which the Passover came.
2. Ziv (1 K 6¹), seemingly the bright month, called later Iyyar.
3. Sivan (Est 8⁹), another Bab. name, occurring only in this one passage in the OT.
4. This month has no Biblical name, but was called in later times Tammuz, after the god of that name, in whose honour a fast was kept during the month, which is mentioned in Zec 8¹⁹ as 'the fast of the fourth month.'
5. This month also has no Biblical name, but was called later Ab.
6. Elul (Neh 6¹⁵, 1 Mac 14²⁷). The etymology of this name is unknown; it occurs in Assyrian.
7. Ethanim (1 K 8²), the month of constant flowings, in later times called Tishri. This was the first month of the civil year.
8. Bul (1 K 6³⁸), a word of doubtful etymology, called later Marcheshvan.
9. Chislew (Neh 1¹, Zec 7¹, 1 Mac 1⁴ etc.), a Bab. word of uncertain derivation.
10. Tebeth (Est 2¹⁶), taken over from the Assyrian. It has been conjectured to mean 'the month of sinking in,' i.e. the muddy month.
11. Shebat (Zec 1⁷, 1 Mac 16¹⁴), taken from the Babylonian; of doubtful meaning, but, according to some, the month of destroying rain.
12. Adar (Ezr 6¹⁵, Est 3⁷ etc.), a Bab. word, perhaps meaning darkened. In 2 Mac 15²² we are informed that the twelfth month is called Adar in the Syrian tongue.

The names given are, it will be seen, of rare occurrence, and only four of them are pre-exilic. Biblical writers are generally content to give the number of the month. Some of the months were notable for their ecclesiastical feasts. In the first came the Passover, on the 14th day; in the third, the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost); in the seventh, the Feast of Trumpets and the Feast of Tabernacles, as also the Fast of the Day of Atonement; in the ninth, the Feast of Dedication; and in the twelfth, the Feast of Purim.

Though at first all the months seem to have been reckoned of equal length, in later times they contained 30 and 29 days alternately. This rendered an intercalation in the Calendar necessary, to keep the Passover in the right season of the year; and this intercalary period was called the second Adar, and was inserted as required to bring Abib to its proper place in the year.

It remains to mention that in the Apocrypha we have traces of the Macedonian Calendar. In 2 Mac 11²¹, a month is named Dioscorinthius, a name which does not occur elsewhere, and which is either a corruption of the text for Dystrus, a name for the twelfth month, which occurs in the Sinaitic text of To 2¹², or the name of an intercalary month inserted at the end of the year. In 2 Mac 11³⁰ Xanthicus, the name for the first month of the Macedonian year, occurs. It answers to the month Abib. These names, with other Macedonian names, are used by Josephus. In 3 Mac 6²⁸ two Egyptian months, Pachon and Epiphi, occur, the former being omitted in some texts. They are the ninth and eleventh months of the Egyptian year.

Of epochs or eras there is but little trace. There were the periods of seven years and fifty years already mentioned, but they never occur in any chronological statement. 430 years is the time assigned to the sojourning in Egypt, both in OT and NT (Ex 12⁴⁰, Gal 3¹⁷), and the commencement of the building of Solomon's Temple is dated 480 years after the Exodus. The chronology of the two kingdoms is reckoned by regnal years, though in some cases a regency period is counted as part of the length of the reign. Twice in Isaiah (61 14²⁸) the date noted is that of the year of the death of a king, in another case the date is the invasion by the Tartan (20¹); whilst in Amos (1¹) a date is given as 'two years before the earthquake,' apparently a particularly severe one which happened during the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah (Zec 14⁵). The 'seventy years' of the Captivity is also a well-known period, as is the thousand years of the Apocalypse (Rev 20), with all the speculations it has given rise to. In later times the years were reckoned by the names of those who filled the office of high priest; in Lk 3¹, we have a careful combination of names of various offices held by various persons at the time of the commencement of the preaching of John the Baptist, to indicate the date.

Of instruments to measure time we hear of only one, the sun-dial of Ahaz (2 K 20⁸⁻¹¹, Is 38⁸), but what shape or form this took we do not know.

H. A. REDPATH.

TIMNA.—1. A concubine of Eliphaz, son of Esau (Gn 36¹²). 2. A woman of the Esau clan of Horites (Gn 36², 1 Ch 1³⁹). 3. A 'duke' of Edom (1 Ch 1³¹, Gn 36⁴⁰ [where RV has, by a slip, Timnah]).

H. L. WILLETT.

TIMNAB.—1. A town in the high region of S. Judah, S.E. of Hebron (Jos 15⁴). It is possible that this was the Timnah visited by Judah at the time of sheep-shearing (Gn 38¹²). Or it may have been—2. A place on the N. frontier of the tribe of Judah between Beth-shemesh and Ekron (Jos 15¹⁰). At one time it was counted in the territory of Dan (Jos 19⁴⁰), but at another it was in Philistine possession (Jg 14¹). Here Samson celebrated his marriage. His father-in-law is called the Timnite (Jg 15⁴). The town was held by the Hebrews in the reign of Uzziah, but was lost to the Philistines by Ahaz (2 Ch 28¹⁸). It is now identified with Tibneh, on the S. side of the Wady Sarar, 2 miles W. of Beth-shemesh. 3. For Gn 36⁴⁰ see TIMNA, 3.

H. L. WILLETT.

TIMNATH.—A strong city built by Bacchides (1 Mac 9⁴⁰). It is possibly the Thamna of Jos. BJ III. iii. 5, the mod. Tibneh, some 10 miles N.W. of Bethel. Cf. TIMNATH-SERAH.

TIMNATH-HERES (In Jos 19⁵⁰ 24³⁰ written Timnath-serah).—A place assigned to Joshua as an inheritance and burying-place (Jg 2⁹). It is described as being 'in Mt. Ephraim, on the N. side of the Mountain of Gaash.' See next article. H. L. WILLETT.

TIMNATH-SERAH.—The city in Mount Ephraim given to Joshua (19⁵⁰), where he was buried (Jos 24³⁰), lying on the N. of the Mountain of Gaash (Jg 2⁹ Timnath-heres). Josephus calls the burial-place of Joshua Thamna, and this probably corresponds to Timnath of 1 Mac 9⁴⁰, although there it is reckoned to Judea. It was head of a Jewish toparchy, and is named with Lydda and Emmaus (BJ III. iii. 5, etc.). The Onomasticon identifies it with Tibneh, where there are remains of an important place, with a spring and ancient tombs, on the Roman road from Caesarea to Jerusalem, about 14 miles N.E. of Ludd (Lydda). The tombs are on the S. of the road. One, distinguished by size and workmanship, may be that pointed out as Joshua's in the time of Eusebius and Jerome. The Samaritans place the burial of Joshua at Keft Haris, a village some 10 miles S. of Nablus, with two sanctuaries to the E., one of which, Neby Kift ('the prophet of the portion or lot'), may be identified with Joshua. In this case, only the second element in the name has survived. Heres, it will be observed, simply reverses the order of the letters in Serah. W. EWING.

TIMON.—One of 'the Seven' (Ac 6³).

TIMOTHEUS.—1. A leader of the Ammonites who was defeated in many battles by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 5⁴⁸, 2 Mac 8³⁰ 9³ 10³⁴⁻⁴⁷). 2. The AV form of the name Timothy everywhere in NT except 2 Co 1¹, 1 Ti 1², 2 Ti 1¹, Philm¹, He 13²³.

TIMOTHY.—A young disciple, a native of Lystra, chosen as companion and assistant by Paul when, during his second missionary journey, he visited that city for the second time. He was the child of a mixed marriage, his father (probably dead at the time of his selection by Paul) being a Greek and his mother a Jewess (Ac 16¹). From earliest childhood ('babe' RV) he had received religious training, being taught the Jewish Scriptures by his mother Eunice and his grandmother Lois (2 Ti 1⁵ 3¹⁵). Probably both he and his mother were converted during Paul's first sojourn at Lystra, for on the Apostle's second visit he was already 'a disciple' of some standing, 'well reported of by the brethren' (Ac 16¹⁻²). Indeed, Paul seems to claim him as a personal convert in 1 Co 4¹⁷, describing him as his 'beloved and faithful child in the Lord.'

The selection of Timothy was due not only to the wish of Paul (Ac 16³), but also to the opinion of the Church at Lystra. In his case, as in the case of Paul and Barnabas (Ac 13³), the local prophets 'led the way' (1 Ti 1¹⁸ RVm) to him; and he was then set apart by imposition of hands by Paul (2 Ti 1⁶) in conjunction with the local presbyters (1 Ti 4¹⁴). Possibly it was on this occasion that he 'confessed the good confession' (1 Ti 6¹²). Paul caused him to be circumcised (Ac 16³), judging that, as his mother was a Jewess, his not having submitted to the rite would prove an obstacle to his ministry among Jews, and, further, that from his semi-Jewish parentage, he did not come within the scope of the Church's decree which released Gentiles from circumcision.

Timothy at once accompanied Paul through Asia to Troas, and thence into Macedonia. He was left behind at Beræa when the Apostle moved on to Athens, but was summoned to rejoin him (Ac 17¹⁴⁻¹⁵). He was thence despatched back again to Macedonia to confirm the Church at Thessalonica, and to bring news of its state to Paul. He rejoined the Apostle in Corinth and cheered him by a favourable report (1 Th 3¹⁻⁸, Ac 18⁵). While in Corinth, Paul wrote his Epistles to the Thessalonians, and included Timothy in the greetings (1 Th 1¹, 2 Th 1¹). He is next mentioned at Ephesus with Paul on his third missionary journey, and thence is sent with Erastus to Macedonia in advance of the Apostle (Ac 19²²). Shortly after Timothy's departure, Paul despatched by direct sea route his First Epistle to the Corinthians. In this he mentions that Timothy (travelling via Macedonia) would shortly reach them (1 Co 4¹⁷); he bespeaks a kindly welcome for him, and adds that he wishes him to return with 'the brethren' (i.e. probably those who had borne the Epistle) to Ephesus (16¹⁰, 11 and 12). Timothy may not have reached Corinth on this occasion, being detained in Macedonia; and the absence in the Second Epistle of all mention of his being there points in this direction. But in any case he is found with Paul again when 2 Cor. was written, in Macedonia (2 Co 1¹). Paul in due course reached Corinth, and Timothy with him, for his name occurs among the greetings in the Epistle to the Romans which was then written (1 Ro 16²¹; cf. Ac 20²). Paul and he, after a three months' sojourn, returned by land to Troas (Ac 20⁴, 5). Timothy is not again mentioned in the Acts. It is clear from the Epistles of the Captivity that he was a companion of Paul during his imprisonment (Col 1¹, Phil 1¹), and that the Apostle meditated sending him on a special mission to Philippi (Ph 2¹⁹). From the Pastoral Epistles we learn that when Paul, after his release, came into Asia, he left Timothy as his delegate in Ephesus, giving him full instructions as to how he was to rule the Church during his absence, which he realized might be longer than he anticipated (1 Ti 1³ 31¹⁴, 15). When Paul was a second time imprisoned, and felt his death to be imminent, he summoned Timothy to his side (2 Ti 4¹, 2). If Timothy ever reached the Apostle, he may have been then himself imprisoned, for we read (He 13²³) of his being 'set at liberty.' Of his subsequent history nothing is known with certainty.

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO.—These Epistles, together with that to Titus, form a special group among the Pauline letters,—the Pastoral Epistles,—being united by common objects in view, and by a common literary style. Each Epistle claims in its opening words to have St. Paul for its author—a claim which the Church has consistently allowed 'ever since the idea of a Canon of the NT came into clear consciousness.' During the last century, however, their genuineness has been vigorously assailed. Baur relegated them to late in the 2nd century; but modern hostile criticism very generally holds that, while they contain genuine fragments of the Apostle's writing, their present form is the work of pseudonymous writers.

There is no doubt that these Epistles present very special difficulties to scholarship; but these are on the way to solution, and the general tendency of criticism may be said to be towards establishing their genuineness.

1. The situation disclosed by 1 and 2 Tim. is as follows. Paul, having to go into Macedonia, left Timothy in charge of the Church at Ephesus (1 Ti 1³); and, fearing he might be detained longer than he anticipated, he wrote telling him how to act during his absence (1 Ti 3¹⁴, 15). From other allusions in the Epistles we gather that the Apostle visited not only Ephesus and Macedonia, but also Troas (2 Ti 4¹²), Corinth and Miletus (4²⁰), and Crete (Tit 1⁵), and that he purposed wintering in Nicopolis (3¹⁵).

Now it is impossible to fit these visits into the period covered by the Acts. No doubt in Acts we find the Apostle remaining two years in Ephesus (Ac 19¹⁰), but on that occasion he did not leave Timothy behind when he went into Macedonia; on the contrary, he sent him into that country while he remained at Ephesus (Ac 19²²); nor was there time during his two years in that city for such lengthened journeys as the above visits require. Therefore, as the Acts closes with St. Paul in Rome in prison (A.D. 61), we must conclude, if we accept the Pastorals as genuine, that the Apostle visited Ephesus, Macedonia, and Crete after a release from imprisonment.

Those who oppose the Pauline authorship refuse to believe in this release, taking as their ground the fact of the silence of the Acts on the point, and charge those who accept it with making an unwarranted assumption; but surely theirs is the unwarranted assumption, for they assume that St. Paul was not released, merely because the Acts does not continue its history farther than it does. Indeed, even if we had not the distinct statements of the Pastorals, we should consider it extremely likely that he was thus released; for it is clear that he anticipated being set at liberty when, from his imprisonment, he wrote to the Philippians that he hoped shortly to come to them (Ph 2²⁴), and when he bid Onesimus prepare him a lodging at Colossæ (Philem²²). When, therefore, we add the further facts, that the Muratorian Fragment states that the Apostle fulfilled his expressed wish of visiting Spain (Ro 15²⁸, 29),—a journey which certainly necessitates his release from his Roman imprisonment,—and that Clement of Rome tells of his reaching 'the bounds of the West,'—a phrase which, used by one resident, as Clement, in Rome, can only mean Spain—we may hold without misgiving that St. Paul was released in A.D. 61, that he was again arrested, and suffered martyrdom in Rome (A.D. 64?), that between these dates he visited Spain in the West, and various Churches in the Eastern Mediterranean, and that during this period he wrote the Pastoral Epistles.

2. The external evidence in favour of the Epistles is remarkably strong. Irenæus, Clement, Tertullian, the Epistle of the Churches of Vienne and Lyons, Theophilus of Antioch, were all clearly acquainted with them. A singularly convincing quotation is found in the writings of Polycarp (the disciple of the Apostle John, and who died A.D. 167), who says: 'The love of money is the beginning of all trouble, knowing . . . that we brought nothing into the world, neither can carry anything out' (cf. 1 Ti 6⁷ 10).

On the other hand, not a word is raised by earlier writers against their genuineness, save by the heretics Marcion and Basilides; and their rejection was due not to any stated doubts as to the Pauline authorship, but apparently to dislike to the teaching of the Epistles. Very much stronger evidence against their authenticity must be supplied before this weight of evidence can be overturned.

3. Much discussion has arisen concerning the nature of the heresies attacked by Paul in these Epistles. Some see in them an incipient Gnosticism, theories from which the developed Gnosticism of Marcion ultimately sprang. Strength was lent to this view by the supposition that 'the endless genealogies' mentioned in 1 Ti 1⁴ and Tit 3⁹ were the long lists of emanations of æons and angels which formed part of the Gnostic systems. But, as Philo and others use the word 'genealogy' of the primitive history of the Pentateuch, it is now generally allowed that the reference is not to Gnostic speculations but to the legendary history of the Jewish patriarchs. Others regard the heresies opposed as essentially Jewish in origin, and undoubtedly many passages point in this direction. We read of would-be 'teachers of the law' (1 Ti 1⁷), of 'they of the circumcision' (Tit 1¹⁰), of 'Jewish fables' (1¹⁴) of 'fightings about the law' (3⁹). Yet, while there are these distinct evidences of Jewish influences, it seems doubtful if it is right to mark all the heresies opposed as coming from this source. The errors leaning towards asceticism, with its prohibition of marriage, and of certain foods, and perhaps of wine also (1 Ti 4¹⁻⁴ 5²³), may indeed have sprung from forms of Judaism which had become ascetic; but just as likely—indeed more likely—they may have come from Gentile sources. These ascetic doctrines may have been founded on the un-Jewish belief of the essential evil of matter—an error which the Apostle probably aimed at when he wrote that God gave all things richly to be enjoyed (8¹⁷). In a city like Ephesus, Oriental mysticism, Greek thought, Judaism, and Christianity would meet; and the Church there, if lapsing from truth, would show signs of heresy derived from all these sources. In 2 Ti 2¹⁸ one heresy is distinctly named—the belief that the resurrection was already past; this opinion may have been the same as that held by those within the Gentile Corinthian Church who said there was no resurrection (1 Co 15¹²).

4. Within these Epistles St. Paul's use of certain theological terms is somewhat different from that in his earlier writings. Thus faith is used more of the objective belief which the individual holds, than of the warm affection that unites the personal soul to Christ. Similarly righteousness is used rather of a virtue to be reached by personal struggle than in the technical sense found in the Epistle to the Romans. But it must be remembered that faith in the earlier writings is not always subjective (e.g. Gal 1²² 3²²), nor is it always objective in the Pastorals (1 Ti 1⁵, Tit 3³), and that righteousness is often spoken of elsewhere as a virtue to be acquired (e.g. 2 Co 9¹⁰, Ro 6¹² 8¹⁰), while justification by faith is emphasized in the Pastoral Epistles (2 Ti 1⁵, Tit 3³). Another distinguishing mark is found in the traces of a formulated creed, which show themselves in frequent quotations, such as the five 'faithful sayings,' and the rhythmic stanza commencing 'He who was manifested in the flesh' (1 Ti 3¹⁶). The latter is clearly part of a hymn embodying a confession of the Christian faith. Such are undoubtedly marks of a Church with a history behind it; but, assuming that St. Paul wrote the Epistles shortly before his death in A.D. 64, ample time would have passed since he first evangelized Ephesus in A.D. 52. It takes but a few years for a living and active community to crystallize its common convictions.

5. It is important to note the development reached in Church organization as presented in the Epistles. They show us the Apostle himself holding the reins of supreme control (1 Ti 1²⁰ 2²⁵), while Timothy and Titus are his delegates. Some years before, they had acted in this capacity on special commissions (1 Co 4¹⁷, Ph 2¹⁹, 2 Co 8¹⁶⁻¹⁸); and, as on those occasions, so on these, they seem to have been appointed temporarily to carry out the functions entrusted to them until the Apostle's return (1 Ti 1³ 3¹⁴, Tit 3¹²). But as his delegates, even though temporarily, they had full jurisdiction over the various officers of the Church, and full instructions are given to them to guide them as to the qualifications necessary to be found in those to be appointed to the offices of bishop (or elder) and deacon. The bishop and elder are spoken of as identical (Tit 1⁷⁻⁹), showing that at the date of the Epistles these two titles had not yet been given to distinct offices (cf. Ph 1¹, Ac 20¹⁷⁻²⁸). This is strong confirmation of the accepted date of the Epistles, for, had they been written at the time assumed by radical criticism, the monarchical position of the bishop, then reached in Asia Minor, would have shown itself. Instructions are also given regarding 'women' (1 Ti 3¹¹) and 'widows' (5¹⁻⁸). As the former are mentioned in the midst of regulations concerning deacons, they probably are not the deacons' 'wives' (as AV), but official women or deaconesses, holding such an office as Phœbe held (Ro 16¹ RVm). This is a distinct advance on the ecclesiastical organizations disclosed in earlier NT writings, but need not surprise us. 'The secluded life of women must at the very beginning have caused a felt want for women to perform for women what deacons did for men.' The care of widows engaged the Church from the first (Ac 6¹, Ja 1²⁷).

The absence of all instructions regarding prophets is remarkable. Probably prophecy, which is an abnormal gift and not a stated function, was not very active in the Ephesian or Cretan Churches at the time, or, if active, was under due control, and so did not call for special treatment as formerly at Corinth (1 Co 14¹⁻⁵).

6. The individuality of St. Paul is strongly present in all his writings, a distinguishing style marking them as his. At the same time his Epistles form themselves into different groups, which vary considerably in style in accordance with the particular period of his life in which they were written. So strongly do the Pastoral Epistles show the general Pauline style, that even those who oppose their genuineness admit that they contain genuine fragments of his writing. But, while this is so, there is no doubt that there is present in them a considerably larger proportion of words peculiar to themselves than we find in any other of the groups into which his Epistles are divided. This is the strongest argument against their Pauline authorship. The argument from 'style,' however, is a most precarious one, especially in the writing of one who shows such great variety of phraseology in his other groups of Epistles. Indeed, if we followed it to its logical issues, it would lead us to conclude that even the three Pastoral Epistles are themselves the work of different authors, for each of these Epistles contains a large number of words absent from the other two.

7. The true explanation of the marked difference of style of the Pastorals from the other Pauline writings appears to be that, while the earlier Epistles were written to Churches at an early stage of their development, and thus dealt mainly with fundamental discussions of doctrine, these were written to individuals who presided over well-established Christian communities, and therefore they deal chiefly with practical virtues and ecclesiastical organizations. Such newness of subject would compel even a much less versatile writer than St. Paul to enlarge and modify his phraseology.

The following judgment of the late Dr. Hort will, we believe, be increasingly accepted: 'In spite of by no means trivial difficulties arising from comparison of the diction of these with other Epistles, I believe them to be his, and to be his as they now stand.'

The First Epistle to Timothy and that to Titus are devoted chiefly to instructions as to the governance of the Church. The Second Epistle to Timothy is the outpourings of the Apostle's heart, when he felt his death to be imminent (2 Ti 4⁶), to one who had been his faithful companion and assistant for many years; it shows tender anxiety for his 'beloved child' (1⁴), whose strength and weaknesses he well knew, and upon whose piety and wisdom so much of the Church's future, after his own decease, would depend.

TINDALE'S VERSION.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS, 12 ff.

TIPSAH ('crossing').—1. The classical Thapsacus, the chief crossing-place on the middle Euphrates for caravans and armies, after the decline of Carchemish in the Persian period. It lay on the eastward bend of the river where it leaves its southerly course. It is named as the north-east limit of the dominions of Solomon (1 K 4²¹). 2. Tiphshah should be corrected to Tappuah, with the Lucian LXX, in 2 K 15¹⁴.

TIRAS.—A son of Japheth (Gn 10²), formerly identified with Thrace, but of late much more plausibly with the Turusha, a piratical people who invaded Syria and Egypt in the 13th cent. B.C. But Tiras has also been identified with Tarsus (=E. Cilicia) and even Tarshish (wh. see).

J. F. MCCURDY.

TIRATHITES.—A family of scribes (1 Ch 2⁵⁵).

TIRE.—See HEADTIRE, and DRESS, 5.

TIRHAKAH, king of Cush (2 K 19⁹, Is 37³⁶), marched out from Egypt against Sennacherib shortly before the mysterious destruction of the Assyrian army (? B.C. 701). Herodotus preserves a version of the same event. Tirhakah was the third of the Ethiopian (25th) Dyn.

TIRHANAH

and reigned as king of Ethiopia and Egypt from about a.c. 691-665; towards the end of his reign (670-665) until his death he was engaged in constant struggles with the Assyrians, who endeavoured to establish their power in Egypt by means of the native princes as against the Ethiopian. Tirhakah was quite unable to resist the attacks of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal; even Thebes was sacked, but the Assyrians were equally unable to hold the country they had won. The chronology of the reign is not clear: Tirhakah was not king at the time of Sennacherib's expedition, but he may have commanded the army opposing it. Winckler places the later Assyrian attacks in 675-668. F. L. GRIFFITH.

TIRHANAH.—A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2⁴⁶).

TIRIA.—A son of Jehallelel (1 Ch 4¹⁸).

TIRSHATHA.—A Persian word = 'His Excellency,' or more probably 'His Reverence,' mentioned Ezr 2⁴ (= Neh 7²⁵), Neh 7⁷⁰ 8³ 10⁴. In the first three passages he is unnamed, but is apparently Zerubbabel; in the last two he is Nehemiah. The title is used interchangeably with the Assyrian pechah or 'governor,' of which it may be the Persian equivalent, and apparently represents a plenipotentiary appointed for a special mission.

C. W. EMMET.

TIRZAH.—1. One of the 31 cities captured by Joshua (Jos 12²⁴). It was the residence of Jeroboam I. (1 K 14¹⁷) and his successors down to Omri (1 K 15²¹ 16⁴ s. 15, 17, 22). The doubtful reference in Ca 6⁴ compares the Shulammites to Tirzah in beauty. The site is uncertain. Three different identifications have met with favour: Talluza, a village E. of Samaria and N. of Mt. Ebal; et-Tirah, a village close to Mt. Gerizim; and Teyasir, 11 m. N. of Nablus (Shechem) and 12 m. E. of Sebastiyeh (Samaria). 2. One of the five daughters of Zelophehad (Nu 26²² 27³⁶ 31¹⁷, Jos 17²).

TISHBITE.—Elijah is repeatedly designated 'the Tishbite' (1 K 17¹ 21¹⁷ 22² etc.)—i.e. native of Tishbeh (? Tishbe) in Gilead.

TISHRI (month).—See TIME, p. 936^b.

TITANS.—In Greek mythology the Titans were divine or semi-divine beings who, endowed with supernatural powers, were overcome only with the greatest difficulty. In later times they were identified with primitive giants.

In the LXX version of Samuel the 'Vale of Rephaim' (2 S 5¹⁸ 22) is called the 'Vale of the Titans.' Here it is used in the sense of 'giants,' for the same version of Chronicles translates this name in 1 Ch 11¹⁶ 14⁹ 'Vale of the Giants.' Thus, in interpreting early Hebrew thought for Greek readers, the old shadowy Rephaim were identified with Titans and giants.

Similarly in the song of victory in Jth 16⁷ we read:

'For the mighty one did not fall by the young men,
Neither did the sons of Titans smite him,
Nor did tall giants set upon him,
But Judith, the daughter of Merari . . .'

In this late work Greek mythology has been absorbed by Jewish thought. GEORGE A. BARTON.

TITHES.—According to both North Israelite (Gn 28²²) and Judean (Gn 14²⁰) tradition, Israel's patriarchs paid tithes; the custom, therefore, among the Israelites was evidently very ancient. But the institution of offering tithes of the fruits of the field and of the flocks is one which dates back to a period greatly anterior to Israelite history. A tenth of the flocks, fruits, and possessions of all kinds, as well as of the spoils of war, was given to their gods by many peoples, not only of Semitic, but also of Indo-Germanic race.

In the OT two ideas lie at the root of the custom; the more antique—apart from its position in the Bible—is that which regards the offering of a tenth to the Deity as His due, owing to His being the Supreme owner of the land and all that it brings forth, or that feeds upon it (Lv 27³⁰⁻³²); here the underlying thought is that of propitiation,—if the Supreme owner does not receive His due, His blessing will be wanting another year. The other idea, which is obviously a later one, is that of thankfulness for the blessings received (Gn 28³⁰⁻³²); the tithes were given in recognition of what the Giver of all things had accorded to His worshippers.

Among the Israelites this ancient custom was taken advantage of by the Levitical priesthood, who, as those employed in the sanctuary of Jahweh, claimed for themselves, on behalf of Him, a tithe of all. According to Nu 18²¹⁻²⁴ the Levites were to receive this in lieu of the inheritance of land which fell to all the other tribes; but they received the tithe on behalf of Jahweh; stress is laid on this point in v. 24: 'For the tithe of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave-offering unto the Lord, I have given to the Levites for an inheritance';—the 'heaving' of an offering towards the altar was the substitute for the actual consuming of it upon the altar. Although tithes were, of course, intended to be offered once a year (Dt 14²²), it would appear from Am 4⁴—though the words are ironical—that in their anxiety to more than fulfil the requirements of the Law, many worshippers brought them more frequently (the original Hebrew, however, is ambiguous). Though, generally speaking, tithes were offered only to God, yet it is clear that they were sometimes given also to the king (cf. Gn 14²⁰, 1 S 8¹⁷, He 7² 4). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

TITLE (Jn 19¹³ 20).—The ordinary term for the 'super-scription,' consisting usually of the name of the criminal and the crime with which he was charged (Mk 15²⁶), written on a board, which, according to Roman practice, was carried in front, or hung from the neck of a prisoner as he was led through the streets of the city to execution, or exposed for punishment. In cases of crucifixion the inscription was often fastened above the head of the criminal (Mt 27³⁷). This public announcement was intended to serve as a warning to evil-doers.

The four inscriptions on the cross of Jesus mentioned in the Gospels are different, though the words 'the King of the Jews' (Mk 15²⁶) are common to all, and truly set forth the charge on which Jesus was formally condemned. Mt. (27³⁷) adds, 'this is Jesus'; Lk. (23³⁴), 'this (is)'; and Jn. (19²⁰) 'Jesus of Nazareth.' The variations may be partly explained by the statement of Jn. that the inscription (like Roman edicts which also were often published in both Latin and Greek) was written in Hebrew, i.e. Aramaic (which was spoken ordinarily by the people of Jerusalem and the pilgrims from Palestine), Latin (the official language), and Greek (the lingua franca of the world). The Evangelist sees, in this announcement in the three languages of the Roman Empire, a symbol of the proclamation to the world of the Messiahship of Jesus, notwithstanding the efforts of the Jews to cover Him with ignominy. Jn. alone implies that Pilate took revenge on the Jews in preparing the inscription; Mt. and Mk. seem to suggest that the soldiers themselves placed the inscription on the cross, and crucified Jesus between two robbers in order to heighten the insult. TITLE.—See JOR.

TITUS.—A convert from heathenism (Gal 2⁹), probably won by St. Paul himself (Tit 1⁴). He is not directly mentioned in Acts, and all that is known of him comes from the Epp. to Gal., 2 Cor., and the Pastorals. Neither his age nor his place of birth is told us. We first hear of him when he accompanies St. Paul on his journey from Antioch to Jerusalem—a journey undertaken in connexion with the question of the circumcision of Gentile Christians (Gal 2¹). He is thus included in the 'certain others' mentioned in Ac 15². The Judaistic party within the Church wished to have Titus circumcised (Gal 2³); but the Apostle and those representing Gentile Christianity strenuously resisted (v. 1), and the decision of the Church was in their favour (Ac 15^{28, 29}). The case of Titus thus seems to have been the test case in this controversy. From this time we may suppose that Titus continued with St. Paul as one of his missionary companions and assistants, but we have no distinct reference to him until some 10 years after the Council at Jerusalem, namely, when the Apostle wrote 2 Corinthians. In this Epistle Titus is mentioned nine times, and from it we gather that he visited Corinth as the Apostle's delegate—probably three times. On the first occasion, which was a year before 2 Cor. was written (2 Co 8¹⁰), he came with an unnamed 'brother' (12¹⁸), and on his arrival set on foot the necessary organization to secure the local contributions towards the collection for the poor Christians of Judaea which the Apostle had inaugurated (1 Co 16^{1, 2}). After his departure from Corinth serious trouble vexed the Church there, and he was a second time sent to reduce matters to order. Probably on this occasion he was the bearer of the letter referred to in 2 Co 2^{20, 7³⁰}. St. Paul anxiously awaited at Troas the return of Titus (2 Co 2¹²); but the journey took longer than was expected; and so the Apostle moved on into Macedonia, with a view to meeting him the sooner on his road. Here Titus ultimately reached him, and bringing good news from Corinth refreshed his spirit (v.¹⁴). Titus was then despatched a third time to Corinth, bearing the 2nd Epistle (8¹⁶⁻²⁴), and was charged to complete 'the collection'—the organization for which he had commenced the year before (8¹⁰).

After these events we do not hear of Titus until St. Paul addressed to him the Pastoral Epistle. From it we gather that he had accompanied the Apostle, after his release from his Roman imprisonment, on a visit to Crete, and had been left there by him 'to set in order things that were wanting' and to 'ordain elders in every city' (Tit 1⁴). He is charged to maintain sound doctrine (2¹), to avoid unprofitable discussions (3⁹), and duly to assert his authority (2¹⁵). The Apostle tells him of his intention to send Artemas or Tychicus to him, and bids him, when this occurs, to join him in Nicopolis, where he hopes to winter (3¹²). Whether these plans were ever realized we know not. St. Paul may have been re-arrested before reaching Nicopolis; but we learn from 2 Ti 4¹⁰ that Titus was with the Apostle during part of his second imprisonment in Rome, though at the time of the writing of that Epistle he had left for Dalmatia.

Titus and Timothy share the honour of being the most trusted and efficient helpers of St. Paul, and the fact that the former was chosen to deal with so sharp a crisis as presented itself at Corinth shows that prudence, 'act, and firmness marked his Christian character.

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

TITUS, EPISTLE TO.—This Epistle was written by St. Paul (1¹) to Titus while the latter was acting as his delegate in Crete (1⁵). It may have been a reply to a request from Titus for guidance, or may have been written by the Apostle on his own initiative, to assist his delegate in the difficulties that faced him. St. Paul had come to Crete in company with Titus (1⁵), but, having to leave before he could complete his work there, he left Titus behind to 'set in order things that were wanting.'

As far as our records tell us, this was the first missionary visit of St. Paul to the island. No doubt on his journey as prisoner from Caesarea to Rome he was windbound under its lee, sheltering from unfavourable winds at Fair Havens (Ac 27^{7, 9}); but we are not told that he landed on this occasion, and it is probable that, as a change of wind was being anxiously waited for, he was unable to leave the ship. In any case there was no opportunity then granted him of prosecuting any effective evangelization.

It has been thought possible that the visit alluded to in our Epistle might have taken place during the Apostle's lengthened sojourn at Corinth (Ac 18¹) or at Ephesus (19¹⁰). Such a visit is possible, but we have no record of it; while the general literary style of the Epistle marks it distinctly as belonging to the same group as 1 and 2 Timothy, which group on strong grounds must be held to belong to that period of St. Paul's life which intervened between his two Roman imprisonments (see TIMOTHY [EPISTLES TO]).

From the Epistle it is evident that, though the Cretan Church was lacking in organization, yet it was of some years' standing. We read of several cities having congregations in need of supervision (1⁵), and of elders to be chosen from among those who were fathers of 'believing' (i.e. Christian) families (v.⁶); while the heresies dealt with are those that are in opposition to true doctrine, rather than such as might occur in a young Church through ignorance of truth.

The Cretan character was not high. Ancient writers describe their avarice, ferocity, fraud, and mendacity, and the Apostle himself quotes (1¹²) Epimenides, one of their own poets, as saying 'Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, idle gluttons.' Christianity, without the discipline of a firm organization, springing up in such soil, would naturally be weakened and corrupted by the national vices. We are not surprised, then, to find the Apostle in this Epistle laying the chief emphasis on the importance of personal holiness of character, and insisting that right belief must issue in useful, fruitful life (1^{16, 18} 2 passim 3^{8, 14}). The chief errorists mentioned by him are unruly men, vain talkers, and deceivers, especially those of the circumcision, who led men astray for filthy lucre's sake (1^{10, 11}), men who professed that they knew God but denied Him in their lives (1¹⁶), and men who were 'heretical' (RVm 'factious,' 3¹⁰). The type of error to be resisted is also seen in the caution given to Titus to avoid foolish questions, genealogies (i.e. Jewish legendary history), and strifes and fightings about the Law, as unprofitable and vain (3⁹).

These dangers to the Christian faith are very similar to those opposed in 1 Timothy; with, however, this difference, that none of those mentioned here seems to have its origin in the incipient Gnosticism which in a measure affected the Church in Ephesus, where Timothy was in charge. The false doctrines in Crete are predominantly, if not exclusively, Jewish in origin, and it is known that Jews abounded in Crete.

The ecclesiastical organization, entrusted to Titus for establishment, is of the simplest kind, merely the ordination of elders (1⁵; spoken of as 'bishops' v.⁷)—officers which it had been the custom of the Apostle from the first to appoint in the Churches he established (Ac 14²³). The appointment of presbyters was left entirely in the hands of Titus; but while this was so, it is evident that it would be necessary for him to consult the congregations over whom the elders were to be appointed, for he is charged to select only those whose reputation should be 'blameless' in the eyes of their fellow-Christians. Further, the presbyter is spoken of as 'God's steward,' so that the authority committed to him by Titus was ultimately derived from God and not from man. No mention is made in this Epistle of deacons, deaconesses, or widows—a fact which so far distinguishes it from 1 Timothy.

The Epistle claims to be written by St. Paul (1¹); and its authenticity is established by the same considerations as establish that of 1 and 2 Timothy, with which Epistles it is closely allied in general situation, external attestation, and literary style. For a discussion of the questions involved in this connexion the reader is referred to art. TIMOTHY [EPISTLES TO].

The Epistle was probably brought to Titus by the hands of Zenas and Apollos (3¹³).

TITUS JUSTUS.—See JUSTUS, No. 2. TITUS MANIUS.—See MANIUS.

TIZITE.—A designation, whose origin is unknown, applied to Joha, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴⁶).

TOAH.—See NAHATH.

TOB.—One of the small Aramæan principalities founded to the south of Mt. Hermon and Damascus in the 12th cent. B.C., the others being Hamath (the less), Zobah, Beth-rehob, Maacah or Geshur. It was in Tob that Jephthah lived as an outlaw (Jg 11³). Tob joined the rest of the Aramæans, except those of Hamath (2 S 8⁴), in helping the Ammonites in their war against king David (2 S 10⁶). The exact position of these little States is uncertain. Tob was perhaps the most easterly of them. Possibly Tob is meant in the region alluded to in 1 Mac 5¹⁸ [Tubias], 2 Mac 12¹⁷ [Tubieni]. J. F. McCurdy.

TOB-ADONIJAH.—One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁹).

TOBIAS.—1. A family which returned from exile, but could not trace their genealogy (Ezr 2⁶⁰—Neh 7⁷²); corrupted in 1 Es 5²⁷ to Ban. 2. The Ammonite who, in conjunction with Sanballat and others, persistently opposed the work of Nehemiah (Neh 2¹⁰, 1⁹ 4³, 7 6¹⁷ 13⁴, 8). Cf. art. NEHEMIAH.

TOBIAS.—1. The son of Tobit (To 1³ and often). 2. The father of Hyrcanus (2 Mac 3¹¹).

TOBIEL.—The father of Tobit (To 1¹).

TOBIJAH.—1. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁹). 2. One of a deputation that came from Babylon to Jerusalem with contributions of gold and silver (Zec 6¹⁰, 14).

TOBIT, BOOK OF.—See APOCRYPHA, § 8.

TOCHEN.—An unidentified town of Simeon (1 Ch 4²²).

TOGARMAH.—The third son of Gomer, his brothers being Ashkenaz and Riphath (Gn 10⁹). In Ezekiel mention is made of 'the house of Togarmah,' the members of which traded for the wares of Tyre with horses and mules. Fried. Delitzsch suggests that Togarmah is the Tû-garimmu of the Assyrian inscriptions, described by Sargon of Assyria as the capital of Melitene, which he captured and re-colonized. Sennacherib, who again captured Tû-garimmu and destroyed it, speaks of it as being on the borders of Tabal (Tubal [see MESHECH]). The difference in the first element (tû—tîl) makes a slight difficulty. Kiepert and Dillmann regard Togarmah as being S.W. Armenia. T. G. PINCHES.

TOKHATH.—See TIKVAH, 1.

TOLA.—The first of the five minor Judges (10¹). In Gn 46¹⁵, Nu 26²², 1 Ch 7¹ he appears as the son of Issachar; Tola was apparently the name of the leading clan of the tribe. It means 'a worm,' from which came a crimson dye (Ex 16²⁰, Is 1¹⁸); and was perhaps an animal name due to totemism. Shamir, his home and birthplace, is unidentified. C. W. EMMET.

TOMB, GRAVE, SEPULCHRE.—The disposal of the dead among the Israelites was always by burial. While spices were sometimes sprinkled among the grave-clothes, there was no religious motive for the embalming of the dead as in Egypt. 1. The common grave must have been the usual opening in the ground with protective stones laid on the surface; or one prepared slab of stone either quite flat, or with the ridge of a sarcophagus lid, might be used. To judge by the custom of to-day, the grave would often be cut partly or altogether in rock, not because that was preferred, but because the village elders usually marked off for the cemetery a section of ground that was too rocky for purposes of cultivation. 2. Tombs of a more important kind were made by excavating in the face of a rock to form a chamber about 8 or 9 feet on each side. At the opposite end and on the two sides were three narrow recesses, Heb. kokim, 6 or 7 feet long and about 2 feet wide, cut into the rock at right angles to each wall. Into one of these the dead body was inserted with the feet towards the entrance, which was then covered with a slab sealed around the edges with plaster. 3. During the two centuries of Greek influence before the Christian era, a somewhat larger form of tomb came into use. The common chamber had on each of its three sides two, and occasionally three, shallow arched recesses, and in each recess a sarcophagus was laid along the line of the wall. From the fact that the two angels could be seen, one at the head and the other at the foot of the receptacle for Christ's body (Jn 20¹³), it is evident that the tomb belonging to Joseph of Arimathea was of this later character. The opening to the central chamber was guarded by a large and heavy disc of rock which could roll along a groove slightly depressed at the centre, in front of the tomb entrance. Both the primitive Israelite sepulchre and its Greek successor might be of a compound form, having a passage leading from one chamber to another, each with its kokim or loculi. The most extensive example of such tombs is found in the catacombs of Rome.

From time immemorial a tomb was a sacred place which it was an act of profanation to violate, and of ceremonial pollution to use for other purposes, such as the erection of a house upon the site. The tomb of a saint became a shrine, and that of a Christian martyr was venerated as the memorial and altar of a living sacrifice. Religious meetings were held there, and pilgrimages were made to it as to a heathen oracle, and votive offerings gradually adorned the walls of the building erected over it. At the present day the peasants of Palestine can leave clothing and agricultural implements, with perfect safety, beside the tomb, under the temporary guardianship of the saint. In course of time this power of protection became transferred to the Church as the common institution of the saints. G. M. MACKIE.

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.—The belief that the world, after the Flood, was re-populated by the progeny of a single family, speaking one language, is reconciled in the Bible with the existing diversity of tongues by a story which relates how the descendants of Noah, in the course of their wanderings, settled in the plain of Shinar, or Babylonia, and there built of brick a city, and a tower high enough to reach heaven, as a monument to preserve their fame, and as a centre of social cohesion and union. But the Lord discerned their ambitious purposes, and, after consulting with the Divine beings who constituted His council and court (cf. Gn 1²⁶ 3²²), frustrated their design by confounding their speech, so that concerted action was no longer possible for them. In consequence, the name of the city was called Babel (see below), and its builders were compelled to disperse over the face of the earth (Gn 11¹⁻⁹).

The story belongs to a class of narratives (of which there are several in the Bible) intended to explain the origin of various institutions, or usages, the existence of which excited the curiosity of a primitive race. Among these was the prevalence in the world of different languages, which contributed so greatly to produce between the various peoples, who were thus unintelligible to one another, feelings of mutual suspicion and fear (cf. Dt 28⁴⁹, Is 28¹¹ 33¹⁹, Jer 5¹⁴). The particular explanation furnished was doubtless suggested partly by the name of the city of Babel, or Babylon (which, though really meaning 'gate of God,' was by a popular etymology connected with the Heb. word bālal, 'to confuse'), and partly by the presence, at or near Babylon, of the ruins of some great tower, which looked as though

It had originally been designed as a means to scale heaven. Two such towers, or ziggurats, were the temple of Merodach (or Marduk) in Babylon (supposed to be beneath the mound of Babil), and the temple of Nebo in Borsippa (the ruins of which form the mound of Birs Nimroud); and knowledge of one or other of these may have helped to shape the narrative. The character of the narrative makes it impossible to consider it as real history; it bears on its surface manifest evidence that it is a creation of primitive fancy. The question whether the various languages of mankind have really been derived from one common tongue cannot be separated from the question (into which it is unnecessary to enter here) whether the various *rac*es of men have sprung from a single stock, i.e. 'whether man appeared originally on the globe at one centre or at many centres.' It may be said, however, that philological research has proved that the numerous existing languages are members of a comparatively small number of families of speech (such as the Indo-European, the Semitic, etc.); but that between these families of speech there is so great a difference of structure, that their descent from one original tongue seems highly improbable. At the same time, all languages must have arisen from certain faculties and instincts common to human nature; and the presence, in languages belonging to distinct families, of onomatopoeic, or imitative, words serves to illustrate the essential similarity of human tendencies in the sphere of speech all the world over.

G. W. WADE.

TONGUES, GIFT OF.—1. In NT we read of 'speaking with tongues' or 'in a tongue' as a remarkable sign of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit; but the exact meaning of the phenomenon described has been much disputed. We may take the passages in the chronological order of writing.—(a) The Epistles. In 1 Co 12–14, among the charismata or (spiritual) gifts are 'divers kinds of tongues' and 'the interpretation of tongues' (12¹⁰, 30). Yet St. Paul, who possessed the gift himself (14¹⁸), considers it to be of little importance as compared with prophecy. In itself it is addressed to God, and unless interpreted it is useless to those assembled; it is a sign to believers, but will not edify, but rather excite the ridicule of, unlearned persons or heathens (14²³). Whatever the gift was, speaking with tongues was at Corinth ordinarily unintelligible to the hearers, and sometimes even to the speaker (14⁹), though the English reader must note that the word 'unknown' in AV is an interpolation. The gift was not to be forbidden, but everything was to be done decently and in order (14⁴⁰).—Indications of the gift are thought to be found in 1 Th 5¹⁹, Ro 8¹⁸, Gal 4⁶, Eph 5¹⁸, but not at all in the Pastoral, Petrine, or Johannine Epistles. It seems to have belonged to the infancy of the Church (1 Co 13⁸: 'Tongues . . . shall cease'). [Irenæus, apparently speaking at second hand, says that the gift existed in the 2nd cent.; but this is very doubtful. Chrysostom says that it was non-existent in the 4th century.]—(b) Acts. At Pentecost, in addition to the 'mighty wind' and the 'tongues parting asunder like as of fire,' we read that the assembled disciples spoke 'with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance' (2⁴). The multitudes from many countries, coming together, heard them speak in their tongues the mighty works of God (2¹¹), while some thought that they were drunken (2¹⁵; cf. 1 Co 14²³). We read again of the gift in the conversion of Cornelius and his household (10⁴⁶)—St. Peter expressly says that it was the same as at Pentecost (11¹⁸)—and at Ephesus (19⁶); and probably the same is intended in the story of the Samaritan converts (8¹⁷ f.: 'Simon saw that . . . the Holy Ghost was given').—(c) In the Appendix to Mark (which, even if Markan, is comparatively late) we have the promise that the disciples 'shall speak with [new] tongues' (16¹⁷; 'new' is probably not of the best text).

2. Meaning of the gift.—Relying chiefly on the passages of Acts, most of the Fathers (as Origen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzus) understand the gift as being for purposes of evangelization, as if the disciples received a miraculous endowment of foreign languages to enable them to preach; Gregory of Nyssa and others take the gift as a miracle of hearing, the disciples speaking in their own language, but the people understanding their speech each in his own tongue. This view starts with the doubtless true idea that 'tongue' means 'language' here. But Acts says nothing about preaching; the gift is never found in NT in connexion with evangelization; the passages in 1 Cor., where the utterances are often unintelligible even to the utterer, are clearly repugnant to this interpretation, and we have no proof that the Apostles ever preached in any language but Greek and Aramaic, even to the 'barbarous' heathen, such as the Lycaonians or Maltese. Indeed, Paul and Barnabas clearly did not know Lycaonian (Ac 14¹¹, 14). Peter probably did not know Greek well enough to preach in it, for Mark was his 'interpreter' (Papias, Irenæus). We cannot, then, follow the majority of the Fathers in their interpretation. Had it been the true one, St. Paul would have encouraged the Corinthians to use the gift to the utmost.

Unfortunately, we do not know how the earlier 2nd cent. Fathers understood the matter; but Tertullian apparently judged the gift to be an ecstatic utterance of praise (adv. Marc. v. 8). This is much more probable than the other view. At Pentecost the disciples spoke the 'mighty works of God.' All the NT passages either suggest or agree with the idea of worship. This does not, indeed, exhaust all our difficulties; but perhaps the following considerations may solve at least some of them.—(a) The disciples, at a critical period of the Church, were in a state of intense excitement. But St. Paul's words do not mean that their utterances were mere gibberish; on the contrary, they were capable of interpretation if one who had that gift were present. And at Pentecost they were, as a matter of fact, understood.—(b) It has been suggested that we are to understand 'tongues,' not as 'languages,' but as 'poetic or symbolic speech,' not readily understood by the unlearned. But this view does not satisfy Ac 2, though in itself it may be true; in a word, this is an insufficient explanation.—(c) The languages required by Ac 2 are actually only two—Greek and Aramaic. For those present at Pentecost were Jews; the list in v. 28 is of countries, not of languages. All the Jews of these countries spoke either Greek or Aramaic. This is a difficulty in interpreting the narrative, which gives us the impression of a large number of different languages. But probably what is intended is a large number of dialects of Greek and Aramaic, especially of the latter; it would be as though a Somerset man heard one who habitually spoke broad Scots praising God in the Somerset dialect. And what would strike the pilgrim Jews present was that the speakers at Pentecost were mainly those who themselves spoke an uncouth Aramaic dialect, that of Galilee (Mt 26⁷³).—(d) This consideration may lead us a step further. We may recognize in the Pentecostal wonder a stirring of memory, a recalling of utterances previously heard by the disciples at former feasts when a polyglot multitude of Jews (polyglot at least in dialects) was assembled, the speakers uttering what they had unconsciously already taken into their memories. This would account for their words being so readily understood; some of the speakers would be praising God in one dialect, some in another.—(e) Something of this sort may have happened at Corinth, one of the most cosmopolitan of cities. Here the possession of the gift was not confined to those of Jewish birth. But naturally the resident Christian community at Corinth would ordinarily not understand the strange dialects given utterance to. The case is not the same as that of Pentecost, when many different peoples were gathered together.

To sum up, it seems probable that the gift of tongues was an ecstatic utterance of praise, not only in poetic and symbolic speech, but also in languages or dialects not ordinarily spoken by those who had the gift; a power given at a time of great enthusiasm and excitement, at a critical period of the world's history, but not meant to be a permanent gift for the Church, and not ranking so high as other charismata, especially not so high as prophecy. That it survived the Apostolic age is hardly probable. A. J. MACLEAN.

TOOLS.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS.

TOPARCHY.—A compound word from Greek topos (place) and archē (rule), found only in 1 Mac 11²² (cf. 1 Mac 10³⁰, 11²⁴) among the sacred books, but very many times in the papyri of Egypt (with reference to that country). It means a very small administrative division of territory. Three toparchies were detached from Samaria and added to Judaea in Maccabean times. A. SOUTER.

TOPAZ.—See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

TOPHEL.—See DIZAHAB.

TOPHETH.—A term of uncertain etymology, designating some locality in one of the valleys near Jerusalem, very possibly in the Valley of Hinnom (2 K 23¹⁰), or near the point of juncture of the three valleys of Jerusalem. It was there that the Jews under Ahab and Manasseh performed the rites of human sacrifice (Jer 7³¹⁻³²), offering children to Baal, Molech, and other heathen gods. It was defiled by Josiah as a part of his religious reformation, and so came to be an abominable place where the refuse was destroyed, and thus a synonym of Gehenna (wh. see).

TORAH.—See LAW (IN OT), §§ 2. 3.

TORCH.—See LAMP, § 1; LANTERN.

TORMAH.—In the margin of Jg 9²¹ 'in Tormah' is given as an alternative rendering of the Hebrew word translated 'craftily' (AV 'privily'). Some commentators have suggested that Tormah is a corruption of Arumah (v. 41).

TORTOISE (Isab, Lv 11³⁰ RV 'great lizard').—Several kinds of land and water tortoises are common in the Holy Land, but here the reference is probably to some kind of lizard. See LIZARD. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

TOU.—King of Hamath on the Orontes, who sent an embassy to congratulate David on his defeat of Hadadezer (1 Ch 18^{9f.}). In the parallel passage, 2 S 8^{9f.}, the name appears as Toi, which, however, is less probable philologically.

TOWN CLERK.—In Græco-Asiatic cities under the Roman Empire the grammateus (tr. 'town clerk') was responsible for the form of decrees presented to the popular assembly. They were first approved by the senate and then sent to the assembly, which formally passed them. At Ephesus (Ac 19³⁵) the clerk feared that he would have to account to the Roman governor for the irregularly constituted assembly.

TRACHONITIS.—Mentioned in Lk 3¹ as the name of the tetrarchy of Philip. It is to be identified with the lava region S.E. of Damascus, known to the Greeks as Trachon, and to modern Arabs as the Lejd. An inscription discovered by Burckhardt in 1810 at Mismiyeih dispels all doubt as to the identity of this region with Trachon. It has ever been regarded as a refuge for invaders. Josephus frequently speaks of the inhabitants of these parts as predatory (Anl. xvi. ix. 1, x. 1). Philip's rule, on the other hand, he describes as just and gentle (Jb. xviii. iv. 6). Trajan in A.D. 106 transformed Trachonitis into a new province, which he called 'Arabia,' making Bosra its capital. GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.—The processes by which international trade is carried on consist in the interchange of commodities or of services, and these latter may be positive or negative in character: they may be represented by actual performance or by the withdrawal of opposition. Such procedure as the occupation of passes or other natural channels for traffic, with the view of demanding tolls of the traders who use them, is the subject of few allusions in the OT; yet the location of the Israelitish kingdoms was such as to favour the production of revenue in this way. The most practicable routes both from the North and from the East to the Red Sea lay through their country; and the land route from Egypt to Asia either traversed or skirted it. United under a powerful sovereign, Palestine could levy large contributions on the traffic of the surrounding nations; and this appears to have been done in Solomon's time.

1. The products of Canaan were in the main agricultural, horticultural, and pastoral, and some of these could be exported. Oil was sent to Egypt (Hos 12¹) and Phœnicia (Ezk 27¹⁷); wine to the latter country (2 Ch 2¹⁰), as well as wheat (Ezk l.c., 2 Ch l.c.), barley (2 Ch l.c.), oak timber (Ezk 27⁸) from Bashan, honey (or dibs) and balsam (Ezk 27¹⁷), and an unknown substance called pannag (Ezk l.c.). Other possible objects for exportation were sand for glass manufacture, bitumen, the purple-fish, wool, and leather; and certain fruits and spices (Gn 43¹¹).

2. Of national industries we hear very little; nor does it appear that any articles of Israelitish workmanship acquired fame in foreign lands. A few notices can, however, be collected, which indicate the existence of manufactures, and of a sort that may have been exported. The housewife of Pr 31 not only makes her own clothes, but sells some to the 'Canaanite' or pedlar; and in 1 Ch 4² there is mention of a Jewish family that owned a byssus-factory. Further, there are not a few references to potteries, and to work done in brass, the precious metals, stone and wood. The iconoclastic attitude which prevails in the OT causes the plastic arts to be ordinarily referred to with scorn and indignation; but of their existence in Palestine there is no doubt, and the considerable market that existed for images probably led to no small development. That any of these manufactures was exported is not attested by any evidence that has as yet come to light; but there is apparently no a priori reason against such a supposition.

Prior to the settlement of the country by the exertions of the kings, trade can have been carried on by Israelites only to an insignificant extent. In Saul's days, according to 1 S 13¹⁹, there were no Israelitish smiths—a fact there explained as due to the tyrannical precautions of the Philistines; but perhaps we should infer that the Israelites had as yet learned no crafts, since even in Solomon's time we find that artificers had to be imported for the building of the royal edifices. The place of industry had to be supplied by raiding, and Saul himself is praised for having stripped the finery of his enemies' women to put it on his own (2 S 13²⁴). The heroic David fights with rustic weapons and without armour. The possibility of the peaceful progress which is the preliminary condition of trade would seem to have been provided by the first two kings.

3. We have unfortunately no account of the financial system which must have been introduced with the foundation of the kingdom, though the prophecy of Samuel (1 S 8¹¹⁻¹⁷) suggests that the king claimed a tithe of all produce, but in theory had a right to both the persons and possessions of his subjects. Before the end of David's reign we hear of permanent officials appointed by the king; and the need for steady sources of revenue whence the stipends of such officials could be supplied, is sufficient to cause the erection of an elaborate financial system, with surveys and assessments, tax-gatherers and clerks. The 'numbering of the people,' which lived on in popular tradition as an iniquity earning condign punishment, doubtless belonged to the commencements of orderly government. For Solomon's time we have something like the fragment of a budget (1 K 10¹⁴⁻¹⁵), according to which it would appear that the king had three sources of revenue—one not further specified, but probably a land-tax; another, tribute from subject States, governed by satraps; and a third connected with commerce, and probably equivalent to excise and customs. The text implies that these various forms of revenue were paid in gold, which was then stored by the king in the form of shields and vessels.

This gold must all have been imported, as there are no mines in Palestine; and indeed we are told that it came, with other produce as well as silver, from the mysterious Ophir and Tarshish; and that the enterprise was a joint venture of Solomon and the king of Tyre, the latter probably supplying the vessels, the former the produce which was exchanged for these goods, unless indeed the gold was procured by raiding. If it was obtained in exchange for commodities, we must suppose either that the latter were identical with those of which we afterwards read in Ezekiel, or that the commodities to be exchanged were all supplied by the Phœnicians, the service by which the Israelites earned their share being that of giving the former access to the harbour of Ezion-geber. In favour of the latter supposition, it has been pointed out that the commodities known to have been exported from Palestine at one time or another were ill-suited for conveyance on lengthy voyages, and unlikely to be required in the countries where the gold was procured. There is in the OT no allusion to the practice of coining metal, and where sums of money are mentioned they are given in silver; the effect, however, of the quantities of gold brought into Palestine in Solomon's time was not, according to the historian to appreciate silver, as might have been expected, but to depreciate it, and render it unfashionable. Yet the notice of prices in the time of Solomon (1 K 10²⁹) suggests that silver was by no means valueless, whatever weight we assign to the shekel of the time. While it is clear that all silver in use must have come in by importation, the notices in the OT of transactions in which it would probably be employed are too scanty to permit of even a guess as to the amount in use; and though it is likely that (as in Eastern countries to this day) foreign coins were largely in circulation, there is little authority for this supposition.

4. If little is known of Israelitish exports, many objects are mentioned in the OT which were certainly imported from foreign countries. These were largely objects of luxury, especially in the way of clothes or stuffs; the material called šān (Pr 7¹⁶ RV 'yarn') was imported from Egypt; the Ivory, to which reference is frequently made during the period of the kingdom, from Ethiopia, through Egypt or Arabia; and the gems from one or other of these countries. Various objects are mentioned in connexion with Solomon's enterprises, as newly introduced into Palestine. For later (Talmudic) times a list of 118 articles has been drawn up which came from foreign countries into the Palestinian market; this list contains many foods and food-stuffs, materials for wearing apparel, and domestic utensils. We should rather gather that in pre-exilic times food was not ordinarily imported, except in times of famine. Imports of raw materials must have been considerable as soon as the people began to settle in towns; for there is no native iron, and little native wood, and these as well as other materials would be required for even the simplest manufactures. Probably, in the case of instruments, the more valuable and elaborate sort came from abroad, while the poorer classes had to content themselves with home-made articles. The finds that have hitherto been made of Israelitish utensils are insufficient to determine this point. Among the more important imports in Biblical times were horses, which seem to have been procured regularly from Egypt. Of the slave-trade there are very few notices in the OT, and it may be that the reduction of the aboriginal population by the Israelites to serfs, and the almost continuous warfare leading to the constant capture of prisoners, rendered the importation of slaves ordinarily unnecessary. According to Joel (3¹⁻⁷), the Phœnicians acted as dealers, purchasing prisoners of war (in this case Jews), and exporting them to foreign countries. The same may have been the fate of those persons who, for non-payment of debt, were assigned to their creditors (2 K 4¹).

5. Persons engaged in commerce.—The words used in the OT for merchants are such as signify primarily 'traveller' (1 K 10¹⁵ RV 'chapmen,' 'merchants,' 'traffic'), and convey the ideas of spying and making circuits. The use of the word 'Canaanite' for pedlar has been noticed. In Jer 37¹⁶ there is an allusion to a place in Jerusalem called 'the booths,' but references to shop-keeping are rare before the Exile. In Nehemiah's time different classes of dealers had their locations in Jerusalem—goldsmiths and grocers (3²), fishmongers (13¹⁶); but most articles of general consumption seem to have been brought in day by day by foreigners and others (10²⁸ and 13²⁰), and sold in the streets. The distinction between wholesale and retail dealers perhaps first occurs in the Apocrypha (Sir 26²⁰). It is worth observing that in the prophetic denunciations of luxury we miss allusions to the shops or stores in which such objects might be supposed to be offered for sale (Is 3¹⁸⁻²⁴). Moreover, the verse of Ezk. (7¹²) 'let not the buyer rejoice nor the seller mourn' suggests that the latter operation was not ordinarily thought of as it is in communities a large portion of which lives by trade, but rather as a humiliation required at times by stern necessity; and there are few allusions to trade in the codes embodied in the Pentateuch, though such are not absolutely wanting. Perhaps, then, we are justified in concluding that the practice of trade was in pre-exilic times largely in the hands of itinerant foreigners; and it is only in NT times that merchandise is regarded as an occupation as normal as agriculture (Mt 22³). To the cumbrous process of bargaining there is an allusion in Pr 20¹⁴.

Allusions to the corn-trade are rather more common than to any other business, and to certain iniquities connected with it—probably, in the main, forms of the practice by which corn was withdrawn from the market in the hope of selling it at famine prices: this at least seems to be the reference in Pr 11¹⁶, though Sirach (34^{28, 29}) seems to have interpreted the passage merely of liberality and stinginess. In Am 9¹⁻³ the reference is more distinct, and implies both the offence mentioned above and the use of deceitful measures, a wrong also condemned by Micah in a similar context (6¹¹). The interpretation of these passages must remain obscure until more light is thrown on land-tenure in Israel, and the process by which the king's share in the produce was collected.

The foreign commerce conducted in king Solomon's time is represented in his biography as a venture of his own, whence the goods brought home were his own possessions; and the same holds good of commerce in the time of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22^{49, 50}). There is no evidence that Israelitish commerce was conducted on any other principle before the Exile, after which isolated individuals doubtless endeavoured to earn their livelihood by trade ventures. The foreign commerce of which we occasionally hear in the OT was also conducted by communities (e.g. Gn 37^{28, 29}), to be compared with the tribes whom we find at the commencement of Isaiah engaged in joint enterprises of a similar kind. In 1 K 20th there appears to be a reference to a practice by which sovereigns obtained the right to the possession of bazaars in each other's capitals—the nearest approach to a commercial treaty that we find in this literature. But at such times as the condition of the Israelitish cities allowed of the purchase of luxuries—i.e. after successful campaigns or long spells of peace, permitting of accumulations of produce—it is probable that the arrival and residence of foreign merchants were facilitated by the practice of 'protection,' a citizen rendering himself responsible for the foreign visitors, and making their interests his own—doubtless in most cases for a consideration. The spirit of the Mosaic legislation (like that of Plato's and Aristotle's theories) is against such intermixing with foreigners; and except for forces such as only powerful chieftains could collect, journeys whether on sea or land were dangerous. Of an expedient for commerce like the Arabian months of sacred truce the OT contains no hint.

6. The chief passage in the OT dealing with commerce is Ezekiel's prophecy against Tyre, in which the chief Tyrian wares are enumerated, and the countries whence the Tyrians imported them (ch. 27). That chapter would seem to be based on some statistical account of Tyre, similar to those which at a somewhat later date were made out concerning the Greek States. In a prophecy inserted in the Book of Isaiah (ch. 23) Tyre is also described as the great mart of the time, serving, it would seem, as the chief exchange and centre of distribution for goods of all kinds. Ezk 26th is sometimes interpreted as implying that Jerusalem was a competitor with Tyre for the trade of the world, but perhaps it means only that the taking of any great city led to the Tyrian merchants obtaining the spoil at low prices.

7. Trade-routes.—Palestine has no internal waterways, and goods brought to it from other countries had to reach it either by sea or across desert. A system of roads leading from Arabia, Egypt, and Mesopotamia appears to have converged at Sela or Petra, whence two branches spread northwards, to Gaza and to the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, continuing northwards on the left bank of the Jordan. From Gaza and Acre roads met in the plain of Esdraelon, the former going through the depressions of Judaea and Samaria. From the plain of Esdraelon a road led to Damascus, touching the N.W. bank of the Sea of Galilee. When Jerusalem became the capital of the country, goods were brought thither, probably by the same routes as were in use till the construction of the railways; but it is uncertain when Joppa first became the port of Jerusalem, for the statement in 2 Ch 2nd that Joppa was so used in Solomon's time is not found in the authentic chronicle of 1 K 5th, where ignorance is clearly acknowledged on this subject. On the other hand, the earlier chronicle states that Elath served as the port of Jerusalem on the Red Sea, and, after Solomon's time, was repeatedly taken out of the possession of the Jewish kings, and re-captured. Josephus (Ant. viii. vii. 4) asserts that Solomon had the roads leading to Jerusalem paved with black stone, but his authority for this statement is unknown. The process of road-making is described in the familiar passage Is 40th, with allusions to the operations of mounding and excavating, possibly of paving; but these operations may have been learned from Babylonian or Persian rather than Israelitish examples. Moreover, such roads were necessary for military rather than commercial expeditions, in which wheeled vehicles were not ordinarily used.

8. Transport.—Before the construction of railways in Palestine, transport was ordinarily on the backs of men or animals, and of the latter camels are mentioned in connexion with goods brought from Arabia (1 K 10th, Is 60th etc.), and even with such as were carried in Syria and Palestine (2 K 8th, 1 Ch 12th). In the last reference these animals are mentioned together with asses, oxen, and mules; and probably the first and last of these were more ordinarily employed for internal traffic. At a later time they first appear to have been employed almost exclusively in the corn-trade, in which they figure as early as Gn 42nd. The allusions to the employment of human transport are more often metaphorical than literal; yet such passages as Is 58th seem distinctly to refer to it and to the instruments employed in fixing the burdens on the slaves' persons. 'Caravans' are mentioned in Job 6th, Is 21st, Ezk 27th (all RV), and Jg 5th (RVm).

9. Commercial instruments.—The money-lender appears at the very commencement of the history of the Israelitish kingdom, where we are told that David's followers were to some extent insolvent debtors; and the Jewish law allowed the taking of pledges, but not (it would seem) the taking of interest, except from foreigners. The result of similar legislation in Moslem countries is to make the rate of interest enormously high, and in Palestine it may have had the same effect. Deeds of loan appear not to be mentioned in the OT, though there is frequent reference to the danger of giving security. To the institution of banking there is a familiar reference in the NT (Mt 25th); the persons there referred to—like the bankers of modern times—undertook the charge of deposits for the use of which they paid some interest; the money-changers (Mt 21st etc.) were, as now, in a smaller way of business. Those who hoarded money more often put it 'under the stone' (Sir 29th) than entrusted it to bankers; and this is still probably the favourite practice all over the nearer East. Another common practice was to deposit money with trustworthy persons, to which there is a reference in Tobit (4th etc.). In most ancient cities the temples served as places of security, where treasure could be stored, and this is likely to have been the case in Israelitish cities also.

10. Development of the Israelites into a commercial people.—The prophets appear to have anticipated that the exiles would carry on in their new home the same agricultural pursuits as had occupied them in Palestine (Jer 29th); and it would appear that till the taking of Jerusalem by Titus, and perhaps even later, agriculture remained the normal occupation of the Israelites, whereas in modern times this pursuit has passed entirely out of their hands. The Jews of the Turkish empire (e.g.) are said to furnish no cultivators of the soil, whereas the Christian population, whose political status is the same, are largely agricultural. The separation of great numbers of the people from the Palestinian soil, in successive captivities, must doubtless have led many of them to take to commerce, to which perhaps those who had no settled home would feel least repugnance; while the settlement of groups in a number of different regions would furnish them with the advantage that companies now secure by the establishment of agencies in various places. After the conquests of Alexander, ghettos began to be formed in the great Hellenic cities, and the Roman conquests soon led to colonies of Jews settling yet farther west. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

TRADES.—See ARTS AND CRAFTS.

TRADITION.—See LAW (IN NT), § 1.

TRAGACANTH.—See SPICE.

TRANCE.—A condition in which the mental powers are partly or wholly unresponsive to external impressions while dominated by subjective excitement, or left free to contemplate mysteries incapable of apprehension by the usual rational processes. The word occurs in EV only in Nu 24th 16 (but cf. RV), Ac 10th 11th 22nd. See, further, artt. DREAMS, VISION. H. L. WILLET.

TRANSFIGURATION.—The Transfiguration is a mysterious occurrence in the life of our Lord, which must be seen and felt, rather than understood. It produced a sense of awe in the hearts of the disciples (Mt 17th).

its value is symbolic. Silence regarding it is enjoined by Jesus, and practised by the disciples until the Resurrection, with which it is closely connected in significance. The problem of the transfigured body of Jesus and of the Resurrection body is the same. The event is referred to by Jesus Himself as a vision (horama, Mt 17⁹); it is vouched for by the three Synoptists (Lk 9²⁸⁻³⁶, Mk 9²⁻¹³, Mt 17¹⁻¹³). Elsewhere in the NT it is referred to only in 2 P 1⁶⁻¹⁸. The Fourth Evangelist, after his own manner, undoubtedly expresses its inner significance for faith in Jn 12²⁸⁻³⁶. The mountain on which it took place was probably Hermon. The time was night (Lk 9²⁸). It was as 'he was praying' that the transfiguration of face and raiment appeared.

As regards the inner significance of the occurrence, one expression in St. Luke's narrative is of great importance—leukos exastraphlon (v. 29), 'was white and glistening' (AV). The sense is really 'gleamed out white.' The glory is not that of reflected light; its source is inward. It is the manifestation of a mental process. The note of time ('six days after' [Mt. Mk.]; 'about eight days after' [Lk.]) affords the key to His thoughts and the subject of His prayers. After what? After Peter's confession (Lk 9¹⁸⁻²⁷), and the prediction of Christ's death (v. 22). Recognized as Messiah by the disciples, He must now prepare them to meet the stumbling-block of the cross. Thus the Transfiguration had (1) a deep significance for Jesus Himself. He was strengthened by the appearance of Moses and Elias who spoke of His decease (Lk 9³¹). They represented the saints in heaven, who understood. Again the Voice stood for the acceptance of His work by God, and He was enabled to yield up His heart and life anew to the will of God. (2) The great lesson for the disciples was that the dreadful shame of His cross was really glory, and that all suffering is ultimately radiant with heavenly beauty, being perfected in Christ. Peter's suggestion of the three tents is an attempt to materialize and make permanent the vision, to win the crown without the cross. The vision vanished, and they saw 'Jesus only.' It was real, but only a glimpse and foretaste. By loyalty once more to the Master, in the common ways of life to which they returned, the disciples would come to share the eternal glory of the Risen Lord. R. H. STRACHAN.

TRANSGRESSION.—See SIN.

TRAVAIL.—The Fr. travail, meaning 'labour or trouble,' was taken into Eng. without alteration of meaning or spelling. This spelling is found in AV, and it is still sometimes used, especially for the labour of child-birth. But the spelling 'travel' afterwards became common, and the word was then confined to journeying, that being a recognized form of toil and trouble in those days. In Nu 20¹⁴ 'Thou knowest all the travel that hath befallen us,' the meaning is more than journeying, and so RV spells the word 'travall,' which was the original spelling of AV also.

TREASURE, TREASURY, TREASURER.—1. In OT 'treasure' and 'treasury' stand for various Heb. terms, but both words usually render tesar. This shows that 'treasure' and 'treasury' are not carefully distinguished in EV, or else that tesar itself may stand for either. As a matter of fact the truth lies with both alternatives. Strictly, a treasure is a store of wealth, while a treasury is a storehouse, a place where treasure is kept. Sometimes, however, 'treasure' occurs in AV where 'treasury' is meant, as Job 38²² 'Hast thou entered into the treasures (RV 'treasuries') of the snow?'; and, on the other hand, 'treasury' is sometimes found where 'treasure' would be the more correct rendering, as Jos 8¹⁹. 24 and RV of Ezr 2²⁹. The indeterminateness of tesar is shown by its constant employment for 'treasure' and 'treasury' alike. The 'treasure' (RV 'store') cities' of Ex 1¹¹ (cf. 1 K 9⁹, 2 Ch 8⁴) are cities in which provisions were stored up (cf. Gn 41⁴⁸. 50).

2. In NT we find a like ambiguousness in the use of 'treasure,' and also of the Gr. thesauros for which it stands. The treasures of the Magi (Mt 2¹¹) and the treasure in heaven (Mt 19²¹) refer to precious stores; but it is out of his treasury rather than his treasure that the good man brings forth good things (Mt 12³⁵), and the householder things new and old (13¹²). In Ac 8³¹ 'treasure' renders gaza, a word of Persian origin. In Mt 27⁶ 'treasury' represents korbands (the depository of the 'corban,' see SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 1 (a)), the sacred treasury into which the chief priests would not put Judas' 30 pieces of silver. For the treasury of the Temple (gazophylakion) into which Jewish worshippers cast their offerings (Mk 12⁴¹. 42, Lk 21¹) see TEMPLE, § 11 (b). When Jesus is said to have spoken 'in the treasury' (Jn 8²⁰), the meaning probably is that He was teaching in the colonnade of the Temple where stood the treasure-boxes into which the offerings were cast.

Treasurer occurs in OT in Neh 12¹⁸, Ezr 1⁸ 7²¹, Is 22¹⁵, Dn 3². 3, representing a different term in each writer. The word is found in NT only in RV of Ro 16²³ as substitute for AV 'chamberlain' (Gr. oikonomos), but the Ethiopian eunuch is said to have had charge of all the treasure of queen Candace. J. C. LAMBERT.

TREE.—'Tree' is used as a poetic name for the Cross in Ac 5³⁰ 10³⁹ 13³⁴, 1 P 2²⁴; cf. Gal 3¹. For sacred trees see HIGH PLACE, 1; and ISRAEL, II. 1 (5); and, for the various trees of the Bible, the artt. under their respective names.

TRESPASS-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE, § 15.

TRIAL.—See TEMPTATION.

TRIBES OF ISRAEL.—The number of the tribes of Israel varied at different periods. The number 12 is an artificial one, as is seen from its application to the descendants of Ishmael (Gn 17²⁰ 25¹⁸⁻¹⁹), of Nahor (Gn 22²⁰⁻²⁴), and of Esau (Gn 36¹⁸⁻¹⁹. 40-43). Simeon and Levi were 'divided in Jacob and scattered in Israel' (Gn 49⁷) when the tribe of Benjamin arose, so that at that time there would be not 12 but only 11 tribes. Reuben, likewise, in the period of the kings, was an insignificant remnant, and, though mentioned in 1 Ch 5²⁶ as still existing in 734, had apparently become disintegrated long before. As Stade (GVF I. 146) correctly remarks, several of the largest tribes—Judah, Ephraim, Manasseh, Gad—contained many minor tribes which surpassed in number, possessions, and political significance several of those counted in the twelve tribes.

The number of the tribes, according to JE's genealogy (Gn 29-30), is not 12 but 13, and in the following order:

Leah tribes—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah	. . . 4
Bilhah (Rachel) tribes—Dan, Naphtali	. . . 2
Zilpah (Leah) tribes—Gad, Asher	. . . 2
Leah tribes—Issachar, Zebulun	. . . 2
Rachel tribes—Joseph=(Manasseh, Ephraim)	. . . 2
Benjamin (born in Palestine), Gn 35 ¹⁶	. . . 1

13

To obtain the number 12 from this scheme it is necessary to omit Levi, or to count Manasseh and Ephraim as one.

Why the number twelve was chosen cannot be answered with certainty. Whether it is astronomical or mythological, i.e. connected with the 12 signs of the Zodiac and the 12 months in the year—in which case it would be traceable to Babylonia, as Gunkel suggests in his Genesis (p. 300), and Winckler holds (Gesch. Israels, II. p. 57, where he connects the 'Zwölf Söhne' (Jacob's) with the 'Zwölf Monaten'), or whether it rests upon Solomon's partition of the land into 12 divisions so that each might provision the royal household one month in the year (1 K 4⁷), as Luther thinks (ZATW xxi. 34), or whether the true explanation has yet to be discovered, cannot be affirmed. The mythological explanation has to the present writer the greater probability in its favour.

The interpretation of the genealogical scheme of JE, which appears to be most acceptable to scholars, may be briefly summarized from Guthe, GVV, p. 49^b. Benjamin appears as the last of the sons because this tribe came into existence last of all, and in Palestine (Gn 35¹⁴⁻²⁰). Joseph is younger than the others because it entered and settled in Canaan later than Simeon, Levi, and Judah, etc. Evidence of this is found in Jg 1¹²⁻²³, and Gn 34, which shows Joseph in possession of the region of Shechem, formerly occupied by Simeon and Levi. The order of arrangement, it would therefore seem, depended upon the author's view of the time of a tribe's respective settlement or origin in Canaan. Dan and Naphtali, Gad and Asher—the Canaanite tribes of the concubines who were admitted to union with the other tribes—owe their position also to these principles. Excluding Benjamin, who was born in Canaan, and the four tribes descended from the concubines, there remain only seven as extra-Canaanite. The mothers, Leah and Rachel, represent different tribal groups at the head of which stand respectively Reuben and Joseph (1 Ch 5¹⁻²). History, however, gives us no record of Reuben's priority in leadership, but assigns that rôle to Joseph, so that the primacy of the Reuben tribe must go back to an earlier time and to the East Jordan. It is possible that the tribes which entered Canaan under Reuben's leadership, or during his supremacy, were classed under Leah, while those which followed under the lead of Joseph were classed under Rachel. The position of Issachar and Zebulun indicates that they were later in acquiring a foothold than the four earlier Leah tribes, yet earlier than Joseph. The position assigned to the Bilhah and Zilpah tribes, Guthe thinks, may be explained by their having come into closer relations to Joseph, and to Reuben or the last of the two Leah tribes respectively, and hence their mothers were given as handmaids to Rachel and Leah. This is all suggestive, but no certainty is reached. Reuben's position (in view of the inferior rôle of the tribe in historical times) remains as a problem to be solved, and the groupings, e.g. Asher with Gad as Zilpah tribes, despite their wide separation, Issachar and Zebulun with Judah as Leah tribes, are of doubtful import. JAMES A. CRAIG.

TRIBUTE, TOLL, TAXING.—1. In OT the subject is obscure. The word most frequently rendered 'tribute' is mas, which denotes a body of forced labourers (2 S 20²⁴, 1 K 9²¹ etc.; see RV), and then later 'forced service'—the feudal corvée. Solomon had a regular system of levying provisions for the maintenance of the royal establishment (1 K 4¹⁻¹⁹), and labourers for the execution of his vast building schemes (5¹²⁻¹⁸, 9¹⁸), and also exacted toll from the caravans of merchants that passed through his kingdom (10¹⁴). After the fall of the Jewish State, tribute was imposed on the land by its foreign masters (2 K 23³, Ezr 4¹³ etc.). In the last-mentioned passage (cf. v. 20⁷) we read of 'tribute, custom, or toll,' but have no information as to the precise meanings of the terms and the distinctions between them. Cf. TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

2. In NT 'tribute' represents 3 Gr. words. (1) phoros is properly a land tax; (2) kénsois (originally a property register), a capitation or poll tax. Both were direct Imperial taxes payable by the Jews as Roman subjects; the former in kind, the latter in Roman money. In NT, however, the distinction is not carefully observed (cf. Mt 22¹⁷, Lk 20²⁵). For the 'tribute money' of Mt 22¹⁹ see MONEY, § 7 (b). (3) didrachmon (Mt 17²⁴, RV 'the half-shekel') was the sum paid by every male Israelite to meet the cost of the daily services in the Temple. See MONEY, § 7 (d). Toll (telos, AV 'custom'; teléōnion, 'place of toll,' AV 'receipt of custom') must be carefully distinguished from tribute (cf. Mt 17²⁴, Ro 13⁷). It was not a direct tax like (1) and (2), but an impost on the value of exported goods. For details see art. CUSTOM(S), PUBLICATION. Taxing (apographē, RV 'enrolment,' Lk 2², Ac 5³⁷) denotes a registration with a view to taxation for Imperial purposes. See QUIRINTUS.

TRINITY.—1. The doctrine approached.—It is sometimes asked why we are not given a definite statement that there are three Persons in the Godhead. One reason for the absence of any such categorical and dogmatic teaching is probably to be found in the fact that the earliest hearers of the gospel were Jews, and that any such pronouncement might (and probably would) have seemed a contradiction of their own great truth of the unity of the Godhead. Consequently, instead of giving an intellectual statement of doctrine, which might have led to theological and philosophic discussion, and ended only in more intense opposition to Christianity, the Apostles preached Jesus of Nazareth as a personal Redeemer from sin, and urged on every one the acceptance of Him and His claims. Then, in due course, would come the inevitable process of thought and meditation upon this personal experience, and this would in turn lead to the inference that Jesus, from whom, and in whom, these experiences were being enjoyed, must be more than man, must be none other than Divine, 'for who can forgive sins but God only?' Through such a personal impression and inference based on experience, a distinction in the Godhead would at once be realized. Then, in the course of their Christian life, and through fuller instruction, would be added the personal knowledge and experience of the Holy Spirit, and once again a similar inference would in due course follow, making another distinction in their thought of the Godhead. The intellectual conception and expression of these distinctions probably concerned only comparatively few of the early believers, but nevertheless all of them had in their lives an experience of definite action and blessing which could only have been from above, and which no difficulty of intellectual correlation or of theological co-ordination with former teachings could invalidate and destroy.

2. The doctrine derived.—The doctrine of the Trinity is an expansion of the doctrine of the Incarnation, and emerges out of the personal claim of our Lord. We believe this position can be made good from the NT. We take first the Gospels, and note that our Lord's method of revealing Himself to His disciples was by means of personal impression and influence. His character, teaching, and claim formed the centre and core of everything, and His one object was, as it were, to stamp Himself on His disciples, knowing that in the light of fuller experience His true nature and relations would become clear to them. We see the culmination of this impression and experience in the confession of the Apostle, 'My Lord and my God.' Then, as we turn to the Acts of the Apostles, we find St. Peter preaching to Jews, and emphasizing two associated truths: (1) the Sonship and Messiahship of Jesus, as proved by the Resurrection, and (2) the consequent relation of the hearers to Him as to a Saviour and Master. The emphasis is laid on the personal experience of forgiveness and grace, without any attempt to state our Lord's position in relation to God. Indeed, the references to Jesus Christ as the 'Servant [wrongly rendered in AV 'Son'] of God' in Ac 3¹³, 26, and 42⁷, seem to show that the Christian thought regarding our Lord was still immature, so far as there was any purely intellectual consideration of it. It is worthy of note that this phrase, which is doubtless the NT counterpart of Isaiah's teaching on the 'Servant of the Lord,' is not found in the NT later than these earlier chapters of the Acts. Yet in the preaching of St. Peter the claim made for Jesus of Nazareth as the Source of healing (3¹⁶), the Prince-Leader of Life (3¹⁵), the Head Stone of the corner (4¹¹), and the one and only Way of Salvation (4¹²), was an unmistakable assumption of the position and power of Godhead.

In the same way the doctrine of the Godhead of the Holy Spirit arises directly out of our Lord's revelation. Once grant a real personal distinction between the Father and the Son, and it is easy to believe it also of the Spirit as revealed by the Son. As long as Christ was present on earth there was no room and no need for the specific work of the Holy Spirit, but as Christ was departing from the world He revealed a doctrine which clearly associated the Holy Spirit with Himself and the Father in a new and unique way (Jn 14¹⁶, 17, 26, 28; 16⁷⁻¹¹). Arising immediately out of this, and consonant with it, is the place given to the Holy Spirit in the Book of the Acts. From ch. 5, where lying against the Holy Spirit is equivalent to lying against God (5³, 4, 9), we see throughout the book the essential Deity of the Holy Spirit in the work attributed to Him of superintending and controlling the life of the Apostolic Church (2⁴, 8²⁹, 10⁴, 13⁴, 16⁶, 7, 20³⁸).

Then, as we pass to the Epistles, we find references to our Lord Jesus and to the Holy Spirit which imply unmistakably the functions of Godhead. In the opening salutations our Lord is associated with God as the Source of grace and peace (1 Th 1¹¹, 1 P 1²), and in the closing benedictions as the Divine Source of blessing (Ro 15²⁰, 2 Th 3¹⁶, 18). In the doctrinal statements He is referred to in practical relation to us and to our spiritual life in terms that can be predicated of God only, and in the revelations concerning things to come He is stated to be about to occupy a position which can refer to God only. In like manner, the correlation of the Holy Spirit with the Father and the Son in matters essentially Divine is clear (1 Co 2⁴⁻⁶, 2 Co 13¹⁴, 1 P 1²).

In all these assertions and implications of the Godhead of Jesus Christ, it is to be noted very carefully that St. Paul has not the faintest idea of contradicting his Jewish monotheism. Though he and others thus proclaimed the Godhead of Christ, it is of great moment to remember that Christianity was never accused of polytheism. The NT doctrine of God is essentially a form of monotheism, and stands in no relation to polytheism. There can be no doubt that, however and whenever the Trinitarian idea was formulated, it arose in immediate connexion with the monotheism of Judaism; and the Apostles, Jews though they were, in stating so unmistakably the Godhead of Jesus Christ, are never once conscious of teaching anything inconsistent with their most cherished ideas about the unity of God.

3. The doctrine confirmed.—When we have approached the doctrine by means of the personal experience of redemption, we are prepared to give full consideration to the two lines of teaching found in the NT. (a) One line of teaching insists on the unity of the Godhead (1 Co 8⁴, Ja 2¹⁹); and (b) the other line reveals distinctions within the Godhead (Mt 3¹⁶, 17 and 28¹⁹, 2 Co 13¹⁴). We see clearly that (1) the Father is God (Mt 11²⁶, Ro 15²⁶, Eph 4⁹); (2) the Son is God (Jn 1¹, 18, 20³⁰, Ac 20²⁸, Ro 9⁵, He 1⁸, Col 2⁹, Ph 2⁶, 2 P 1¹); (3) the Holy Spirit is God (Ac 5³⁻⁴, 1 Co 2¹⁰⁻¹¹, Eph 2²²); (4) the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are distinct from one another, sending and being sent, honouring and being honoured. The Father honours the Son, the Son honours the Father, and the Holy Spirit honours the Son (Jn 15²⁶, 16¹³, 14, 17¹, 8, 18, 22). (5) Nevertheless, whatever relations of subordination there may be between the Persons in working out redemption, the three are alike regarded as God. The doctrine of the Trinity is the correlation, co-ordination, and synthesis of the teaching of these passages. In the Unity of the Godhead there is a Trinity of Persons working out redemption. God the Father is the Creator and Ruler of man and the Provider of redemption through His love (Jn 3¹⁶). God the Son is the Redeemer, who became man for the purpose of our redemption. God the Holy Spirit is the 'Executive of the Godhead,' who applies to each believing soul the benefits of redemption. The elements of the plan of redemption thus find their root, foundation, and spring in the nature of the Godhead; and the obvious reason why these distinctions which we express by the terms 'Person' and 'Trinity' were not revealed earlier than NT times is that not until then was redemption accomplished.

4. The doctrine stated.—By the Trinity, therefore, we mean the specific and unique Christian idea of the Godhead. The foundation of the Christian idea of the Godhead is that of the One Supreme Almighty Spirit whom we worship, to whom we pray, from whom we receive grace, and whom we serve. But the specific Christian thought of God is that of a Spirit, in the unity of whose being is revealed a distinction of Persons whom we call Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the God from whom, through whom, and by whom all things come—the Father as the primal Source, the Son as the redemptive Mediator, and the Holy Spirit as the personal Applier of life and grace. The Christian idea of the Trinity may be summed up in the familiar words: 'The Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God. And yet they are not three Gods, but one God. The Godhead of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost is all one, the Glory equal, the Majesty co-eternal. And in this Trinity none is afore or after other: none is greater or less than another, but the whole three Persons are co-eternal together and co-equal.'

The term 'Trinity' dates from the second century, being found in Greek in Theophilus of Antioch (A.D. 181); and the actual Latin word, from which we derive our English term, in Tertullian (A.D. 200). Its use is sometimes criticised because it is not found in the Bible, but this is no valid objection to it. Like other words, e.g. 'Incarnation,' it expresses in technical language the truth about the Godhead which is found implicitly in the NT. The real question is whether it is true, and whether it is fairly expressive of the Bible truth. It is intended to express and safeguard that real and essential unity of the Godhead which is at the root of the distinctions of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The term 'Person' is also sometimes objected to. Like all human language, it is liable to be accused of inadequacy and even positive error. It certainly must not be pressed too far, or it will lead to Tritheism. While we use the term to denote distinctions in the Godhead, we do not imply distinctions which amount to separateness, but distinctions which are associated with essential mutual coherency or inclusiveness. We intend by the term 'Person' to express those real distinctions of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit which are found amid the oneness of the Godhead, distinctions which are no mere temporary manifestations of Deity, but essential and permanent elements within the Divine unity.

5. The doctrine supported.—When all this is granted and so far settled, we may find a second line of teaching to support the foregoing in the revelation of God as Love. Following the suggestion of St. Augustine, most modern theologians have rightly seen in this a safe ground for our belief. It transcends, and perhaps renders unnecessary, all arguments drawn from human and natural analogies of the doctrine. 'God is love' means, as some one has well said, 'God as the Infinite home of all moral emotions, the fullest and most highly differentiated life.' Love must imply relationships, and, as He is eternally perfect in Himself, He can realize Himself as Love only through relationships within His own Being. We may go so far as to say that this is the only way of obtaining a living thought about God. Belief in Theism postulates a self-existent God, and yet it is impossible to think of a God without relationships. These relationships must be eternal and prior to His temporal relationships to the universe of His own creation. He must have relationships eternally adequate, and worthy, and when once we realize that love must have an object in God as well as in ourselves, we have the germ of that distinction in the Godhead which is theologically known as the Trinity.

6. The doctrine anticipated.—At this stage, and only here, we may seek another support for the doctrine. In the light of the facts of the NT we cannot refrain from asking whether there may not have been some adumbrations of it in the OT. As the doctrine arises directly out of the facts of the NT, we do not for an instant look for any full discovery of it in the OT. But if the doctrine be true, we might expect that Christian Jews, at any rate, would seek for some anticipation of it in the OT. We believe we find it there. (a) The references to the 'Angel of Jehovah' prepare the way for the Christian doctrine of a distinction in the Godhead (Gn 18¹, 16, 17²² with 19¹, Jos 5¹¹⁻¹³ with 6¹, Jg 13¹⁻³, 14 Zec 13⁷). (b) Allusions to the 'Spirit of Jehovah' form another line of OT teaching. In Gn 1² the Spirit is an energy only, but in subsequent books an agent (Is 40¹³ 48¹⁶ 59¹⁹ 63¹⁰). (c) The personification of Divine Wisdom is also to be observed, for the connexion between the personification of Wisdom in Pr 8, the Logos of Jn 1¹⁻¹⁸, and the 'wisdom' of 1 Co 1²⁴ can hardly be accidental. (d) There are also other hints, such as the triplicity of the Divine Names (Nu 6²⁴⁻²⁷, Ps 29³⁻⁵, Is 6³), which may not be pressed, but can hardly be overlooked. Hints are all that were to be expected or desired until the fullness of time should have come. The function of Israel was to guard God's transcendence and omnipresence; it was for Christianity to develop the doctrine of the Godhead into the fullness, depth, and richness that we find in the revelation of the Incarnate Son of God.

7. The doctrine justified.—(a) From the facts of Scripture. It emerges clearly from the claim of Christ; it is an extension of the doctrine of the Incarnation. If the Incarnation was real, the Trinity is true. (b) From the facts of Christian experience. It is a simple fact that Christians of all periods of history claim to have personal direct fellowship with Christ. This claim must be accounted for. It is possible only by predicated Deity of our Lord, for such fellowship would be impossible with one who is not God. (c) From the facts of history. Compared with other religions, Christianity makes God a reality in a way in which no other system does. The doctrine of the Trinity has several positive theological and philosophical advantages over the Unitarian conception of God, but especially is this so in reference to the relation of God to the world. There are two conceivable relations of God to the world—as transcendent (in Mohammedanism), or as immanent (in Buddhism). The first alone means Deism, the second alone Pantheism. But the Christian idea is of God as at once transcendent and immanent. It is therefore the true protection of a living Theism, which otherwise oscillates uncertainly between these two extremes of Deism and Pantheism, either of which is false to it. It is only in Christianity that the Semitic and Aryan conceptions of God are united, blended, correlated, balanced, and preserved. (d) From reason. It is simple truth to say that, if Jesus be not God, Christians are idolaters, for they worship One who is not God. There is no other alternative. But when once the truth of the doctrine of the Trinity is regarded as arising out of Christ's claim to Godhead as Divine Redeemer, reason soon finds its warrant for the doctrine. The doctrine of the Trinity comes to us by revelation and not by nature, though it is soon seen to have points of contact with thought and reason.

The doctrine 'started in the concrete, with the baptismal formula . . . emanating from Jesus Christ. And throughout the history of its dogmatic formulation, we are confronted with this fact. It was regarded as a revelation by the men who shaped its intellectual expression; and it was only in the process . . . of that expression that its congruity with human psychology came out; that psychology in fact being distinctly developed in the effort to give it utterance. . . . They did not accommodate Christian religion to their philosophy, but philosophy to their Christian religion.' This doctrine appealed 'first to unsophisticated men, far removed from Alexandria or Athens; yet the very words in which it does so, turn out, upon analysis, to involve a view of personality which the world had not attained, but which, once stated, is seen to be profoundly, philosophically true' (Illingworth, Personality, p. 212 f.). TRIPOLIS.—An important town in northern Phœnicia, where Demetrius Soter landed when he made his successful attack against Antiochus v. (2 Mac 14¹). It was divided into three parts, originating in colonies from Tyre, Sidon, and Arvad—hence the name. The modern Tarābulūs is two miles inland, its fort occupying the site of the ancient city on the coast.

TROAS.—A city of Mysia on the N.W. coast of Asia Minor. It was in the Roman province Asia. It was founded by Antigonos, and re-founded in b.c. 300 by Lysimachus, who named it Alexandria Troas. For a time under the Seleucid kings of Syria, it gained its freedom, and began to strike its own coins (examples exist from b.c. 164 to 65). Its freedom continued under Pergamenean and afterwards, from b.c. 133, under Roman rule. Augustus made it a Roman colony, and it became one of the greatest cities of N.W. Asia. The Roman preference was partly explained by their belief in the early connexion between Troy and their own capital. This place was a regular port of call on coasting voyages between Macedonia and Asia (cf. Ac 16⁸ 20⁶, 2 Co 2¹³). St. Paul, with Silas and Timothy, approached Troas from the Asian-Bithynian frontier near Dorylaeum or Cotlaeum (Ac 16⁸⁻⁹). He did not preach in Mysia on the first visit, though the Western text at Ac 16⁸ makes him do so.

A. SOUTER.

TROGYLLIUM.—According to the AV (Ac 20¹⁵), which here follows the Western text, St. Paul's ship, after touching at Samos, and before putting in at Miletus, 'tarried at Trogyllium.' This statement is no part of the NT text as now commonly read, but it is not impossible, and perhaps embodies a real tradition. Trogyllium is a promontory which projects from the mainland and overlaps the eastern extremity of Samos, so as to form a strait less than a mile wide. There is an anchorage near, still called 'St. Paul's Port.'

A. SOUTER.

TROPHIMUS.—A Gentile Christian, a native of Ephesus (Ac 21²⁹), who, with Tychicus, also of the province Asia (20⁴), and others, accompanied St. Paul to Jerusalem. The Jews, seeing Trophimus with the Apostle in the city, hastily concluded that St. Paul had brought him into the inner court of the Temple, separated from the outer 'Court of the Gentiles' by a barrier on which were inscriptions in Greek and Latin forbidding any non-Jew to enter on pain of death. This occasioned the riot which led to St. Paul's arrest. Some years later Trophimus was left at Miletus sick (2 Ti 4²⁰).

A. J. MACLEAN.

TROW.—'To throw' was originally 'to trust,' with which it is connected in origin; but it came to mean no more than 'think or suppose.' This is the meaning in Lk 17³, its only occurrence in AV.

TRUMPET.—See MUSIC, 4 (2) (e).

TRUMPETS, FEAST OF.—The 1st day of Tishri (October), the 7th month of the sacred year, was signalized by a 'memorial of blowing trumpets,' to call both God and the people to remembrance of their reciprocal positions. It was a day of holy convocation, on which no servile work might be done. The trumpets blown were probably of a different kind from those used at the ordinary new-moon festivals. At the Feast of Trumpets special offerings were made: a burnt-offering of a bullock, a ram, and 7 lambs, and a sin-offering of a kid of the goats; these in addition to the ordinary daily and monthly offerings (cf. Nu 29¹⁻⁴, Lv 23²⁴⁻²⁵). This was one of the lunar festivals of the Jewish calendar, and was the most important of the new-moon celebrations.

TRUST.—See FAITH.

TRUTH.—1. In OT ('ēmeth, 'ēmānāh).—Firmness or stability is the fundamental idea of the root, and to this radical thought most of the uses of the Heb. nouns may be traced. Often they signify truth in the common meaning of the word, the correspondence, viz., between speech and fact (Dt 13¹⁴, Pr 12¹⁷). At first the standards of veracity were low (Gn 12¹⁸, 20¹¹, 26⁷, 27¹⁸, etc.); but truthfulness in witness-bearing is a commandment of the Decalogue (Ex 20¹⁶), and from the prophetic age onwards falsehood of every kind is recognized as a grave sin (Hos 4¹, Ps 50¹⁷, Pr 12¹⁸). See, further, LIE. Sometimes 'truth' denotes justice as administered by a ruler or a judge (Ex 18¹⁸, Pr 20³), and, in par ticular, by the Messianic King (Ps 45¹, Is 42⁹). Frequently it denotes faithfulness, especially the faithfulness of a man to God (2 K 20⁹) and of God to men (Gn 32¹⁰). When God is described as a 'God of truth,' His faithfulness to His promises may be especially in view (Ps 31¹). But not far away is the sense of 'living reality' in distinction from the 'lying vanities' in which those trust to whom Jahweh is unknown (v. 9; cf. Dt 32⁹). In some later canonical writings there appears a use of 'truth' or 'the truth' as equivalent to Divine revelation (Dn 8¹³ 9¹⁴), or as a synonym for the 'wisdom' in which the true philosophy of life consists (Pr 23²³). In the Apoc. books this use becomes frequent (1 Es 4²², Wis 3¹, Sir 4²³ etc.).

2. In NT (alētheia).—The Gr. word (which is employed in LXX to render both 'emeth and 'emānah) has the fundamental meaning of reality, as opposed to mere appearance or false pretence. From this the sense of veracity comes quite naturally; and veracity finds a high place among the NT virtues. The OT law forbade the bearing of false witness against one's neighbour; the law of Christ enjoins truth-speaking in all social intercourse (Eph 4²⁵), and further demands that this truth-speaking shall be animated by love (v. 15; cf. v. 25 'for we are members one of another').

Special attention must be paid to some distinctive employments of the word. (a) In the Pauline writings there is a constant use of 'the truth' to describe God's will as revealed—primarily to the reason and conscience of the natural man (Ro 1¹⁴, 20), but especially in the gospel of Jesus Christ (2 Co 4², Gal 3¹ etc.). 'The truth' thus becomes synonymous with 'the gospel' (Eph 1¹³; cf. Gal 2¹⁴ etc., where 'the truth of the gospel' evidently means the truth declared in the gospel). In the Pastoral Epistles the gospel as 'the truth' or 'the word of truth' appears to be passing into the sense of a settled body of Christian doctrine (1 Ti 3¹⁴, 2 Ti 2¹⁵ etc.). It is to be noted that, though the above usages are most characteristic of the Pauline cycle of writings, they are occasionally to be found elsewhere, e.g. He 10²², Ja 1¹⁸, 1 P 1²², 2 P 1¹².

(b) In the Johannine books (with the exception of Rev.) alētheia is a leading and significant term in a sense that is quite distinctive (cf. 'light' and 'life'). To Pilate's question, 'What is truth?' (Jn 18³⁸), Jesus gave no answer. But He had just declared that He came into the world to bear witness unto the truth (v. 37), and the Fourth Gospel might be described as an elaborate exposition of the nature of the truth as revealed by Jesus, and of the way in which He revealed it. In John 'the truth' stands for the absolute Divine reality as distinguished from all existence that is false or merely seeming (cf. 8⁴⁴), where Jesus contrasts His Father, from whom He had heard the truth, with 'your father the devil,' who 'stood not in the truth, because there is no truth in him'). Jesus came from the bosom of the Father (Jn 1¹⁸), and truth came by Him (v. 17) because as the Word of God He was full of it (v. 14). The truth is incarnated and personalized in Jesus, and so He is Himself the Truth (14⁶). The truth which resides in His own Person He imparts to His disciples (8³¹); and on His departure He bestows the Spirit of truth to abide with them and be in them for ever (14¹⁷). Hence the truth is in the Christian as the very groundwork and essence of his spiritual being (1 Jn 1², 2 Jn 1²). It is there both as a moral and as an intellectual quality—standing midway, as it were, between 'life' and 'light,' two other ruling Johannine ideas with which it is closely associated. Primarily it is a moral power. It makes Christ's disciples free (Jn 8³²)—free i.e., as the context shows, from the bondage of sin (vv. 33-36). It has a sanctifying force (Jn 17¹⁷⁻¹⁹); it ensures the keeping of the commandments (1 Jn 2⁹) and the life of Christian love (3¹⁸). And, while subjectively it is a moral influence, objectively it is a moral vocation—something not only to be known (Jn 8³²)

and believed (vv. 46-47), but requiring to be done (Jn 3²¹, 1 Jn 1⁹). From this moral quality of the truth, however, there springs a power of spiritual illumination. The truth that is life passes into the truth that is light (Jn 3²¹). Every one that is of the truth heareth Christ's voice (18³⁷); if any man willeth to do His will, he shall know of the doctrine (7¹⁷); the Spirit of truth, when He is come, shall guide the disciples into all the truth (16¹³).

TRYPHENA.—Greeted along with Tryphosa by St. Paul in Ro 16¹², and described by him as labouring in the Lord. They were probably sisters or near relations, 'for it was usual to designate members of the same family by derivatives of the same root.' The common root makes their names signify 'delicate,' 'luxurious'—a meaning which contrasts with their active Christian toll. Inscriptions in a cemetery used chiefly for the Emperor's servants, contain both names; if we identify them with these, then they would be among 'the saints of Cæsar's household' (Ph 4²²).

A Tryphæna plays a prominent part in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla.

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

TRYPHON.—An officer of Alexander Balas, who, after the death of the latter, took advantage of the unpopularity of Demetrius to put forward Antiochus, the son of Balas, as a claimant to the throne (1 Mac 11²³). His real aim, however, was to gain the crown for himself, and this he accomplished after he had murdered in succession Jonathan the Maccabee (12³⁹⁻⁴⁰) and Antiochus (13¹¹). His rapacity led Simon to appeal to Demetrius (13³⁴). The latter was organizing an expedition against Tryphon when he was himself made prisoner by Arsaces (14¹⁻³). In the end, Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius, attacked Tryphon, besieged him in Dor, and pursued him when he escaped thence to Orthesla (15¹⁰⁻¹⁴, 27-30). Tryphon was finally shut up in Apamea, where he committed suicide (Strabo, p. 668; Jos. Ant. xiii. vii. 2; App. Syr. 68).

TUBAL-CAIN.—In Gn 4²² 'the father of every forger of copper and iron' (so read, with slight textual correction), i.e. the founder of the guild or profession of metal-workers. The name seems to be made up of Tubal (or the Tibareni, noted for production of bronze articles (Ezk 27¹³)) and Cain ('smith'), as the ancestor of the Kenites or 'Smiths.' J. F. McCURDY.

He was the bearer of the circular letter to Asia which we call 'Ephesians' (Eph 6¹¹), and of Colossians (Col 4¹¹). In later years either he or Artemas was to have been sent to Crete, apparently to take Titus' place (Tit 3¹⁰); but he was sent to Ephesus, probably instead of to Crete (2 Ti 4¹¹).

TROAS.—A city of Mysia on the N.W. coast of Asia Minor. It was in the Roman province Asia. It was founded by Antigonos, and re-founded in b.c. 300 by Lysimachus, who named it Alexandria Troas. For a time under the Seleucid kings of Syria, it gained its freedom, and began to strike its own coins (examples exist from b.c. 164 to 65). Its freedom continued under Pergamenean and afterwards, from b.c. 133, under Roman rule. Augustus made it a Roman colony, and it became one of the greatest cities of N.W. Asia. The Roman preference was partly explained by their belief in the early connexion between Troy and their own capital. This place was a regular port of call on coasting voyages between Macedonia and Asia (cf. Ac 16⁸ 20⁶, 2 Co 2¹³). St. Paul, with Silas and Timothy, approached Troas from the Asian-Bithynian frontier near Dorylæum or Cotiæum (Ac 16⁸⁻⁹). He did not preach in Mysia on the first visit, though the Western text at Ac 16⁸ makes him do so.

A. SOUTER.
TROGYLLIUM.—According to the AV (Ac 20¹⁴), which here follows the Western text, St. Paul's ship, after touching at Samos, and before putting in at Miletus, 'tarried at Trogyllium.' This statement is no part of the NT text as now commonly read, but it is not impossible, and perhaps embodies a real tradition. Trogyllium is a promontory which projects from the mainland and overlaps the eastern extremity of Samos, so as to form a strait less than a mile wide. There is an anchorage near, still called 'St. Paul's Port.' A. SOUTER.

TROPHIMUS.—A Gentile Christian, a native of Ephesus (Ac 21²⁹), who, with Tychicus, also of the province Asia (20⁴), and others, accompanied St. Paul to Jerusalem. The Jews, seeing Trophimus with the Apostle in the city, hastily concluded that St. Paul had brought him into the inner court of the Temple, separated from the outer 'Court of the Gentiles' by a barrier on which were inscriptions in Greek and Latin forbidding any non-Jew to enter on pain of death. This occasioned the riot which led to St. Paul's arrest. Some years later Trophimus was left at Miletus sick (2 Ti 4¹⁰).

A. J. MACLEAN.
TROW.—'To throw' was originally 'to trust,' with which it is connected in origin; but it came to mean no more than 'think or suppose.' This is the meaning in Lk 17³, its only occurrence in AV.

TRUMPET.—See MUSIC, 4 (2) (e).

TRUMPETS, FEAST OF.—The 1st day of Tishri (October), the 7th month of the sacred year, was signaled by a 'memorial of blowing trumpets,' to call both God and the people to remembrance of their reciprocal positions. It was a day of holy convocation, on which no servile work might be done. The trumpets blown were probably of a different kind from those used at the ordinary new-moon festivals. At the Feast of Trumpets special offerings were made: a burnt-offering of a bullock, a ram, and 7 lambs, and a sin-offering of a kid of the goats; these in addition to the ordinary daily and monthly offerings (cf. Nu 29¹⁻⁴, Lv 23²⁴⁻²⁵). This was one of the lunar festivals of the Jewish calendar, and was the most important of the new-moon celebrations.

TRUST.—See FAITH.

TRUTH.—1. In OT ('emeth, 'emânâh).—Firmness or stability is the fundamental idea of the root, and to this radical thought most of the uses of the Heb. nouns may be traced. Often they signify truth in the common meaning of the word, the correspondence, viz., between speech and fact (Dt 13⁴, Pr 12¹⁷). At first the standards of veracity were low (Gn 12¹⁸, 20², 26⁷, 27¹⁰, etc.); but truthfulness in witness-bearing is a commandment of the Decalogue (Ex 20¹⁶), and from the prophetic age onwards falsehood of every kind is recognised as a grave sin (Hos 4¹, Ps 59¹, Pr 12²²). See, further, LIE. Sometimes 'truth' denotes justice as administered by a ruler or a judge (Ex 18¹, Pr 20¹⁶), and, in parhicular, by the Messianic King (Ps 45⁴, Is 42⁶). Frequently it denotes faithfulness, especially the faithfulness of a man to God (2 K 20²) and of God to men (Gn 32¹⁰). When God is described as a 'God of truth,' His faithfulness to His promises may be especially in view (Ps 31⁴). But not far away is the sense of 'living reality' in distinction from the 'lying vanities' in which those trust to whom Jahweh is unknown (v.⁴; cf. Dt 32⁴). In some later canonical writings there appears a use of 'truth' or 'the truth' as equivalent to Divine revelation (Dn 8¹² 9¹³), or as a synonym for the 'wisdom' in which the true philosophy of life consists (Pr 23²²). In the Apocr. books this use becomes frequent (1 Es 4¹², Wis 3², Sir 4¹² etc.).

2. In NT (alētheia).—The Gr. word (which is employed in LXX to render both ēmēth and ēmēnthh) has the fundamental meaning of reality, as opposed to mere appearance or false pretence. From this the sense of veracity comes quite naturally; and veracity finds a high place among the NT virtues. The OT law forbade the bearing of false witness against one's neighbour; the law of Christ enjoins truth-speaking in all social intercourse (Eph 4²⁵), and further demands that this truth-speaking shall be animated by love (v.¹⁵; cf. v.²⁵ 'for we are members one of another').

Special attention must be paid to some distinctive employments of the word. (a) In the Pauline writings there is a constant use of 'the truth' to describe God's will as revealed—primarily to the reason and conscience of the natural man (Ro 1¹⁸, 2¹⁸), but especially in the gospel of Jesus Christ (2 Co 4², Gal 3¹ etc.). 'The truth' thus becomes synonymous with 'the gospel' (Eph 1¹³; cf. Gal 2¹⁴, etc., where 'the truth of the gospel' evidently means the truth declared in the gospel). In the Pastoral Epistles the gospel as 'the truth' or 'the word of truth' appears to be passing into the sense of a settled body of Christian doctrine (1 Ti 3¹⁴, 2 Ti 2¹⁴ etc.). It is to be noted that, though the above usages are most characteristic of the Pauline cycle of writings, they are occasionally to be found elsewhere, e.g. He 10²⁵, Ja 1⁸, 1 P 1²², 2 P 1².

(b) In the Johannine books (with the exception of Rev.) alētheia is a leading and significant term in a sense that is quite distinctive (cf. 'light' and 'life'). To Pilate's question, 'What is truth?' (Jn 18³⁸), Jesus gave no answer. But He had just declared that He came into the world to bear witness unto the truth (v.²⁷), and the Fourth Gospel might be described as an elaborate exposition of the nature of the truth as revealed by Jesus, and of the way in which He revealed it. In John 'the truth' stands for the absolute Divine reality as distinguished from all existence that is false or merely seeming (cf. 8¹⁰), where Jesus contrasts His Father, from whom He had heard the truth, with 'your father the devil,' who 'stood not in the truth, because there is no truth in him'. Jesus came from the bosom of the Father (Jn 1¹⁴), and truth came by Him (v.¹⁷) because as the Word of God He was full of it (v.¹⁴). The truth is incarnated and personalized in Jesus, and so He is Himself the Truth (14⁶). The truth which resides in His own Person He imparts to His disciples (8¹⁷); and on His departure He bestows the Spirit of truth to abide with them and be in them for ever (14¹⁷). Hence the truth is in the Christian as the very groundwork and essence of his spiritual being (1 Jn 1⁸ 2¹, 2 Jn 1⁹). It is there both as a moral and as an intellectual quality—standing midway, as it were, between 'life' and 'light,' two other ruling Johannine ideas with which it is closely associated. Primarily it is a moral power. It makes Christ's disciples free (Jn 8³²)—free i.e., as the context shows, from the bondage of sin (vv.¹² 14¹). It has a sanctifying force (Jn 17¹⁷⁻¹⁹); it ensures the keeping of the commandments (1 Jn 2⁴) and the life of Christian love (3¹⁸). And, while subjectively it is a moral influence, objectively it is a moral vocation—something not only to be known (Jn 8³²) and believed (vv.⁴⁶), but requiring to be done (Jn 3²¹, 1 Jn 1⁹). From this moral quality of the truth, however, there springs a power of spiritual illumination. The truth that is life passes into the truth that is light (Jn 3²¹). Every one that is of the truth heareth Christ's voice (18³⁷); if any man willeth to do His will, he shall know of the doctrine (7¹⁷); the Spirit of truth, when He is come, shall guide the disciples into all the truth (16¹³).

TRYPHENA.—Greeted along with Tryphosa by St. Paul in Ro 16¹², and described by him as labouring in the Lord. They were probably sisters or near relations, 'for it was usual to designate members of the same family by derivatives of the same root.' The common root makes their names signify 'delicate,' 'luxurious'—a meaning which contrasts with their active Christian toil. Inscriptions in a cemetery used chiefly for the Emperor's servants, contain both names; if we identify them with these, then they would be among 'the saints of Caesar's household' (Ph 4²).

A Tryphēna plays a prominent part in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla.

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.

TRYPHON.—An officer of Alexander Balas, who, after the death of the latter, took advantage of the unpopularity of Demetrius to put forward Antiochus, the son of Balas, as a claimant to the throne (1 Mac 11³⁰). His real aim, however, was to gain the crown for himself, and this he accomplished after he had murdered in succession Jonathan the Maccabae (12³⁹⁻⁴⁰) and Antiochus (13¹¹). His rapacity led Simon to appeal to Demetrius (13³⁴). The latter was organizing an expedition against Tryphon when he was himself made prisoner by Arsaces (14¹⁻³). In the end, Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius, attacked Tryphon, besieged him in Dor, and pursued him when he escaped thence to Orthesia (15¹⁰⁻¹⁴, 27-33). Tryphon was finally shut up in Apamea, where he committed suicide (Strabo, p. 668; Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 2; App. Syr. 68).

TRYPHOSA.—See TRYPHENA.

TUBAL.—A country and people in Asia Minor mentioned only in association with Meshech (wh. see). J. F. McCURDY.

TUBAL-CAIN.—In Gn 4²² 'the father of every forger of copper and iron' (so read, with slight textual correction), i.e. the founder of the guild or profession of metal-workers. The name seems to be made up of Tubal (or the Tihareni, noted for production of bronze articles (Ezk 27¹³)) and Cain ('smith'), as the ancestor of the Kenites or 'Smiths.' J. F. McCURDY.

TYCHICUS.—A native of the province Asia, like Trophimus, and a companion of St. Paul on the journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20⁴). He was the bearer of the circular letter to Asia which we call 'Ephesians' (Eph 6²¹), and of Colossians (Col 4⁷). In later years either he or Artemas was to have been sent to Crete, apparently to take Titus' place (Tit 3¹); but he was sent to Ephesus, probably instead of to Crete (2 Ti 4¹).

A. J. MACLEAN.

TYRANNUS.—This man is mentioned only in Ac 10¹. St. Paul in Ephesus preached before the Jews and proselytes in the synagogue for three months. Findings them determinedly hostile, he resorted to the 'school of Tyrannus,' where he reasoned every day. The expression is somewhat enigmatical to us, as we have no other reference to this institution by which to illustrate it. The Greek word may be translated either 'school' or 'lecture room,' and Tyrannus may have been either a schoolmaster or what we call a professor. There is the further difficulty that Tyrannus may have been dead at the time, and that the building may have been merely known as 'Tyrannus's school,' in memory of a once famous teacher who taught there. All the probabilities are in favour of this having been the name of a noted public building in Ephesus. Permission to use this building was given to Paul; perhaps it was hired by him or his friends. All this may be inferred from what is the generally accepted text of the passage in the present day. The Western and other texts have touched up this simpler text, and changed the situation considerably. They have inserted the word 'a certain' before 'Tyrannus,' and this at once converts the public building into a private one. The person Tyrannus would then be unknown to the readers, and would be one not unfavourable to St. Paul, who lent him his own building with or without fee. The most notable MS of the Western text adds the words: 'from the fifth hour till the tenth.' This addition is all of a piece with the idea that Tyrannus was a schoolmaster or professor, whose work, according to the ancient custom, would be over early in the day, thus leaving the building free for the rest of the day. Juvenal describes to us how the boys read their lessons to the master even before dawn. Augustine, himself a professor, tells us that his lecturing work was over early in the day. The experience of moderns in southern countries confirms this: the early morning is the time for brain work in the South, as the young Julius Charles Hare and his brother found when resident as boys in Italy. The hall was free to Paul at the hottest period of the day, when it must have been hard for people to listen, and yet harder for him to preach. All this is conveyed by the reading of the chief representative of the Western text, but the present writer has no doubt that here, as elsewhere, the reviser has been endeavouring to remove obscurity from the narrative. Almost all the Western variants can be explained by a greater or less effort to smooth difficulties of various sorts. The shorter reading discussed in the earlier paragraph is the genuine one.

A. SOUTER.

TYRE (Tār—'rock,' Jos 19²⁹) was situated on the coast of Palestine about half-way between Carmel and Beirut. The narrow strip of land between the sea and the background of mountains was almost inaccessible owing to massive rocky promontories (the most famous being 'the Ladder of Tyre'), which barred the approach of invaders. The date of the foundation of Tyre is unknown. That given by Herodotus is b.c. 2740, by Josephus about b.c. 1217. Isaiah (23⁷) calls her 'the joyous city whose antiquity is of ancient days'; Strabo, 'the most ancient of all Phœnicia.' Her original inhabitants probably came from the Semitic homeland near the Persian Gulf. But Tyre was not 'the most ancient.' Isaiah (23^{1,12}) calls her 'daughter of Sidon' (cf. Gn 10¹⁹); Homer mentions 'Sidonian wares,' but ignores Tyre. Justin says Sidon suffered so severely at the hands of Ascalon that her trade passed to her daughter Tyre. The Tell el-Amarna letters (c. b.c. 1430) reveal Abi-milki, king of Tyre, sending appeals to his lord Amenhotep IV. for assistance against the swarms of Khabiri, who were ravaging the land, while the citizens were dying of want on the islets off the coast. At the conquest of Canaan, Joshua assigned the Tyrian territory to Asher, though it was perhaps never occupied (Jos 19²⁹, but cf. 2 S 24⁷).

For the next 430 years the city's history is a blank. It was Hiram, David's contemporary, who raised Tyre to fame. Old Tyre (Palætyrus), on the mainland, he strongly fortified, its walls being 15 miles in circumference. Hiram now built New Tyre by uniting the scattered islands, half a mile out to sea, till they enclosed an area 2½ miles in circumference. At the N. end, two stone piers, about 100 ft. apart, extended E. and W. for 700 ft. These with the shore line embraced an area (the 'Zidon Harbour') of 70,000 sq. yds. At the S. end a similar harbour (the 'Egyptian'), 80,000 sq. yds. in area, was enclosed by a vast pier 200 yds. long, and a breakwater 35 ft. wide and nearly 2 miles in length. The two harbours were united by a canal across the island. The city rose up in tiers of houses, gardens, orchards, and vineyards, and was embellished by a new and splendid temple of Melkarth, a royal palace, and a great piazza (the 'Eurychorus') for national assemblies. The city's wealth was furnished largely from the trade in purple dye, the secret of the extraction of which from two species of murex the Tyrians possessed. The gradual failure of the supply of these shellfish on their own shores led the citizens to become great explorers. Every island and coastline were searched for these precious molluscs. Trade naturally followed. They trafficked up the Nile as far as Memphis; worked copper mines in Cyprus and Crete (cf. Phenice, Ac 27¹²); erected stations on the Bosphorus, the Euxine, and the Crimea; established colonies on the N. African shores, Malta, Sicily, Sardinia, Marseilles, etc., and exploited the gold, silver, lead, and other mines of Spain for their emporium Tartessus (prob. the Tarshish of Gn 10⁴, Ps 72⁹, Is 66¹⁹). Even the Atlantic was braved, and they worked the tin deposits of Cornwall, and had depôts in the Scilly Isles and the Isle of Wight. Hiram co-operated with David in the erection of the latter's palace in Jerusalem, sending cedars from Lebanon (1 Ch 14¹). Under Solomon, Tyrian artisans built the Temple on Phœnician models (2 Ch 2). Hiram and Solomon had joint maritime adventures, Jewish ships with Tyrian seamen trading to Ophir every three years (1 K 9²⁶ 10²²). 'Hiram's Tomb,' a massive limestone sarcophagus, is still shown on the shore 6 miles S. of Tyre.

The years following Hiram's death were very troubled, changes of dynasty occurring through repeated assassinations. At length Eth-baal, by the murder of his brother, seized the throne, and married his daughter Jezebel to Ahab (1 K 16³¹). Some time after the death of Eth-baal a domestic rebellion led to the emigration of the Tyrian princess Elissa, who is said to have fled from Tyre with her murdered husband's riches and to have founded Carthage, thereby winning fame for herself as the Dido of Virgil's Æneid. About b.c. 880 Assyria began to interfere with Western politics. Tyre purchased her liberty from Assur-nazir-pal by a heavy indemnity. In b.c. 726 Shalmaneser IV. came against the city, but, having no ships, could not reach the island fortress till he had bribed Sidon to furnish 60 vessels. These the Tyrians, with only 12 ships, easily routed. Shalmaneser retired, leaving a garrison in Old Tyre, which kept up a fruitless blockade for five years. At the next attack, under Sennacherib, Eluleus, the king, fled in despair to Cyprus, the Assyrians appointing a tributary king, Tubaal, in his stead (b.c. 705). Under Esarhaddon, Tyre rebelled. The Assyrians held the shore, and captured Sidon, but Tyre again escaped. In b.c. 664 it submitted to Ashurbanipal on honourable terms. On the decline of Nineveh, Tyre again proclaimed her independence (b.c. 630), and after Nineveh fell (b.c. 606) she reached the zenith of her glory. Ezekiel (27–28) gives a marvelously vivid picture of the island city at this period, yet prophesies her fall on account of her colossal sins.

In the early unsettled days of the New Babylonian Empire the Tyrians entered into a league with Pharaoh-necho of Egypt. They were invited to make a canal from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, and even to circumnavigate Africa. The latter feat they accomplished in three years, the voyagers sailing down the E. coast, and reaching the Pillars of Hercules after a feat of unheard-of daring. Nebuchadnezzar II. attacked Tyre, and besieged it for 13 years. Old Tyre was destroyed

(Ezk 26¹⁻¹³), but the Babylonian army in vain wearied itself in trying to subdue the island (29¹⁸). It is probable that the city finally capitulated on favourable terms. The long siege, however, had ruined her commerce, and for 50 years Tyre was a poverty-stricken town. An attempt at a republic did not improve her fortunes. She was involved in the struggle between Nebuchadnezzar II. and Pharaoh-hophra (Jer 44³⁰), was for a time under Egypt, but finally fell to Babylon, and remained a dependency until the overthrow of the Babylonian Empire. Her humbled state did not change her people's temper. Their pride (Ezk 28²), their contempt for the rights of man (Am 1⁹), their slave-trading propensities (Jl 3¹⁻⁶) are denounced by the Hebrew prophets. In B.C. 538 Cyrus II., the founder of the Persian Empire, ordered Tyrian workmen to assist with Lebanon cedars in the re-building of the Jewish Temple (Ezk 3⁷). Cambyses II. engaged the Tyrians to supply a fleet for his invasion of Egypt. On his proposing to send them to subdue Carthage they refused, on the score of their blood relationship with the daughter colony of Tyre. Under Artaxerxes Longimanus (B.C. 430) we read of Tyrian fish-merchants at the gates of Jerusalem (Neh 13¹⁶). In the Persian-Greek wars Tyrian fleets fought on the Persian side, till, after the Peace of Antalkidas (B.C. 387), Tyre transferred her allegiance to Persia's enemies. Artaxerxes III. (Ochus) took fearful vengeance. Sidon disappeared in flame and torrents of blood. Tyre in horror opened her gates, and was spared. In B.C. 332 Alexander the Great appeared in front of the city. The Tyrians declined to allow him to sacrifice personally to Melkarth in their fortress. The memorable siege began. Alexander built a mole 200 ft. wide out towards the island. It was repeatedly destroyed. The defence was desperate and successful, till Alexander invested the city with a fleet of 224 ships. Tyre was stormed, 8000 of her inhabitants massacred, 2000 crucified on the shore, and 30,000 sold into slavery. Tyre ceased to be an island, and henceforth was permanently joined to the mainland. Only a blunt headland to-day suggests the existence of the former island fortress. The mole is now $\frac{1}{2}$ mile broad.

Tyre was again re-peopled. She figured in the wars of the Ptolemys and Seleucidæ. In B.C. 314 Antigonus besieged her for 15 months. After 70 years' subjection to Egypt she was under Antioch till B.C. 65, when the Romans made her a free city. Some of her citizens came to hear the preaching of Jesus (Mk 3⁸). Christ visited the neighbourhood (Mk 7²¹⁻²³), and got a favourable reception (Lk 10¹³). Tyre figured in connexion with St. Paul in Apostolic times (Ac 12²⁰ 21³⁻⁷). Was the Church in Tyre not a fulfilment of Ps 87¹? A Christian church was built on the site of the Melkarth temple. Origen found refuge in Tyre, and died there. Jerome (4th cent.) speaks of it as the 'most noble and beautiful city of Phœnicia.' Captured by the Saracens (A.D. 638), it was recovered (A.D. 1124), and William of Tyre celebrates its fame under the Crusaders. Here was buried Frederick Barbarossa. Saladin was repelled in 1187, but the spot was abandoned in 1291, and the Moslems took possession of it. Tyre has since sunk to a miserable stagnant village, where the waves mournfully crash amid the ruins of her former magnificence.

G. A. FRANK KNIGHT.

TZADE.—The eighteenth letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 18th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

U

UCAL.—See ITHIEL, 2.

UEL.—One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10³⁴); called in 1 Es 9³⁴ Juel.

UKNAZ.—In 1 Ch 4¹³ Avim gives 'Uknaz' instead of 'even Kenaz' (AV) or 'and Kenaz' (RV). In all probability something has dropped out of the text, which had read originally 'the sons of Elah: . . . and Kenaz.' This is favoured by the plural 'sons.'

ULAI.—A large river of Elam, emptying into the Persian Gulf. According to Dn 8²⁻¹⁸ and the Assyrian inscriptions, it flowed past the city of Shushan (Susa). It is the modern Karūn, which, however, does not now flow close to the site of Susa, but to the east of it. Cf. also HYDASPES. J. F. MCCURDY.

ULAM.—1. A Manassite family (1 Ch 7¹⁶⁻¹⁷). 2. A Benjaminite family, specially noted as archers (1 Ch 8³⁹⁻⁴⁰; cf. also 2 Ch 14⁷⁻⁹).

ULLA.—An Asherite family (1 Ch 7³⁹).

UMMAH.—An Asherite city (Jos 19³⁰), probably a slip, owing to resemblance of Heb. letters m and k, for Acco (Ptolemais).

UNCHASTITY.—See MARRIAGE, 7. 8.

UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS.—See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

UNCTION.—The same Gr. word as that translated 'anointing' in 1 Jn 2²⁷ is in 2²⁰ rendered 'unction' (RV 'anointing'). It is used there metaphorically of the effect of the presence of the Holy Spirit upon the believer.

UNDERGIRDING.—See HELPS; SHIPS, etc., p. 850^b.

UNDERSSETTER.—Only 1 K 7³⁰⁻³¹, in the difficult description of Solomon's lavers (TEMPLE, § 6 (d)). In older English it meant 'support'; the Heb. word is lit. 'shoulders,' and denotes something of the nature of a strut or brace. See the ref. in the above mentioned article. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

UNICORN (re'em, Nu 23²² etc.; re'em, Job 39¹; RV in all passages 'wild ox').—This is undoubtedly the rimu of the Assyrians, often figured on their sculptures. A fine bas-relief of this animal was uncovered recently by the excavations of Nineveh. It is probably identical with the aurochs or Bos primigenius, the urus of Julius Caesar. It was of great size and strength (Nu 23²² 24⁸, Ps 22²¹), very wild and ferocious (Job 39¹⁻¹²), and specially dangerous when hunted, because of its powerful double horns (Ps 92¹⁰, Dt 33¹⁷). In connexion with Is 34⁷ it is interesting to note the inscription of Shalmaneser II., who says, 'His land I trod down like a rimu.' The Arab. re'em, the graceful Antelope leucorhæ of Arabia, is a very different animal. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

UNKNOWN GOD.—St. Paul, wandering along the streets of Athens, saw an altar bearing the dedication, 'To an Unknown God' (Ac 17²³). He used this as the text of his sermon before the Areopagus. There is evidence in other ancient writers in favour of the existence of such a dedication, and the conjecture may be permitted that the altar was erected as a thank-offering for life preserved in some foreign country, the name of the proper divinity of which—a very important thing in Greek ritual—was unknown to the person preserved. A. SOUTER.

UNLEAVENED BREAD.—See BREAD, LEAVEN, PASSOVER.

UNNI.—1. A Levitical family (1 Ch 15¹⁴). 2. See UNNO.

UNNO (so Kethibh, followed by RV; Kerē Unni [so AV, cf. 1 Ch 15^{18, 20}]).—A family of Levites that returned with Zerub. (Neh 12⁹).

UNTOWARD.—'Untoward' is 'not toward,' i.e. not well disposed. It occurs in Ac 2⁴⁰ 'this untoward generation.' Cf. 'untoward to all good . . . forward to evil'—Judgement of the Synode at Dort, p. 32. The subst. 'untowardness' occurs in the heading of Is 28, Hos 6. The word is still occasionally used, but in the more modern sense of 'unfortunate'—as 'an untoward accident.'

UNWRITTEN SAYINGS.—The name Agrapha or 'Unwritten Sayings,' is applied to sayings ascribed to Jesus which are not found in the true text of the canonical Gospels. That some genuine sayings of the Lord not recorded by the Evangelists should linger in the oral tradition of the early Church is only what we should expect, but of the extant Agrapha it is only a small number that meet the tests of textual criticism, or satisfy the requirements of moral probability. It is significant of the value of the canonical Gospels as historical records that outside of them there are so few 'sayings of Jesus' that could possibly be accepted as conveying a veritable tradition of His actual words. The Unwritten Sayings may be classified as follows:—

1. Those in the NT.—Two varieties meet us here. (a) Those which are found in some MSS of the Gospels, but whose authenticity textual criticism renders doubtful. Among the most important of these are Mt 6¹³ 17²⁴, Mk 9^{49b}, Lk 9⁵⁵. 23³⁴, which all find a place in TR and are reproduced in AV, while RV removes all of them except the last to the margin. To this list must be added the sayings of Jesus in Mk 16¹¹⁻¹³ and Jn 8⁷. 11, the conclusion of Mk. (16⁷⁻²⁰) and the Pericope Adulteræ in Jn. (7⁵³⁻⁸¹) being regarded by critical scholars as additions to the original texts, which may at the same time embody authentic traditions. Between Lk 6⁴ and 4 Cod. D gives the striking saying:

'On the same day he saw one working on the Sabbath, and said to him, Man, if thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art accused and a transgressor of the law.'

(b) Those outside of the Gospels.—The most notable is Ac 20⁹, but to this may be added Ac 1⁶ (cf. 11¹⁶) and the last part of 1 Co 11²² ('This do, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me'). In the opinion of some commentators, Ja 1¹² 'the crown of life which the Lord promised to them that love him,' is 'a semi-quotation of some saying of Christ's.'

2. In Apocryphal Gospels.—See these fully given in art. GOSPELS [APOCRYPHAL], III. 1. 2.

3. In the Fathers and other early Church writers (cf. p. 443).—Only a few examples of these can be set down:

Clem. Alex., Strom. vi. 5: 'Wherefore Peter says that the Lord said to the apostles, If then any one of Israel wishes to repent and believe on God through my name, his sins shall be forgiven him. After twelve years go forth into the world, lest any one say, We did not hear.'

Origen, in Jer. xx. 3: 'But the Saviour himself saith, He who is near me is near the fire; he who is far from me is far from the kingdom.'

Origen, in Joh. xix., speaks of 'the commandment of Jesus which saith, Prove yourselves trustworthy money-changers.'

Tertullian, de Bapt. xx., commenting on the words 'Watch and pray,' addressed to St. Peter in Gethsemane, adds: 'For the saying had also preceded, that no one untempted should attain to the heavenly kingdoms.'

4. In Mohammedan writers.—A large number of Agrapha, collected by Professor D. S. Margoliouth from el-Ghazzali's Revival of the Religious Sciences and other sources, were published by him in a series of papers in ExpT v. (1893-94) (cf. Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 350, DCG II. 882). Though interesting and sometimes striking, these have no claim to represent original traditions, but are frequently traceable to Gospels canonical or apocryphal. The following are among the best specimens:

'Jesus one day walked with his apostles, and they passed by the carcase of a dog. The apostles said, How foul is the smell of this dog! But Jesus said, How white are its teeth!'

'Jesus said, Take not the world for your lord, lest it take you for its slaves.'

'Jesus said, Whoso knows and does and teaches, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.'

5. In the Oxyrhynchus papyri.—Special interest attaches to the 'Sayings of Jesus' unearthed at Oxyrhynchus by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt, all the more as they open a prospect of further discoveries of a like kind. The first series of these, published in 1897, contained some sayings that have Gospel parallels, but the following strike a note of their own:

'Jesus saith, Except ye fast to the world, ye shall in no wise find the kingdom of God; and except ye make the sabbath a real sabbath, ye shall not see the Father.'

'Jesus saith, I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them, and my soul grieveth over the sons of men, because they are blind in their heart and see not.'

'Jesus saith, Wherever there are two, they are not without God; and wherever there is one alone, I say, I am with him. Raise the stone and there thou shalt find me; cleave the wood and there am I.'

More recently the same scholars discovered another papyrus with additional 'Sayings' of Jesus. In this case, unfortunately, the leaf was in a mutilated condition, and both re-construction and interpretation are difficult. A good account of this second series of 'Sayings' with the Gr. text as restored by Grenfell and Hunt themselves, will be found in an article by Professor Swete in ExpT xv. [1903-04] p. 488, with which cf. his art. on the 1897 Oxyrhynchus fragment in ExpT viii. [1896-97] p. 544. Here again some of the 'Sayings' have Gospel parallels, while others bear a more original character. From the two most important the following extracts (based on a text that is partly conjectural) may be given:

'Jesus saith . . . If ye shall truly know yourselves, ye are the sons and daughters of the Father Almighty, and ye shall know yourselves to be in the city of God, and ye are the city.'

'Jesus saith . . . Do nothing save the things that belong to the truth, for if ye do these, ye shall know a hidden mystery.'

Of the value of the Oxyrhynchus 'Sayings' very different estimates have been formed. But it is pretty generally agreed that, in their present shape at all events, they were not uttered by Jesus, and do not belong to the first Christian age. J. C. LAMBERT.

UPHARSIN.—See MENE MENE TEKEL UPHARSIN.

UPHAZ.—A supposed country or region mentioned in Jer 10⁹, Dn 10⁴, as a source of gold. Probably the word is miswritten for Ophir (wh. see).

UPPER ROOM.—See HOUSE, 5.

UR.—Father of one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11¹⁸).

UR OF THE CHALDEES, whence Abraham set out upon his journey to Canaan (Gn 11²⁸⁻³¹ 15⁷, Neh 9⁷), is usually identified with the well-known city of Uru in southern Babylonia, the site of which is marked by the mounds of Muqayyar. This city was in existence in the earliest period of Babylonian history, and was the seat of a dynasty of early kings before the foundation of the Bab. monarchy; it was always the centre of the worship of the moon-god in Southern Babylonia.

The identification has not been universally accepted, since from the narrative in Gn 11 it would appear that Haran was passed on the journey from Ur of the Chaldees to Canaan; hence, too, the traditional identification of the place with Urfa, the Gr. Edessa. The difficulty may perhaps be explained by the supposition that the narrative incorporates variant traditions with regard to Abraham's origin; the fact that Uru and Harran were both of them centres of moon-worship is possibly significant. L. W. KING.

URBANUS.—A Christian greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16⁹. The name is common among slaves, and is found in inscriptions of the Imperial household.

URI.—1. The father of Bezalel (Ex 31² 35²⁰ 38²², 1 Ch 2²⁰, 2 Ch 1⁵). 2. Father of Geber (1 K 4¹⁹). 3. A porter (Ezr 10²¹).

URIAH, or URIJAH (in AV 1 below appears as Uriah [Mt 1⁹ Urias], 2 as Uriah in Is 8² and Urijah in 2 K 16¹⁰⁻¹⁶, and 4 as Uriah in Ezr 8²³ and Urijah in Neh 3⁴ 21; while Urijah only is found in the case of 3 and 5. In RV Uriah is found only in 2 K 16¹⁰⁻¹⁶, Uriah elsewhere).—1. One of David's 30 heroes, the husband of Bathsheba. He was a Hittite, but, as the name indicates, doubtless a worshipper of Jahweh (2 S 11 12⁹ 10. 15, 1 K 15¹⁹, Mt 1⁹). After David's ineffectual attempt to use him as a shield for his own sin, he was killed in battle in accordance with the instructions of David to Joab. 2. High priest in the reign of Ahaz; called a 'faithful witness' in Is 8², but subservient to the innovations of Ahaz in 2 K 16¹⁰⁻¹⁶. The omission of the name in 1 Ch 6⁴⁻¹⁵ may be due to textual corruption, since it appears in Jos. Ant. x. viii. 6, which is based on Chronicles. 3. A prophet, son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim. His denunciations against Judah and Jerusalem in the style of Jeremiah aroused the wrath of king Jehoiakim. Uriah fled to Egypt, was seized and slain by order of Jehoiakim, and was buried in the common graveyard (Jer 26²⁰⁻²²). 4. A priest (Neh 3⁴ 21), son (representative) of Hakkoz, doubtless one of the courses of the priests (1 Ch 24¹⁰). He was father (or ancestor) of Meremoth, an eminent priest (Ezr 8²³ [1 Es 8⁶² Urias]). 5. A man who stood on the right hand of Ezra when he read the Law (Neh 8⁴ [1 Es 9⁴³ Urias]). GEORGE R. BERRY.

URIAS.—1. 1 Es 8⁶² = Ezr 8²³ Uriah; perhaps identical with—2. 1 Es 9⁴³ = Neh 8⁴ Uriah.

URIEL ('flame of God' or 'my light is God').—1. Mentioned in genealogies: (a) 1 Ch 6²⁴ 15¹¹. (b) 2 Ch 13². 2. The angel who rebukes the presumption of Esdras in questioning the ways of God (2 Es 4¹ 52¹⁰⁷ 102²⁸), and converses with him at length. In 4³⁶ RV reads 'Jeremiel.' In Enoch 9¹ Uriel, or Urjan, is one of the four archangels, but in 40⁹ and 71 his place is taken by Phanuel. In 19¹ 20² he is one of the 'watchers,' 'the angel over the world and Tartarus'; and in 21. 27 he explains the fate of the fallen angels (cf. Sib. Orac., where he brings them to judgment). In 72 ff. Uriel, 'whom the eternal Lord of glory sets over all the luminaries of heaven,' shows Enoch the celestial phenomena; in 33⁴ he writes them down. In the lost 'Prayer of Joseph' he is the angel with whom Jacob wrestled, the eighth in rank from God, Jacob being the first.

C. W. EMMET.

URIM AND THUMMIM.—These denote the two essential parts of the sacred oracle by which in early times the Hebrews sought to ascertain the will of God. Our OT Revisers give as their meaning 'the Lights and the Perfections' (Ex 28³⁰ RVm). This rendering—or rather, taking the words as abstract plurals, 'Light and Perfection'—seems to reflect the views of the late Jewish scholars to whom we owe the present vocalization of the OT text; but the oldest reference to the sacred lot suggests that the words express two sharply contrasted ideas. Hence if Thummim, as most believe, denotes 'innocence,' Urim should denote 'guilt'—a sense which some would give it by connecting it with the verb meaning 'to curse.' Winckler and his followers, on the other hand, start from 'light' as the meaning of Urim, and interpret Thummim as 'darkness' (the completion of the sun's course). 'Urim and Thummim are life and death, yes and no, light and darkness' (A. Jeremias, *Das AT im Lichte d. alt. Orients*², 450; cf. Benzinger, *Heb. Arch.*² 459 f.). There is thus a wide divergence among scholars as to the original significance of the words.

As to the precise nature of these mysterious objects there also exists a considerable, though less marked, divergence of opinion, notwithstanding the numerous recent investigations by British, American, and Continental scholars, of which the two latest are those by Kautzsch in Hauck's PRE³ xx. 328–336 [1907], with literature to date, and M'Neile, The Book of Exodus [1908], 181–184. The most instructive, as it is historically the oldest, passage dealing with Urim and Thummim is 1 S 14⁴¹, as preserved in the fuller Greek text. The latter runs thus: 'And Saul said, O J^o God of Israel, why hast thou not answered thy servant this day? If the iniquity be in me or in my son Jonathan, J^o God of Israel, give Urim; but if thou sayest thus, The iniquity is in thy people Israel, give Thummim. And Saul and Jonathan were taken, but the people escaped,' etc. Now, if this passage be compared with several others in the older narratives of Samuel, e.g. 1 S 23²⁻⁴ 30⁷ 8, 2 S 21, where mention is made of 'enquiring of the LORD' by means of the sacred lot associated with the ephod, the following points emerge: (1) There is good reason, as most scholars admit, for believing that the Urim and Thummim were two lots closely connected in some way, no longer intelligible, with the equally mysterious ephod. (2) As the lots were only two in number, only one question could be put at a time, capable of being answered by a simple 'yes' or 'no,' according to the lot which 'came out.' (3) When, as was the case in 1 S 14, the situation was more complicated, it was necessary to agree beforehand as to the significance to be attached to the two lots.

As to the material, shape, etc., of the two lots and the precise method of their manipulation, we are left to conjecture. It seems, on the whole, the most probable view that they were two small stones, either in the shape of dice or in tablet form, perhaps also of different colours. Others, including Kautzsch (op. cit.), favour the view that they were arrows, on the analogy of a well-known Babylonian and Arabian method of divination (cf. Ezk 21²). In addition to the two alternatives above considered, it may be inferred from 1 S 23⁸ that neither lot might be cast. Were they contained within the hollow ephod-image, which was provided with a narrow aperture, so that it was possible to shake the image and yet neither lot 'come out'? (The lot is technically said 'to fall or come out,' the latter Jos 16¹ RV, 19¹, etc.) The early narratives above cited show that the manipulation of the sacred lot was a special prerogative of the priests, as is expressly stated in Dt 33⁸ (cf. LXX), where the Divine Urim and Thummim are assigned to the priestly tribe of Levi, and confirmed by Ezr 2³⁵ = Neh 7⁶⁴.

In the Priests' Code the Urim and Thummim are introduced in Ex 28³⁰, Lv 8⁸, Nu 27¹, but without the slightest clue as to their nature beyond the inference as to their small size, to be drawn from the fact that they were to be inserted in the high priest's 'breastplate of judgment' (see BREASTPLATE). But this is merely an attempt on the part of the Priestly writer to divest these 'old-world mysteries' of their association with ideas of divination now outgrown, and, moreover, forbidden by the Law. It is, besides, doubtful if P was acquainted, any more than ourselves, with the Urim and Thummim of the Books of Samuel, for the passage above cited from Ezr–Neh. shows that they were unknown in the post-exilic period. In specially placing them within 'the breastplate of judgment,' it is not impossible that P was influenced by the analogy of the Babylonian 'tablets of destiny' worn by Marduk on his breast, but the further position that these 'and the Urim and Thummim were originally one and the same' (Muss-Arnolt, Urim and Thummim, 213 and passim), as has been recently maintained, has yet to be proved. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

USURY, INTEREST, INCREASE.—At the date of our AV 'usury' had not acquired its modern connotation of exorbitant interest; hence it should be replaced in OT by 'interest,' as in Amer. RV, and as the English Revisers have done in NT (see below). The OT law-codes forbid the taking of interest on loans by one Hebrew from another, see Ex 22²⁵ (Book of the Covenant), Dt 23¹⁹, Lv 25³⁵⁻³⁸ (Law of Holiness). Of the two terms constantly associated and in EV rendered 'usury' (neshek) and 'increase' (tarbitk), the former, to judge from Lv 25³⁷, denotes interest on loans of money, the latter interest on other advances, such as food stuffs, seed-corn, and the like, which was paid in kind. In Dt 23²⁰ neshek is applied to both kinds of loan. For the distinction in NT times, see Mishna, Baba mezia, v. 1. Cf. also Strack's art. 'Wucher' in PRE³ xxi. A large part of the Babylonian loan-system, which was fully developed before B.C. 2000, consisted of such loans (Johns, Bab. and Assy. Laws, ch. xxiii. 'Loans and Deposits').

To appreciate the motives of the Hebrew legislators, it must be remembered that, until a late period in their history, the Hebrews were almost entirely devoted to agricultural and pastoral pursuits. The loans here contemplated are therefore not advances required for trading capital, but for the relief of a poor 'brother' temporarily in distress, who would otherwise be compelled to sell himself as a slave (Lv 25³⁷). We have to do with an act of charity, not with a commercial transaction. In similar circumstances loans without interest were made from the Babylonian temple funds and by private individuals, as is still done by the Arabs to-day (Doughty, Arabia Deserta, i. 318).

In NT times conditions had greatly changed, and capital was required for many trading concerns. Our Lord twice introduces with approbation the investment of money with 'the bankers,' so as to yield a proper 'interest' (Mt 25¹⁷, Lk 19¹³ both RV). The rate of interest in the ancient world was very high. In Babylonia one shekel per mina per month, which is 20 per cent. per annum, was a usual rate; for advances of grain, for 400 or 300 ka the return was 100 ka, i.e. 25 to 33 per cent. per annum (Meissner, Aus d. albab. Recht, 15). For short loans for 15 days or thereby the rate might rise as high as 300 per cent. per annum! (Johns, op. cit.). In Egypt 30 per cent. was not unusual. Even in Greece 12 per cent. was considered a low rate of interest. The recently discovered papyri from Elephantine in Egypt show members of the Jewish colony there already engaged (c. B.C. 430) in the characteristically Jewish business of money-lending. See also DEBT.

UTA (1 Es 5³⁰).—His sons returned among the Temple servants under Zerub. (Ezr. and Neh. omit).

UTHAI.—1. A family of Judah after the Captivity (1 Ch 9⁴)=Neh 11⁴ Athaiah. 2. One of the sons of Bigvai (Ezr 8¹⁴)=1 Es 8⁴⁰ Uthi.

UTHI (1 Es 8⁴⁰)=Ezr 8¹⁴ Uthai.

UZ.—1. A son of Aram, grandson of Shem (Gn 10²⁸ and 1 Ch 1¹⁷ [in emended text]). 2. A son of Nahor (Gn 22²¹, AV Huz), whose descendants are placed in Aram-naharaim (Gn 24¹⁰). 3. One of the Horites in the land of Edom (Gn 36²⁸ [v. 21 and v. 30], 1 Ch 1⁴²). 4. A region which is called the dwelling-place of the daughter of Edom (La 4²¹). 5. A district containing a number of kings, situated between Philistia and Egypt, or, with a different pointing of the consonants of one word, between Philistia and the country of the Bedouin (Jer 25²⁰; the name not in LXX). 6. Job's country (Job 1¹). As the first three are probably tribal designations, all may be regarded as geographical terms. It is not certain that they all refer to the same region. Nos. 1 and 2 seem to point to Mesopotamia. Nos. 3 and 4, and perhaps 5, indicate Edom or its neighbourhood. The locality of No. 6 is obscure. Ancient tradition is threefold. In LXX of Job 42¹⁹ Uz is affirmed, on the authority of 'the Syrian book,' to lie on the borders of Idumaea and Arabia. In v. 22 it is located on the borders of the Euphrates. Josephus (Ant. i. vi. 4) associates the Uz of No. 1 with Damascus and Trachonitis. The evidence of the Book of Job itself about its hero's home seems to favour the neighbourhood of Edom or N. Arabia. Teman (2¹¹) was an Edomite district containing the city of Bozrah (Am 1¹²), and Eliphaz was an Edomite name (Gn 36⁴). The Sabaeans (Job 1¹⁸ 6¹⁹) were a S. Arabian people who had settlements in the north. Tema (6¹⁹) lay in N. Arabia, about 250 miles S.E. of Edom. The description of Job, however, as one of 'the children of the East' (1¹) is most naturally understood to refer to the east of Palestine. The cuneiform inscriptions have a name Uzai, which has been identified with Uz, but the identification is extremely uncertain.

Modern tradition, which can be traced back to early Christian times, locates Job in the Hauran, where the German explorer J. G. Wetzstein found a monastery of Job, a tomb and fountain and stone of Job, and small round stones called 'worms of Job.' Another German explorer, Glaser, finds Uz in W. Arabia, at a considerable distance to the N.W. of Medina. Decision at present is unattainable, both on the general question of the signification of Uz in OT and on the special question of its meaning in the Book of Job. All that can be said is that the name points to the E. and S.E. of Palestine, and that the Book of Job appears to represent its hero as living in the neighbourhood of the Arabian or Syro-Arabian desert.

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

UZAI.—Father of Palai (Neh 3²⁴).

UZAL.—1. A son of Joktan (Gn 10²⁷, 1 Ch 1²¹). 2. A place named in Ezk 27¹⁹ (RVm 'from Uzal', AVm 'Meuzal')—a difficult passage, the text being in disorder. Davidson (Ezekiel, in loc.) suggests that, although the most serious objections occur to the rendering, it might read, 'Vedan and Javan of Uzal furnished their wares, etc.' Uzal is thought to be the ancient name of San'a, the capital of el-Yemen. The name San'a may have been given by the Abyssinians, in whose tongue it means 'fortress.' The modern Jewish inhabitants, who occupy a separate quarter, are reported to have come from India. But although none of the pre-Islamic Jewish stock remains, they were influential in the century before Mohammed (Harris, el-Yemen, 313). Probably the name Azal or Izal, by which the town was then known, may have been due to their revival of the ancient name (Glaser, Skizze, ii. 427). In Arabic azal means 'eternity.' This may account for the Arabs' belief that it is the world's oldest city (Margoliouth in Hastings' DB, s.v.). Iron is found in several districts of Central Arabia (Doughty, Arabia Deserta). The steel made in San'a is still highly esteemed, especially the sword- and dagger-blades (Harris, op. cit. 310 ff.).

Standing on the floor of a spacious valley, 7250 feet above the level of the sea, San'a is dominated by a fortress on Jebel Nufam, which rises abruptly to the east. The height renders the climate delightful. The gardens and orchards are luxurious and fruitful. A river bed lies through the city, and in the rainy season is full of water. In the dry months water is supplied by deep wells. The splendid palace of Ghumdan, and the adjoining temple dedicated to Zahrah, the Arabian Venus, were destroyed by Othman, the third Caliph. The same fate befell the famous Christian church built by Abrahah el-Ashran, viceroy of el-Yemen under the Abyssinian king Aryat, for the building of which the Emperor of Rome is said to have sent marble and workmen (Harris, op. cit. 291-322). According to Ibn Khaldun, San'a was the seat of the Himyarite kings for centuries before Islam.

W. EWING.

UZZA.—1. A Benjamite family (1 Ch 8⁷). 2. A family of Nethinim (Ezr 2⁴⁹—Neh 7³¹ [1 Es 5³¹ Ozias]). 3. The driver of the cart on which the ark was removed from Kirjath-jearim (2 S 6³. 8. 7. 8 [in vv. 8-8 the name is Uzzah])—1 Ch 13⁷. 9. 10. 11). Uzza's sudden death at a place called; in commemoration of this untoward incident, Perez-uzzah ('breach of Uzzah'), led to the temporary abandonment of David's project of transporting the ark to Jerusalem. Uzza's death was attributed by the popular mind to anger on the part of Jahweh at his having presumed to handle the sacred emblem too familiarly. 4. A 'garden of Uzza' (2 K 21¹⁴. 20) was attached to the palace of Manasseh.

UZZAH.—1. A Merarite family (1 Ch 6²⁴ (14)). 2. See UZZA, 3.

UZZEN-SHEERAH.—See SHEERAH.

UZZI.—1. A descendant of Aaron (1 Ch 6⁵. 6. 81, Ezr 7⁴ [1 Es 8² Savias]). 2. A family of Issachar (1 Ch 7². 2). 3. A Benjamite family (1 Ch 7⁷ 9⁸). 4. A Levite (Neh 11²³). 5. A priestly family (Neh 12¹⁸. 4).

UZZIA.—One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11⁴).

UZZIAH.—1. A king of Judah. See next article. 2. A Kohathite Levite (1 Ch 6²⁴). 3. The father of an officer of David (1 Ch 27²⁵). 4. A priest (Ezr 10²⁴ [1 Es 9²⁴ Azarias]). 5. A Judahite (Neh 11⁴).

UZZIAH, also called AZARIAH, was king of Judah after his father Amaziah. His name was Azariah originally, whether abbreviated in popular usage or corrupted in the written form can no longer be made out with certainty. His reign is said to have been fifty-two years in length. Religiously he is classed among the good kings (2 K 15¹⁰). The only event recorded of this king by the Book of Kings is the restoration of Elath, the town at the head of the Gulf of Akabah. As his father Amaziah had conquered Edom, we conclude that this nation had revolted at the accession of Uzziah. The re-building of Elath (14²²) points to some attempt at commerce, but of this our sources say nothing. We should be glad to know whether the subjection of Judah to Israel effected by Jehoash continued in this reign; but here again we are left to conjecture. The Chronicler (2 Ch 26) knows, indeed, of successes against the Philistines, Arabs, and Ammonites, as well as of extensive building operations, but the traditions drawn upon by this author are not always reliable.

The additional fact related by the Book of Kings is that the king was a leper. On account of this disease he withdrew from public business, and his son Jotham acted as his representative (2 K 15⁵). This regency, as it may be called, may account for some of the chronological difficulties of the period. Uzziah seems not to have been compelled to leave his palace. The Chronicler has the story of a conflict between Uzziah and the priesthood, according to which the monarch attempted to usurp the function of the chief priest and offer incense. For this the plague was sent upon him, after which he was thrust out as unclean.

Uzziah has been supposed to be mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions in connexion with a campaign of Tiglath-pileser in the Lebanon region. But it is now generally conceded that the inscription in question has reference to some prince of Northern Syria.

H. P. SMITH.

UZZIEL ('my strength is El').—1. A son of Kohath (Ex 6¹⁸. 23, Lv 10⁴, Nu 3¹⁸. 30, 1 Ch 6². 18 15¹⁰ 23¹². 20 24²⁰); gentile Uzzielites (Nu 3²⁷, 1 Ch 26²³). 2. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4⁴). 3. Founder of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 7⁷). 4. A musician, of the sons of Heman (1 Ch 25¹ [v. 18 Azarel]). 5. A Levite, of the sons of Jeduthun (2 Ch 29¹⁴). 6. A goldsmith who aided in repairing the wall (Neh 3⁸). GEORGE R. BERRY.

V

VAGABOND.—Gn 4¹² 'a fugitive and a vagabond wait thou be in the earth'—i.e. a wanderer, as AV 1c 19¹⁴ 'certain of the vagabond Jews,' RV 'strolling.' In both places the word is used in its older and literal meaning (from Lat. vagari, to wander).

VAHEB.—An unknown locality in Amorite territory (Nu 21¹⁹).

VAIL, VEIL.—In AV this word is spelled 'vail' and 'veil,' in RV uniformly 'veil.' See DRESS, § 5 (b); also TABERNACLE, § 5 (d), and TEMPLE, §§ 9. 12.

VAIZATHA.—One of the ten sons of Haman (Est 9⁹).

VALE, VALLEY.—'Vale' is found in AV as the tr. of two Heb. words 'ēmeq and shephēlah;' 'valley' represents five Heb. words, big'ah, gai, nachal, 'ēmeq, shephēlah, and the Gr. pharufnigz. For shephēlah (a low-lying tract of ground) and big'ah (a broad plain) see art. PLAIN, and for nachal (wady) see art. BROOK.

1. The word gai (AV and RV always 'valley') refers to a narrow gorge, a glen or ravine. A considerable number of such are named in the OT, e.g. the valley of Hinnom, beside Jerusalem; of Iptah-el, between Zebulun and Asher; of Zebolim, S.E. of Gibeah; of Salt, etc., while several other valleys are mentioned without a special name being attached to them.

The reference in Ps 23⁴ to the 'valley of the shadow of death' may be simply figurative of a place of peril and loneliness, or, as Gunkel holds, the place through which the ancient Hebrews supposed the soul had to pass on the way to the under world.

In the Apocrypha, 'valley' is the translation of phara[n]gā and aulōn, the former appearing in the NT (Lk 3⁶).

2. The word 'ēmeq (generally tr. 'valley' but 'vale' in AV of Gn 14⁸. 8. 10 37¹⁴ and also in RV of Gn 14⁷, Jos 8¹³ 15⁸ 18¹⁰, 1 S 17². 19 21⁹) means literally depression, and is 'a highlander's word for a valley as he looks down into it, and is applied to wide avenues running up into a mountainous country like the Vale of Elah, the Vale of Hebron, and the Vale of Ajalon' (HGHL 384). Thus the 'ēmeq is broader than a gai' and not so broad or extensive as a big'ah (plain). A considerable number of vales are mentioned in the OT, e.g. of Siddim, of Shaveh, of Hebron, of Achor, of Ajalon, etc.

Other vales are mentioned without special names being attached to them. The fertility of the vale (1 S 6¹⁸, Is 17⁹) and its suitability for cavalry operations (e.g. Jos 17¹⁰, Jg 1¹⁹. 24 etc.) are frequently referred to.

W. F. BOYD.

VANIAH.—One of the sons of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁶)—1 Es 9²⁴ Anos.

VANITY.—The root-idea of the word is 'emptiness.' Skeat suggests that the Lat. vanus (perhaps for vac-nus) is allied to vacuus 'empty.' In English literature 'vanity' signifies (1) emptiness, (2) falsity, (3) vainglory. The modern tendency is to confine its use to the last meaning. But 'vanity' in the sense of 'empty conceit' is not found in the English Bible.

1. In the OT.—(1) 'Vanity' is most frequently the

tr. of hebel, 'breath' or 'vapour'. The RV rightly gives the literal rendering in Is 57¹⁸: 'a breath (AV vanity) shall carry them all away.' The word naturally became an image of what is unsubstantial and transitory: in Ps 144¹ man is said to be 'like a breath' (RVm), because 'his days are as a shadow that passeth away.' In Ecclesiastes 'vanity' often occurs; it connotes what is fleeting, unsatisfying, and profitless. 'Vanity of vanities' (1st 12⁹) is the superlative expression of the idea of the futility of life. Jeremiah regards idols as 'vanity,' because they are 'the work of delusion' (10¹⁵), 'lies and things wherein there is no profit' (16¹⁹). (2) Another Heb. word (ʿāven), whose root-meaning is 'breath' or 'nothingness,' is twice rendered 'vanity' in the RV, and is applied to idols (Is 41²⁰, Zec 10²). But ʿāven generally describes moral evil as what is naughty and worthless; the RV therefore substitutes 'iniquity' for 'vanity' in Job 15³⁴, Ps 10⁷; cf. Is 58². (3) More frequently, however, 'vanity' is the tr. of šav, which also signifies 'what is naught.' In the OT it is used to set forth vanity as that which is hollow, unreal, and false. In Ps 41⁸ RVm 'he speaketh falsehood' is preferable; but the AV 'he speaketh vanity' exemplifies the close connexion between vain or empty words and lies (cf. Ps 12³ 144³, Job 35¹³, Pr 30⁸, Ezk 13²² 22³⁴). (4) 'Vanity' occurs twice as the rendering of rtq 'emptiness,' and refers to what is destined to end in failure (Ps 4⁷, Hab 2¹⁹). (5) In the RV it is used for lāhū 'waste,' but the marginal alternative in all passages but one (Is 59⁴) is 'confusion' (Is 40¹⁷, 2^d 44²).

2. In the NT.—'Vain' is the rendering of (a) kenos 'empty,' (b) mataios 'worthless.' When the former word is used, stress is laid on the absence of good, especially in essential qualities. The true thought is suggested by the RVm 'void' in 1 Co 15¹⁰. 14. 28. A partial exception is Ja 2²⁹—a rare example of the absolute use of the word. The 'vain man' is not only 'one in whom the higher wisdom has found no entrance,' but he is also 'one who is puffed up with a vain conceit of his own spiritual insight' (Trench, NT Synonyms, p. 181). Even here the primary negative force of the word is clearly discernible; the man's conceit is 'vain,' that is to say, his conception of himself is devoid of real content. He is a 'man who cannot be depended on, whose deeds do not correspond to his words' (Mayor, Com. in loc.). kenos is the word rendered 'vain' in the NT, except in the passages cited in the next paragraph.

When 'vain' is the tr. of mataios, as in 1 Co 3³⁰ 15¹⁷, Tit 3⁷, Ja 1⁸, 1 P 1¹⁸ (cf. the adverb Mt 15⁹, Mk 7⁷), more than negative blame is implied. 'By giving prominence to objectlessness it denotes what is positively to be rejected, bad. . . In Biblical Greek the word is, in the stronger sense, the expression of perfect repudiation' (Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lexicon of NT Greek, pp. 418, 781). In 1 Co 15¹⁴ the reference (kenos) is to 'a hollow witness, a hollow belief,' to a gospel which is 'evacuated of all reality,' and to a faith which has 'no genuine content.' But in v. 17 the reference (mataios) is to a faith which is 'frustrate,' or 'void of result,' because it does not save from sin (cf. Findlay, EGT, in loc.).

'Vanity' occurs only three times in the NT (Ro 8²⁰, Eph 4¹⁷, 2 P 2¹⁹); it is always the tr. of mataiotēs, which is not a classical word, but is often found in the LXX, especially as the rendering of hebel 'breath' (see above). When St. Paul describes the creation as 'subject to vanity' (Ro 8²⁰), he has in mind the marbling of its perfection and the frustration of its Creator's purpose by sin; nevertheless, the groanings of creation are, to his ear, the utterance of its hope of redemption. When he says that 'the Gentiles walk in the vanity of their mind' (Eph 4¹⁷), he is dwelling on the futility of their intellectual and moral gropings, which is the result of their walking in darkness (v. 18). In 2 P 2¹⁸ the intimate connexion between unreality and boastfulness in speech is well brought out in the graphic phrase, 'great swelling words of vanity.' How pitiful the contrast between the high-sounding talk of the false teachers who were themselves 'bond-servants of corruption,' and yet had the effrontery to 'promise liberty' to those whom in reality they were bringing into bondage (v. 18). J. G. TASKER.

VASHNI.—Samuel's firstborn son, according to MT of 1 Ch 6¹³ (Eng. 28), which is followed by AV. RV, following the Syr. (see ing.), and on the strength of v. 18 (33) and the || 1 S 8², supplies Joel as the name of Samuel's oldest son, and substitutes 'and the second Abiah' for 'Vashni and Abiah.'

VAU OR WAW.—The sixth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 6th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

VEDAN.—In RV the name of a country or city that traded with Tyre (Ezk 27¹⁹). AV has 'Dan also.' The passage is so corrupt that no certainly correct reading is at present attainable. Cf. UZAL.

VESSELS.—See HOUSE, § 9: MEALS, § 5. For 'the vessels of the tabernacle' (AV) RV has sometimes 'furniture,' sometimes 'instruments,' according to the context (cf. Nu 1⁵⁰ with 3²⁶). For the Temple cf. 1 Ch 9²³ in AV and RV. In Gn 43¹⁴ 'vessels' is equivalent to 'saddlebags.' In 1 Th 4⁸ 'vessel' probably stands for 'body' rather than 'wife,' an alternative favoured by many (see Milligan, Thess., ad loc.).

VESTRY occurs only in 2 K 10²² 'him that was over the vestry,' as the rendering of a word of uncertain meaning. Cf. 22¹⁴ 'keeper of the wardrobe.'

VESTURE.—In AV this word occurs as the rendering both of words denoting dress or raiment generally, as Gn 41⁴², Ps 22¹⁸, and of special words for the plaid-like upper garment of antiquity, as Dt 22² (see FRINGES), Rev 19¹³. 16 (RV here 'garment'), for which see DRESS, § 4 (a).

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

VIAL occurs in OT only in 1 S 10¹ AV, and 2 K 9¹. 8 RV (AV box) for an oil-flask. In NT, RV has substituted 'bowi' for 'vial' throughout (Rev 5⁸ 15⁷ 16¹⁵). The phiale was a flat vessel, resembling a saucer, specially used for pouring libations of wine upon the altar of a deity.

VILLAGE.—For the OT villages and their relation to the 'mother' city, see CITY, and cf. FORTIFICATION AND SIEGECRAFT, ad init. In all periods of Heb. history the cultivators of the soil lived for greater security in villages, the cultivated and pasture land of which was held in common. Solitary homesteads were unknown. The NT writers and Josephus also distinguish between a city (polis) and a village (kōmē), the distinction being primarily a difference not of size but of status. Thus in Mk 1³⁸ the word rendered 'towns' is literally 'village-cities' (others render 'market-towns'), i.e. places which are cities as regards population but not as regards constitutional status. When Josephus tells us that 'the very least of' the villages of Galilee 'contained above 15,000 inhabitants' (BJ iii. iii. 2 [Niese, § 43]), he is, more suo, drawing a very long bow indeed!

VINE, VINEYARD.—

The usual Heb. word for 'vine' is gephen, used of the grape-vine everywhere except in 2 K 4³⁹, where gephen sâdeh (lit. 'field vine') refers to a wild-gourd vine. Another word, sôrēq (Is 5², Jer 2²¹), or sôrēqâh (Gn 49¹¹), refers to superior vines with purple grapes.

VINEGAR

The vine (Vitis vinifera) is supposed to be a native of the shores of the Caspian, but has been cultivated in Palestine from the earliest times, as is witnessed by the extensive remains of ancient vineyards. The climate is peculiarly suited to the grape, which reaches perfection during the prolonged sunshine and the dewy nights of late summer. Vines specially flourish on the hillsides unsuited for cereals (Jer 31⁵, Am 9¹³). Viti-culture, which languished for centuries under the Arabs, has recently been revived by the German and Jewish colonies, and millions of imported vines of choice strain have been planted. As in the case of the olive, the culture of the vine needs a peaceful, settled population, as the plants require several years' care before bearing fruit (Zeph 1¹³), and constant attention if they are to maintain their excellence; hence to sit under one's 'own vine and fig tree' was a favourite image of peace (1 K 4²⁵, Mic 4⁵, Zec 3¹⁰). In some districts to-day vines are trained over a trellis at the front door, making a cool summer resort. The Israelites found Palestine ready planted with vineyards (Dt 6¹¹, Jos 24¹³, Neh 9²⁸). The steps taken in making a vineyard are described in detail in Is 5. The land must be fenced (cf. Ps 80¹²), the stones gathered out, the choicest possible plants obtained. A winepress was cut in the rock, and a watch tower (Is 5⁷, Mt 21³³) was built to guard against intruders. These last included foxes (or jackals) (Ca 2¹⁶) and boars (Ps 80¹³). In such a tower the owner's family will probably pass all the grape season; during the vintage a large proportion of the people are to be found living in the vineyards. Every spring the soil between the vines must be dug or ploughed up and the plants pruned (Lv 25⁴, Is 5⁶); neglect of this leads to rapid deterioration of the grapes; only the slothful man could permit his vineyard to be overgrown with 'thorns and nettles' and 'the stone wall thereof to be broken down' (Pr 24³⁰⁻³¹). The clusters of grapes are often enormous (cf. Nu 13²³). When the vintage is over and the leaves turn sere and yellow, the vineyards have a very desolate look (Is 34⁴). The failure of the vintage was looked upon as one of God's terrible punishments (Ps 78¹⁷, Jer 8¹³, Hab 3¹⁷), and a successful and prolonged vintage as a sign of blessing (Lv 26¹⁰). Of the vast quantities of grapes produced in ancient times a large proportion was, without doubt, converted into dibs (Arab.) or grape honey (cf. Heb. dēbāsh = 'honey'), a form of thick, intensely sweet grape juice, which is still made in considerable quantities in Syria, but which must have been much more important in the days when cane sugar was unknown. Many references to 'honey' probably refer to this product rather than to that of the bee.

Israel is compared to a vine in Ezk 15. 17, Is 5, and Ps 80. The vine-leaf was a favourite design on Jewish coins. The numerous references to the vine in the NT (e.g. Mt 20¹⁵, 21²⁸, 32⁷, Jn 15) point to the continued importance of viticulture in those days.

Vine of Sodom (Dt 32¹⁷).—If the reference is to any particular plant—which is very doubtful—the most probable is the colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis); see GOURD. The apple-sized fruit of the curious 'osher' (Calotropis procera) has been suggested; but though this answers well to the description by Josephus (BJ iv. viii. 4) of the 'fruits of Sodom' which vanish into ashes, so substantial a tree, with its cork-like bark and large glossy leaves, could in no sense be called a vine.

VINEGAR.—The light wine of Bible times, in consequence of the primitive methods of manufacture then in vogue (for which see WINE AND STRONG DRINK), turned sour much more rapidly than modern wines. In this condition it was termed chōmets (lit. 'sour stuff'), and was used, mixed with water, as a drink by the peasants (Ru 2¹⁴). The Nazirite's vow of abstinence included also 'vinegar of wine' and 'vinegar of strong drink,' i.e. of all intoxicating liquor other than grape-wine (Nu 6³). The Jewish chōmets corre-

VIRGIN usually represents (a) Heb. bēthulāh, an unmarried maiden. The word is frequently applied to countries, often with the addition of 'daughter,' e.g. Israel (Jer 18¹³, Am 5⁷), Zion (2 K 19²¹, La 2¹³), Babylon (Is 47¹), Egypt (Jer 46¹¹). In Jl 1⁸ it is used of a young widow. Dt 22²⁸ has laws for the protection of virgins; v. 12 insists on the importance of virginity in a bride. (b) In Is 7¹⁴ a rare word 'almāh' is used (RVm 'maiden'). The OT usage is indecisive as to whether it is confined to the unmarried (e.g. Ex 2¹, Ca 1⁸ 6⁸; masc. 1 S 17²³ 20²²). The Arab. root means 'to be mature,' and the Aram. does not connote virginity. The word apparently means 'one of marriageable age,' and is certainly not the word which would naturally be used if 'virginity' were the point to be emphasized. LXX has parthenos ('virgin'); so Mt 1²³; but the complaints of Justin and Irenaeus against the later Jewish tr. nednis ('damsel') are hardly justifiable. A modern view holds that Isalah was adopting the language of a current mythological tradition, and intended the word to convey the idea of a divine mother (note 'the virgin,' RVm). (c) Rev 14⁴ uses the word of men, probably metaphorically, implying chastity, not celibacy; cf. 2 Co 11². At 21⁹ is probably the germ of the later 'order' of virgins. For 'Virgin-birth' see pp. 589^b, 705^a. C. W. EMMET.

VIRTUE.—In Mk 5³⁰, Lk 6¹⁹ 8⁴⁶ the word 'virtue' is used with the antiquated meaning of 'power,' or 'powerful influence' (Gr. dynamis).

VISION.—1. In OT.—In its earlier form the vision is closely associated with belief in dreams (wh. see) as the normal vehicle of Divine revelation. The two words are repeatedly used of the same experience, the dream being rather the form, the vision the substance (e.g. Dn 1¹⁷ 2²⁸ 4⁵, cf. Jl 2²⁸). The common phrase 'visions of the night' embodies the same conception (Dn 2¹⁹, Job 4¹³, Gn 46²; cf. 1 S 3¹⁻¹⁶, Ac 16⁹). In the darkness, when the eye is closed (Nu 24⁴) and the natural faculties are suspended by sleep, God speaks to men. A further stage is the belief in an exalted condition of quickened spiritual discernment ('ecstasy' Ac 11⁵ 22¹⁷, cf. Gn 15¹² [LXX]), detached from the dream-state and furthered by fasting, prayer, and self-discipline (Dn 10²⁻⁹, cf. Ac 10⁹⁻¹¹). But in the later OT books neither ecstasy nor the objective vision, with its disclosure in cryptic symbolism of future happenings (Daniel), or of the nature and purposes of God (Ezekiel, Zechariah), has a place in the normal line of development of man's conception of the methods of Divine revelation. The earlier prophets had already attained to the idea of vision as inspired insight, of revelation as an inward and ethical word of God (Is 1¹ 2¹ etc.; cf. 1 S 3¹, Ps 89¹¹). Their prophetic consciousness is not born of special theophanies, but rather of a restless sense of constraint upon them to discern and utter the Divine will (Am 7¹⁴ 1¹, Is 6⁴, Jer 1⁶, Ezk 3¹⁻¹⁶). Ecstasies and visual appearances are the exception (Am 7¹⁻⁹ 8¹, Is 6, Jer 1¹⁻¹³). In Is 22¹ 6⁸ hizzayōn 'valley of vision' (EV) is possibly a mistake for gē' Hinnōm, 'Valley of Hinnom.'

2. In NT.—St. Paul once makes incidental reference to his 'visions' (2 Co 12¹), and perhaps confirms the objective character of the revelation to him on the road to Damascus (Gal 1¹¹⁻¹⁷, 1 Co 9¹ 12¹). Visions are also recorded in Lk 1. 2, Ac 10. 11. 16; and the term is once applied to the Transfiguration (Mt 17⁹; Mk. Lk. 'the things which they had seen'). But the NT vision is practically confined to the Apocalyptic imagery of the Book of Revelation. S. W. GANN.

VOPHSI.—The father of the Naphtalite spy (Nu 13¹⁴).

VOWS.—In common with most peoples of the ancient world, the making of vows was of frequent occurrence among the Israelites. The underlying idea in making a vow was to propitiate the Deity; this was done either by promising to do something for Him, or to please Him by the exercise of self-denial. Vows were made from a variety of motives: Jacob vows a vow according to which he will please Jahweh by becoming His worshipper, on condition that Jahweh will keep him safe during his journey and give him food and raiment (Gn 28²⁰⁻²²). Jephthah vows to offer to Jahweh the first person he sees coming out of his house on his return from battle, provided he is victorious (Jg 11³⁰⁻³¹). Hannah vows that if Jahweh gives her a son, she will dedicate him to the service of God (1 S 1¹¹). These cases are typical: in each something is promised to God, on condition that God will do something for him who makes the vow. But there was another class of vows which were of a more disinterested character; the most striking here would be the Nazirite vow, according to which a man undertook to lead a strenuously austere life, which was supposed to approximate to the simple life of the patriarchs; that was done out of protest against the current mode of life, which had been largely adopted from the Canaanites; indeed, the Nazirite vow implied, and was intended to be, a life of greater loyalty to Jahweh.

There are two words in Hebrew for a vow—though they do not necessarily correspond to the two ideas just mentioned: neder, which is a vow whereby a man dedicates something, even himself, to God; issar, a vow by which a man binds himself to abstain from enjoyment, or to exercise self-denial, in honour of Jahweh.

Vows were clearly of very common occurrence in Israel, indeed it would almost seem as though at one time it was deemed generally incumbent on men to make vows; this would, at all events, explain the words in Dt 23²¹, 'But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee.' A vow having once been made had to be kept at all costs (Dt 23²¹⁻²², Nu 30², Jg 11³⁰); though, as regards women, they might be absolved by father or husband, under certain conditions, from fulfilling a vow (Nu 30¹⁻⁶). From the expression used in connexion with the making of a vow, 'to bind the soul' (Nu 30²), it would seem that the idea was that if the vow was broken the life was forfeited to the Deity to whom the vow had been made; the warning, therefore, of Pr 20²⁵, Ex 5⁴ (4), was needed.

In making a vow in which something was promised to Jahweh, only such things could be promised as were truly the property of him who vowed; for this reason a man might not promise a firstling or the like, as that was already the property of Jahweh (cf. Lv 27²⁶⁻²⁹).

In later times the spirit in which vows were observed appears to have degenerated; Malachi speaks sternly of those who make a vow, and in fulfilling it sacrifice unto the Lord 'a blemished thing' (1¹⁴). Another, and still worse, misuse of vows meets us in the Gospels: the spurious piety of some men induced them to vow gifts to the use of the sanctuary, but they neglected, in consequence, the most obvious duties of natural affection; when a man uttered the word 'Corban' in reference to any possession of his, it meant that it was dedicated to God. Money that should have gone to the support of aged parents was pronounced to be 'Corban,' the son felt himself relieved of all further responsibility regarding his parents, and took honour to himself for having piously dedicated his substance to God (see Mt 15, Mk 7⁹). W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

VULGATE.—1. The position of the Latin Vulgate, as a version of the original texts of the Bible, has been dealt with in the two articles on the Text of the OT and the NT. But its interest and importance do not end there. Just as the LXX, apart from its importance as evidence for the text of the OT, has a history as an integral part of the Bible of the Eastern Church, so also does the Vulgate deserve consideration as the Bible of the Church in the West. Although the English Bible, to which we have been accustomed for nearly 300 years, is in the main a translation from the original Hebrew and Greek, it must be remembered that for the first thousand years of the English Church the Bible of this country whether in Latin or in English, was the Vulgate. In Germany the conditions were much the same, with the difference that Luther's Bible was still more indebted to the Vulgate than was our AV; while in France, Italy, and Spain the supremacy of the Vulgate lasts to this day. In considering, therefore, the history of the Vulgate, we are considering the history of the Scriptures in the form in which they have been mainly known in Western Europe.

2. The textual articles above mentioned have shown that, when Jerome's Biblical labours were at an end, about A.D. 404, the Latin Bible as left by him was a very complex structure, the parts of which differed very considerably in their relations to the original Greek and Hebrew texts. The Canonical Books of the OT, except the Psalms, were Jerome's fresh translation from the Massoretic Hebrew. The Psalms were extant in three forms—(a) the Roman, Jerome's slightly revised edition of the OL, which still held its own in a few churches; (b) the Gallian, his more fully revised version from the Hexaplar text of the LXX; and (c) the Hebrew, his new translation of the Massoretic text; of these it was the second, not the third, that was taken into general use. Of the deuterocanonical books, or Apocrypha, Judith and Tobit, with the additions to Daniel, were in Jerome's very hasty version; the remainder, which he had refused to touch (as not recognized by the Massoretic canon), continued to circulate in the OL. The Gospels were Jerome's somewhat conservative revision of the OL; the rest of the NT was a much more superficial revision of the same. The Latin Bible, therefore, which we know as the Vulgate was not wholly Jerome's work, still less did it represent his full and final views on the textual criticism of the Bible; and, naturally, it did not for a long time acquire the name of 'Vulgate.' The 'vulgata editio,' of which Jerome himself speaks, is primarily the Gr. LXX, and secondarily the OL as a translation of it. It is not until the 13th cent. that the epithet is found applied to Jerome's version by Roger Bacon (who, however, also uses it of the LXX); and it was canonized, so to speak, by its use in the decree of the Council of Trent, which speaks of it as 'hæc ipsa vetus et vulgata editio.' By that time, however, it differed in many points of detail from the text which Jerome left behind him; and it is of the history of Jerome's version during this period of some twelve hundred years that it is proposed to speak in the present article.

3. Jerome's correspondence and the prefaces attached by him to the several books of his translation (notably those prefixed to the Pentateuch, Joshua, Ezra and Nehemiah, Job, Isaiah, and the Gospels) sufficiently show the reception given to his work by his contemporaries. He complains constantly and bitterly of the virulence of his critics, who charge him with deliberate perversions of Scripture, and refuse to make themselves acquainted with the conditions of his task. Especially was this the case with the OT. In the NT Jerome had restrained his correcting pen, and made alterations only when the sense required it [Ita calamo temperavimus ut his tantum quæ sensum videbantur mutare correctis, reliqua manere pateremur ut fuerant] (Pref. ad Damasum); and though even these were sufficient to cause discontent among many readers, the openings given to adverse criticism were relatively insignificant. But in the case of the OT the basis of the OL rendering to which people were accustomed was the LXX, the differences of which from the Massoretic Hebrew are often very wide. When, therefore, readers found whole passages omitted or transposed, and the meanings of very many sentences altered beyond all recognition, they believed that violence was being done to the sacred text; nor were they prepared to admit as axiomatic the superiority of the Hebrew text to the Greek, the OT of the Jews to the OT of the Christians. Even Augustine, who commended and used Jerome's revision of the Gospels, questioned the expediency of the far-reaching changes made in the OT.

4. Nor was Jerome's translation assisted by authority to oust its predecessor. Never until 1546 was it officially adopted by the Roman Church to the exclusion of all rivals. It is true that the revision of the Gospels was undertaken at the instance of Pope Damasus, and was published under the sanction of his name; and the Gallican version of the Psalms was quickly and generally adopted. But the new translation of the OT from the Hebrew had no such shadow of official authority. It was an independent venture of Jerome's, encouraged by his personal friends (among whom were some bishops), and deriving weight from his reputation as a scholar and from the success of his previous work, but in no sense officially commissioned or officially adopted. It was thrown on the world to win its way by its own merits, with the strong weight of popular prejudice against it, and dependent for its success on the admission of its fundamental critical assumption of the superiority of the Massoretic Hebrew to the LXX. It is not to be wondered at if its progress in general favour was slow, and if its text was greatly modified before it reached the stage of universal acceptance.

5. The extant evidence (consisting of occasional statements by ecclesiastical writers, and their ascertainable practice in Biblical quotations) is not sufficient to enable us to trace in detail the acceptance of Jerome's version in the various Latin-speaking countries. Gaul, as it was the first country to adopt his second Psalter, was also the first to accept the Vulgate as a whole, and in the 5th cent. the use of it appears to have been general there; but Gaul, it must be remembered, from the point of view of Christian literature, was at this time confined mainly to the provinces of the extreme south. Isidore of Seville, however, testifies to the general use of the Vulg. by all churches, as being alike more faithful and more lucid than its predecessors. In the 6th cent. it is probable that its use was general among scholars. Victor of Capua, about 541, finding a Latin version of the Diatessaron according to the OL text, and being desirous of making it generally known, had it transcribed, with the substitution of the Vulg. for the OL. Gregory the Great (d. 604) used the Vulg. as the basis of his commentary on Job, but speaks of both versions as existing and recognized by the Church ('Novam translationem dissero, sed, ut comprobationis causa exigit, nunc novam nunc veterem per testimonia assumo; ut, quia sedes Apostolica utraque utitur, mei quoque labor studii ex utraque fulciatur'). On the other hand, Primasius is evidence of the continued use of the OL in Africa; and a considerable number of the extant fragments of OL MSS are of the 6th cent. or later date [see TEXT or MT, 20]. In general it is probable that the old version was retained by the common people, and by such of the clergy as took little interest in questions of textual scholarship, long after it had been abandoned by scholars. In any case, it is certain that the Vulg. was never officially adopted in early times by the Roman Church, but made its way gradually by its own merits. The continuance of the OL in secluded districts is illustrated by the fact that Cod. Colbertinus (c) was written as late as the 12th cent. in Languedoc, and Cod. Gigas (g) of the Acts) in the 13th cent. in Bohemia.

6. Although this method of official non-interference was probably necessary, in view of the fact that Jerome's version of the OT was a private venture, and one which provoked much hostile criticism, and although in the end the new translation gained the credit of a complete victory on its merits as the superior version for general use, nevertheless the price of these advantages was heavy. If the Vulgate had enjoyed from the first the protection of an official sanction, which Sixtus and Clement ultimately gave to the printed text, it would have come down to us in a much purer form than is actually the case. Under the actual conditions, it was peculiarly exposed to corruption, both by the ordinary mistakes of scribes and by contamination with the familiar OL. In some cases whole books or chapters in a Vulg. MS contain an OL text; for some reason which is quite obscure, Mt. especially tended to remain in the earlier form. Thus Codd. g¹, h, r² all have Mt. in OL, and the remaining Evv. in Vulgate. Cod. Gigas is OL in Acts and Apoc., Vulg. in the rest of the Bible. Cod. p of the Acts is OL in Ac 1¹-13² 28¹⁴-30, while the rest of the book is Vulg. Codd. ff¹, g² of the Gospels and ff of Cath. Epp. have texts in which OL and Vulg. are mixed in various proportions. Even where OL elements do not enter to a sufficient extent to be noteworthy, MSS of the Vulg. tend to differ very considerably. In the absence of any central authority to exercise control, scribes treated the text with freedom or with carelessness, and different types of text grew up in the different countries of Western Europe. It is with these different national texts that the history of the Vulg. in the Middle Ages is principally concerned.

7. During the 5th and 6th centuries, when Jerome's version was winning its way outwards from the centre of the Latin-speaking Church, the conditions over a large part of Western Europe were ill fitted for its reception. Gaul, in the 5th cent., was fully occupied with the effort first to oppose and then to assimilate the heathen Frankish invaders; and even in the 6th it was a scene of almost perpetual war and internal struggles. Germany was almost wholly pagan. Britain was in the throes of the English conquest, and the ancient British Church was submerged, except in Wales and Ireland. Outside Italy, only Visigothic Spain (Arian, but still Christian, until about 596) and Celtic Ireland were freely open at first to the access of the Scriptures; and in these two countries (cut off, as they subsequently were, from central Christendom by the Moorish invasion of Spain and the English conquest of Britain) the two principal types of text came into being, which, in various combinations with purer texts from Italy, are found in the different MSS which have come down to the present day. From the Visigothic kingdom the Spanish influences made their way northward into the heart of France. Irish missionaries carried the Bible first into southern Scotland, then into Northumbria, then into northern France and up the Rhine into Germany, penetrating even into Switzerland and Italy, and leaving traces of their handiwork in MSS produced in all these countries. Meanwhile Rome was a constant centre of attraction and influence; and to and from Italy there was an unceasing stream of travellers, and not least between Italy and distant Britain. These historical facts find their illustration in the Vulg. MSS still extant, which can be connected with the various churches.

8. In the 6th and 7th cent. the primacy of missionary zeal and Christian enterprise rested with the Irish Church; but in the latter part of the 7th and the first half of the 8th cent. the Church of Northumbria sprang into prominence, and added to the gifts which it had received from Iona a spirit of Christian scholarship which gave it for a time the first place in Christendom in this respect. In the production of this scholarship the arrival of Theodore of Tarsus as archbishop of Canterbury in 669 happily co-operated, if it was not a chief stimulus; for Theodore and his companions brought with them from Italy copies of the Latin Bible in a purer text than Ireland had been able to provide. There is clear evidence to show that the celebrated Lindisfarne Gospels (Y 9.

Wordsworth's numeration) was copied from one of these MSS, and the same was probably the case with another Northern copy of the Gospels now in the British Museum (Royal 1 B vii.). The great Cod. Amiatinus (A) itself, the best single MS of the Latin Bible in existence, was written in Northumbria before 716, and must have been copied from MSS brought from Italy either by Theodore or by Ceolfrid of Jarrow, by whose order it was made. Other MSS (notably Δ and Σ), written in the north, are closely akin to these, and must be derived from the same source; and this whole group of MSS furnishes the best text of the Vulg. now available. The centres of English scholarship, to which this pre-eminence in Biblical study was due, were the twin monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow, of which the most famous members were Ceolfrid and Bede; but their influence spread widely over Northumbria, and was renowned in the more distant parts of England and western Europe.

9. To this renown it was due that, when a king at last arose in France with a desire to improve the religious education of his country, he turned to Northumbria for the necessary assistance to carry out the reform. The king was Charlemagne, and the scholar whom he invited to help him was Alcuin of York; and the record of their joint achievement constitutes the next chapter in the history of the Vulgate. Alcuin came to France in 781, and was made master of the schools attached to Charlemagne's court at Aix-la-Chapelle (Aachen). He was subsequently made titular abbot of Tours, and in 796 he obtained leave to retire to that monastery, where he spent the nine remaining years of his life (d. 805) in establishing the school of calligraphy for which Tours was long famous. His work in connexion with the Latin Bible falls into two stages. To the earlier part of his life at Aix belongs, in all probability, the beginning of a series of magnificent copies of the Gospels, of which several have survived to the present day. Certainly, they date from about this period, and have their home in the country of the Rhine and the Moselle. They are obviously modelled on the Anglo-Celtic MSS, of which the Lindisfarne Gospels is the most eminent example. Prefixed to each Gospel is a portrait of the Evangelist (in the Byzantine style), a full page of elaborate decoration, and another containing the first words of the Gospel in highly ornamental illumination. The English MSS excel their French successors in elaboration and skill of workmanship; but the French books have an added gorgeousness from the lavish use of gold, the whole of the text being written in gold letters, sometimes upon purple vellum. Hence the whole series of these books (the production of which continued through the greater part of the 9th cent.) is often described as the 'Golden Gospels.'

10. The importance of the 'Golden Gospels' group of MSS is artistic rather than textual, and although their dependence upon Anglo-Celtic models is obvious, their connexion with Alcuin personally is only hypothetical. It is otherwise in both respects with another great group of MSS, which are directly due to the commission given by Charlemagne to Alcuin to reform the current text of the Vulgate. About the end of 796, Alcuin established the school of Tours, and sent to York for MSS to enable him to carry out his work. On Christmas Day of 801 he presented to the king a complete Bible, carefully revised. Several descendants of this Bible are still in existence, and enable us to judge of Alcuin's work. They differ from the 'Golden Gospels' in being complete Bibles, and in being written in the beautiful small minuscule which at this time, under Charlemagne's influence, superseded the tortured and unsightly script of the Merovingian and Lombardic traditions, and of which Tours was one of the principal homes. The MS. which appears most accurately to represent the edition of Alcuin at the present day is the Cod. Vallicellianus at Rome (Wordsworth's V); with this Wordsworth and White associate the 'Caroline Bible' (Add. MS 10546 (Wordsworth's K) in the British Museum), and there are some 8 or 10 other MSS (written mostly at Tours), besides several others containing the Gospels only, which in varying degrees belong to the same group. In text these MSS naturally show a great affinity to the Northumbrian MSS headed by the Cod. Amiatinus, and there is no question that Alcuin introduced into France a far purer text of the Vulgate than any which it had hitherto possessed.

11. Alcuin's attempt, however, was not the only one made in France at this period to reform the current Bible text. Another edition was almost simultaneously produced in western France by Theodulf, bishop of Orleans and abbot of Fleury (about 795-821); but its character was very different from that of Alcuin. Theodulf was a Visigoth, probably from Septimania, the large district of southern France which then formed part of the Visigothic kingdom of Spain; and it was to Spain that he looked for materials for his revision of the Latin Bible. The MS which represents his edition most fully (Paris, Bibl. Nat. 9380) has a text closely connected with the Spanish type of which the Codd. Cavensis and Toletanus are the most prominent examples, except in the Gospels, which are akin rather to the Irish type; and a contemporary hand has added a number of variants, which are often Alcuinian in character. With this MS may be associated a volume at Puy, and Add. MS 24124 in the British Museum, which are closely akin to the Paris MS, but follow sometimes its first and sometimes its second reading; the latter (especially in its corrections) has been used by Wordsworth and White along with the Paris MS to represent the Theodulfian edition. All are written in an extremely minute Caroline minuscule.

12. In spite, however, of the labour spent upon these attempts to improve the current text of the Vulgate, the forces of deterioration were more powerful than those of renovation. Theodulf's edition, which was a private venture, without the advantages of Imperial patronage, had no wide sphere of influence, and left no permanent mark on the text of the Vulgate. Alcuin's had, no doubt, much greater authority and effect; yet its influence was only transient, and even at Tours itself the MSS produced within the next two generations show a progressive departure from his standard. On the other hand, the study of the Scriptures was now definitely implanted on the Continent, and the number of copies of them produced in France and Germany shows a great increase. During the 9th cent. splendid copies of the 'Golden Gospels' continued to be produced in the valley of the Rhine, and Alcuinian texts at Tours; while a new centre of Scripture study and reproduction came into existence in Switzerland, at the famous abbey of St. Gall. The library and scriptorium of this monastery (many of the inmates of which were English or Irish monks) first became notable under abbot Gozbert (816-836), and perhaps reached the height of their importance under abbot Hartmut (872-883). Many copies of the Bible were written there, and the influence of St. Gall permeated a large portion of central Europe. Here, too, was produced by Walsfridus Strabo, dean of St. Gall before 842, the original form of the Glossa Ordinaria, the standard commentary on the Bible in the Middle Ages.

13. After Alcuin and Theodulf no important effort was made to recover the original text of the Vulgate, though some attempt in this direction was made by Lanfranc, of which no traces seem to survive; but the history of its diffusion can to some extent be followed by the help of the extant MSS, which now begin to increase greatly in number. The tradition of the 'Golden Gospels' was carried into Germany, where copies of the Gospels were produced on a smaller scale, with less ornamentation, and in a rather heavy Caroline minuscule, which clearly derive their origin from this source. In France itself, too, the later representatives of this school are inferior in size and execution to their predecessors. Spain and Ireland had by this time ceased to be of primary importance in the circulation of Bible texts.

In England a new departure was made, on a higher scale of artistic merit, in the fine Gospels and Service-Books produced at Winchester between about 960 and 1060, the chief characteristics of which are broad bands of gold forming a framework with interlaced foliage. These details, however, relate more to the history of art than to that of the Bible, and with regard to the spread of the knowledge of the Scriptures there is nothing of importance to note in the 10th and 11th cents. beyond the increase of monasteries in all the countries of western Europe, in the scriptoria of which the multiplication of copies proceeded apace.

14. In the 12th cent. the most noteworthy phenomenon, both in England and on the Continent, is the popularity of annotated copies of the various books of the Bible. The ordinary arrangement is for the Bible text to occupy a single narrow column down the centre of the page, while on either side of it is the commentary; but where the commentary is scanty, the Biblical column expands to fill the space, and vice versa. The main staple of the commentary is normally the Glossa Ordinaria; but this, being itself a compilation of extracts from pre-existing commentaries (Jerome, Augustine, Isidore, Bede, etc.), lent itself readily to expansion or contraction, so that different MSS differ not inconsiderably in their contents. The various books of the Bible generally form separate MSS, or small groups of them are combined. Simultaneously with these, some very large Bibles were produced, handsomely decorated with illuminated initials. Of these the best examples come from England or northern France. These are of the nature of éditions de luxe, while the copies with commentaries testify to the extent to which the Bible was at this time studied, at any rate in the larger monasteries; and the catalogues of monastic libraries which still exist confirm this impression by showing what a large number of such annotated MSS were preserved in them, no doubt for the study of the monks.

15. A further step in advance was taken in the 13th cent., which is to be attributed apparently to the influence of the University of Paris then at the height of its renown and the intellectual centre of Europe. The present chapter division of the Bible text is said to have been first made by Stephen Langton (archbishop of Canterbury, 1207-1228), while a doctor at Paris; and the 13th cent. (probably under the influence of St. Louis) witnessed a remarkable output of Vulgate MSS of the complete Bible. Hitherto complete Bibles had almost always been very large volumes, suitable only for liturgical use; but by the adoption of very thin vellum and very small writing it was now found possible to compress the whole Bible into volumes of quite moderate size, comparable with the ordinary printed Bibles of to-day. For example, one such volume, containing the whole Bible with ample margins, measures 5½x3½x1½ inches, and consists of 471 leaves. From the appearance of these Bibles (hundreds of which are still extant) it is evident that they were intended for private use, and they testify to a remarkable growth in the personal study of the Scriptures. The texts of these MSS seem to embody the results of a revision at the hands of the Paris doctors. Correctoria, or collections of improved readings, were issued at Paris about 1230, and at other places during this cent., the best being the 'Correctorium Vaticanum,' so called from a MS in the Vatican Library. This revision, however, was superficial rather than scientific, and is of importance in the history of the Vulgate mainly because it established the normal text which was current at the time of the invention of printing. These small Bibles were produced almost as plentifully in England as in France, and in an identical style, which continued well into the 14th century.

16. After the Parisian revision of the 13th cent. no important modification of the text or status of the Latin Bible took place until the invention of printing two centuries later. The first book to be printed in Europe was the Latin Bible, published in 1456 by Gutenberg and Fust (now popularly known as the Mazarin Bible, from the circumstance that the first copy of it to attract notice in modern times was that in the library of Cardinal Mazarin). In type this Bible resembles the contemporary large German Bible MSS; in text it is the ordinary Vulgate of the 15th century. During the next century Bibles poured from the press, but with little or no attempt at revision of the text. Some MSS were consulted in the preparation of the Complutensian Polyglot; but the only editions before the middle of the 16th cent. which deserve the name of critical are those of Stephanus in 1540 and Hentenius in 1547, which laid the foundations of the modern printed Vulgate. It is, however, to the action of the Council of Trent that the genesis of an authorized text is ultimately due. Soon after its meeting, in 1546, a decree was passed declaring that the 'vetus et vulgata editio' of the Scriptures was to be accepted as authentic, and that it should be printed in the most accurate form possible. It was forty years, however, before this decree bore fruit. Sixtus V., in his short pontificate of five years (1585-90), not only caused the production of an edition of the Greek OT (1587), but in 1590 issued a Latin Bible which he declared was to be accepted as the authentic edition demanded by the Council of Trent. This edition was the work of a board of revisers appointed for the purpose, but Sixtus himself examined their results before they were published, and introduced a large number of alterations (rarely for the better) on his own authority. The Sixtine edition, however, had hardly been issued when it was recalled in 1592 by Clement VIII., at the instance, it is believed, of the Jesuits, with whom Sixtus had quarrelled; and in the same year a new edition was issued under the authority of Clement, with a preface by the famous Jesuit Bellarmine, in which (to avoid the appearance of a conflict between Popes) the suppression of the Sixtine edition is falsely stated to be due to the abundance in it of printers' errors, and to have been contemplated by Sixtus himself. The Clementine revisers in many instances restored the readings of Sixtus' board, which Sixtus himself had altered; and the general result of their labours was to produce a text resembling that of Hentenius, while the Sixtine edition was nearer to that of Stephanus. The bull in which the Clementine edition was promulgated forbade any future alteration of the text and any printing of various readings in the margin, and thereby stereotyped the official text of the Vulgate from that day until this.

17. Clement's bull practically closed the textual criticism of the Vulgate in the Roman Church, though Vallarsi was able to print a new text in his edition of the works of St. Jerome in 1734, and Vercellone published a collection of various readings in 1860-64. The course of criticism outside the Roman communion can be briefly sketched. Bentley, with the help of his assistants, made large collections for an edition of the Vulgate, but was unable to carry through his task. Lachmann, in the second edition of his Greek NT (1842-50), added a text of the Vulgate, based on a collation of the Cod. Amlatinus and a few other selected MSS. Corssen in 1885 printed a revised text of Gal. as a sample of a new NT, but has carried his enterprise no further, being perhaps deterred by the appearance of the great Oxford edition now in progress. This edition, planned by Bishop J. Wordsworth of Salisbury, and carried out by him with the assistance of the Rev. H. J. White and others, gives a revised text of the Vulgate with a full critical apparatus and introductions. The four Gospels and Acts have now appeared (1889-1905); it is to be hoped that nothing will prevent the completion of the entire work, which will establish the criticism of at least the Vulg. NT on a firm foundation. A very handy text of the NT, with Wordsworth and White's variants in the margin, has been produced by E. Nestle (1907). Quite recently it has been announced that Pope Pius x. has entrusted the Benedictine order with the revision of the Vulgate text. It is satisfactory to know that they propose to devote themselves in the first instance to the OT.

LITERATURE.—The Prolegomena to Wordsworth's and White's edition; art. by Bp. Westcott in Smith's DB; art. by H. J. White in Scrivener's Introd. to Crit. of NT, with description of 181 of the principal MSS, and art. 'Vulgate' in Hastings' DB; and especially S. Berger's Hist. de la Vulg. pendant les premiers siècles du moyen âge (1893).

Specimens of the principal classes of MSS mentioned in the present article may be seen in Facsimiles from Biblical MSS in the British Museum (1900). The best edition of the Clementine Vulgate is that of Vercellone (1861). For fuller bibliography, see Berger, op. cit., and White's art. in Hastings' DB. F. G. KENTON.

VULTURE.—1. dā'ah, Lv 11⁴, dayyāh or dayyōh, Dt 14¹³ AV; in both passages RV has 'kite.' 2. 'ayyāh, Job 28⁷ AV; RV 'falcon.' These words certainly refer to some of the smaller birds of prey: the larger vultures are included in neshet, for which see EAGLE.

WAFER.—See BREAD, end.

WAGES.—Under the conditions of life in Palestine in OT times, work on the land, at all times the chief occupation, was done for the most part by the peasant and his family, assisted, in the case of the well-to-do, by a few slaves. The 'hired servants' were never numerous, and mainly aliens. We have no information as to the wages of such field-labourers. Dt 15¹⁸ seems to say that a hireling cost the farmer twice as much as a slave, and since the latter received only his keep and his few clothes, it follows that the former will have earned the equivalent thereof, over and above, in wages. The first definite engagement—disregarding the special case of Jacob and Laban—with stipulated wages is that of the Levite whom Micah hired as his domestic chaplain for 10 shekels a year, with 'a suit of apparel' and his 'victuals' (Jg 17¹⁰). The next instance is Tobit's engagement of the angel Raphael as his son's travelling-companion for a drachm a day and all found (To 5¹⁴). This amount—in Tobit's day nearly a shilling—would probably be equal in purchasing power to three shillings at the present day. From the NT we have the familiar case of the labourers in the vineyard who received a denarius for their day's labour (Mt 20¹²; see MONEY, §§ 6, 7 (b)).

Information is now available as to the wages of different classes of 'hirelings,' from doctors to tailors, in Babylonia c. B.C. 2000, from the Code of Hammurabi (see Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 592 f., 606 f.; S. A. Cook, The Laws of Moses and the Code of Hammurabi, 171 ff.), but it is perilous to compare too closely the highly developed social conditions of Babylonia, even at this early period, with the simpler forms of Hebrew life, say under the monarchy. A still better reflexion of the actual conditions of labour in the valley of the Euphrates is found in the numerous written contracts that have been deciphered in recent years, a specimen of which will be given below (see esp. Johns, Bab. and Assyr. Laws, ch. xxv. 'Wages of Hired Labourers'; Meissner, Aus d. altbab. Recht, 13 f.). The Code of Hammurabi (§ 273) enacts that a field labourer shall receive from the beginning of the year (April) to the fifth month—the period of longer days and harvest operations—6 she (180 she = 1 shekel) per day; and from the sixth month to the end, 5 she. At best this is only a shekel a month; but, according to Meissner, this early introduction of a 'standard wage' did not lead to a rise of wages, for only on very rare occasions do these exceed 6 shekels a year in addition to food and clothing. It was customary to give a sum, probably a shekel, as earnest-money, the remainder being paid at stipulated intervals, daily or monthly, or in a lump sum at the expiry of the engagement.

Brickmakers and tailors are to receive 5 she a day (§ 274), and herdsmen—the name nāṭal is the Babylonian form of that denoting the occupation of Amos, the prophet—8 gur of corn a year, the gur being worth probably about a shekel. In other cases as well, it was customary to pay in grain. Frequently, as has been said, a written contract was drawn up, specifying the wages and the period of engagement. An example may be given from Meissner (op. cit. 14):—

'Asir-Ramman, the son of Libit Urta, has hired Shamash-bel-ili from the priestess of the sun, Achatani, the daughter of Shamash-khazir, for one year. He will pay 3½ shekels as yearly wages. He will find his own clothes. He will begin work on the 4th of the month Dur-Ramman, and will finish and leave in the month Marmutu.'

In OT times we hear also of yearly engagements (Lv 25⁵³), but the Deuteronomic Law enjoins daily payment of wages, in cases of poverty at least (Dt 24¹⁵, cf. Lv 19¹³). Details of the conditions of hire and the mutual obligations of master and servant at a much later period are to be found in the Mishna (see esp. Baba me'ila, vi. and vii.). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

WALLS.—In Palestine the principal cities were protected by surrounding walls, sometimes of great size. That of Gezer, for instance, was fourteen feet thick. These walls were built of stones, set in mud, or else of brick. The walls of houses were generally ill-built structures of the same materials. The choice of material varied with the locality: Lachish (Tell el-Hesi), for example, was almost entirely a brick town; in Gezer brick is the exception. See also art. CITY; FORTIFICATION, 1; HOUSE, 4. For the walls of Jerusalem, which may be taken as typical of a city wall, see JERUSALEM. R. A. S. MACALISTER.

WAR.—1. In the days before the monarchy the wars of the Hebrew tribes must have resembled those of early Greece, when 'the two armies started out, marched till they met, had a fight and went home.' Rarely, as in the case of the campaign against Sisera (Jg 4), was it necessary to summon a larger army from several tribes. From the days of Saul and David, with their long struggle against the Philistines, war became the affair of the whole nation, leading, also to the establishment of a standing army, or at least of the nucleus of one (see ARMY). In the reign of Solomon we hear of a complete organization of the kingdom, which undoubtedly served a more serious purpose than the providing of 'victuals for the king and his household' (1 K 4⁷).

Early spring, after the winter rains had ceased, was 'the time when kings go out to battle' (2 S 11¹). The war-horn (EV 'trumpet'), sounded from village to village on their hilltops, was in all periods the call to arms (Jg 6¹⁶, 1 S 13³, 2 S 20¹). How far the exemptions from military service specified in Dt 20¹⁻⁴ were in force under the kings is unknown; the first express attestation is 1 Mac 3⁴.

2. War, from the Hebrew point of view, was essen-

Jally a religious duty, begun and carried through under the highest sanctions of religion. Israel's wars of old were the wars of Jⁿ (Nu 21¹⁴), and was not Jahweh Tebbd'ôh, especially 'the God of Israel's battle-array' (1 S 17⁴⁵)? His presence with the host was secured by 'the ark of Jⁿ' accompanying the army in the field (2 S 11¹¹, cf. 1 S 4³). As an indispensable preliminary, therefore, of every campaign, the soldiers 'sanctified' themselves (Jos 3⁵) by ablutions and other observances preparatory to offering the usual sacrifices (1 S 7⁹ 13⁹). The men thus became God's 'consecrated ones' (Is 13³ RV), and to open a campaign is in Heb. phrase 'to consecrate war' (Jl 3⁹, Jer 6⁴ etc.). Is 21⁵ 'anoint the shield' (cf. 2 S 1²¹) is commonly taken to allude to a practice of smearing shields with oil, that hostile weapons might more readily glance off (see, for another explanation, Marti or Duhm, Jesaja, ad loc.).

To ascertain the propitious moment for the start, and indeed throughout the campaign, it was usual to 'enquire of the Lord' by means of the sacred lot (Jg 1¹, 1 S 23³ and oft.), and in an age of more advanced religious thought, by the mouth of a prophet (1 K 22³⁴). Still later a campaign was opened with prayer and fasting (1 Mac 3⁴⁷).

As regards the commissariat, it was probably usual, as in Greece, to start with three days' provisions, the soldiers, for the rest, helping themselves from friends (cf. however, the voluntary gifts, 2 S 17²⁷) and foci. The arrangement by which 'ten men out of every hundred' were told off 'to fetch victual for the people' (Jg 20¹⁰), is first met with in a late document.

3. As the army advanced, scouts were sent out to ascertain the enemy's position and strength (Jg 1²⁴ [AV 'spies,' RV 'watchers'], 1 S 26⁴, 1 Mac 5³⁶). Where the element of secrecy enters, we may call them spies (so Jos 2¹ RV, 2 S 15¹⁰, 1 Mac 12²; cf. Gideon's exploit, Jg 7¹⁷).

Little is known of the camps of the Heb. armies. The men were sheltered in tents and booths (2 S 11¹¹; this reference, however, is to a lengthy siege). The general commanding probably had a more elaborate 'pavilion' (1 K 20¹², ¹⁵, see TENT). The obscure term rendered by RV 'place of the wagons' (1 S 17²⁰ 26⁸ 7) is derived from a root which justifies us in supposing that the Hebrew camps were round, rather than square. Of the 20 Assyrian camps represented on the bronze plates of the gates of Balawat, 4 are circular, 14 almost square, and 2 have their long sides straight and their short sides curved outwards. Two gates are represented at opposite ends, between which a broad road divides the camp into two almost equal parts (Billerbek u. Delltzech, Die Palastore Salmanassars, II, [1908], 104). The Hebrews divided the night into three watches (Jg 7¹⁹, 1 S 11¹¹).

4. The tactics of the Hebrew generals were as simple as their strategy. Usually the 'battle was set in array' by the opposing forces being drawn up in line facing each other. At a given signal, each side raised its battle-cry (Jg 7²¹, Am 1¹⁴, Jer 4¹⁹) as it rushed to the fray; for the wild slogan of former days, the Ironsides of the Jewish Cromwell, Judas the Maccabee, substituted prayer (1 Mac 5³⁶) and the singing of Psalms (2 Mac 12²⁷). It was a common practice for a general to divide his forces into three divisions (Jg 7¹⁶, 1 S 11¹¹, 2 S 18², 1 Mac 5³⁶). A favourite piece of tactics was to pretend flight, and by leaving a body of men in ambush, to fall upon the unwary pursuers in front and rear (Jos 8¹⁵, Jg 20³⁰). As examples of more elaborate tactics may be cited Joab's handling of his troops before Rabbath-ammon (2 S 10⁹⁻¹¹), and Benhadad's massing of his chariots at the battle of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22³¹); the campaigns of Judas Maccabeus would repay a special study from this point of view. The recall was sounded on the war-horn (2 S 28¹⁸ 20²⁷).

5. The tender mercies of the victors in those days were cruel, although the treatment which the Hebrews meted out to their enemies was, with few exceptions (e.g. 2 K 15¹⁶), not to be compared to what Benzinger only too aptly describes as 'the Assyrian devilries.' It is one of the greatest blots on our RV that 2 S 12³¹ should still read as it does, instead of as in the margin (see Cent. Bible, in loc.). The Hebrew wars, as has been said, were the wars of Jⁿ, and to Jⁿ of right belonged the population of a conquered city (see BAN). Even the humane Deuteronomic Code spares only the women and children (Dt 20¹⁴). The captives were mostly sold as slaves. A heavy war indemnity or a yearly tribute was imposed on the conquered people (2 K 3⁴).

The booty fell to the victorious soldiery, the leaders receiving a special share (Jg 8²⁴, 1 S 30²⁴). The men 'that tarried by the stuff'—in other words, who were left behind as a camp-guard—shared equally with their comrades 'who went down to the battle' (1 S 30²⁴, a law first introduced by David, but afterwards characteristically assigned to Moses, Nu 31²⁷). The returning warriors were welcomed home by the women with dance and song (Ex 15²⁰, Jg 11³⁴, 1 S 18⁶ etc.). The piety of the Maccabaean age found a more fitting expression in a service of thanksgiving (1 Mac 4²⁴). See also ARMY, ARMOUR ARMS, FORTIFICATION AND SIEGE-CRAFT.

WARS OF THE LORD, BOOK OF THE.—A work quoted in Nu 21¹⁴, to settle a point with regard to the boundary of Moab and Ammon. The quotations in vv. 17, 18, 27-30 are probably from the same original. This is the only mention of the book in the OT. It is not likely that the work is identical with the Book of Jashar. It probably consisted of a collection of songs celebrating the victories of Israel over their neighbours. The song in Ex 15¹⁻¹⁹ describing the Lord as 'a man of war' has been thought to be derived from it. The date of the work is unknown. As it deals with the heroic age, it likely originated in the period immediately following, and it has been dated in the reign of Omri (Stade), and by others as early as the time of David or Solomon. If Nu 21²⁷⁻³⁰ refer to the wars of Omri, we must regard the work as a product of the N. kingdom.

WATER.—The scarcity of water in the East lends it a special value. Its presence in some form is essential to life. The fruitfulness of the land depends on the quantity available for watering. The Jordan, with its great springs, is too low for the irrigation of anything but the valley. There are many fountains in Palestine, but most fail in summer. The average annual rainfall approaches 30 inches. But this is confined to the months from April till October; and the water would rush down the slopes to the sea, were it not caught and stored for future use. The limestone formation, with its many caves, made easy the construction of cisterns and reservoirs to collect the rain water: thence supplies were drawn as required during the dry months. Wherever water is found, there is greenery and beauty all through the year.

In the Maritime Plain plentiful supplies of water are found on digging (Gn 26¹⁹). To fill up the wells would make the district uninhabitable. Invading armies were at times reduced to sore straits by the stopping of wells (2 K 3¹⁹, ²⁰), or diversion and concealment of the stream from a fountain (2 Ch 32³¹).

The earliest use of water was doubtless to allay the thirst of man and beast. Refusal of drink to a thirsty man would be universally condemned (Gn 24²¹, Jn 4⁷).

WATER OF BITTERNESS

It is held a meritorious act to set a vessel of water by the wayside for the refreshment of the wayfarer. The same right does not extend to flocks (Gn 24¹¹), for which water must often be purchased. Use and wont have established certain regulations for the watering of animals, infringement of which frequently causes strife (Gn 29²², Ex 21²⁸; cf. Gn 26²⁰ etc.). The art of irrigation (wh. see) was employed in ancient days (Ps 1⁶⁵, Ezk 17⁷ etc.), and reached its fullest development in the Roman period. To this time also belong many ruins of massive aqueducts, leading water to the cities from distant sources.

Cisterns and springs are not common property. Every considerable house has a cistern for rain water from roof and adjoining areas. Importance is attached to plunging in the buckets by which the water is drawn up, this preventing stagnation. The springs, and cisterns made in the open country, are the property of the local family or tribe, from whom water, if required in any quantity, must be bought. The mouth of the well is usually covered with a great stone. Drawing of water for domestic purposes is almost exclusively the work of women (Gn 24¹¹, Jn 4⁷ etc.). In crossing the desert, water is carried in 'bottles' of skin (Gn 21¹⁴).

The 'living,' i.e. 'flowing' water of the spring is greatly preferred to the 'dead' water of the cistern, and it stands frequently for the vitalizing influences of God's grace (Jer 2¹³, Zec 14⁸, Jn 4¹⁰ etc.). Many Scripture references show how the cool, refreshing, fertilizing qualities of water are prized in a thirsty land (Pr 25²⁵, Is 44¹, Jer 17⁸, Lk 16²⁴ etc.). Water is furnished to wash the feet and hands of a guest (Lk 7⁴). To pour water on the hands is the office of a servant (2 K 3¹¹). The sudden spates of the rainy season are the symbol of danger (Ps 18¹⁶ 32⁶, Is 28¹⁷ etc.), and their swift passing symbolizes life's transiency (Job 11¹⁶, Ps 58⁷). Water is also the symbol of weakness and instability (Gn 49⁴, Ezk 21⁷ etc.). Cf. CITY; JERUSALEM, I. 4. For 'Water-gate' see NETHIM, p. 654. W. EWING.

WAY.—1. OT usage.—(a) Of a road or journey (1 S 6¹, 12, 2 K 3²⁰, Jer 2⁹). (b) Figuratively, of a course of conduct or character (Job 17⁹, Ps 91¹¹), either in a good sense as approved by God (Dt 31², Ps 50²³, Is 30²¹), or in a bad sense of man's own choosing (Ps 139²⁴, Is 65², Jer 18¹¹). (c) Of the way of Jehovah, His creative power (Job 26¹¹), His moral rule and commandments (Job 21⁴, Ps 18²⁰, Pr 8²²).

2. NT usage.—(a) In the literal sense (Mt 4¹⁵ 10⁸, Ac 8²⁹). (b) Figuratively, as in OT of human conduct, or God's purpose for man (Mt 21², Ac 14¹⁸, Ro 11⁸, 1 Co 4⁷, Ja 5²⁰). But the gospel greatly enriched the ethical and religious import of the word. Though Jesus was addressed as one who taught 'the way of God in truth' (Mt 22¹⁶), He Himself claimed to show the way to the Father because He is 'the Way, the Truth, and the Life' (Jn 14⁶). By Him 'the two worlds were united' (Westcott). This is equivalent to the Apostolic doctrine that Christ is the gospel (Mk 1¹, Ro 15¹⁹). In He 9⁸ 10²⁰ there is the similar thought that Jesus by His life, death, and exaltation has opened a way whereby men may enter into the holy presence of God, and enables them also to walk therein. In Acts 'the Way' is used with the distinctive meaning of the Christian faith and manner of life, which is the only 'way' that leads to salvation (9² 19³, 24²⁰). This is the 'way of the Lord' so often referred to in the OT, of which Jesus became the final and perfect revealer. The development of the conception may be traced in Ac 16¹⁷ 18²⁵, 20. R. A. FALCONER.

WAYMARK.—In Jer 31²¹ (20) 'the virgin of Israel' is called on to set up waymarks and make guide-posts to mark the way for the returning exiles. The Heb. word tr. 'waymark' apparently means a small stone pillar, similar to our milestones, with an indication of routes and distances.

WEALTH.—This word is used in Scripture occasionally in the Elizabethan and primary sense of 'well-being' (e.g. 1 S 2⁷, Est 10³ etc.), but generally in the more usual sense of affluent possessions (e.g. Gn 34²², Dt 8¹⁷, 18, Ac 19²⁵ etc.).

1. Palestine is described in Dt 8⁷⁻⁹ as rich not only in cereal but also in mineral wealth; but this may be a description more poetic than literal. It is, however, frequently spoken of as 'flowing with milk and honey' (Ex 3⁸, etc. etc.)—products which were in ancient times considered the marks of fertile lands. The wealth of Israel increased as the country developed; and under the monarchy it reached its height. The increased prosperity did not, however, lead to increased righteousness. If in the times of Isaiah the land was 'full of silver and gold,' it was also 'full of idols' (Is 27⁹); the ruling classes oppressed the poor (5⁴, Mic 2²), drunkenness (Is 5¹¹, Mic 2¹¹) and audacity of sin (Is 5¹⁸) were rampant. The national poverty that followed upon the Exile had been removed before the birth of our Lord, as exemplified by the magnificent buildings of Herod. Throughout the OT and NT many instances of wealthy individuals occur: e.g. Abram (Gn 13²), Nabal (1 S 25²), Barzillai (2 S 19²⁴), Zacchæus (Lk 19⁹), Joseph of Arimathea (Mt 27⁵⁷).

2. In the OT the possession of wealth is generally regarded as evidence of God's blessing, and so of righteousness (Ps 12⁴ etc.). But the stubborn facts of the godly being called upon sometimes to suffer, and of the wicked sometimes flourishing, led to a deeper view; and the limited power and transitoriness of wealth were realized (Ps 49; cf. 37, 73, Job 21, Jer 12 etc.). In the NT the problem does not present itself so keenly; as, in the full belief of a future life, the difficulty resolved itself. But the general conduciveness of virtue to earthly prosperity is inculcated; and we are taught that godliness is profitable for this life as well as for that which is to come (1 Ti 4⁸; cf. Mt 6²⁴, Mk 10²⁰).

3. Our Lord's position regarding wealth must be deduced from His practice and teaching. As regards His practice, it is clear that, until He commenced His ministry, He obtained His livelihood by labour, toiling as a carpenter in Nazareth (Mk 6³). During His ministry, He and the Twelve formed a family with a common purse. This store, composed, no doubt, of the personal property of those of their number who originally had wealth, was replenished by gifts of attached disciples (Lk 8³). From it necessary food was purchased and the poor were relieved (Jn 4⁸ 13²⁹). Christ and His Apostles as a band, therefore, owned private property. When our Lord dispatched the Twelve on a special tour for preaching and healing, and when He sent the Seventy on a similar errand, He commanded them to take with them neither money nor food (Mt 10⁹, Lk 10⁴); but these were special instructions on special occasions, and doubtless on their return to Him the former system of a common purse was reverted to (cf. Lk 22²⁸).

As regards Christ's teaching, it is important to balance those sayings which appear to be hostile to any possession of wealth, with those which point in the other direction. On the one hand, we find Him bidding a rich young man sell his all and give to the poor (Mk 10²¹), and then telling His disciples that it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of God. He pictures a possessor of increasing wealth hearing God say, 'Thou foolish one, this night is thy soul required of thee' (Lk 12²⁰); He follows beyond the grave the histories of a rich man and a beggar, placing the rich man in a 'place of torment' and the poor man in Abraham's bosom (Lk 16¹⁹⁻³¹). But there is the other side; for we find that He sympathized deeply with those enduring poverty, assuring them of their Father's care (Mt 6²⁵), preaching especially to them the gospel (Mt 11¹), and pronouncing upon them in their sorrows a special benediction (Lk 6²⁰). He showed that He desired that all should have a sufficiency, by bidding all, rich and poor alike, pray for 'daily bread.' If He taught that riches were indeed an obstacle to entrance into the Kingdom of God, He also taught that it was the 'few' (whether rich or poor) that succeeded in entering it (Mt 7¹⁴). If He told one young man to sell all that he had, clearly He did not intend this counsel to be applicable to all, for He assured of 'salvation' Zacchaeus, who gave but the half of his goods to the poor (Lk 19⁸⁻⁹). If the builder of larger barns is termed the 'foolish one,' his folly is shown not to have been mere acquisition of wealth, but that acquisition apart from riches 'toward God' (Lk 12²¹); and if Dives is in Hades, it is evident that he is not there merely because of his riches, for Lazarus lies in the bosom of Abraham, the typical rich Jew. Further, in the parables of the Pounds and the Talents (Lk 19¹³, Mt 25¹⁴) He teaches, under the symbolism of money, that men are not owners but stewards of all they possess; while in the parable of the Unjust Steward He points out one of the true uses of wealth—namely, to relieve the poor, and so to insure a welcome from them when the eternal tabernacles are entered (Lk 16⁹).

From the foregoing we may conclude that, while our Lord realized that poverty brought sorrow, He also realized that wealth contained an intense peril to spiritual life. He came to raise the world from the material to the spiritual; and wealth, as the very token of the material and temporal, was blinding men to the spiritual and eternal. He therefore urged those to whom it was a special hindrance, to resign it altogether; and charged all to regard it as something for the use of which they would be held accountable.

4. In the Apostolic Church, in its earliest days, we find her members having 'all things common,' and the richer selling their possessions to supply the wants of their poorer brethren (Ac 2⁴⁴, 4³⁴⁻³⁷). But this active enthusiasm does not necessarily show that the Church thought the personal possession of wealth, in itself, unlawful or undesirable; for the case of Ananias clearly indicates that the right to the possession of private property was not questioned (Ac 5⁴). Later in the history of the Church we find St. James inveighing against the proud and heartless rich (Ja 2¹⁻⁵ 5¹⁻⁴), and St. Paul warning men of the spiritual dangers incident to the procuring or possessing of wealth (1 Ti 6⁹, 10¹⁷⁻¹⁹; cf. Rev 3¹⁷).

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—Since the most important of all ancient Oriental systems of weights and measures, the Babylonian, seems to have been based on a unit of length (the measures of capacity and weight being scientifically derived therefrom), it is reasonable to deal with the measures of length before proceeding to measures of capacity and weight. At the same time it seems probable that the measures of length in use in Palestine were based on a more primitive, and (so far as we know) unscientific system, which is to be connected with Egypt. The Babylonian system associated with Gudea (c. a.c. 3000), on statues of whom a scale, indicating a cubit of 30 digits or 19½ inches, has been found engraved, was not adopted by the Hebrews.

I. MEASURES OF LENGTH.

The Hebrew unit was a cubit ($\frac{1}{2}$ of a reed, Ezk 40⁵), containing 2 spans or 6 palms or 24 finger's breadths. The early system did not recognize the foot or the fathom. Measurements were taken both by the 6-cubit rod or reed and the line or 'fillet' (Ezk 40⁵, Jer 31²² 52²¹, 1 K 7¹⁵).

The ancient Hebrew literary authorities for the early Hebrew cubit are as follows. The 'cubit of a man' (Dt 3¹¹) was the unit by which the 'bedstead' of Og, king of Bashan, was measured (cf. Rev 21¹⁷). This implies that at the time to which the passage belongs (apparently not long before the time of Ezekiel) the Hebrews were familiar with more than one cubit, of which that in question was the ordinary working cubit. Solomon's Temple was laid out on the basis of a cubit 'after the first (or ancient) measure' (2 Ch 3³). Now Ezekiel (40⁵ 43¹³) prophesies the building of a Temple on a unit which he describes as a cubit and a hand's breadth, i.e. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the ordinary cubit. As in his vision he is practically reproducing Solomon's Temple, we may infer that Solomon's cubit, i.e. the ancient cubit, was also $\frac{1}{2}$ of the ordinary cubit of Ezekiel's time. We thus have an ordinary cubit of 6, and what we may call (by analogy with the Egyptian system) the royal cubit of 7 hand's breadths. For this double system is curiously parallel to the Egyptian, in which there was a common cubit of 0.450 m. or 17.72 in., which was $\frac{2}{3}$ of the royal cubit of 0.525 m. or 20.67 in. (these data are derived from actual measuring rods). A similar distinction between a common and a royal norm existed in the Babylonian weight-system. Its object there was probably to give the government an advantage in the case of taxation; probably also in the case of measures of length the excess of the royal over the common measure had a similar object.

We have at present no means of ascertaining the exact dimensions of the Hebrew ordinary and royal cubits. The balance of evidence is certainly in favour of a fairly close approximation to the Egyptian system. The estimates vary from 16 to 25.2 inches. They are based on: (1) the Siloam inscription, which says: 'The waters flowed from the outlet to the Pool 1200 cubits,' or, according to another reading, '1000 cubits.' The length of the canal is estimated at 537.6 m., which yields a cubit of 0.525 to 0.527 m. (20.67 to 20.75 in.) or 0.538 m. (21.18 in.) according to the reading adopted. Further uncertainty is occasioned by the possibility of the number 1200 or 1000 being only a round number. The evidence of the Siloam inscription is thus of a most unsatisfactory kind. (2) The measurements of tombs. Some of these appear to be constructed on the basis of the Egyptian cubit; others seem to yield cubits of 0.575 m. (about 22.6 in.) or 0.641 m. (about 25.2 in.). The last two cubits seem to be improbable. The measurements of another tomb (known as the Tomb of Joshua) seem to confirm the deduction of the cubit of about 0.525 m. (3) The measurement of grains of barley. This has been objected to for more than one reason. But the Rabbinical tradition allowed 144 barley-corns of medium size, laid side by side, to the cubit; and it is remarkable that a recent careful attempt made on these lines resulted in a cubit of 17.77 in. (0.451 m.), which is the Egyptian common cubit. (4) Recently it has been pointed out that Josephus, when using Jewish measures of capacity, etc., which differ from the Greek or Roman, is usually careful to give an equation explaining the measures to his Greek or Roman readers, while in the case of the cubit he does not do so, but seems to regard the Hebrew and the Roman-Attic as practically the same. The Roman-Attic cubit (1½ ft.) is fixed at 0.444 m. or 17.57 in., so that we have here a close approximation to the Egyptian common cubit. Probably in Josephus' time the Hebrew common cubit was, as ascertained by the methods mentioned above, 0.450 m.; and the difference between this and the Attic-Roman was regarded by him as negligible for ordinary purposes. (5) The Mishna. No data of any value for the exact determination of the cubit are to be obtained from this source. Four cubits is given as the length of a loculus in a rock-cut tomb; it has been pointed out that, allowing some 2 inches for the pier, and taking 5 ft. 6 in. to 5 ft. 8 in. as the average height of the Jewish body, this gives 4 cubits = 5 ft. 10 in., or 17½ in. to the cubit. On the cubit in Herod's Temple, see A. R. S. Kennedy in art. TEMPLE (p. 902^b), and in artt. in ExpT xx. [1908], p. 24 ff.

The general inference from the above five sources of information is that the Jews had two cubits, a shorter and a longer, corresponding closely to the Egyptian common and royal cubit. The equivalents are expressed in the following table:—

	Royal System.		Common System.
	Metres.	Inches.	Metres.	Inches.
Finger's breadth .	0.022	0.86	0.019	0.74
Palm = 4 fingers .	0.088	3.44	0.075	2.95
Span = 3 palms .	0.262	10.33	0.225	8.86
Cubit = 2 spans .	0.525	20.67	0.450	17.72
Reed = 6 cubits .	3.150	124.02	2.700	106.32

Parts and multiples of the unit.—The ordinary parts of the cubit have already been mentioned. They occur as follows: the finger's breadth or digit (Jer 52^a, the daktyl of Josephus); the palm or hand's breadth (1 K 7^a, Ezk 40^a, 43^a etc.); the span (Ex 28^a 39^a etc.). A special measure is the gomed, which was the length of the sword of Ehud (Jg 3^a), and is not mentioned elsewhere. It was explained by the commentators as a short cubit (hence EV 'cubit'), and it has been suggested that it was the cubit of 5 palms, which is mentioned by Rabbi Judah. The Greeks also had a short cubit, known as the pygón, of 5 palms, the distance from the elbow to the first joint of the fingers. The reed (= 6 cubits) is the only definite OT multiple of the cubit (Ezk 40^a). This is the akaina of the Greek writers. The pace of 2 S 6^a is probably not meant to be a definite measure. A 'little way' (Gn 35^a 48^a, 2 K 5^a) is also indefinite. Syr. and Arab. translators compared it with the parasang, but it cannot merely for that reason be regarded as fixed. A day's journey (Nu 11^a, 1 K 19^a, Jon 3^a, Lk 24^a) and its multiples (Gn 30^a, Nu 10^a) are of course also variable.

The Sabbath day's journey (Ac 1^a) was usually computed at 2000 cubits. This was the distance by which the ark preceded the host of the Israelites, and it was consequently presumed that this distance might be covered on the Sabbath, since the host must be allowed to attend worship at the ark. The distance was doubled by a legal fiction: on the eve of the Sabbath, food was placed at a spot 2000 cubits on, and this new place thus became the traveller's place within the meaning of the prescription of Ex 16^a; there were also other means of increasing the distance. The Mt. of Olives was distant a Sabbath day's journey from Jerusalem, and the same distance is given by Josephus as 5 stadia, thus confirming the 2000 cubits computation. But in the Talmud the Sabbath day's journey is equated to the mīl of 3000 cubits or 7½ furlongs; and the measure 'threescore furlongs' of Lk 24^a, being an exact multiple of this distance, seems to indicate that this may have been one form (the earlier?) of the Sabbath day's journey.

In later times, a Byzantine writer of uncertain date, Julian of Ascalon, furnishes information as to the measures in use in Palestine (Provincial measures, derived from the work of the architect Julian of Ascalon, from the laws or customs prevailing in Palestine, is the title of the table). From this we obtain (omitting doubtful points) the following table:—

1. The finger's breadth.
2. The palm = 4 finger's breadths.
3. The cubit = 1½ feet = 6 palms.
4. The pace = 2 cubits = 3 feet = 12 palms.
5. The fathom = 2 paces = 4 cubits = 6 feet.
6. The reed = 1½ fathoms = 6 cubits = 9 feet = 36 palms.
7. The plethron = 10 reeds = 15 fathoms = 30 paces = 60 cubits = 90 feet.
8. The stadion or furlong = 6 plethra = 60 reeds = 100 fathoms = 200 paces = 400 cubits = 600 feet.
9. (a) The milion or mile, according to Eratosthenes and Strabo = 8½ stadia = 833½ fathoms.
- (b) The milion, according to the present use = 7½ stadia = 750 fathoms = 1500 paces = 3000 cubits.
10. The present milion of 7½ stadia = 750 'geometric' fathoms = 833½ 'simple' fathoms; for 9 geometric fathoms = 10 simple fathoms.

We may justifiably assume that the 3000 cubits of 9 (b) are the royal cubits of 0.525 m. The geometric and simple measures according to Julian thus work out as follows:—

	Geometric.		Simple.
	Metres.	Inches.	Metres.	Inches.
Finger's breadth .	0.022	0.86	0.020	0.79
Palm	0.088	3.44	0.080	3.11
Cubit	0.525	20.67	0.473	18.62
Fathom	2.100	82.68	1.890	74.49

Measures of area.—For smaller measures of area there seem to have been no special names, the dimensions of the sides of a square being usually stated. For land measures, two methods of computation were in use. (1) The first, as in most countries, was to state area in terms of the amount that a yoke of oxen could plough in a day (cf. the Latin jugerum). Thus in Is 5¹⁰ (possibly also in the corrupt 1 S 14^a) we have '10 yoke' (tsemed) of vineyard. Although definite authority is lacking, we may perhaps equate the Hebrew yoke of land to the Egyptian unit of land measure, which was 100 royal cubits square (0.2756 hectares or 0.6810 acre). The Greeks called this measure the aroura. (2) The second measure was the amount of seed required to sow an area. Thus 'the sowing of a homer of barley' was computed at the price of 50 shekels of silver (Lv 27^a). The dimensions of the trench which Elijah dug about his altar (1 K 18^a) have also recently been explained on the same principle; the trench (i.e. the area enclosed by it) is described as being 'like a house of two seahs of seed' (AV and RV wrongly 'as great as would contain two measures of seed'). This measure 'house of two seahs' is the standard of measurement in the Mishna, and is defined as the area of the court of the Tabernacle, or 100 × 50 cubits (c. 1648 sq. yds. or 0.1379 hectares). Other measures of capacity were used in the same way, and the system was Babylonian in origin; there are also traces of the same system in the West, under the Roman Empire.

II. MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

The hin (Gr. hein) was a liquid measure = $\frac{1}{3}$ seah. In Lv 19³⁰ the LXX renders it chous. But Josephus and Jerome and the Talmud equate it to 2 Attic choes = 12 sextarii. The hin was divided into halves, thirds (= cab), quarters, sixths, and twelfths (= log). In later times there were a 'sacred hin' = $\frac{1}{2}$ of the ordinary hin, and a large hin = 2 sacred hins = $\frac{1}{3}$ ordinary hin. The

When we come to investigate the actual contents of the various measures, we are, in the first instance, thrown back on the (apparently only approximate) equations with the Roman sextarius (Gr. zestes) and its multiples already mentioned. The log would then be the equivalent of the sextarius, the bath of the metrêtes, the cab (of 6 logs) of the Ptolemaic chous. If log and sextarius were exact equivalents, the ephah of 72 logs would = 39.39 litres, = nearly 8½ gallons. This is on the usual assumption that the sextarius was 0.545 l. or 0.96 imperial pints. But the exact capacity of the sextarius is disputed, and a capacity as high as 0.562 l. or 0.99 imperial pint is given for the sextarius by an actually extant measure. This would give as the capacity of the ephah-bath 40.46 l. or 71.28 pints. But it is highly improbable that the equation of log to sextarius was more than approximate. It is more easy to confound closely resembling measures of capacity than of length, area, or weight.

Other methods of ascertaining the capacity of the ephah are the following. We may assume that it was the same as the Babylonian unit of 0.505 l. (0.89 pint). This would give an ephah of 36.37 l., or nearly 8 gallons or 66.5 sextarii of the usually assumed weight, and more or less squares with Epiphanius' equation of the seah or ½ ephah with 22 sextarii. Or we may connect it with the Egyptian system, thus: both the ephah-bath and the Egyptian-Ptolemaic artabe are equated to the Attic metrêtes of 72 sextarii. Now, in the case of the artabe this is only an approximation, for it is known from native Egyptian sources (which give the capacity in terms of a volume of water of a certain weight) that the artabe was about 36.45 l., or a little more than 64 pints. Other calculations, as from a passage of Josephus, where the cor is equated to 41 Attic (Græco-Roman) modii (i.e. 656 sextarii), give the same result. In this passage modii is an almost certain emendation of medimni, the confusion between the two being natural in a Greek MS. There are plenty of other vague approximations, ranging from 60 to 72 sextarii. Though the passage of Josephus is not quite certain in its text, we may accept it as having the appearance of precise determination, especially since it gives a result not materially differing from other sources of information.

In the above table, the values of the measures are given according to three estimates, viz. (1) log = Babylonian unit of 0.505 l.; (2) ephah = 65 pints; (3) log = sextarius of 0.99 pint.

Foreign measures of capacity mentioned in NT.—Setting aside words which strictly denote a measure of capacity, but are used loosely to mean simply a vessel (e.g. 'cup' in Mk 7), the following, among others, have been noted. Bushel (Mt 5*) is the tr. of modius, which represents seah. Firkin is used (Jn 2*) to represent the Greek metrêtes, the rough equivalent of the bath. Measure in Rev 6* represents the Gr. choinix of about 2 pints.

III. MEASURES OF WEIGHT.

The system of weights used in Palestine was derived from Babylonia. Egypt does not seem to have exerted any influence in this respect. The chief denominations in the system were the talent (Gr. talanton, Heb. kikkar meaning, apparently, a round cake-like object), the mina (Gr. mina, Heb. maneh; tr. 'pound' in 1 K 10¹⁷ and elsewhere, though 'pound' in Jn 12¹⁹ means the Roman pound of 327.45 grammes or 505.3 grs.

tro), and the shekel (Gr. siklos or siglos, Heb. sheqel, from shâqal, 'to weigh'). The shekel further was divided into 20 gerahs (gerah apparently—the Babylonian guru, a small weight of silver). [References to shekels or other denominations of precious metal in pre-exilic times must be to uncoined metal, not to coins, which are of later origin.] For ordinary purposes 60 shekels made a mina, and 60 minæ a talent; but for the precious metals a mina of 50 shekels was employed, although the talent contained 60 minæ, as in the other case. There were two systems, the heavy and the light, the former being double of the latter. The evidence of certain extant Bab. weights proves that there was a very complex system, involving at least two norms, one of which, the royal, used for purposes of taxation, was higher than the other, the common. For our purposes, we may here confine ourselves to the common norm in the heavy and light systems. It may, however, be mentioned that the 'king's weight,' according to which Absalom's hair weighed 200 shekels (2 S 14²⁹), is probably to be referred to this royal norm. Combining the evidence of the extant Bab. weights with the evidence of later coins of various countries of the ancient world, and with the knowledge, derived from a statement in Herodotus, that the ratio of gold to silver was as 13½ to 1, we obtain the following results:—

	Heavy.		Light.
	Grains Troy.	Grammes.	Grains Troy.	Grammes.
Talent	757,340	49,077	378,690	24,539
Mina	12,623	818	6,311.5	409
Shekel	252.5	16.36	126.23	8.18
Value of the gold shekel in silver	3,366.6	218.1	1,684.3	109.1
i.e., ten pieces of silver of	336.6	21.81	168.4	10.91
Or fifteen pieces of silver of	224.4	14.54	112.2	7.27

N. B.—One heavy talent = 98.154 lbs. avoirdupois; one heavy mina = 1.636 lb. avoirdupois.

Now the pieces of ½ and ¼ of the value of the gold shekel in silver were the units on which were based systems known as the Babylonian or Persian and the Phœnician respectively; the reason for the names being that these two standards seem to have been associated by the Greeks, the first with Persia, whose coins were struck on this standard, the second with the great Phœnician trading cities, Sidon, Tyre, etc. For convenience' sake the names 'Babylonian' and 'Phœnician' may be retained, although it must be remembered that they are conventional. The above table gives the equivalents in weights on the two systems, both for the precious metals (in which the mina weighed 50 shekels) and for trade (in which it weighed 60 shekels).

The evidence of actual weights found in Palestine is as follows: 1. 2. 3. Three stone weights from Tell Zakariya, inscribed apparently netseph, and weighing—10.21 grammes = 157.564 grains troy.

9.5 " = 146.687 "

9.0 " = 138.891 "

4. A weight with the same inscription, from near Jerusalem, weighing 8.61 grammes = 134.891 grains troy.

5. A weight from Samaria inscribed apparently 1 netseph and 1 shekel, weighing 2.54 grammes = 39.2 grains troy; yielding a netseph of 9.16 grammes = 156.8 grains troy. This has been dated in the 8th cent. B.C.; and all the weights are apparently of pre-exilic date. There are other weights from Gezer, which have, without due cause, been connected with the netseph standard; and a second set of weights from Gezer, Jerusalem, Zakariya, and Tell el-Judeideh may be ignored, as they seem to bear Cypriote inscriptions, and represent a standard weight of 93 grammes maximum. Some addition must be allowed to Nos. 2 and 3 of the above-mentioned netseph weights, for fracture, and probably to No. 4, which is pierced. The highest of these weights is some 10 grains or 0.7 grammes less than the light Bab. shekel. It probably, therefore, represents an independent standard, or at least a deliberate modification, not an accidental degradation, of the Bab. standard. Weights from Naucratis point to a standard of about 80 grains, the double of which would be 160 grains, which is near enough to the actual weight of our specimens (maximum 157½ grains). We need not here concern ourselves with the origin of this standard, or with the meaning of netseph; there can be no doubt of the existence of such a standard, and there is much probability that it is connected with the standard which was in use at Naucratis. Three weights from Lachish (Tell el-Hesi) also indicate the existence of the same 80-grain standard in Palestine. The standard in use at the city of Aradus (Arvad) for the coinage is generally identified with the Babylonian; but as the shekel there only exceptionally exceeds 165 grains, it, too, may have been an approximation to the standard we are considering. But in Hebrew territory there can be no doubt that this early standard was displaced after the Exile by a form of the Phœnician shekel of 14.54 grammes, or 224.4 grains. It has, indeed, been thought that this shekel can be derived by a certain process from the shekel of 160 grains; but on the whole the derivation from the gold shekel of 126.23 grains suggested above is preferable.

The evidence as to the actual use of this weight in Palestine is as follows: From Ex 38²⁴, it appears that the Hebrew talent contained 3000 shekels. Now, Josephus equates the mina used for gold to 2½ Roman pounds, which is 12,633.3 grains troy, or 818.625 grammes; this is only 10 grains heavier than the heavy mina given above. From Josephus also we know that the kikkar or talent contained 100 minæ. The talent for precious metals, as we have seen, contained 3000 shekels; therefore the shekel should be $\frac{100 \times 3000}{2.5 \times 16}$ grains = 421 grains. We thus have a heavy shekel of 421 grains, and a light one of 210.5 grains. There is other evidence equating the Hebrew shekel to weights varying from 210.48 to 210.55 grains. This is generally supposed to be the Phœnician shekel of 224.4 grains in a slightly reduced form. Exactly the same kind of reduction took place at Sidon in the course of the 4th cent. B.C., where, probably owing to a fall in the price of gold, the weight of the standard silver shekel fell from about 28.60 grammes (441.36 grains) to 26.30 grammes (405.9 grains). A change in the ratio between gold and silver from 13½:1 to 12½:1 would practically, in a country with a coinage, necessitate a change in the weight of the shekel such as seems to have taken place here; and although the Jews had no coinage of their own before the time of the Maccabees, they would naturally be influenced by the weights in use in Phœnicia. The full weight shekel of the old standard probably remained in use as the 'shekel of the sanctuary,' for that weight was 20 gerahs (Ezk 45¹², Ex 30¹³), which is translated in the LXX by '20 obols,' meaning, presumably, 20 Attic obols of the time; and this works out at 224.2 grains. This shekel was used not only for the silver paid for the 'ransom of souls,' but also for gold, copper, and spices (Ex 30²⁴, 24 38²⁶); in fact, the Priests' Code regarded it as the proper system for all estimations (Lv 27²⁴). The beka = ½ shekel is mentioned in Gn 24²², Ex 38²⁴.

Foreign weights in the NT.—The 'pound' of spikenard (Jn 12³) or of myrrh and aloes (19¹¹) is best explained as the Roman libra (Gr. litra) of 327.45 grammes. The 'pound' in Lk 19¹² is the money-mina or ½ of the Roman-Attic talent (see art. MONEY, 7 (j)). The 'talent' mentioned in Rev 16¹⁹ also probably belongs to the same system.

WHEAT (chittah, Gn 30¹⁴, Ex 34²² etc.; sitos, Mt 3¹² 13³⁰, 29, 30, Lk 3¹⁷ 16⁷ 22³¹ etc.).—The wheat of Palestine is mostly of the bearded varieties; it is not only eaten as bread, but also boiled, unground, to make the peasant's dish burghul, which is in turn pounded with meat in a mortar (cf. Pr 27²²) to make the festive delicacy kibbeh. Wheat is grown all over the valleys and plains of W. Palestine, though to a less extent than barley, but it is cultivated in the largest quantities in the Nuqra or plain of the Hauran, one of the finest grain-growing countries in the world. The wheat harvest occurs from April to June; its time was looked upon as one of the divisions of the year (Ex 34²², Jg 15¹, 1 S 12¹⁷). The expressions 'fat of wheat' (Ps 81¹⁶ mg., 147¹⁴ mg.) and 'the fat of kidneys of wheat' (Dt 32¹⁴) refer to the finest flour of wheat.

WHEEL.—The various parts of a cart or chariot wheel are enumerated in connexion with the bronze wheels of Solomon's lavers (1 K 7³⁰, 22¹). In RV v. 23 reads: 'And the work of the wheels was like the work of a chariot wheel: their axletrees, and their fellows, and their spokes, and their naves were all molten' (cf. AV). In carts and chariots the essential parts were, of course, of wood. The fellows were made in segments doweled together. For illust. see Wilkinson. Anc. Egy. i. 234 ff. The finest specimen of a Roman chariot wheel as yet found has the fellow, 'which is formed of a single piece of wood bent,' and the nave shod with iron, the latter being also 'bushed with iron' (Scott. Hist. Rev., Oct. 1905, p. 123, with illust.). For the potter's wheel, see POTTER. Wells and cisterns were also furnished with wheels, over which the rope passed for drawing up the water-bucket (Ec 12⁹). See also CART, CHARIOT.

WHIRLWIND represents two Heb. words—sāphāh (Job 37⁹, Pr 1⁷ etc., also tr. 'storm' in Job 21¹⁶, Ps 83¹⁵, Is 29⁶ etc.), and sa'ar or sā'arāh (2 K 2¹, Job 38¹, Jer 23¹⁹ etc., also tr. 'tempest,' and 'stormy wind,' Ps 55⁸ 83¹⁵ 107³⁵, Ezk 13¹³ etc.). The words do not necessarily mean 'whirlwind,' and are applied to any furious storm. From the context, however, in certain passages, we gather that whirlwind is intended—a violent wind moving in a circle round its axis (2 K 2¹¹, Job 38¹ etc.). It often works great havoc in its path, as it sweeps across the country. Drawing up sand, dust, straw, and other light articles as it gyrates, it presents the appearance of a great pillar—an object of fear to travellers and dwellers in the desert. Passing over the sea, it draws up the water, and the bursting of the column causes the water-spout. God spake to Job from the whirlwind (Job 40⁶); the modern Arabian regards it with superstitious dread, as the residence of demons.

WHITE.—See COLOURS, § 1.

WHITE OF AN EGG (EV Job 6⁴, RVm 'juice of purslain').—The allusion should perhaps be understood to be the juice of some insipid plant, probably Portulaca oleracea, L., the common purslane. 'White of an egg' (lit., on this view, 'slime of the yoke') is still, however, accepted by many interpreters.

WHORE.—This term is generally replaced in RV by harlot (wh. see).

WIDOW.—Widows from their poverty and unprotectedness, are regarded in OT as under the special guardianship of God (Ps 68⁵ 146⁹, Pr 15²⁵, Dt 10¹⁸, Jer 49¹¹); and consequently due regard for their wants was looked upon as a mark of true religion, ensuring a blessing on those who showed it (Job 29¹³ 31¹⁶, Is 1¹⁷, Jer 7⁶, 22³, 4); while neglect of, cruelty or injustice towards them were considered marks of wickedness meriting punishment from God (Job 22⁹, 10, 24²⁰, 21, Ps 94⁶, Is 1¹² 10³, Zec 7¹⁰, 14, Mal 3⁵). The Book of Deut. is especially rich in such counsels, insisting that widows be granted full justice (24¹⁷ 27¹⁹), that they be received as guests at sacrificial meals (14²⁹ 16¹¹, 14, 26¹¹ etc.), and that they be suffered to glean unmolested in field, oliveyard, and vineyard (24¹⁹ etc.). See, further, INHERITANCE, i. 2 (c); MARRIAGE, 6.

The earliest mention of widows in the history of the Christian Church is found in Ac 6¹, where the Grecian Jews murmured 'against the Hebrews because their widows were neglected' in the daily distribution of alms or food. In course of time these pensioners became an excessive burden on the finances of the Church. We thus find St. Paul dealing with the matter in 1 Ti 5³⁻¹⁶, where he charges relatives and Christian friends to relieve those widows with whom they are personally connected (vv. 4, 8, 15), so that the Church might be the more able to relieve those who were 'widows indeed' (i.e. widows in actual poverty and without any one responsible for their support) (vv. 3, 8, 16). He further directs that 'none be enrolled as widows' except those who were sixty years of age, of unimpeachable character, and full of good works; and he adds that 'the younger widows' should be 'refused' (i.e. not enrolled), for experience had shown that they 'waxed wanton against Christ' and, re-marrying, 'rejected their first faith.' Since it could not have been the Apostle's wish that only widows over sixty should receive pecuniary help from the Church (for many young widows might be in great poverty), and since he could not describe the re-marriage of such a widow-pensioner as a rejection of her faith, it follows that the list of widows, from which the younger widows were to be excluded, was not the list of those who were in receipt of Church relief, but rather a list of those, from among the pensioner-widows, who were considered suitable by age and character to engage officially in Church work. Therefore we may see in this passage a proof of the existence thus early in the history of the Church of that ecclesiastical order of 'Widows' which we find mentioned frequently in post-Apostolic times.

WIFE.—See FAMILY, 2; MARRIAGE.

WILDERNESS, DESERT.—These terms stand for several Heb. and Gr. words, with different shades of meaning.

1. midbār (from dabar, 'to drive') means properly the land to which the cattle were driven, and is used of dry pasture land where scanty grazing was to be found. It occurs about 280 times in OT and is usually tr. 'wilderness,' though we have 'desert' about a dozen times. It is the place where wild animals roam: pelicans (Ps 102⁷), wild asses (Job 24⁵, Jer 24¹), ostriches (La 4¹), jackals (Mal 1³); and is without settled inhabitants, though towns or settlements of nomadic tribes may be found (Jos 15⁶¹, 62, Is 42¹¹). This term is usually applied to the Wilderness of the Wanderings or the Arabian desert, but may refer to any other waste. Special waste tracts are distinguished: wilderness of Shur, Zin, Paran, Kadesh, Maon, Ziph, Tekoa, Moab, Edom, etc.

2. arābāh (probably from a word meaning 'dry') signifies a dry, desolate, unfertile tract of land, 'steppe,' or 'desert plain.' As a proper name, it is applied to the great plain including the Jordan Valley and extending S. to the Gulf of Akabah, 'the Arabah' but it is applied also to steppes in general, and translated 'wilderness,' 'desert,' and sometimes in pl. 'plains,' e.g. of Moab, of Jericho.

3. chorbāh (from a root 'to be waste or desolate') is properly applied to cities or districts once inhabited now lying waste, and is translated 'wastes,' 'deserts,' 'desolations,' though it is once used of the Wilderness of the Wanderings (Is 48²¹).

4. tsiyāh meaning 'dry ground' is twice translated 'wilderness' in AV: Job 30⁸ (RV 'dry ground'), Ps 78¹⁷ (RV 'desert,' RVm 'a dry land').

5. whū has the special meaning of a 'wild desolate expanse.' In Job 6¹⁰ it is the waste where the caravans perish. It is applied to the primeval chaos (Gn 1²), also to the Wilderness of the Wanderings (Dt 32¹⁰ 'waste howling wilderness').

6. The NT terms are erēmos and erēmia, the former being used either as noun or as adjective, with 'place' or 'country' understood. Generally the noun is tr. 'wilderness,' the adjective 'desert' in the English versions.

On deserts named in NT see art. on respective names.

WILL.—'Will' and 'would' are often independent verbs in AV, and being now merely auxiliaries, their force is liable to be missed by the English reader. Thus Mt 11⁴ 'if ye will receive it' (RV 'if ye are willing to receive it'); Jn 14¹ 'Jesus would go forth into Galilee' (RV 'was minded to go forth').

WILL.—See PAUL, p. 692^a; TESTAMENT.

WILLOW.—(ārābm, Lv 23⁴⁰, Job 40², Ps 137¹, Is 15⁷ 44⁴ [cf. Arab. gharab 'willow' or 'poplar']; tsaphāphāh, Ezk 17³ [cf. Arab. saṣaf 'the willow']).—Most of the references are to a tree growing beside water, and apply well to the willow, of which two varieties, Salix fragilis and S. alba, occur plentifully by watercourses in the Holy Land. Some travellers consider the poplar, especially the willow-like Populus euphratica, of the same Nat. Ord. (Salicaceae) as the willows, more probable. Tristram, without much evidence, considered that tsaphāphāh might be the oleander, which covers the banks of so many streams. E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

WIMPLE.—Only Is 3² AV; RV shawls. The precise article of dress intended is unknown.

WIND.—The winds in Heb. are designated by the four cardinal points of the compass. 'South wind,' e.g., may be either S., S.W., or S.E.; and so with the others. Cool winds come from the N., moist winds from the western sea, warm winds from the S., and dry winds, often laden with fine sand, from the eastern deserts. Warmth and moisture, therefore, depend much upon the direction of the winds. During the dry season, from May till October, the prevailing winds are from the N. and N.W.; they do much to temper the heat of summer (Ca 4¹⁶, Job 37²). In Sept. and Oct., E. and S.E. winds are frequent; blowing from the deserts, their dry heat causes the furniture to crack, and makes life a burden (Hos 13¹⁴). Later, the winds from the S. prolong the warmth of summer (Lk 12³⁶); then the W. and S.W. winds bring the rain (1 K 18⁴, Lk 12³⁶). East winds earlier in the year often work great destruction on vegetation (Ezk 17¹⁰). Under their influence strong plants droop, and flowers quickly wither (Ps 103¹⁶).

Of the greatest value for all living things is the perpetual interchange of land and sea breezes. At sunrise a gentle air stirs from the sea, crosses the plain, and creeps up the mountains. At sunset the cooling air begins to slip down seaward again, while the upper strata move landward from the sea. The moisture thus carried ashore is precipitated in refreshing dew.

The 'tempestuous wind' (Ac 27¹⁴), called Euroclydon or Euraquilo (wh. see), was the E.N.E. wind so prevalent in the eastern Mediterranean, called by sailors to-day 'the Levanter.' W. EWING.

WINDOW.—See HOUSE, § 7.

WINE AND STRONG DRINK.—Taken together in this order, the two terms 'wine' and 'strong drink' are continually used by OT writers as an exhaustive classification of the fermented beverages then in use (Lv 10⁹, 1 S 1¹⁵, Pr 20¹, and oft.). The all but universal usage in OT—in NT 'strong drink' is mentioned only Lk 1¹⁵—is to restrict 'wine' (yayin) to the beverage prepared from the juice of the grape, and to denote by 'strong drink' (shēkar) every other sort of intoxicating liquor.

1. Before proceeding to describe the methods by which wine in particular was made in the period covered by the canonical writings, it will be advisable to examine briefly the more frequently used terms for wine and strong drink. This examination may begin with the term shēkar, which in virtue of its root-meaning always denotes 'intoxicating drink.' In a former study of this subject ('Wine and Strong Drink' in EBi iv. col. 5309 f.), the present writer has given reasons for believing that among the early Semites a name similar to shēkar and the Babylonian shikaru was first given to the fermented juice of the date, and that from signifying date-wine the name passed to all other fermented liquors. At a later period, when the ancestors of the Hebrews became acquainted with the vine and its culture, the Indo-Germanic term represented by the Greek oinos (with the digamma, woinos) and the Latin vinum was borrowed, under the form yayin, to denote the fermented juice of the grape. The older term shēkar then became restricted, as we have seen, to intoxicants other than grape wine.

Another important term, of uncertain etymology, 'on which,' in Driver's words, 'much has been written—not always wisely,' is ārōsh, in our EV sometimes rendered 'wine,' sometimes 'new wine,' but in Amer. RV consistently 'new wine.' Strictly speaking, ārōsh is the freshly expressed grape juice, before and during fermentation, technically known as 'must' (from Lat. mustum). In this sense it is frequently named as a valued product of the soil with 'fresh oil' (Dt 7¹³ 11¹⁴ etc.),—that is, the raw, unclarified oil as it flows from the oil-press, to which it exactly corresponds. In some OT passages, however, and notably Hos 4¹¹, where ārōsh is named with yayin and whoredom, as taking away the understanding (RV), it evidently denotes the product of fermentation. Hence it may be said that ārōsh is applied not only to the 'must' in the wine-fat (see § 3), but to 'new wine' before it has fully matured and become yayin, or, as Driver suggests in his careful study of the OT occurrences (Joel and Amos, 79 f.), 'to a light kind of wine such as we know, from the classical writers, that the ancients were in the habit of making by checking the fermentation of the grape juice before it had run its full course' (see also the discussion in EBi iv. 5307 f.).

Of the rarer words for 'wine' mention may be made of chemer (Dt 32⁴, and, in a cognate form, Ezr 6⁹, Dn 5⁴), which denotes wine as the result of fermentation, from a root signifying 'to ferment,' and zetsa, a poetical synonym of ārōsh, and like it used both of the fresh juice and of the fermented liquor (see Jl 1⁵, Is 49²³); in Am 9¹³ it is rendered 'sweet wine,' which suggests the gleukos (EV 'new wine') of Ac 2¹³. Reference may also be made to the poetical expression 'the blood of the grape' (Gn 49¹¹, Dt 32¹⁴) and to the later 'fruit of the vine' (Mt 26²⁹ and ||) of the Gospels and the Mishna.

2. The Promised Land was pre-eminently a 'land of wine . . . and vineyards' (2 K 18²⁰), as is attested by the widely scattered remains of the ancient presses. A normal winepress consisted of three parts, two rock-hewn troughs at different levels with a connecting channel between them. The upper trough or press-vat (gath—the 'winefat' of Is 63¹, elsewhere generally 'winepress') had a larger superficial area, but was much shallower than the lower trough or wine-vat (yagab, Is 5¹, cf. RVm). The relative sizes may be seen from a typical press described by Robinson, of which the upper trough measured 8 feet square and was 15 inches deep, while the lower was 4 feet square and 3 feet deep. The distinction between the two is entirely obscured in EV, and is not always preserved in the original.

The grapes were brought from the adjoining vineyard in baskets, and were either spread out for a few days, with a view to increase the amount of sugar and diminish the amount of water in the grapes, or were at once thrown into the press-vat. There they were thoroughly trodden with the bare feet, the juice flowing through the conducting channel into the lower wine-vat. The next process consisted in piling the husks and stalks into a heap in the middle of the vat, and subjecting the mass to mechanical pressure by means of a wooden press-beam, one end of which was fixed into a socket in the wall of the vat or of the adjacent rock, while the other end was weighted with stones.

While the above may be considered the normal construction of a Hebrew winepress, it is evident, both from the extant specimens and from the detailed references to wine-making in the Mishna, that the number of troughs or vats might be as high as four (see the press described and illustrated in PEFS, 1899, 41 ff.), or as low as one. The object of a third vat was to allow the 'must' to settle and clarify in the second before running it off into the third. Where only one vat is found, it may have served either as a press-vat, in which case the 'must' was at once transferred to earthen jars (see next section), or as a wine-vat to receive the 'must,' the grapes having been pressed in a large wooden trough, such as the Egyptians used (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, I, 385 with illust.). This arrangement would obviously be required where a suitable rock surface was not available. In such a case, indeed, a rock-hewn trough of any sort was dispensed with, a vat for the wooden press being supplied by a large stone hollowed out for the purpose, an excellent specimen of which was found at Tell es-Safi, and is figured in Bliss and Macalister's Excavations, etc., p. 24 (see, for further details, the index of that work, under 'Vats').

3. Returning to the normal press-system, we find that the 'must' was usually left in the wine-vat to undergo the first or 'tumultuous' fermentation, after which it was drawn off (Hag 2¹⁰, lit. 'baled out'), or, where the vat had a spout, simply run off, into large jars or into wine-skins (Mt 9¹⁷ and ||) for the 'after-fermentation.' The modern Syrian wines are said to complete their first fermentation in from four to seven days, and to be ready for use at the end of two to four months. In the Mishna it is ordained that 'new wine' cannot be presented at the sanctuary for the drink-offering until it has stood for at least forty days in the fermenting jars.

When the fermentation had run its full course, the wine was racked off into smaller jars and skins, the latter for obvious reasons being preferred by travellers (Jos 9¹¹). At the same time, the liquor was strained (Mt 23⁴; cf. Is 28¹ 'wines on the lees well refined,' i.e. strained) through a metal or earthenware strainer, or through a linen cloth. In the further course of maturing, in order to prevent the wine from thickening on the lees (Zeph 1¹³ RVm), it was from time to time decanted from one vessel to another. The even tenor of Mosibite history is compared to wine to which this process has not been applied (Jer 48¹¹). When sufficiently refined, the wine was poured into jars lined with pitch, which were carefully closed and sealed and stored in the wine cellars (1 Ch 27²⁷). The Lebanon (Hos 14⁷) and Hebron (Exk 27¹²), to the N.W. of Damascus, were two localities specially celebrated for their wines.

It may be stated at this point that no trace can be found, among the hundreds of references to the preparation and use of wine in the Mishna, of any means employed to preserve wine in the unfermented state. It is even improbable that with the means at their disposal the Jews could have so preserved it had they wished (cf. Professor Macalister's statement as to the 'impossibility' of unfermented wine at this period, in Hastings' DB li, 34^b).

4. Of all the fermented liquors, other than wine, with which the Hebrews are likely to have been familiar, the oldest historically was almost certainly that made from dates (cf. § 1). These, according to Pliny, were steeped in water before being sent to the press, where they were probably treated as the olives were treated in the oil-press (see OIL). Date wine was greatly prized by the Babylonians, and is said by Herodotus to have been the principal article of Assyrian commerce.

In the Mishna there is frequent mention also of cider or 'apple' wine, made from the quince or whatever other fruit the 'apple' of the Hebrews may signify. The only wine, other than 'the fruit of the vine,' mentioned by name in OT is the 'sweet wine' of pomegranates (Ca 8² RVm). Like the dates, these fruits were first crushed in the oil-mill, after which the juice was allowed to ferment. In the Mishna, further, we find references to various fermented liquors imported from abroad, among them the beer for which Egypt was famed. A striking and unexpected witness to the extent to which the wines of the West were imported has recently been furnished by the handles of wine jars, especially of amphorae from Rhodes, which have been found in such numbers in the cities excavated in Southern Palestine (see Bliss and Macalister, op. cit. 131 ff., and more fully PEFS, 1901).

5. The Hebrew wines were light, and in early times were probably taken neat. At all events, the first clear reference to diluting with water is contained in 2 Mac 15²⁸: 'It is hurtful to drink wine or water alone,' but 'wine mingled with water is pleasant,' and in NT times this may be taken as the habitual practice. The wine of Sharon, it is said, was mixed with two parts of water, being a lighter wine than most. With other wines, according to the Talmud, the proportion was one part of wine to three parts of water.

The 'mingling' or mixing of strong drink denounced by Isaiah (52¹) has reference to the ancient practice of adding aromatic herbs and spices to the wine in order to add to its flavour and strength. Such was the 'spiced wine' of Ca 8². Our Saviour on the cross, it will be remembered, was offered 'wine mingled with myrrh' (Mk 15²³, cf. Mt 27³⁴ RV).

6. The use of wine was universal among all classes (see MEALS, § 6), with the exception of those who had taken a vow of abstinence, such as the Nazirites and Rechabites. The priests also had to abstain, but only when on duty in the sanctuary (Lev 10⁹). A libation of wine formed the necessary accompaniment of the daily burnt-offering and of numerous other offerings (cf. Sir 50¹⁸ RV: 'He stretched out his hand to the cup, and poured of the blood of the grape . . . at the foot of the altar').

The attitude of the prophets and other teachers of Israel, including our Lord Himself, to the ordinary use of wine as a beverage is no doubt accurately reflected in the saying of Jesus ben-Sira: 'wine drunk in measure and to satisfy is joy of heart and gladness of soul' (Sir 31¹⁸ RV). At the same time, they were fully alive to the danger, and unsparingly denounced the sin, of excessive indulgence (see, e.g., Is 51¹⁷, 22¹, 28¹⁻⁴, Hos 4¹¹, Pr 20¹ 23³³⁻³⁵ etc.). In the altered social conditions of our own day, however, it must be admitted that the rule of conduct formulated by St. Paul in 1 Co 8¹⁻¹² (cf. Ro 14¹³⁻²¹) appeals to the individual conscience with greater urgency and insistence than ever before in the experience of Jew or Christian.

WINEFAT, WINEPRESS

WINEFAT, WINEPRESS, WINE-VAT.—See WINE and STRONG DRINK, § 2.

WINK.—To 'wink at,' i. e. pass over, is used of God in Ac 17³⁴ 'The times of this ignorance God winked at,' and Wis 11²⁰ 'Thou . . . winkest at the sins of men.' It is a good example of the colloquial language of the English Versions.

WINNOW.—See AGRICULTURE, § 3.

WISDOM.—The great literary landmarks of the 'wisdom' teaching are the Books of Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon. This literature, in its present form at least, belongs to the latter half of the Persian period and to the Greek period of Jewish history. But behind this latest and finest product of the Hebrew mind there lay a long process of germination. In the pre-exilic history there are traces of the presence of the 'wisdom' element from early times. This primitive 'wisdom' was not regarded as an exclusively Israelitish possession, but was shared with other nations (1 K 4³⁰⁻³¹, Gn 41³, Jg 5²⁸, Jer 10⁷, Ezk 27⁹). In Israel it was confined neither to rank (1 K 10²⁵, Dt 16¹⁸, Job 32⁹) nor to sex (2 S 14¹⁷⁻²⁰); but it was particularly characteristic of 'the elders' (Dt 1⁵, Job 12² 32⁷), and in course of time seems to have given rise to a special class of teachers known as 'the Wise' (Jer 18¹⁴).

Early 'Wisdom' was varied in character and of as wide a scope as the range of human activities. It thus included the most heterogeneous elements: e.g. mechanical skill (1 K 7¹⁴), statecraft (51²), financial and commercial ability (Ezk 28), political trickery (1 K 2⁹), common sense and tact (2 S 14 20¹⁶⁻²²), learning (1 K 3¹⁶⁻²²), military skill and administrative ability (Is 10¹³), piety (Dt 4⁹), and the creative energy of God (Jer 10¹³). In short, any capacity possessed in an exceptional degree was recognized as 'wisdom,' and was regarded as the gift of God. But there was already manifest a marked tendency to magnify the ethical and religious elements of 'wisdom,' which later came to their full recognition.

In pre-exilic Israel, however, 'wisdom' played a relatively small part in religion. The vital, progressive religious spirit exhausted itself in prophecy. Here was laid the foundation of all the later 'wisdom.' Not only did the prophets hand down the literary forms through which the sages expressed themselves, e.g. riddle (Jg 14¹⁴⁻¹⁸), fable (9³⁻¹⁵), parable (2 S 12¹⁻⁶, Is 5¹⁻⁵), proverb (1 S 10¹², Jer 31³²), essay (Is 28²³⁻²⁹), lyric, address, etc., but they also wrought out certain great ideas that were presupposed in all the later 'wisdom.' These were: (a) monotheism, which found free course in Deuteronomy, Jeremiah, and Deutero-Isaiah; (b) individualism, or the responsibility of the individual before God for his own sins and for the sins of no one else—the great message of Ezekiel; and (c) the insistence of God upon right character as the only passport to His favour—a truth proclaimed by all the great prophets. With the fall of Jerusalem, however, and the destruction of the Jewish State, the knell of prophecy was sounded; the responsibility for shaping the religious destiny of Israel now fell into the hands of the priests and sages.

The priest responded to the call first, but sought to heal the wounds of Israel lightly, by purification and elaboration of the ritual. The true heir of the prophet was the sage. He found himself confronted with a new world; it was his to interpret it religiously. The old world-view of the prophet was no longer tenable. New problems were calling for solution and old problems becoming ever more pressing. The task of the sage was to adjust the truths left to him by the prophets to the new situation. It was his to find the place of religion in that situation and to make it the dominant element therein. The greatest sources of danger to true religion were: (a) an orthodoxy which held the ancient traditions inviolable and refused to see the facts of the present (b) the scepticism and discouragement arising out of the miseries of the time which seemed to deny the justice and goodness of God; and (c) the inroads of Greek civilization which seemed to threaten the whole fabric of Judaism. Indeed, the sages themselves did not wholly escape being influenced by these tendencies: witness the orthodoxy of the bulk of the Book of Proverbs, the scepticism of Ecclesiastes, and the Greek elements in the Wisdom of Solomon. To these conditions the sages, each in his own way, addressed their message.

The writers of Proverbs, for the most part, stand firmly upon the old paths; in the midst of mental and moral chaos and flux they insist upon adherence to the old standards of truth and goodness, and they promise success to all who heed their instruction. For their prosperity is the proof of piety. This is the old prophetic recipe for national success made operative in the lives of individuals. Through it the sages inform all the ordinary processes of common everyday life with religious meaning. Their philosophy of life is simple, but shallow. They fail to realize that the reward of piety is not in the market-place, but in the soul.

The weakness of this traditional position is exposed by the Book of Job, which points out the fact that the righteous man is often the most sorely afflicted, and seeks to reconcile this fact with belief in the justice and goodness of God. But no solution of the age-long problem of suffering is provided; the sufferer is rather bidden to take refuge in his faith in God's goodness and wisdom, and to realize that, just as the mysteries of God's visible universe elude his knowledge, so also is it futile for him to attempt to penetrate the greater mysteries of God's providence. Let him be content with God Himself as his portion.

Song of Songs illustrates the humanity of the sages. It concerns itself with the greatest of all human passions—love. Whether to be interpreted as a drama or as a collection of lyrics such as were sung at weddings in Syria, it extols the nobility and loyalty of true love. In a period when the licentious customs of the pagan world were finding eager acceptance in Judah, such a powerful and beautiful vindication of the character of unselfish love was urgently needed, and was calculated to play an important part in the preservation of true religion.

Ecclesiastes is the product of many minds, with more or less conflicting views. But they are all concerned with the problem of practical scepticism: Does God care for truth and goodness? Is there any religious meaning in the universe? The heart of the book meets this question fairly and squarely. The iron has entered the author's own soul. He desires to help those in the same situation with himself. He would give doubting, faltering souls a basis for faith. Recognizing and giving full weight to the many difficulties that beset the religious point of view and tend to drive men to despair, he holds fast to his belief in God's loving care, and therefore counsels his fellows to put on a cheerful courage and perform their allotted tasks with joy. This is the only way to make life worth living, and worth living to the full.

Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon are both products of the life and death-struggle between Judaism and Greek thought. The author of the former is hospitable to Greek social life, but rigid in his adherence to the old Hebrew ideals of morals and religion. He seeks to arouse loyalty to and enthusiasm for these in the hearts of the Jews, who are in constant danger of yielding to the seductive and powerful influences of Greece. The same purpose animates the author of the Wisdom of Solomon. But he is more liberal in his attitude to foreign influences. He welcomes truth from any direction, and therefore does not hesitate to incorporate Greek elements in his fundamentally Hebraic view of life and duty. He thus enriches the conception of 'wisdom' from every source, and seeks to show that this Hebrew ideal is immeasurably superior to the boasted Greek sophia.

Hebrew 'wisdom' by its very nature could have no fellowship with philosophy. The aims and methods of the two were fundamentally different. In the words of Bishop Westcott, 'the axioms of the one are the conclusions of the other.' For philosophy, God is the conclusion; for 'wisdom,' He is the major premise. Philosophers have ever been seeking after God 'if haply they might find him.' The mind of the sage was saturated with the thought of God. Philosophy starts with the world as it is, and seeks to find room for God in it; 'wisdom' started with God and sought to explain the world in terms of God. 'Wisdom,' furthermore, was practical and moral; philosophy was speculative and metaphysical. The interests of 'wisdom' were intensely human. They were concerned with living questions and concrete issues. The problems of the sage were surcharged with emotion; they were the outcome of troubled feelings and perturbed will; only in slight measure were they the product of the intellect. It is not surprising, therefore, that 'wisdom' presents no carefully developed system of thought. The heart knows no logic. 'Wisdom' cares little for a plan of the universe; it leaves all such matters to God. It seeks only to enable men to love and trust God and to walk in His ways.

The Hebrew conception of 'wisdom' developed along two lines. 'Wisdom' had its human and its Divine aspects. In so far as it was human, it devoted itself to the consideration of the great problems of life. It was identified with knowledge of the laws and principles, observance of which leads to the successful life. These were all summarized in the formula, 'the fear of the Lord.' Later in the history of the idea, this subjective experience was externalized and objectified and, under the growing influence of the priestly ritual, 'wisdom' came to be defined as observance of the Mosaic Law (Sir 19³⁰⁻³⁴ 24²³).

On its Divine side, 'wisdom' was at first conceived of as an attribute of God which He generously shared with men. Then, as the conception of God grew broader and deeper, large areas of 'wisdom' were marked off as inaccessible to man, and known only to God (Job 28). Still further, 'wisdom' was personified and represented as the companion of God in all His creative activities (Pr 8²²⁻³¹); and was, at last, under the influence of Greek thought, personalized, or hypostatized, and made to function as an intermediary between man and God, carrying out His beneficent purposes towards the righteous (Wis 8¹⁻⁴ 9⁴ 10¹¹ 14¹⁰ 15⁴).

Upon the whole, the 'wisdom' element must be considered the noblest expression of the Hebrew spirit. It was in large part the response of Judaism to the influx of Western civilization. It demonstrated irrefutably the vitality of the Hebrew religion. When the forms and institutions in which Hebrew idealism had clothed itself were shattered beyond restoration, 'wisdom' furnished new channels for the expression of the ideal, and kept the passion for righteousness and truth burning. When Judaism was brought face to face with the Gentile world on every hand, 'wisdom' furnished it with a cosmopolitan message. Nationalistic, particularistic, transitory elements were discarded, and emphasis was laid upon the great fundamental concepts of religion adapted to the needs of all men everywhere. 'Wisdom' thus became of the greatest importance in the preparation for Christianity, the universal religion.

WISDOM, BOOK OF.—See preceding art. and APOCRYPHA, § 14.

WISE MEN.—See MAGI; and, for 'the Wise,' WISDOM.

WIST.—See WIT.

WIT.—The vb. 'to wit,' which means 'to know,' is used in AV in most of its parts. The present tense is I wot, thou wottest, he wot or wotteth, we wot; the past tense, I wist, he wist, ye wist; the infinitive, 'to wit.' In 2 Co 8¹ occurs the phrase do to wit, i.e. make to know—'we do you to wit of the grace of God.' The subst. 'wit' means in AV 'knowledge'; it occurs only in Ps 107²⁷ 'at their wit's end.' 'Witty,' which is found in Pr 8¹², Jth 11², Wis 8¹³, has the sense of 'knowing,' 'skilful'; and 'wittingly' (Gn 48⁴) is 'knowingly.'

WITCH, WITCHCRAFT.—See MAGIC DIVINATION and SORCERY.

WITHERED HAND.—See MEDICINE, p. 599^a.

WIT(ES) in Jg 16¹ represents a term which probably means bow-strings of 'green' gut. The Eng. word means a supple twig from a willow (see also CORN).

WITNESS.—This is the rendering of Heb. 'ed and 'edah and of the Gr. martyrs, martyria, and martyres, and compounds of this root. The primitive idea of the Heb. root is to repeat, re-assert, and we find the word used in the following connexions:—(1) Witness meaning evidence, testimony, sign (of things): a heap of stones (Gn 31⁴⁴), the Song of Moses (Dt 31²²), Job's disease (Job 16⁴), the stone set up by Joshua at Shechem (Jos 24²⁷). So in the NT the dust on the feet of the disciples was to be a witness against the Jews (Mk 6¹¹). (2) Witness signifying the person who witnesses or can testify or vouch for the parties in debate; e.g. God is witness between Jacob and Laban (Gn 31⁵⁰); so Job says, 'My witness is in heaven' (Job 16¹¹, cf. also 1 S 12²², Jer 29²³ 42⁵). In the NT God is called on by St. Paul to witness to his truth and the purity of his motives (Ro 1⁹, 2 Co 1²³ etc.). Akin to this meaning we have (3) Witness in a legal sense. Thus we find witnesses to an act of conveyancing (Jer 32¹⁰), to a betrothal (Ru 4⁹), while in all civil and criminal cases there were witnesses to give evidence, and references to false witnesses are frequent (cf. Pr 12¹⁷ 19⁵⁻⁶ 21¹⁸ 25¹⁸ etc.). See also JUSTICE (II.), 2; OATHS. In the NT the Apostles frequently appear as witnesses (martyres) of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus (Lk 24⁴⁸, Ac 1⁸ 2³² 3¹⁴ etc.). The heroes of the faith are called the 'cloud of witnesses' (He 12¹), and Jesus Himself is 'the faithful witness (martyr)' in Rev 1⁵ 3¹⁴ (cf. 1 Ti 6¹¹). Cf. also artt. ARK, § 1; TABERNACLE, § 7 (a).

WITTY.—See WIT.

WIZARD.—See MAGIC DIVINATION and SORCERY.

WOLF.—

In AV 'wolf' is always tr. of se'eb (cf. Arab. seeb 'wolf'), Gn 49¹⁷, Is 11⁶ 65²⁵, Jer 5⁶, Ezk 22²⁷, Hab 1¹, Zeph 3⁴. Cf. also proper name Zeeb, Jg 7²⁵. For syym (tr. 'wolves' in Is 13²² RV) and tannim see JACKAL. The NT term is lykos (Mt 7¹⁵ 10⁴, Lk 10¹⁷, Jn 10¹, Ac 20¹⁹).

The wolf of Palestine is a variety of Canis lupus, somewhat lighter in colour and larger than that of N. Europe. It is seldom seen to-day, and never goes in packs, though commonly in couples; it commits its ravages at night, hence the expression 'wolf of the evening' (Jer 5⁶, Zeph 3⁴); it was one of the greatest terrors of the lonely shepherd (Jn 10¹²); persecutors are compared to wolves in Mt 10¹⁶, Ac 20²⁹.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN.

WOMAN.—1. In OT ('ishah, 'woman,' 'wife'; negebah [Lv 15², Nu 31¹³, Jer 31²²], 'female') woman's position is one of inferiority and subjection to man (Gn 3¹⁶); and yet, in keeping with the view that ideally she is his companion and 'help meet' (2¹⁸⁻²⁴), she never sinks into a mere drudge or plaything. In patriarchal times, Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel stand side by side with their husbands. In the era of the deliverance from Egypt, Miriam is ranked with Moses and Aaron (cf. Mic 6⁴). In the days of the judges, Deborah is not only a prophetess (wh. see), as other women in Israel were, but is herself a judge (Jg 4⁹). Under the monarchy, Jezebel in the Northern Kingdom and Athaliah in the Southern, afford illustrations of the political power and influence that a woman might wield. In religious matters, we find women attending the Feasts along with men (1 S 1²⁴ etc.), taking part with them in acts of sacrifice (Jg 13²⁴ etc.), combined with them in the choral service of the Temple (Ezr 2⁶⁸ etc.). And though in the Deut. code woman's position is one of complete subordination, her rights are recognized and safeguarded in a way that prepares the soil for the growth of those higher conceptions which find utterance in Malachi's declaration that divorce is hateful to Jehovah (2¹⁶), and in the picture of the virtuous wife with which the Book of Proverbs concludes (ch. 31). See, further, FAMILY, MARRIAGE.

2. In NT (gynē, 'woman,' 'wife'; thēleia [Ro 1²⁶, 27], 'female'; gynaikarion [dimin. fr. gynē, 2 Ti 3⁹], EV 'silly women').—Owing to the influence of Rabbinism, Jewish women had lost some of their earlier freedom (1 Ti 2¹⁵ with the scene at the well of Haran [Gn 24^{10f}]; the surprise of the disciples by the well of Sychar when they found Jesus 'speaking with a woman' [Jn 4^{7f}]). But Jesus wrought a wonderful change. He did this not only by His teaching about adultery (Mt 5^{27f}) and marriage and divorce (vv. 31^f, 19^{27f}), but still more by His personal attitude to women, whether good and pure like His own mother (there is nothing harsh or discourteous in the 'Woman' of Jn 2⁴; cf. 19²⁶) and the sisters of Bethany, or sinful and outcast as some women of the Gospels were (Lk 7³⁷, 8³, Jn 4). The work of emancipation was continued in the Apostolic Church. Women formed an integral part of the earliest Christian community (Ac 1¹⁴), shared in the gifts of Pentecost (2¹⁸, cf. v. 17), engaged in tasks of unofficial ministry (Ro 16^{1f}, Ph 4^{2f}), and by and by appear (1 Ti 3¹¹) as holding the office of the deacons (wh. see), and possibly (5³) that of the 'widow' (wh. see, and cf. TIMOTHY [EPP. TO], § 5). St. Paul's conception of woman and of man's relation to her is difficult (1 Co 7), but may be explained partly by his expectation of the Parousia (vv. 29-31), and partly by the exigencies of an era of persecution (v. 26). In a later Pauline Epistle marriage becomes a type of the union between Christ and the Church (Eph 5²²⁻³²). And if by his injunction as to the silence of women in the Church (1 Co 14^{34f}) the Apostle appears to limit the prophetic freedom of the first Christian days (Ac 2¹⁷), we must remember that he is writing to a Church set in the midst of a dissolute Greek city, where Christian women had special reasons for caution in the exercise of their new privileges. Elsewhere he announces the far-reaching principle that in Christ Jesus 'there can be no male and female' (Gal 3²⁸).

J. C. LAMBERT.

WONDERS (Heb. mōphēth, Gr. teras; usually in OT and always in NT associated with Heb. ōth, Gr. σημεῖον, Eng. 'sign').—In OT the term ordinarily occurs with reference to the miracles at the time of the deliverance from Egypt (Ex 7³ etc.).—Jehovah's 'wonders in the land of Ham' (Ps 105²⁷). In NT it is used of the miracles wrought by Jesus (Ac 2²² etc.), those demanded of Him by the people (Jn 4⁴⁸); those of the Apostles and the early Church (Ac 2²² etc.); those which should be wrought by false Christs (Mt 24²⁴=Mk 13²²). It refers primarily to the astonishment produced by a miraculous event, and so it is significant that, as applied to the miracles of Jesus, it is always conjoined with some other term. His miracles were not mere prodigies exciting astonishment, but 'signs and wonders,' that appealed at the same time, through their evidential value, to the reason and spirit. And yet Jesus preferred the intuitive faith that is independent alike of wonders and of signs (Jn 4⁴⁸). See, further, MIRACLES, SIGN.

J. C. LAMBERT.

WOOD.—See FOREST, also WRITING, 6.

WOOL.—Woollen stuffs were much used for clothes (Lv 13⁴⁷, Pr 31¹³ etc.); mainly, however, for outer garments. For underwear, linen was preferred, as being cooler and cleaner. Wool, falling swiftly a prey to moths and larvae (Is 51⁸ etc.), was not used for wrapping the dead. A garment of mingled wool and linen might not be worn (Lv 19¹⁹, Dt 22¹¹). Josephus says this was reserved exclusively for the priests (Ant. iv. viii. 11). Dyed wool is referred to (He 9¹³, cf. Lv 14⁴), but its actual colour, white, makes it the criterion of whiteness and purity (Ps 147¹⁴, Is 1¹⁸, Dn 7⁷, Rev 1¹⁴). Wool was a valuable article of commerce (Ezk 27¹⁶), and it figures in the tribute paid by king Mesha (2 K 8³).

W. EWING.

WORD.—Apart from the personal use of 'Word' as a title of Christ (see LOGOS), its Biblical interpretation presents few difficulties. Both in the OT and in the NT the original terms employed may pass from the meaning 'speech' to signify 'the subject matter of speech.' In some passages there is uncertainty as to whether the tr. should be 'word' or 'thing.' For example, 1 K 11¹¹ RVm has 'or words, or matters' as alternatives to 'the acts of Solomon.' In Ac 8²¹ 'thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter' probably means 'in the matter in dispute,' which was the coveted power of imparting the gifts of the Holy Spirit; but the RVm 'word' is preferred by some expositors, who think that the reference is to the word preached by the Apostles and its attendant blessings (cf. Mk 1⁴, Lk 1³). The EV retains 'word' in Mt 18¹⁸ and 2 Co 13¹, although Dt 19¹⁶ reads: 'At the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall every matter be established.'

WORLD.—1. In OT.—In general it may be said that the normal expression for such conception of the Universe as the Hebrews had reached is 'the heavens and the earth' (Gn 1¹, Ps 80¹¹, 1 Ch 16¹¹), and that 'world' is an equivalent expression for 'earth.' So far as there is a difference, the 'world' is rather the fruitful, habitable earth, e.g., 'the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein' (Ps 24¹; cf. 50¹² 90⁴, Is 34¹). The religious sentiments awakened by the contemplation of Nature appear also in references to the heavens and the sea (e.g. Ps 8, 19, Job 38, 39). But of the ethical depreciation of the world, so prominent in some NT writings, there are in the OT few traces. The 'world' is to be judged in righteousness (Ps 9⁸ 96¹³ 98⁹), and punished for its evil (Is 13¹¹). The transient character of its riches and pleasures, with the consequent folly of absorption in them, is perhaps indicated by another Hebrew word (meaning 'duration'; cf. aeon below) rendered 'world' at Ps 17⁴ ('men of the world, whose portion is in this life,' cf. RVm); also by the same word at Ps 49¹ (see the whole Psalm). A word of similar meaning is rendered 'world' in AV at Ps 73¹², Ec 3¹¹, but RV retains 'world' only in the latter passage, and gives quite another turn to the sense.

The ethical aspect of the 'world' does not receive any fresh emphasis in the Apocrypha, though in the Book of Wisdom both the scientific interest in regard to the world and the impulses of natural religion are notably quickened (7¹⁷⁻²² 9¹ 11¹⁷ 2 13⁴, cf. Sir 17, 18). There is ample contrast between the stability of the righteous and the vanity of ungodly prosperity (e.g. Wis 1-5), but the latter is not identified with the 'world.' It is noticeable that in the Apocrypha the word kosmos, which in the LXX means 'adornment,' has reached its sense of 'world,' conceived as a beautiful order; in the NT this becomes the prevalent word.

2. In NT.—(1) aion (aeon), 'age,' is used of the world in its time-aspect: human history is conceived as made up of ages, successive and contemporaneous, converging to and consummated in the Christ. These in their sum constitute the 'world'; God is their Maker (He 1¹¹ 11¹ [AV and RV 'worlds,' but 'world' better represents the thought]) and their King (1 Ti 1¹⁷ RVm, Rev 15³ RV). Hence the phrases 'since the world began,' lit. 'from the age' (Lk 1⁷⁰, Jn 9²⁸, Ac 15²⁵); and 'the end of the world,' lit. the 'consummation of the age' (Mt 13³⁹, 40, 42 24²⁸ 28³⁰) or 'of the ages' (He 9²⁶). All the 'ends of the world' so conceived meet in the Christian era (1 Co 10¹¹ [RV 'ages'], cf. He 11³⁰, 40). Under this time-aspect, also, the NT writers identify their own age with the 'world,' and this, as not merely actual but as typical, is set in new lights. As 'this world,' 'this present world,' it is contrasted explicitly or implicitly with 'the world to come' (Mt 12³², Mk 10³⁰, Lk 18³⁰ 20³⁴, Eph 1²¹, 2 Ti 4¹⁰, Tit 2¹², He 6¹).

In some of these passages there is implied a moral condemnation of this world; elsewhere this receives deeper emphasis. 'The cares of the world choke the word' (Mt 13²², Mk 4¹⁹): the 'sons of this world' are contrasted with the 'sons of light' (Lk 16⁸; cf. Ro 12², Eph 2² 'according to the transient fashion [æon] of this material world [kosmos]'). This world is evil (Gal 1⁴), its wisdom is naught (1 Co 13²⁰ 2³ 3¹⁸), its rulers crucified the Lord of glory (1 Co 2⁸); finally, it is the 'god of this world' that has blinded the minds of the unbelieving (2 Co 4⁴). This ethical use of æon = 'world' is not found in the Johannine writings.

(2) But the most frequent term for 'world' is kosmos, which is sometimes extended in meaning to the material universe, as in the phrases 'from the beginning' ('foundation', 'creation') of the world' (e.g. Mt 24²¹ 25³⁴, He 4¹, Ro 1²⁰; for the implied thought of Divine creation cf. Ac 14¹⁷ 17³⁰). More commonly, however, the word is used of the earth, and especially the earth as the abode of man. To 'gain the whole world' is to become possessed of all possible material wealth and earthly power (Mt 16²⁶, Mk 8³⁶, Lk 9²⁵). Because 'sin entered into the world' (Ro 5¹²), it is become the scene of the Incarnation and the object of Redemption (2 Co 5¹⁹, 1 Ti 1⁵, He 10⁵, Jn 1⁹, 10. 30 31⁶, 17 12⁴⁷), the scene also, alien but inevitable, of the Christian disciple's life and discipline, mission and victory (Mt 5¹⁴ 13³⁸ 28¹⁸, Jn 17¹⁸, Ro 1⁸, 1 Co 3²² 4⁹ 5¹⁰ 7³¹, 2 Co 1¹², Ph 2¹⁵, Col 1⁶, 1 P 5⁹, Rev 11¹⁵). From this virtual identification of the 'world' with mankind, and mankind as separated from and hostile to God, there comes the ethical signification of the word specially developed in the writings of St. Paul and St. John.

(a) The Epp. of St. Paul. To the Galatians St. Paul describes the pre-Christian life as slavery to 'the rudiments of the world' (4³, cf. v. 9); through Christ the world is crucified to him and he to the world (6¹⁴). Both thoughts recur in Colossians (2⁸ 20). In writing to the Corinthians he condemns the wisdom, the passing fashion, the care, the sorrow of the world (1 Co 1²⁰ 2¹ 3¹⁹ 7³¹, 2², 2 Co 7¹⁰; cf. atōn above), and declares the Divine choice to rest upon all that the world least esteems (1 Co 1²⁷ 28, cf. Ja 2⁵). This perception of the true worth of things is granted to those who 'received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God' (1 Co 2¹³); hence 'the saints shall judge the world' (1 Co 6², cf. 11¹⁵). In the argument of Romans the thought of the Divine judgment of the 'world' has incidental place, but in the climax St. Paul conceives of the 'fall' of Israel as leading to 'the riches of the world,' and of the 'casting away' of them as the 'reconciling of the world' (11¹⁵ 16, cf. v. 22 and 512-21). What St. Paul condemns, then, is hardly the world as essentially evil, but the world-spirit which leads to evil by its neglect of the unseen and eternal, and by its blindness to the true scale of values revealed in the gospel of Christ crucified.

(b) The Gospel and First Ep. of St. John. In these two writings occur more than half the NT instances of the word we are considering. That is, the term kosmos is characteristic of St. John, and, setting aside his frequent use of it in the non-ethical sense, especially as the sphere of the incarnation and saving work of Christ, we find an ethical conception of the 'world' deeper in its shadows than that of St. Paul. It is true that Jesus is the Light of the world (Jn 1⁹ 3¹⁹ 8¹² 9¹²), its Life-giver (6²⁷ 31), its Saviour (3¹⁷ 4⁴² 12⁴⁷); yet 'the world knew him not' (1¹⁰), and the Fourth Gospel sets out its story of His persistent rejection by the world, in language which at times seems to pass beyond a mere record of contemporary unbelief, and almost to assert an essential dualism of good and evil (7⁷ 8²² 9³⁹ 12³¹ 14¹⁷ 30 16¹¹ 30). Here the 'world' is not simply the worldly spirit, but the great mass of mankind in deadly hostility to Christ and His teaching. In contrast stand His disciples, his own which were in the world' (13¹), chosen out of the world (15¹⁹, cf. 17⁹), but not of it, and therefore hated as He was hated (15²⁴ 16 17¹⁴ 18). For them He intercedes as

WRITING

He does not for the world (17⁹). In the 1st Ep. of St. John the same sharp contrasts meet us. The world lies within the scope of God's redemptive purpose in Jesus Christ (2² 4¹⁴), yet it stands opposed to His followers as a thing wholly evil, with which they may hold no traffic (2¹⁵⁻¹⁷, cf. Ja 4⁴), knowing them not and hating them (3¹ 13). It is conceived as under the sway of a power essentially hostile to God,—the antichrist (2¹⁸ 2²² 4³; cf. 'the prince of this world' Jn 12³¹ 14³⁰ 16¹¹)—and is therefore not to be entreated and persuaded, but fought and overcome by the 'greater one' who is in the disciple of Christ (4⁴ 5⁴ 5¹⁸). Faith 'overcometh the world,' but St. John reserves for his closing words his darkest expression of a persistent dualism of good and evil, light and darkness: 'We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in the evil one' (5¹⁹).

The idiomatic uses of the term 'world' in Jn 7⁴ 12¹⁹, 1 Jn 3¹⁷ are sufficiently obvious. For the difficult expression 'the world of iniquity' applied to the tongue (Ja 3⁴) see the Commentaries. S. W. GREEN.

WORM.—1. sās, Is 51⁸ (cf. Arab. sūs, a moth or a worm), the larva of a clothes-moth. See MOTM. 2. rimmah (Ex 16²⁴, Job 25⁶, Is 14¹¹). 3. ālāh, ālāh or ālā'ah (Ex 16²⁰, Job 25⁶, Is 14¹¹ 66²⁴, Jon 4⁷ etc.). Both 2 and 3 are used to describe the same kind of worms (cf. Ex 16²⁰ 24), and most references are to maggots and other insect larvæ which breed on putrid organic matter. These are very common in Palestine, occurring even on neglected sores and, of course, on dead bodies (Job 19²⁸ 21²⁶ 24²⁰). Jonah's worm (ālā'ah) was probably some larva which attacks the roots, or perhaps a centipede. The 'worms' of Dt 28²⁷ were probably caterpillars. 4. rāqab (Hos 5¹³ AVm). In Pr 12⁴ where the same word is also tr. 'rotteness,' it is rendered in LXX skōlēz, 'wood-worm,' which seems appropriate to the context. 5. zōchalē'āretz, 'worms of the earth' (Mic 7¹⁷), may possibly refer to true earthworms (which are comparatively rare in Palestine), but more probably to serpents. See SERPENT (10). 6. skōlēz, Mk 9¹⁴ etc. The expression 'eaten of worms,' used (Ac 12²⁴) in describing the death of Herod Agrippa I., would seem to refer to a death accompanied by violent abdominal pains, such symptoms being commonly ascribed in the Holy Land to-day to abdominal worms (Lumbricoides)—a belief often revived by the evacuation of such worms near the time of death (cf. p. 600*).

WORMWOOD (la'ānāh, Dt 29¹⁸, Pr 5⁴, Jer 9¹⁵ 23¹⁸, La 3¹⁵ 19, Am 5⁷ 6¹² [in the last AV tr. 'hemlock']; Gr. apsinthos, Rev 8¹¹).—la'ānāh was some bitter substance usually associated with gall (wh. see); it is used metaphorically for calamity and sorrow. Tradition favours some species of Artemisia (wormwood), of which several kinds are found in Palestine.

WRITING.—1. Pre-historic.—The origin of writing is not recorded in Genesis, where we should expect to find some account of it, but this omission may be intentional. Since God is represented as writing on two Tablets of stone (Ex 32¹⁶), it might seem improper that He should employ a human invention, while, on the other hand, there may have been no tradition that the art was first used on that occasion; the inference is therefore left to be drawn by the reader. Perhaps we may infer from the phrase in Is 8¹ that there was a style known as 'Divine writing,' being the character used in these Tablets. The Tablets themselves scarcely figure in the historical parts of the OT, neither can we from the Pentateuch learn their contents with precision; yet the tradition that such Tables at one time existed is likely to be trustworthy, and the narratives given in Ex. and Deut. imply that there were whole Tables and fragments of Tables which had to be accounted for. From the statement that they were written on both sides—afterwards grotesquely misunderstood—we may infer that they resembled stelæ in form, and perhaps the original should be rendered by that word.

2. Origin of writing among the Israelites.—It is improbable that the OT contains any documents which in their written form are earlier than the time of David, when we first hear of an official scribe (2 S 8¹⁷). The question of the date at which writing was first in use in Palestine is absolutely distinct from that of its earliest employment by Israelites, though the two are often confused. There is no evidence of Israel ever having employed the cuneiform script or any form of hieroglyphic writing, though both may have been familiar in Palestine before the rise of the Israelitish State. Probably, then, their earliest writing was alphabetic, but whence the Israelites got the art is a question of great difficulty, never likely to be cleared up. It is certain that Hebrew orthography is etymological, i.e. fixed in many cases by the history of the word as well as by its pronunciation, and this being so, it must have come down by tradition from an earlier stage of the language; yet of this earlier language we have no monuments. The possibilities are: (1) that the Israelitish tribes contained men with whom knowledge of writing was hereditary; (2) that when they settled in Canaan—however we interpret this phrase—they took over the language, and with it the writing and orthography, of the earlier inhabitants; (3) that when the immigrants were settled, teachers of this art, among others, were sent for to Phœnicia. The second of these hypotheses has most in its favour, as it accounts best for the differences between Hebrew and Phœnician spelling.

3. Character of writing.—The alphabet employed by the Israelites consists of 22 letters, written from right to left, serving for 28 or more sounds, not including vowels, which some of the consonants assist in representing. The OT, which has no grammatical terms, never alludes to these signs by name; yet we learn a few letter-names, not from their being employed to denote letters, but from their use as names of objects resembling those letters: these are Wāw and Tāw, meaning 'hook' and 'cross' (like our T-square, etc.), and it seems possible that two more such names may lurk in Is 28¹⁰. From the story in Jg 12⁶ it might be inferred that the letter-names were not yet known at the time; still those which figure in the Hebrew grammars must be of great antiquity, as is evinced by the Greeks having borrowed them. The Greek names are evidently taken from an Aramaic dialect, and of this language some of the names used by the Jews (Nūn, Rēsh) show traces. These names have often been thought to be taken from the appearance of the letters—or perhaps it should be said that the letters were originally pictures of the objects which their names denote—but it is difficult to draw up a consistent scheme based on this theory. The familiar order is found in the alphabetic Psalms and in Lamentations, and in the cypher of Jeremiah (25³⁰ etc., if the traditional explanation of those passages be trustworthy). Of the existence of any graphic signs other than the letters there is no evidence, though it is likely that the signs used by the neighbouring peoples to express units, decades, scores, and centuries were known to the Israelites, and they may also have had the dividing line between words, though the mistakes in the text of the OT due to wrong division show that it was not regularly used; a dividing point is used in the Siloam inscription. Isaiah, as has been seen, distinguishes 'human writing' or 'the writing of ʿēnāsh' from some other; and it would be in accordance with analogy that the spread of the art should lead to the formation of a variety of scripts. The style current, as exhibited in the inscription mentioned, and in a weight and a few gems, differs very slightly from that in use in the Phœnician settlements, of which the history is traceable from the 8th or 9th cent. B.C. down to Roman times. The papyri recently discovered at Elephantine show that in the 5th cent. B.C. a different and more cursive hand was used for Aramaic by the Jewish exiles; we should probably be correct in assuming that a similar hand was employed for Hebrew papyri also, in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

The square character, according to the Jewish tradition, was substituted for the older writing (of which a variety is preserved in the Samaritan script) in copies of the Law by Ezra, but this can be regarded only as a conjecture. The modern character first appears in Hebrew inscriptions of the 1st cent. A.D., and a somewhat similar type in Palmyrene texts of nearly the same date; yet for certain purposes the older style was retained by the Jews, e.g. for coins, which show the ancient character even in Bar Cochba's time. Still the numerous errors in the LXX version which owe their explanation to the confusion of similar letters, show that an alphabet similar to that now in use must have been employed for writing the Law as early as the 2nd or perhaps the 3rd cent. B.C.; and the allusion in Mt 5¹⁸ to Yod as the smallest letter of the alphabet, shows that the employment of this alphabet was familiar at that time. The change by which it had superseded the older scripts is likely to have been gradually rather than suddenly accomplished. The square character differs from the older, among other things, in the possession of five final forms, four of which are in fact nearer the older script than the initial forms; this innovation seems to be connected with the practice, adopted from the Greeks, of employing the letters for numeration, when five extra letters were required to provide signs for 500–900. That this practice was borrowed from the Greeks is confirmed by the Rabbinical use of the Gr. word gematria, 'geometry,' to denote it. The exact sense of the word rendered 'title' in Mt 5¹⁸ is unknown; attempts have at times been made to interpret the word from the strokes called in the later Jewish calligraphy lāṭṭā.

4. Later history of Hebrew writing.—Of other signs added to the letters the only kind which can claim any considerable antiquity are the puncta extraordinaria, dots placed over certain letters or words (e.g. 'and he kissed him' in Gn 33⁴) to indicate that they should be 'expunged,' a term which literally means 'to point out.' This practice was common to both Western and Eastern scribes in the early centuries of our era, and even before; and it has rightly been inferred from the occurrence of these dots that all our copies of the Hebrew OT go back to one, of no great accuracy. In Bible times the process of erasure is indicated by a word signifying 'to wipe out' (Ex 32³⁵), apparently with water (Nu 5²⁰), whereas in Rabbinical times a word which probably signifies 'to scratch out' is ordinarily employed. The NT equivalent is 'to smear out,' e.g. Col 2¹⁴ etc. During the period that elapsed between the fall of Jerusalem and the completion of the Tradition, various rules were invented for the writing of the Law, which are collected in the Tract called Sopherim; these involved the perpetuation of what were often accidental peculiarities of the archetype, and the insertion in the text of signs, the meaning of which had in certain cases been forgotten. A much more important addition to the text is later than the completion of the Talmuds, viz. the introduction of a system of signs indicating the vocalization and musical pitch or chant. Of the former, two systems are preserved, an Eastern and a Western, but the familiar Western system won general acceptance. The invention and elaboration of these systems stand in some relation to the efforts made by Syrian Christians and Moslems to perpetuate the correct vocalization and intonation of their sacred books and facilitate their acquisition; and Indeed the Jewish inventions seem based on those already employed by Syrians and Arabs, and both in form and in nomenclature bear evidence of this origin. It would seem, however, that the first employment of vowel-signs for a Semitic language is to be found in the monuments of pagan Abyssinia. We should expect the introduction of extraneous signs into the sacred page to meet with violent opposition, yet of this we have no record; there is, however, evidence that the employment of the same signs for the punctuation of non-Biblical texts was disapproved by a party. The Karaites appear to have saved the text from these additions by the expedient of transliterating it into Arabic characters, but this practice was soon abandoned, and the MSS which illustrate it belong to a limited period.

Some record of the process by which the text was vocalized would be welcome, for without this it has to be re-constructed by analogies drawn from the history of the Koran, which itself is imperfectly known. There are clearly many cases in which the vocalization has been affected by dogmatic considerations; it is not, however, certain that the punctuators were responsible for this, as there is evidence that before the invention of vowel-signs there were cases where fault was found with the traditional vocalization. The familiar series of variants known as Qere, opposed to Kethibh, appears to embody suggestions for the improvement of the text, dating from various ages. So elaborate a task as the vocalization must have been accomplished by a large and authoritative committee, labouring for at least some years; but whether there was any reason for secrecy or not, there is ground for thinking that even in the 9th cent. the memory of the event was exceedingly hazy.

5. Character of writers.—The OT gives little information on such subjects as schools and methods of instruction. In Isaiah's time (29¹¹⁻¹²) an ordinary Israelite might or might not be able to read; apparently, however, such knowledge was usual in the higher classes (8³), and the same seems to be implied by a scene in Jeremiah (ch. 36), whereas the precepts of Deuteronomy from their wording (6⁹) rather suggest that the process of writing would be familiar to every Israelite, and in one case (24¹) distinctly imply it. Of association of the art of writing with the priestly caste there is perhaps no trace except in Nu 5², where a priest has to write a magical formula; and the fact that in later times the order of scribes was quite distinct from that of priests shows that there was no such association. Unless we are to infer from Jg 5¹⁴ that the art of writing was cultivated at an early time in the tribe of Zebulun, it would appear that the foreign policy of David first led to the employment of a scribe (2 S 8¹⁷), such a person doubtless corresponding with the kātib or munshi of Mohammedan States, whose business it is to write letters for the sovereign, himself often unacquainted with the art; these persons set the fashion and invent the technicalities which other writers adopt. Less distinguished scribes attach themselves to particular individuals, at whose dictation they write (as Baruch for Jeremiah), or earn their living by writing and reading letters for those who require the service. Closely connected with this profession is that of copyist, but the development of the latter in Israel seems to have been peculiar. In Deuteronomy Moses writes the Law himself (31²⁴), and the kings are to make their own copies (17¹⁸); of a professional copyist of the Law we do not hear till the time of Ezra, who is clearly regarded as editor as well as copyist; and though the word 'scribe' technically means one who copies the Law, its sense in Sirach (10⁵ etc.) approaches that of avant, while in the NT it might be rendered by 'theologian.'

Publication in ancient times was usually effected by recitation, whence one copy would serve for a large community; but the employment of writing altogether for the composition and perpetuation of books appears to have commenced late in Israelitish history. Thus Solomon's 'wisdom' was spoken, not written (1 K 4³²⁻³⁴), and those who wished to profit by it had to come and hear the king, who may be thought of as holding stances for the recitation of his works. In Isaiah's time the amount of a prophecy written appears to have been confined to just sufficient to remind the hearer of its content (8¹); and this might be attested by witnesses. When the prophecies of Jeremiah were written at length, the process appears to have been regarded as an innovation of which some account was required (36¹⁷); but after this time it seems to have become familiar, and in Hab 2¹ the prophet is commanded to write his prophecy clearly, to enable it to be read easily. Of a written Law, apart from the tradition of the Two Tables, there seems to be little or no trace prior to the discovery of Deuteronomy; how the older code embodied in Exodus was preserved is not known. Official chronicles—perhaps engraved on stone, but this is uncertain—seem to have commenced in the time of David, when we first hear of an official called 'the recorder' (2 S 8¹⁶); and to his age or that of his successor it is possible that certain collections of tribal lays go back, which afterwards furnished the basis of prose histories whose substance is preserved in the Pentateuch and following books; but the older theory of the documents contained in the Pentateuch (e.g. Ex. 13⁹) is that the memory of events would be preserved by ceremonies, accompanied with explanatory formulae, rather than by written monuments. The founding of libraries (cf. 2 Mac 2¹⁹) and circulation of literature in masses probably belong to post-exilic times, when Ecclesiastes can complain that too many books are written (12¹²), and Daniel thinks of the OT as a library (9²). But for legal and commercial purposes (as well as epistolography) the use of writing was common in pre-exilic times. So Jezebel sends a circular note in many copies (1 K 21¹), which bear the king's seal, probably in clay (Job 38¹⁴); Job (13²³ and 31³³) thinks of his indictment as written, and Isaiah (10¹) appears to condemn the practice of drawing up documents fraudulently. Contracts of divorce and purchase of land are mentioned by Jeremiah (3²² etc.), the latter requiring attestation by witnesses. The images of Is 34¹⁴, Ps 139¹⁶ etc. appear to be taken from the practice of bookkeeping, which ben-Sira in the 2nd cent. B.C. so strongly recommends (42⁷). Of genealogical rolls we hear first in post-exilic times, but the comparison of 1 Ch 9 with Neh 11 shows that such documents were sometimes old enough to make it difficult for the archaeologists to locate them with certainty. In the Persian period a few new terms for writings and copies were introduced into Hebrew, and we hear of translations (Ezr 4⁷ 'written in Aramaic and translated into Aramaic,' where the first 'Aramaic' is surely corrupt), and of foreign scripts being learned by Jews (Dn 1¹⁷). In Esther we read of an elaborate system in use in the Persian empire for the postage of royal communications.

On the whole, we are probably justified in asserting that the notion connected with writing in the classical period of Hebrew literature was rather that of rendering matter permanent than that of enabling it to reach a wide circle. Hence the objection that some have found to the Two Tables of stone being hidden away in the ark (unlike the Greek and Roman decrees engraved on public stelae) is not really a valid one; the contents are supposed to be graven on the memory (Jer 31³³), the written copy serving merely as an authentic text for possible reference in case of doubt—like the standard measures of our time. This theory is very clearly expressed in Dt 31²⁴ and 1 S 10²⁵, and renders it quite intelligible that the Law should have been forgotten, and recovered after centuries of oblivion. Such instruction as was given to the young was in all probability without the use of any written manuals, and in the form of traditions to be committed to memory. 'We have heard with our ears and our fathers have told us' (Ps 44¹) is the formula by which the process of acquiring knowledge of ancient history is described. The conception of the Law as a book to be read, whereas other literary matter was to be learned and recited without note, is due to the growth of synagogal services, such as commenced long after the first Exile. Even in the time of Josephus it would appear that a community rather than an individual was ordinarily the possessor of a copy of the Law, whence the term 'to read,' as in Lk 10², is the formula employed in quoting texts of Scripture only, whereas 'to repeat' would be used when the Tradition was cited. Both were doubtless habitually committed to memory and so cited, whence it comes that quotations are so often inaccurate.

6. Writing materials.—The ordinary verb used in Hebrew for 'writing' has in Arabic as its primary sense that of sewing or stitching, whence it might be inferred that the earliest form of writing known to the peoples who employ that word consisted in embroidery or the perforation of stuffs and leaves. More probably the sense of 'writing' comes through an intermediate signification to put together, make a list, compose, of which we have examples in Jg 8¹⁴, Is 10¹⁹, and perhaps Hos 8¹² and Pr 22²⁹; this sense is preserved in Arabic in the word kattbah, 'regiment or list of men enrolled.' From the Heb. word kāṭṭabūh, then, we learn nothing as to the nature of the material; more is indicated by a rarer word chāṭṭaq, lit. 'to scratch,' which implies a hard surface, such as that of stone or wood; and of 'books' of this sort, calculated to last for ever, we read in Is 30⁸ and Job 19^{23, 24}. Wooden staves are specified as material for writing in Nu 17² and Ezk 37¹⁸; and a 'polished surface,' probably of metal, in Is 8¹. The instrument (AV pen) employed in this last case has a peculiar name: that which was employed on stone was called 'ṭē, and was of iron, with a point at times of some harder substance, such as diamond (Jer 17¹). There appears to be a reference in Job (l.c.) to the practice of filling up the scratches with lead for the sake of greater permanence, but some suppose the reference to be rather to leaden tablets. At some time near the end of the Jewish kingdom, the employment of less cumbersome materials came into fashion, and the word for 'book' (sepher) came to suggest something which could be rolled or unrolled, as in Is 34⁴, where a simile is drawn from the latter process, and Is 37¹⁴, where a letter from the king of Assyria—which we should expect to be on clay—is 'spread out'; in the parallel narrative of 2 Kings this detail is omitted. Allusions to rolls become common in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and though their material is not specified, it was probably papyrus; but skins may also have been employed. For writing on these lighter substances, reds and pigments were required; references to the latter are to be found in Jer 36¹⁸, Ezk 23¹⁴, but of the former (3 Jn 13 ('pen')) there is no mention in the OT, though it has been conjectured that the name of the graving tool was used for the lighter instrument (Ps 45¹); the later Jews adopted the Greek name, still in use in the East, and various Greek inventions connected with the preparation of skins. To an instrument containing ink and probably pens, worn at the waist, there is a reference in Ezk 9² (EV inkhorn), and to a penknife in Jer 36²².

In Roman times parchment appears to have been largely used for rough copies and notes, and to this there is a reference in 2 Ti 4¹³. The Apostolic letters were written with ink on papyrus (2 Co 3², 2 Jn^{6, 12} etc.). Zacharias (Lk 1⁹) uses a tablet, probably of wood filled in with wax.

Literary works, when rolls were employed, were divided into portions which would fill a roll of convenient size for holding in the hand: on this principle the division of continuous works into 'books' is based, while in other cases a collection of small pieces by a variety of authors was crowded into a single roll. The roll form for copies of the Hebrew Scriptures was maintained long after that form had been abandoned (perhaps as early as the 2nd cent.) for the quire by Christians in the case of Greek and Syriac copies. The quire was employed, it would appear, only when the material was parchment, the roll form being still retained for papyrus. Paper was brought from the far East by Moslems in the 7th cent. A.D., when factories were founded at Ispahan and elsewhere, and owing to its great cheapness it soon superseded both papyrus and parchment for ordinary purposes. The Jews, however, who were in possession of a system of rules for writing the Law on the latter material, did not readily adopt the new invention for multiplying copies of the Sacred Books.

7. Writing as affecting the text.—It has often been shown that accuracy in the modern sense was scarcely known in ancient times, and the cases in which we have parallel texts of the same narrative in the Bible show that the copyists took very great liberties. Besides arbitrary alterations, there were others produced accidentally by the nature of the rolls. The writing in these was in columns of breadth suited to the convenience of the eye; in some cases lines were repeated through the eye of the scribe wandering from one column to another. Such a case probably occurs in Gn 4⁷, repeated from 3⁸. Omissions were ordinarily supplied on the margin, whence sometimes they were afterwards inserted in a wrong place. There is a notable case of this in Is 33^{21, 22}, whose true place is learned from 2 K 20^{7, 8}. Probably some various readings were written on the margin also, and such a marginal note has got into the text of Ps 40^{7b}. Ancient readers, like modern ones, at times inserted their judgment of the propositions of the text in marginal comments. Such an observation has got into the text in 2 Mac 12⁴⁶ 'it is a holy and godly thought,' and there are probably many more in which the criticism of an unknown reader has accidentally got embodied with the original: Ec 10¹⁴ appears to contain a case of this sort. A less troublesome form of insertion was the colophon, or statement that a book was finished, e.g. Ps 72²⁰. Similar editorial matter is found in Pr 25¹, and frequently elsewhere. An end was finally put to these alterations and additions by the registration of words, letters, and grammatical forms called Massorah, of which the origin, like all Hebrew literary history, is obscure, but which probably was perfected during the course of many generations. Yet, even so, Jewish writers of the Law were thought to be less accurate than copyists of the Koran.

WYOLIF'S VERSION.—See ENGLISH VERSIONS § 7 ff.

Y

YARN.—1. This is prob. the correct tr. of ʔān (a word of doubtful etymology) in Pr 7¹⁶. 2. In Ezk 27¹⁸ RV 'yarn' is very doubtful (cf. RVm and art. UZAL). 3. In 1 K 10²⁵ miqweh should be tr. 'drove' (RV), not 'yarn' (AV). See also SPINNING AND WEAVING, 4 (b); TRADE AND COMMERCE, 4.

YEAR.—See TIME.

YELLOW.—See COLOURS, § 1.

YOKE.—See AGRICULTURE, 1; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, 1.

YOKEFELLOW.—See SYNTRYGUS.

Z

ZAAANAN.—A place mentioned in Mic 1¹⁴, where there is a characteristic word-play: 'The inhabitress of Za'ānan went (yāzēah) not out' (for fear of the enemy). Za'anān is generally considered to be the same as Zenan of Jos 15²⁷, an unidentified town in the Shephelah.

ZAAANNIM.—The border of the tribe of Naphtali passed through 'the terebinth in Zaanannim' (Jos 19³³), and the camp of Heber the Kenite was at 'the terebinth in Z. which is by Kedesh' (Jg 4¹¹). It is probable that the preposition 'in' (be in Heb.) is part of the name, which should then be read Besaanannim. The site is unknown. A plausible conjecture is that it was Khirbet Bessum, E. of Mt. Tabor. H. L. WILLETT.

ZAAVAN.—A descendant of Seir (Gn 36²⁷ = 1 Ch 1⁴⁷).

ZABAD ('he hath given' or 'a gift').—Many names are derived from this root, both in OT and in Palmyrene and Nabatean inscriptions. About 36 are reckoned in OT—23 in Chron., and nearly all in post-exilic books. In Gn 30²⁴ it is the first explanation of 'Zebulun.' The fuller form is Zabdiel or Zebadiah ('my gift is J'). 1. 1 Ch 2²⁶, 27, a descendant of Judah, perhaps the same as the Zabud of 1 K 4⁵. 2. 1 Ch 7²¹, an Ephraimite; if the text is correct, this passage and 1 indicate that there was some uncertainty as to the reckoning of the clan probably intended by the name. 3. 1 Ch 11⁴, one of David's valiant men, perhaps—1. 4. 2 Ch 24²⁶, one of the murderers of Joash = Jozacar (2 K 12²¹); we should perhaps read Zacar here. 5. 6. 7. Laymen who married 'strange' wives, Ezr 10²⁷, 22, 42 (cf. 1 Es 9²⁸ [Sabathus], 23 [Sabanneus], 24 [Zabadeas]). C. W. EMMET.

ZABADEANS.—The name of an Arabian tribe defeated by Jonathan Maccabæus, B.C. 144. According to the account in 1 Mac 12³⁰⁻³², its home was to the N.W. of Damascus. Perhaps Zebadani, on the Anti-Lebanon, about 20 miles on the way from Damascus to Baalbek, represents the ancient name.

J. F. McCURDY.

ZABADEAS (1 Es 9²⁸) = Ezr 10²⁷ Zabad.

ZABBAL.—1. One of the descendants of Bebai who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁷); called in 1 Es 9²⁷ Josababus. 2. Father of Baruch who assisted in the re-building of the wall (Neh 3³⁰). The Kerē has, perhaps rightly, Zaccal, a name which occurs in Ezr 2² = Neh 7¹⁴, and is the origin of the Zacchæus of 2 Mac 10¹⁸ and the NT.

ZABBUD (Kerē Zaccur).—An exile who returned (Ezr 8¹⁴). In 1 Es 8⁴⁰ wē-Zaccur [an easy slip. In Heb., for wē-Zabud] is apparently corrupted into Istalcurus.

ZABDEUS (1 Es 9²¹) = Zebadiah of Ezr 10²⁷.

ZABDI ('gift of Jah,' or perh. 'my gift,' or 'gift to me'; NT Zebedee).—1. The grandfather of Achan (Jos 7^{1, 17, 18}), called in 1 Ch 2² Zimri. 2. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8¹⁹). 3. An officer of David (1 Ch 27⁷). 4. A Levite (Neh 11¹⁷); but read probably Zichri, as in || 1 Ch 9¹⁵.

ZABDIEL ('my gift is El').—1. Father of one of David's officers (1 Ch 27⁷). 2. A prominent official in Nehemiah's time (Neh 11¹⁴). 3. An Arabian who put Alexander Balas to death and sent his head to Ptolemy (1 Mac 11¹⁷).

ZABUD.—The son of Nathan (1 K 4⁵); cf. Zabad, 1.

ZACCAI.—See ZABBAL, 2.

ZACCHÆUS (= Zaccal, Ezr 2², Neh 7¹⁴, lit. 'pure').—1. An officer put to death by Judas Maccabæus for treachery (2 Mac 10^{18, 22}). 2. A 'chief publican' of Jericho who entertained our Lord (Lk 19¹⁻¹⁰). He was a rich man, a Jew (v. 9), of a higher grade than St. Matthew, but, like all his class, hated by his countrymen. Being short of stature, he had climbed up into a 'fig-mulberry' tree to see Jesus; our Lord called him down and invited Himself to his house. On hearing the murmuring of the people at the distinction conferred on a publican, Zacchæus justifies himself. Jesus passes this by, but in effect replies to the murmurers: 'If he is a sinner, I have come to save him.' A. J. MACLEAN.

ZACCUR.—1. A Reubenite (Nu 13⁴⁶). 2. A Simeonite (1 Ch 4²⁸). 3. A Merarite (1 Ch 24²⁷). 4. An Asaphite (1 Ch 25¹⁹, Neh 12²⁸). 5. One of those who helped to re-build the wall (Neh 3²). 6. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²⁸), prob. same as mentioned in 13¹². 7. Ezr 8⁴. See ZABBUD.

ZACHARIAH, ZACHARIAS (the latter uniformly in RV except in No. 4). 1. 1 Es 1⁸ = Zechariah (No. 19). 2. 1 Es 1¹² = Heman of 2 Ch 35¹⁵. 3. 1 Es 6¹ 7² = Zechariah (No. 20). 4. 1 Es 8³⁰ 41 = Zechariah (No. 21). 5. 1 Es 8²⁷ = Zechariah (No. 22). 6. 1 Es 9²⁷ 44 = Zechariah (No. 24). 7. Father of Joseph, an officer of Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 5¹⁸ 46). 8. Husband of Elisabeth, and father of John the Baptist, a priest of the course of Abijah (Lk 1⁵)—this was one of the twenty-four courses of priests,—but clearly not the high priest, as the Apocryphal Gospel called Protevangelium makes him (§ 8). As he was ministering in his turn in the Temple, the angel Gabriel appeared to him and predicted the birth and future work of his son. His disbelief was punished by dumbness, which was cured only on the child being brought to be circumcised and named; when in obedience to Gabriel's command he and Elisabeth insisted that he should be called John. Under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, Zacharias composed the Benedictus. We know nothing more of him. 9. The martyr mentioned by our Lord in Mt 23³⁵, Lk 11⁴. The reference is clearly to the death of Zechariah, son of Jehoiada (2 Ch 24²⁰⁻²²); and as Chronicles was the last book of the Jewish canon, the phrase 'from Abel to Zechariah' would be equivalent to our 'from Genesis to Revelation.' In Mt., however, Zachariah is called 'son of Barachiah,' and there is thus a confusion with Zechariah the prophet, whose father was Berechiah (Zec 1¹). Allen ('St. Matthew' in ICC, p. 250) thinks that the confusion was due to the tradition of the age. It is more likely to be due to the Evangelist, or, still more to a scribe, who perhaps was misled by the mention by Josephus of a 'Zacharias son of Baruch,' murdered in the Temple by the Zealots (BJ iv. v. 4). Origen's guess that the father of the Baptist is meant is scarcely tenable.

A. J. MACLEAN.

ZACHARY (2 Es 14^o)—Zechariah the prophet.

ZADOK.—1. Founder of an important branch of the priesthood in Jerusalem. The reading of MT in 2 S 8¹⁷ (= 1 Ch 18¹⁶) being doubtful, there is no definite information concerning his family except in the genealogical lists in 1 Ch 6¹⁻¹⁵, 24¹⁻¹⁰, in which his descent is traced from Eleazar the elder son of Aaron; but these details are of doubtful reliability. He is first mentioned in 2 S 8¹⁷, where perhaps he should be associated with Abiathar in the correct text, as he is in 2 S 15²⁴. He was appointed priest by Solomon in place of Abiathar (1 K 2²⁶), because of his own loyalty (1 K 1⁸) and the disloyalty of Abiathar (v. 7). From this it is evident that his position hitherto had been inferior to that of Abiathar, although his name regularly has the precedence in Samuel. From the time of Solomon the descendants of Zadok constituted the most prominent family among the priests, the high priests being taken from them till the time of the Maccabees. To Ezekiel the Zadokites are the only legitimate priests (40⁶ 43¹⁰ 44¹⁵ 48¹¹). 2. A warrior of David's, of the house of Aaron (1 Ch 12²⁴), identified by Josephus (Ant. vii. ii. 2) with 1, against all probability. 3. Maternal grandfather of Jotham (2 K 15²⁴, 2 Ch 27¹). 4. Son of Baanah (see Ezr 2³, Neh 7⁷), a helper of Nehemiah in re-building the wall (Neh 3⁴). 5. Son of Immer, repairer of a portion of the wall (Neh 3²⁰). 6. 'The scribe,' probably a priest, appointed a treasurer by Nehemiah (Neh 13¹³); perhaps to be identified with 5. 7. One of the 'chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant (Neh 10²³). 8. A high priest later than 1 (1 Ch 6¹² [cf. Ezr 7², Neh 11¹¹])—a passage of doubtful historicity. 9. An ancestor of Joseph the husband of Mary (Mt 1¹⁴ [AV and RV Sadoc])).
GEORGE R. BERRY.

ZAHAM.—A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11¹⁶).

ZAIN.—The seventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 7th part, each verse of which begins with this letter.

ZAIR.—According to the MT of 2 K 8⁴, Joram, in the course of his campaign against Edom, 'passed over to Zair.' In the parallel passage, 2 K 21¹, the Heb. is 'passed over with his princes,' which may be confidently pronounced to be a corruption of the text in Kings. The latter itself is unfortunately not certain—so that the identification of the place in question is impossible.

ZALAPH.—The father of Hanun (Neh 3²⁰).

ZALMON.—1. The hill near Shechem where Abimelech and his followers cut wood for the burning down of the stronghold of Baal-berith (Jg 9⁴). Possibly the same mountain is meant in Ps 68¹⁴, where a snow-storm is apparently referred to as contributing to the scattering of 'kings' opposed to the people of Jehovah. As the Psalm refers to incidents of wars not related in the canonical books, we have to look to the times of the Maccabees; and the most obvious allusion is to the retreat of the army of Tryphon in b.c. 143, when he attempted to relieve the Syrian garrison in Jerusalem and was prevented by a heavy fall of snow (1 Mac 13²³). 2. See ILAI.
J. F. McCURDY.

ZALMONAH.—An unidentified 'station' of the Israelites (Nu 33⁴¹).

ZALMUNNA.—See ZEBAB.

ZAMBRI (1 Es 9²⁴)—Ezr 10⁴ Amariah.

ZAMOTH (1 Es 9²⁴)—Ezr 10⁷ Zattu.

ZAMUMMIM.—A name given by the conquering Ammonites to the Rephaim, the original inhabitants of the land (Dt 2⁹). They are described as a people 'great and many and tall like the Anakim' (see art.

ZAZA

REPHAIM). The name Zamsumim has been connected with Arab. zamzama 'a distant and confused noise,' and with zaim, the sound of the finn heard in the desert at night. The word may thus perhaps be translated 'Whisperers,' 'Murmurers,' and may denote the spirits of the giants supposed to haunt the hills and ruins of Eastern Palestine (cf. art. ZUZIM).

W. F. BOYD.

ZANOAH.—1. A town in the Shephelah (Jos 15²⁴, Neh 3¹¹ 11²⁰, 1 Ch 4¹⁵). It is named also in Jg 12¹, where Zaphnah should be rendered 'to Zaphon' (RVm) instead of 'northward' (AV and RV). Possibly the Talmudic tradition is correct which identifies Zaphon with Amathus, the modern Amaleh, a little north of the Jabbok, at the mouth of Wady er-Rugeib. Zaphon is probably connected with Ziphion (Gn 46¹⁰), or (more correctly) Zéphon with gentile name Zephonites (Nu 26¹⁰), described as a 'son' of Gad.

ZAPHENATH-PANEAH.—The name given by Pharaoh to Joseph (Gn 41⁴⁵). It should evidently be read Ze-p-net-ef-onkh, meaning in Egyp. 'God hath said he liveth'—a common type of Egyp. name in late times (see PHARAOH, 2, and cf. JOSEPH, p. 495⁴).

F. LL. GRIFFITH.

ZAPHON ('north').—A city E. of Jordan, assigned to Gad (Jos 13²⁷). It is named also in Jg 12¹, where Zaphnah should be rendered 'to Zaphon' (RVm) instead of 'northward' (AV and RV). Possibly the Talmudic tradition is correct which identifies Zaphon with Amathus, the modern Amaleh, a little north of the Jabbok, at the mouth of Wady er-Rugeib. Zaphon is probably connected with Ziphion (Gn 46¹⁰), or (more correctly) Zéphon with gentile name Zephonites (Nu 26¹⁰), described as a 'son' of Gad.

ZARAIAS.—1. 1 Es 5⁸—Seraiah, Ezr 2²; Azariah, Neh 7⁷. 2. 1 Es 8³, one of the ancestors of Ezra, called Zerahiah, Ezr 7⁴, and Arna, 2 Es 1¹. 3. 1 Es 8⁴—Zerahiah, the father of Eliehoenai, Ezr 8⁴. 4. 1 Es 8⁴—Zebadiah, Ezr 8⁴.

ZARAKES.—Called in 1 Es 1¹⁸ brother of Joakim or Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and said to have been brought up out of Egypt by him. The name apparently is a corruption, through confusion of Heb. d and r, of Zedekiah, who was a brother of Jehoiakim (2 K 24¹⁷). The verse of 1 Es. is entirely different from the corresponding passage in 2 Ch 36¹⁰.

ZARDEUS (1 Es 9²³)—Ezr 10²⁷ Asizea.

ZAREPHATH.—The Arab. village of Sarafend lies on a promontory about eight miles south of Zidon. On the shore in front of it are the scattered remains of what must have been a considerable town, the Zarephath or Sarepta of the Bible. Zarephath originally belonged to Zidon (1 K 17⁹), but passed into the possession of Tyre after the assistance rendered by the fleet of Zidon to Shalmaneser iv. in b.c. 722 in his abortive attempt to capture insular Tyre. In Lk 4² it is again called a city of Sidon (RV 'in the land of Sidon'). Zarephath is included in the list of towns captured by Sennacherib when he invaded Phœnicia in b.c. 701. It was the town in which Elijah lodged during the years of famine (1 K 17⁹⁻²⁴).

ZARETHAN (Jos 3¹⁶, 1 K 4¹² 7⁴⁶).—Three readings of this name appear, the other two being Zeredah (1 K 11², 2 Ch 4¹⁷) and Zererah (Jg 7²²). It is probable that all three names refer to the same place, and that it must be sought near a ford of the Jordan on the W. side. The most probable spot is near the Jisr ed-Damieh at the junction of the Jabbok and the Jordan.

H. L. WILLETT.

ZATHOES, 1 Es 8², probably stands for Zattu. The name does not appear in the Heb. of the corresponding passage Ezr 8², to be corrected from 1 Es. so as to run 'Of the sons of Zattu, Shecaniah the son of Jahaziel.'

ZATHUI (1 Es 5¹²)—Zattu, Ezr 2², Neh 7¹²; called also Zathoes, 1 Es 8².

ZATTU.—A family of exiles that returned (Ezr 2³—Neh 7¹² [1 Es 5¹² Zathui]); several members of this family had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁷ ('Es 9²³ Zamoth)); its head sealed the covenant (Neh 10²⁴ 24¹). See also Zathoes.

ZAZA.—A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2²⁹).

ZEALOT

ZEALOT.—See CANANEAN, MESSIAH (p. 616^a f.), PHARISEES.

ZEBADIAH.—1. Two Benjamites (1 Ch 8¹⁵ 17). 3. One of those who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12⁷). 4. One of David's officers (1 Ch 27⁷). 5. An exile who returned with Ezra's second caravan (Ezr 8⁹); called in 1 Es 8²⁴ Zarias. 6. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁰); called in 1 Es 9²¹ Zabdeus. 7. A Korahite (1 Ch 26⁹). 8. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17⁹). 9. An officer of king Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 19¹¹).

ZEBAH ('victim').—A Midianite king, mentioned together with Zalmunna, who was killed by Gideon as the result of blood-revenge (Jg 8¹⁸⁻²¹); both kings had, however, been previously overcome in battle by Gideon, who championed the Israelites against their Midianite oppressors. This victory must have been of vital and far-reaching consequence to the Israelites, for it is more than once commemorated long after as a landmark in the nation's history (Is 9¹⁰⁻¹², Ps 83¹¹). The death of Zebah and Zalmunna is very graphically described. Gideon commands Jether, his eldest son, to slay them, but being only a youth he is afraid; so the kings ask Gideon himself to kill them; he does so, and takes the crescents from the necks of their camels. This last action may conceivably imply a kindly remembrance of the kings on the part of Gideon, for from 8¹⁸ it would seem that it was only reluctantly, and from a sense of duty, that he slew them. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ZEBEDEE.—Father of James and John, husband of Salome; a comparatively rich fisherman, for he had 'hired servants' (see e.g. Mk 1²⁰ 15²; cf. Mt 27⁵⁴).

A. J. MACLEAN.

ZEBIDAH (Kethibh and RV) or ZEBUDAH (Keri and AV).—The mother of Jehoiakim (2 K 23³⁶).

ZEBINA.—One of the sons of Nebo who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10²⁴).

ZEBOIM.—One of the five cities of the Plain (Gn 10¹⁹, 14², Dt 29²³ (32), Hos 11⁸ [AV and RV here Zebolm]). The site has not been identified. See, further, PLAIN [CITIES OF THE].

ZEBOIM.—1. 'The ravine of Zebd'im' ('ravine of the hyenas') is named in 1 S 13¹⁸ in describing the route followed by one of the bands of Philistine marauders. It is prob. the Wady el-Kell or one of its branches. The name Wady abu Dabd ('hyena gorge') is still applied to a ravine in this neighbourhood. The same locality appears to be referred to in the Zebolm of Neh 11²⁴. 2. Hos 11⁸. See ZEBOIM.

ZEBUDAH.—See ZEBIDAH.

ZEBUL.—A lieutenant of Abimelech (wh. see), who was left by him as governor of Shechem. He cleverly assisted his master in suppressing the revolt of Gaal (Jg 9²³⁻⁴¹). The episode is obscure, but he apparently acted loyally from the first; having no force at his command, he was obliged to use craft. This is clear, if vv. 42, belong to a different narrative. C. W. EMMET.

ZEBULUN.—According to OT tradition, Zebulun was the tenth son of Jacob, and the sixth of Leah (Gn 30²⁰ E).

The original form of the name is uncertain, there being some evidence in favour of Zebulon, and even Zebul. The meaning of the name is likewise doubtful. Gn 30²⁰ presents a double explanation. One of these (apparently E's) connects it with the verb zabab 'to endow'; the other (J's) derives it from zabul 'to dwell',—because Leah said, 'Now will my husband dwell with me' (so AV and RV following the Vulg. habitabit). The Assyrian meaning of zabdu, however, 'carry', 'exalt', affords a more suitable rendering for this isolated use of the Hebrew verb, for the remark, 'Now will my husband dwell with me,' appears rather gratuitous and pointless after she had borne him six sons. The phrase beth zebul, 1 K 8¹³, moreover, implies a connotation of ab different from that of 'dwell,' for the context immediately defines its purpose as a 'place for thee to dwell in.' Zebul is here used of the dwelling of God, elsewhere of the sun and moon, and, therefore, probably designated originally, in harmony with the Assyrian, a lofty abode, a beth-kar, or mountain sanctuary, such as is referred to in Dt 33¹⁹ as being in the territory of Zebulun and Issachar. If so, the name Zebulun, while etymologically related to ab, is rather of geographical import in its historic application to the tribe.

According to Gn 46¹⁴, Zebulun is the progenitor of three tribal families through his three sons Sered, Elon, and Jahleel, who went down into Egypt with the other sons and grandsons of Jacob. The first and last of these names are notably like the town names Sarid and Nahalal, which were allotted to Zebulun according to Jos 19^{10f}. There is no name corresponding to Elon in this passage, but the names of seven of the twelve cities spoken of have been lost.

At the time of the Sinal census the male Zebulunites from 20 years old and upwards numbered 57,400, and their lot on the march was cast on the east of the Tabernacle, with Judah and Issachar (Nu 18¹⁴ P). All of these, as in the case of the men of the other tribes, died before the next census in the plains of Moab, where, nevertheless, the total reached 60,500 (Nu 26³⁷, 44 P).

The boundary line marked off by lot in Jos 19¹⁰⁻²⁴ gives only the southern and eastern borders, and is difficult to follow. Starting on the south with Sarid (Tell Shadud?), about five miles S.W. of Nazareth, it reached Jokneam, eight miles due W., on the farther side of the plain of Esdraelon. It extended about the same distance eastwards, reaching, at the west of Mt. Tabor, Daberath (which, however, in 21²² fell to Issachar), and then, if the text and identifications are correct, which is improbable, turned sharply west again to Japhia. Thence it continued in a north-easterly direction, passing Gath-hepher and Rimmon, and across the plain until it reached Hannathon, known to Babylonians, c. B.C. 1400, as Hinnaduni, which at that time was held by Amen-hotep. The remaining statement, 'and the goings out thereof were at the valley of Iph-tael,' would indicate that the line turned at Hannathon in a south-westerly direction, perhaps towards Jefat. There would thus be no distinctly northern border, but only a north-western. The western is left undefined; but as Asher is made to reach to Carmel, and its S.E. point to join Zebulun at the valley of Iph-tah-el (vv. 27, 37), there is no room left for the access of Zebulun to the sea. Jacob's Song, however, uses the same expression (Gn 49¹⁹) as is used of Asher in Jg 5¹⁷, and apparently extends the border to Sidon. In the 'Blessing of Moses' it is said that 'Zebulun and Issachar shall suck the abundance of the seas' (Dt 33¹⁹). This, as is clear from the inclusion of Issachar, implies only that their position will be such as to enable them to obtain the mercantile and other advantages of the sea traffic. The delimitations of the tribal boundaries in Joshua are very indefinite, and often in conflict with one another and with other data. Of the five cities mentioned in 19¹⁵ Bethlehem is the only one whose site is identified with certainty. The modern Ma'ul may represent Nahalal, one of the four cities which, according to Jos 21⁴⁴ (P), was given by the Zebulunites to the sons of Merari (Levites). Roughly speaking, Zebulun lay to the N.E. of Carmel, between Issachar on the S.E. and Asher on the N.W.

Zebulun shared in the natural richness and fertility of the rest of Galilee, and the great 'way of the sea' (the via maris of the Crusaders) which ran through its territory, and from Acco to Damascus, brought it into touch with the outer world and its products.

In the war against Jabin 10,000 men of Zebulun and Naphtali went with Barak against Sisera, and in the battle, whose issues were of decisive importance to the tribes of Israel, they immortalized themselves by their bravery (Jg 4¹⁰). They, like the other tribes, failed, however, to drive out the Canaanites from some of their city strongholds. One of the minor 'judges' came from this tribe, viz. Elon, who headed the tribes in the anarchic and troublous time preceding the kingdom (Jg 12¹¹). In later history, Zebulun, like the other northern tribes, played an unimportant rôle. According to 2 K 15³², it would appear that the fate of the other tribes of Galilee overtook this tribe in the days of Pekah, when the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser carried them captive to Assyria. See also art. TRIBES.

ZECHARIAH.—1. Brother of Ner and uncle of Saul (1 Ch 9⁴⁷); called Zecher in 1 Ch 8³¹. 2. A son of Meshelemiah (1 Ch 9³¹ 28¹⁴). 3. A Levite musician (1 Ch 15¹⁸ 20). 4. A priest in the time of David (1 Ch 15²⁴). 5. A Levite, of the family of Kohath (1 Ch 24²⁸). 6. A Levite, of the family of Merari (1 Ch 26¹¹). 7. Father of Iddo (1 Ch 27¹¹). 8. One of the princes of Judah in the days of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17⁷). 9. A Levite, one of the sons of Asaph (2 Ch 20¹⁴). 10. Son of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21³). 11. Son of Jehoiada the priest (2 Ch 24²⁶). After Jehoiada's death, Zechariah reproved the idolaters and announced God's judgment against them. He was stoned with stones at the commandment of the king in the court of the house of the Lord. His dying words, 'The Lord look upon it and require it,' were long remembered. See also ZACHARIAH (No. 9). 12. A prophet, living in the earlier part of Uzziah's reign (2 Ch 26⁴). 13. Son of Jeroboam II. (2 K 14²⁹ 15¹²). See next article. 14. A man of high repute in Isaiah's day (Is 8⁷). When faithful witnesses were required to attest a solemn prophetic roll, this Zech. was chosen along with Uriah the priest. He is described as son of Jeberechiah, and may possibly be the same as the Asaphite mentioned in 2 Ch 29¹⁴. 15. The father of Abi or Abijah, the mother of king Hezekiah (2 K 18² 2 Ch 29¹⁴). 16. A reforming Asaphite under Hezekiah (2 Ch 29¹⁴). 17. Head of a house of the Reubenites (1 Ch 5⁷). 18. A Levite, one of the sons of Kohath (2 Ch 34¹²). 19. One of the rulers of the Temple under Josiah (2 Ch 35⁸ [1 Es 1⁸ Zacharias]). 20. The prophet (see ZACHARIAH [Book 37]). 21. One of the family of Parosh (Ezr 8¹ [1 Es 8³⁰ Zacharias]). 22. Son of Bebai (Ezr 8¹¹ [1 Es 8³⁷ Zacharias]). 23. One of the chief men with whom Ezra consulted at the river Ahava (Ezr 8¹⁴; cf. 1 Es 8⁴⁴; prob.—No. 21). 24. A descendant of Eliam (Ezr 10²⁴ [1 Es 9²⁷ Zacharias]). 25. A descendant of Perez (Neh 11⁴). 26. A Shilonite (Neh 11⁴). 27. Son of Pashhur (Neh 11¹³). 28. An Asaphite (Neh 12²³). 29. A priest (Neh 12⁴¹).

ZECHARIAH, king of Israel, was the last member of the house of Jehu to come to the throne, and he occupied it only six months. His assassination begins the period of virtual anarchy with which the history of Israel comes to an end (2 K 14²⁹ 15¹²). H. P. SMITH.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF.—The first eight chapters contain the genuine prophecies of Zechariah. Chs. 9-14 are sharply distinguished from these in form, language, and thought. They are generally regarded as anonymous prophecies which became attached to the original book, and are often spoken of as Deutero-Zechariah.

1. CHAPTERS 1-8.—1. Historical occasion.—According to Ezra (5¹ 6¹⁴), the prophets Haggai and Zechariah roused Zerubbabel and Joshua to build the Temple, and the work went forward prosperously through their prophesying. The dates given in the book itself assign the prophecies to the second and fourth years of Darius (b.c. 520, 518). The first message (1¹⁻⁶) is placed two months after the first address of Haggai, between the second and third. The section 1⁷⁻⁶ is two months later than the last addresses of Haggai, while chs. 7, 8 follow after an interval of nearly two years. The prophecies are thus associated with the earlier part of the four years devoted to the re-building of the Temple, and their contents connect themselves with this occasion.

2. Contents.—The book opens with an exhortation to return unto Jehovah (1¹⁻⁶), based upon the sad experience of the fathers who had not heeded the word of the prophets to return from their evil ways.

It is especially noticeable that this post-exilic prophet, although very familiar with the words of his predecessors is not enslaved by them; he rather draws a living lesson from a broad view of the vital experiences of the past. The main body of the book (1⁷⁻⁶) is made up of a series of eight visions and a symbolic action, after the manner of Ezekiel. In the first (1⁷⁻¹⁷) the prophet sees at night, in a myrtle-shaded glen, four horsemen whom the angel that talks with him designates as the messengers of Jehovah. They report that all is quiet in the earth. The angel calls upon Jehovah: 'How long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem and on the cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years?' In response, assurance comes that Jehovah is displeased with the nations which are at ease. He is returned to Jerusalem, His house shall be built, His cities shall overflow with prosperity, Zion be comforted, Jerusalem chosen. The second vision (1¹⁸⁻²⁴) is of four horns—the nations which have scattered the holy people—and four smiths, who are to cast them down. Next, the prophet sees (2¹⁻⁴) the future Jerusalem spread far and wide beyond the limits of her old walls, with Jehovah as a wall of fire round about her. There follows a song that calls upon the exiles to return, pictures the discomfiture of those that have plundered them, and the future glory of Zion as Jehovah's dwelling-place.

In ch. 3, Joshua, the high priest, is seen standing before Jehovah's angel, clad in filthy garments and accused by the Satan. Now these garments are taken from him, and he is clothed in rich apparel as a symbol of the removal of guilt. Joshua is promised full exercise of his priestly functions if he will walk in Jehovah's ways; he and those with him are a sign that Jehovah is to bring His servant the Branch (cf. Is 4², Jer 23³ 33¹⁵). The vision that follows (ch. 4) is of the seven-branched lamp of the Temple, supplied with oil from two olive trees. Probably the promise to Zerubbabel (vv. 9⁸⁻¹⁰) should be transferred to the end of the chapter; then confusion disappears, and the seven lamps are interpreted as the eyes of Jehovah which run to and fro through the earth. The olive trees are explained as the two sons of oil that stand by the Lord of the whole earth. They must be Zerubbabel and Joshua, representatives of king and priest. The splendid promise to Zerubbabel now closes the picture, as that to Joshua had closed the preceding. In this, Zerubbabel is assured that he shall bring the Temple to completion, not by might nor by power, but by Jehovah's spirit. The prominent place given in these visions to priest and king, as essential to the national life, is most significant. Next, the prophet sees (5¹⁻⁴) the curse of Jehovah as a book that flies and enters the house of every thief and perjurer to consume it. The seventh vision (5⁵⁻¹¹) follows naturally upon the preceding. Wickedness, represented by a woman, is carried away from the land to Babylon. Jehovah's curse has fallen upon the sinners, and sin itself is now removed to the land of exile. The last vision (6¹⁻⁸) represents four chariots going forth upon the earth; of these the one that goes to the north executes the wrath of Jehovah upon those who have oppressed His people. The visions opened with the horsemen that reported the earth as quiet; they close with the chariots that keep the world in subjection to Jehovah. There follows the symbolic act of crowning Joshua (more probably, in the original text, Zerubbabel). The visions centre in the hope of a glorious future for Jerusalem, with its Temple restored, its enemies stilled, its exiles returned, its sin forgiven, its wickedness removed, and with Jehovah's spirit flowing in through priest and prince of Davidic line. The visions lead on to the symbolic crowning of the promised ruler.

In the third section (chs. 7, 8), Zechariah is led by a question concerning fasting to teach that the fasts which have been kept in the years of exile are to be changed into joyous feasts. Rather than fast they should observe the teachings of the earlier prophets concerning justice and mercy. With glorious promises for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem, with the nations coming to seek Jehovah, the original Book of Zechariah closes.

3. Significance.—The historical importance of Zechariah in connection with the re-building of the Temple has already been noted. In the transition from prophetic to apocalyptic literature, this book is an important link. Zechariah has a large measure of the spirit of the early ethical prophets. From the experiences of the past he can draw broad and deep moral lessons, with something of the freedom and consciousness of immediate Divine illumination that distinguished an Amos or an Isaiah. Yet, even in the passages where this is most observable, one feels a harking back that was not characteristic of the earlier prophecy—less of vital touch with present conditions and with the God in whose name he speaks. The centring of hope in prince and priest, with the consciousness that the great era of prophecy is past, sharply distinguishes Zechariah from his pre-exilic predecessors. In the visions, the machinery of apocalypse, introduced by Ezekiel, has been somewhat developed in its feature of angelic intermediaries. The characteristic apocalyptic spirit, however, with its reveling in the blood of enemies, is noticeably lacking. Zechariah loves, rather, to dwell upon peace and prosperity, upon sin removed, and the Divine spirit inflowing. His message is rich and full, for he has caught the ethical enthusiasm of the great eighth-century prophets, and has enriched it by the spiritual insight of Jeremiah and the glorious hopes of the exilic prophets. Zechariah not only strove to get the Temple built, but also urged upon the builders those moral and spiritual truths without which the Temple and its worship would be hollow mockery.

II. CHAPTERS 9-14.—1. Critical analysis.—As early as 1653, it was maintained, in the interest of the accuracy of Mt 27⁹,¹⁰, that chs. 9-11 were written by Jeremiah. This view was soon adopted by several writers, and chs. 12-14 were connected with 9-11 as the work of the earlier prophet. Near the close of the 18th century, chs. 9-11 and 12-14 were distinguished as separate prophecies, dated respectively, from internal evidence, in the time of Hosea, and shortly after the death of Josiah. At about the same time, the view that 9-14 were really later than Zechariah was advocated. During the 19th century, each of the three general conclusions—(1) that the entire book is the work of Zechariah; (2) that 9-14 are pre-exilic; (3) that 9-14 are post-Zechariah—found many advocates. In the third quarter of the century, however, the first view was largely abandoned, and, after the thoroughgoing discussion of Stade, in 1881-2, the third view became almost completely dominant. Growing knowledge of the general course of development of prophetic and apocalyptic literature makes this conclusion more and more inevitable. How many separate prophecies, by different hands, may be embodied in these six chapters is not determinable with equal clearness. On the whole, however, 9-11 (with 13⁷⁻⁹) seem distinct from 12-14. Less conclusive are the data which indicate distinct sections as beginning at 11⁴ and 14¹. It is not possible to connect chs. 9-14 positively with any known events in the post-exilic history. In general, the historical situation seems to be that of the years after Alexander's conquests and death, when the Egyptian and Syrian rulers struggled for the possession of Palestine. Possibly some of the material comes from the time just before or during the Maccabæan struggle.

2. Contents.—In 9^{1-11³} the oracle is one of doom upon Israel's neighbours, with promises of dominion and prosperity for Israel, restored to her land. The title burden of the word of Jehovah' is very unusual, occurring elsewhere only in Zec 12¹ and Mal 1¹. The opening message of doom upon Israel's neighbours bears outward resemblance to Amos, but the ethical ground of Amos's denunciation is noticeably lacking. 12¹⁻⁷ is rightly interpreted as referring to food ritually unclean, the contrast with the early prophet is still more striking. V. 8, with its comforting promise, seems to reflect the devastation of the Temple, as in the past. This is followed by the prediction of the coming king of peace—a beautiful lyric which breaks in sharply upon the context, and is followed by a prediction of successful resistance to the Greeks, and victory given through Jehovah. The shepherds of Judah, Jehovah's flock, are condemned, and victory is promised to the flock. The house of Judah shall be strengthened, and the house of Joseph restored to its land. In 11⁴⁻¹⁷, 13⁷⁻⁹ the figure of the false shepherds, introduced in the preceding section, is worked out into an allegory of the false and true shepherd, in a way that enables the prophet to illustrate the frustration of God's beneficent purpose by the obstinacy of His people, as well as the evil character of their rulers. The three shepherds cut off in quick succession strongly suggest the conditions shortly before the Maccabæan uprising, but the highly symbolic and somewhat imitative character of the prophecy renders it precarious to seek any exact picture of immediate conditions; our ignorance, too, of large portions of the post-exilic age makes it impossible to say that some other time may not have furnished an equally appropriate occasion.

The second main division of chs. 9-14, beginning with ch. 12, leads us immediately into the familiar apocalyptic conception introduced by Zephaniah, and developed by Ezekiel and Joel. The nations are assembled against Jerusalem, there to be consumed through the power of Jehovah. Hope centres in the house of David, and yet this house, it would seem, is now reduced to the position of merely one of the important families of the people. The closing verses of the first section in this division (13¹⁻⁴) indicate a time when prophecy is utterly degraded—idols, prophets, unclean spirit are evils to be removed. Ch. 14 gives another apocalyptic vision of the siege of Jerusalem. The onslaught is terrible, and the discomfiture of her enemies is wrought only after great affliction. In this little apocalypse the vengeful, proud hopes with which the wretched, persecuted Jews consoled themselves throughout the later pre-Christian centuries, and on into Christian times, find vivid expression. With these hopes there is clearly present that late, narrow, legalistic spirit which finds its climax of religious outlook in a wide recognition of the feasts, and in ceremonially clean boiling-pots for the sacrifices. It is evident that the closing oracle of this collection appended to Zechariah carries us far into 'the night of legalism.'

ZECHER (1 Ch 8²¹) = 9⁷ Zechariah.

ZECHRIAS.—An ancestor of Ezra (1 Es 8¹).

ZEDAD.—One of the points mentioned in defining the northern border of the Promised Land in Nu 34¹, and again in Ezekiel's ideal picture, Ezk 47¹⁵. The reading is uncertain; not improbably it should be Zerad. The place may perhaps be identified with Khribet Seradda, N. of Abil, E. of Merj 'Ajûn towards Hermon.

ZEDEKIAH.—1. Son of Chenaanah, and one of Ahab's four hundred court prophets (1 K 22¹¹. 2. 2, 2 Ch 18¹⁰. 2. 24). 2. A prophet deported to Babylon with Jehoiachin. He and another, named Ahab, are denounced by Jeremiah (29²¹⁻²²) for gross immorality as well as for falsely prophesying a speedy restoration from Babylon. It was probably their action as political agitators that brought on them the cruel punishment of being roasted in the fire by order of Nebuchadnezzar. 3. Son of Hananiah, one of the princes in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer 36¹²). 4. A signatory to the covenant (Neh 10¹). 5. See next article.

ZEDEKIAH, the last king of Judah before its fall at the hands of the Babylonians, is known to us not only from the historical books, but also from references in the Book of Jeremiah. He was the third son of Josiah to assume the royal title. Jehoahaz was deposed by the Pharaoh; Jehoiakim had a troubled reign of eleven years, and escaped the vengeance of Nebuchadnezzar by dying just before the Babylonian reached Jerusalem. The young Jehoiachin suffered for the sin of his father, being carried into captivity after three months of barren kingship. With him were carried away the chief men of Judah to the number of eight thousand.—Nebuchadnezzar thinking thus to break the seditious temper of the people. Over the remnant left behind Zedekiah was made king. His earlier name, Mattaniah, was changed to Zedekiah (meaning 'righteousness of Jahweh'), to indicate that the Babylonian monarch, in punishing the treachery of Jehoiakim, had the God of Judah on his side (2 K 24¹⁷). We are told by Ezekiel (17¹⁵. 17) that Zedekiah took an oath of allegiance to his suzerain. For Zarakes of 1 Es 1¹¹ see ZARAKES.

Nebuchadnezzar's confidence that the people would be submissive after the severe lesson they had received was disappointed. The new men who came to the front were as headstrong as, and even more foolish than, their predecessors. They were blind to the ludicrous insufficiency of their resources, and determined to play the game of politics against the great nations of the world. The court of Zedekiah was the centre of intrigues against the Babylonian power, and the plotters were fed with promises from Egypt. Zedekiah showed himself a weak man, unable to cope with the situation. In his fourth year ambassadors appeared at Jerusalem from the surrounding nations, to concert common measures against the oppressor. The majority of the prophets encouraged the movement; only Jeremiah saw the madness of the undertaking, and declared against it. His bold declaration of the truth brought upon him the enmity of the courtiers. Zedekiah seems to have been called to account by the great king, to whom he made some explanation which satisfied him, or at least lulled suspicion for a time. The movement itself came to nothing at this time. But in Zedekiah's ninth year renewed promises from Egypt induced the Jerusalemites to revolt, and Zedekiah was too weak to restrain them. Nebuchadnezzar replied promptly by marching in person against the rebels. Jerusalem was a stronghold in which the people had confidence, and they seem also to have believed fanatically that Jahweh would intervene to protect His Temple. This faith was raised to a high pitch by the approach of an Egyptian army under Pharaoh-hophra; for Nebuchadnezzar was compelled to raise the siege to meet the new enemy. The expression of the people's confidence that they had got from Jahweh all that they desired is seen in the indecent haste with which they reduced again to slavery the servants whom they had set free in order to obtain His favour (Jer 34²⁰).

The joy was short-lived. The Egyptians were hardly a serious problem to Nebuchadnezzar, and soon left him free to resume the siege, which he did with energy. The strongly fortified city was defended by its inhabitants with the courage of despair, and held out a year and a half. During this time they suffered all the horrors of siege, famine, and pestilence. Jeremiah, who still predicted disaster, was arrested, and would have perished in his dungeon had it not been for the compassion of one of the king's slaves (Jer 38). Zedekiah, who believed in him, consulted him by stealth, but could not nerve himself to follow the advice he received. When at last the wall was breached, the king attempted to escape to the Jordan valley, hoping thus to gain the eastern desert. But he was overtaken and carried to Nebuchadnezzar. The victor, considering that forbearance had ceased to be a virtue, slew the captive king's children before his eyes, then blinded the king himself and carried him away in chains to Babylon. The kingdom of Judah had come to an end (2 K 25²⁶). H. P. SMITH.

ZEEB.—See OREH and ZEEB.

ZELA(H).—A Benjaminite city (Jos 18²³), where was the family burying-place of Saul (2 S 21¹⁴ [here RV needlessly confuses by writing Zelah]). Its site has not been discovered.

ZELEK.—One of David's heroes (2 S 23³⁷ = 1 Ch 11³⁹).

ZELOPHEHAD.—A Manassite who died during the wilderness journeyings, leaving no male issue. His five daughters successfully asserted their claim to the inheritance of their father (Nu 26³³ 27¹⁻⁷ 36²⁻¹², Jos 17¹, 1 Ch 7¹³).

ZELZAH.—In 1 S 10² Samuel tells Saul that he will find 'two men by Rachel's sepulchre in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah.' No such place is known to us, and the reference is strange after the definite mention of Rachel's sepulchre. The LXX does not regard it as a proper name, and tr. 'leaping furiously'; and the Vulgate reads 'in the south.' Neither of these can be correct. Possibly the Greek of the LXX is a transliteration of some Heb. word, which was not understood and was then transformed into something significant in Greek. The meaning remains uncertain.

W. F. BORD.

ZEMARAIM.—A city of Benjamin, apparently in the vicinity of Bethel (Jos 18²⁷). It prob. gave its name to Mt. Zemaraim, in the hill-country of Ephraim (2 Ch 13⁴). It is generally identified with es-Sumra to the north of Jericho.

ZEMARITE, THE.—A collective designation of one of the Canaanite communities in Gn 10¹⁸, named along with the Arvadite, and therefore presumably in Northern Phoenicia. It stands probably for the people of Simira, an important city in the time of the later Assyrian empire and the seat of an Assyrian province. It seems to be mentioned also in the Amarna letters under the name Sumur. Perhaps we should compare the modern Sumra, between Ruwdd (Arvad) and Tarabulus (Tripolis). J. F. McCURDY.

ZEMIRAH.—A son of Becher (1 Ch 7⁴).

ZENAN.—See ZAAANAN.

ZENAS.—A lawyer (i.e. learned in Jewish law, cf. v.⁹) whom St. Paul asks Titus to send to him from Crete, with Apollos (Tit 3¹³). The name is perhaps a contraction from Zenodorus. A. J. MACLEAN.

ZEPHANIAH.—1. The prophet (see next art.). 2. A Kohathite (1 Ch 6²⁴). 3. Son of Maaseiah the priest in Jerusalem in the time of Zedekiah the king and Jeremiah the prophet (Jer 21¹ 29³ 37¹). As next in rank to Seraiah, grandson of Hilkiah (1 Ch 6¹⁴), Zeph. is called second priest (2 K 25¹⁸). On the occasion of the final overthrow of Jerusalem he was put to death at Riblah (Jer 52²⁴). 4. The father of one Josiah in Babylon (Zec 6¹⁴).

ZEPHANIAH is the title of the 9th section of the Hebrew collection of prophetic literature, entitled 'The Twelve Prophets,' which was probably compiled in the 3rd cent. B.C. (see MICAH [BOOK OF]). Like other sections of this work, it contains both earlier and later materials, though these cannot always be separated from one another with certainty. In the main the Book of Zephaniah consists of a prophecy of judgment delivered by Zephaniah about B.C. 627.

1. The prophet.—According to the title of the book (1¹), Zephaniah prophesied in the reign of Josiah (B.C. 639–608). Since the allusions in ch. 1 point to the continuance unchecked of false worship such as those of 'the host of heaven' which had prevailed in Judah under the previous kings Manasseh and Amon, we may infer that Zephaniah prophesied in the earlier part of Josiah's reign, before the Reformation of the year 621, which enforced the laws of Deuteronomy. Two further inferences with regard to Zephaniah are justifiable if, as is probable, the great-great-grandfather of Zephaniah was king Hezekiah (1¹, cf. Expositor, 1900 [July], pp. 76–80): (1) Zephaniah was of royal descent; (2) like Jeremiah (Jer 1¹), Zephaniah when he began to prophesy was a young man—say of some 25 years.

2. The book.—The Book of Zephaniah ought not to be read as a continuous whole. Ch. 3 is separated from chs. 1, 2 by a very marked break. Chs. 1 and 2 form not improbably a single prophecy, which, however, appears to have been more or less amplified by subsequent editors; certainly in some places, especially at the beginning of ch. 2, it has been rendered obscure by textual corruption. In its present form this prophecy predicts as near at hand a judgment that is to involve the whole world (1²; also v.¹⁵); if 'land' should rather be translated 'earth'; and it describes in detail how it will affect Judah (1⁴⁻¹⁷ 20), Philistia (2⁴⁻⁷), Moab and Ammon (2⁸⁻¹⁰), Ethiopia (2¹²) and Assyria (2¹⁴⁻¹⁵). The ground of judgment in the case of Judah is found in the prevalence of false worship (1⁴ 5), of foreign fashions (1⁶) and disregard of Jahweh (1¹³); in the case of Moab and Ammon, in the contemptuous taunts with which they had upbraided Judah (21-10) (such taunts as, according to Ezekiel [25-11], these peoples hurled at the Jews after the Fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.); in the case of Assyria, in her presumptuous arrogance and self-confidence (24). According to the general opinion, Zephaniah, like Jeremiah, who was prophesying at the same time, expected the Scythians to be the instruments of this judgment: for at about this time hordes of these barbarians were pouring into Asia. According to Marti, Zephaniah's original prophecy confined itself to a prediction of a destructive invasion by the Scythians, who, coming from the north, would first sweep through Judah, then southwards through Philiatia to Ethiopia in the extreme south, and then, turning backwards, would overwhelm the Assyrian empire. The references to Moab and Ammon, and the touches which universalize the judgment, must in this case owe their insertion to Zephaniah's prophecy to later editors. Many also think that the promises in chs. 1. 2 (see chiefly 2^a. 7) are later than Zephaniah.

Ch. 3 contains (1) a description of the sins of Jerusalem (31-7); this may be a second denunciation of Zephaniah's, parallel to ch. 1 and particularizing rather different sins, or a prophetic description of Jerusalem at a later date; (2) a description of a universal judgment from which only the godly remnant of Judah will escape (38. 11-13; cf. 2^a); (3) a description of the glory of the Jews after Jahweh has delivered them from captivity (31-10). All of ch. 3 may be of post-exilic origin, and the third section can scarcely be pre-exilic. Inserted in the midst of the second section are two verses (39-10) which, like 21, predict that Jahweh will be universally worshipped; these also are probably of post-exilic origin.

It seems clear that Zephaniah, like the prophets of the 8th cent. and his own contemporary, Jeremiah, was, primarily, a prophet of judgment to come upon his own people. In this respect he differed from two prophets of the same generation—Nahum and Habakkuk, both of whom, however, probably prophesied after the Reformation of Josiah. Nahum is entirely concerned with judgment on Assyria; Habakkuk is perplexed by what to Zephaniah might have appeared the fulfilment of his prophecy—the present troubles of Judah. Zephaniah marks no new departure in prophetic activity or thought, but by his moral earnestness, and his insistence on the need for single-hearted devotion to the demands of Jahweh for righteousness, he performed for his own generation the service rendered a century earlier by Isaiah, whose influence on his thought and teaching is obvious (cf. particularly 11-17 with Is 21st).

Owing more especially to textual corruption, parts of the book, even in the RV, are unintelligible: see Driver, Minor Prophets, vol. ii. (Century Bible); G. A. Smith, Book of the Twelve Prophets, vol. ii, pp. 35-74 (containing a translation from a critically emended text); see also A. B. Davidson's Commentary on the AV in the Cambridge Bible.

ZEPHATH.—See HORMAH.

ZEPHATHAH.—An unknown locality named only (if the text is correct) in 2 Ch 14¹⁰ (9).

ZEPHI (1 Ch 1st) or ZEPHO (Gn 36¹¹. 18).—A son of Eliphaz, and one of the 'dukes' of Edom.

ZEPHON, ZEPHONITES.—See ZAPHON.

ZER.—A 'fenced' city of Na-hthai (Jos 19²⁵). It follows Ziddim (properly Hazzidim [with art.]), which may be the modern Hattin, N.W. of Tiberias. The identity of Zer is quite uncertain.

ZERAH.—1. One of the sons of Reuel (Gn 36¹¹. 17, 1 Ch 1st). The name appears again as that of the father of Jobab, one of the early kings of Edom (Gn 36¹¹, 1 Ch 14¹). 2. The younger-born of the twin sons of Judah by Tamar his daughter-in-law (Gn 38¹⁰). He gives his name to the Zerahites (Nu 26²¹). Of this family was Achan the son of Zabdi (Jos 7¹) or Zimri (1 Ch 2²). Zerah's sons are mentioned in 1 Ch 9⁴, and Pethahiah (Neh 11²⁴) is one of his descendants. He finds a place in the genealogy of our Lord (Mt 1³). 3. A son of Simeon, and the founder of a family of Zerahites within that tribe (Nu 26¹⁵, 1 Ch 4³⁴); called also Zohar (Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁵). 4. A Levite name, borne by a Gershonite (1 Ch 6²¹) and by a Kohathite (1 Ch 6⁴⁰). 5. The name of the Cushite (2 Ch 14¹⁵) who invaded Judah in the reign of Asa. The story of this invasion is unknown to secular history, and rests solely upon the authority of the Chronicler. There has been much controversy as to its historicity, and the question is still involved in obscurity. In any case the numbers in the text of Chron. (580,000 men in Asa's army, 1,000,000 in Zerah's) are incredibly large.

ZERAHIAH.—1. A priest, an ancestor of Ezra (1 Ch 6¹⁵ bis. 51, Ezr 7¹ [1 Es 8² Zaraias, 2 Es 1² Arna]). 2. The father of Ellehoenai, Ezr 8⁴ [1 Es 8²⁴ Zaraias].

ZERED.—The torrent-valley (nachal) of Zered is named in the itinerary of Israel's journeyings, Nu 21¹², immediately prior to their crossing of the Arnon, and in Dt 2²⁴ as the point that marked the close of the 38 years' wanderings. It is probably either the Sa'û Sa'idah (the principal confluent of the Arnon from the S.E.) or the Wady Kerak.

ZEREDAH, ZERERAH.—See ZARETHAN.

ZERESH.—The wife of Haman (Est 5¹⁰. 14 6¹²).

ZERETH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4⁷).

ZERETH-SHAHAR.—A Reubenite town (Jos 13¹⁸). Its site has not been identified.

ZERI.—See IZRI.

ZEROR.—An ancestor of Saul (1 S 9¹).

ZERUAH.—The mother of Jeroboam (1 K 11² 12¹⁰).

ZERUBBABEL (meaning uncertain, perhaps 'offspring of Babel'; the form Zorobabel is used in the Apocrypha).—The son of Shealtiel, and related to the house of David. He was the leader of one of the bands that returned from the Captivity (Ezr 2², Neh 7⁷), and was at one time pecah or 'governor' of Judah (Hag 1¹ etc.). On the question of his identity with Sheshbazzar, see SHESHBAZZAR. As the servant of the Lord, and as His specially chosen one, he is designated as one who is to be specially honoured in the 'day of the Lord,' for which reason he is called the 'signet' (Hag 2²³). Both Haggai and Zechariah point to Zerubbabel and the high priest Joshua as those who are to re-build the Temple (Hag 1¹⁻² 2³⁻¹³, Zec 4¹⁻¹⁴); this was done, though after considerable delay owing to enemies of the Jews; it was only after a special appeal had been made to Darius that the work was proceeded with unimpeded (Ezr 6¹⁰). From Zechariah's fourth 'night-vision' (Zec 3¹, esp. vv. 8-10) we learn that Zerubbabel was looked upon as the coming Messiah; in this night-vision it is pointed out that Joshua and his fellows are a pledge and an earnest of the near approach of the Messiah—the 'Branch,' as he is here called; the stone which is to adorn his crown is ready, and Jahweh Himself is about to engrave thereon a fitting inscription; when the Messiah comes, God will obliterate all guilt from the people, and peace shall rest upon the land (see BRANCH). Although Zerubbabel is not mentioned here by name, a comparison of the passages Zec 3¹⁻¹⁰ 4¹⁻¹⁴ 6¹⁻¹² makes it reasonably certain that he is intended.

This period of Jewish history presents not a few very difficult problems; one of the burning questions has reference to the respective parts played in the re-building of the Temple, and the re-organization of the Jewish State generally, by the returned exiles, and by the 'people of the land' who had been left behind when the rest were carried off to Babylon; this question has an important bearing on the subsequent history of Judaism.

W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

ZERUIAH.—The mother of David's officers Abishai, Joab, and Asahel, who are always referred to as 'sons of Zeruiah'. The father's name is never mentioned, and he may have died early; or the mother may have been so remarkable a woman that her husband's name was not preserved; or we have a survival of the ancient custom of tracing kinship through the female line.

In 1 Ch 2¹⁶ Zeruiah and Abigail are called 'sisters of the sons of Jesse,' but in 2 S 17²⁵ Abigail is called the daughter of Nahash. It seems more probable that for Nahash in 2 S 17²⁵ we ought to read Jesse, than that Jesse's wife had previously been married to Nahash the Ammonite. According to this view, Zeruiah would be the daughter of Jesse and sister of David.

W. F. BOYD.

ZETHAM.—A Gershonite Levite (1 Ch 23²⁶).

ZETHAN.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 7¹⁹).

ZETHAR.—A eunuch of king Ahasuerus (Est 1¹⁰).

ZEUS.—See JUPITER.

ZIA.—A Gadite (1 Ch 5¹³).

ZIBA.—A servant, probably a freedman, of Saul. He appears before David (2 S 9¹⁻¹¹), possessing 15 sons and 20 servants, and is consulted as to the existence of any members of the house of Saul. He informs David of the retreat of Mephibosheth, to whom David restores the lands of his father and appoints Ziba steward. On David's flight from Jerusalem (2 S 16¹⁻⁴) Ziba followed him with provisions, and accused Mephibosheth of treachery. He received a grant of his master's lands, but on David's return Mephibosheth was able to clear himself and was allowed to retain a half (2 S 19²⁴⁻³⁰).

W. F. BOYD.

ZIBEON.—See ANAH.

ZIBIA.—A Benjamite (1 Ch 8⁹). This and the name Zibiah may be connected with zēbht, fem. zēbbyah 'gazelle,' as totem.

ZIBIAH.—The mother of Joash of Judah (2 K 12¹ & 2 Ch 24¹). See also ZIBIA.

ZICHRI.—1. A grandson of Kohath (Ex 6²⁴, misspelt in modern edd. of AV Zithri, although ed. of 1611 has correctly Zichri). 2. 3. 4. 5. Four Benjamites (1 Ch 8¹², 2²⁷, Neh 11⁹). 6. An Asaphite (1 Ch 9¹⁵ || Neh 11¹⁷ [see ZABDI, No. 4]). 7. A descendant of Eliezer (1 Ch 26²⁸). 8. A Reubenite (1 Ch 27¹⁶). 9. A Judahite (2 Ch 17¹⁶). 10. Father of a captain in Jeholada's time (2 Ch 23¹). 11. A mighty man of Ephraim (2 Ch 28⁷). 12. A priest (Neh 12¹⁷).

ZIDDIM.—See ZER.

ZIDON (NT Sidon).—About midway between Beyrout and Tyre, on the edge of a fertile strip of plain stretching from the mountain to the shore, a small rocky promontory juts into the sea. Here stood the ancient city of Zidon. The site was chosen doubtless because of the excellent harbour formed by a series of small islets, a short distance from the shore, which protected shipping lying by the city. In old times the islets were joined together by artificial embankments. This harbour lay to the N.; on the S. was a second one, larger but less secure, known as the Egyptian harbour. Zidon appears in Scripture as the chief city of Phœnicia, giving her name to the whole people (Gn 10¹⁴, Jg 10¹¹ etc.). What the title 'Great Zidon' (Jos 11⁶ etc.) signified, as distinguished from 'Little Zidon,' we cannot now say. They are mentioned together in the inscription of Sennacherib at a later period (Schrader, KAT, 288f.). Zidon's early pre-eminence was due no doubt to her success in commercial enterprise, the skill and intrepidity of her mariners and merchants, and the progress of her sons in arts and manufactures. They excelled in artistic metal work (Homer, Il. xxiii. 743-748, Od. iv. 613-619, xv. 460) and in the products of the loom, the value of which was enhanced by the famous dye, used first by the Zidonians, but, by a strange fortune, known to the later world as 'Tyrian purple.' The planting of colonies was a natural, and almost necessary, outcome of her commercial enterprise. If she did not found Aradus (Strabo, xvi. ii. 13) and Carthage (Applian, de Rebus Punicis, 1, etc.), she seems to claim on a coin to be the mother-city of Melita or Malta, as well as of Citium and Berytus (Gesenius, Mon. Phœn. 278; Rawlinson, Phœn. 411). Prince Zimrida of Zidon appears in the Amarna tablets as contesting with Egypt the lordship of the coast lands. Zidonian ascendancy succeeded the decline of the Egyptian power after Rameses II. How long it lasted we do not know. It was marked by an unsuccessful conflict with the Philistines for the possession of Dor, which, however, did not necessarily involve her deposition (Rawlinson, op. cit. 417). Israel, who had not dispossessed the Zidonians (Jg 1¹³), suffered oppression at their hands (10¹⁹). By the time of Solomon, however, Tyre had assumed the hegemony (Jos. Ant. viii. v. 3, c. Apion, i. 18). In B.C. 877 Zidon, with other Phœnician cities, submitted to the Assyrian Ashur-nazir-pal and 'sent him presents.' Zidon suffered under Shalmaneser II., Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser IV., and finally was subdued by Sennacherib, who made Tubaal, a creature of his own, king. A revolt under Tubaal's successor led to the utter destruction of the city, with circumstances of great severity, by Esarhaddon, who built a new city called by his own name. The native lips probably preserved the ancient name. 'Zidon' persists, 'Ir Esarhaddon' is heard of no more. The decline and fall of Assyria brought a period of rest to Phœnicia, and recuperation to her cities. The attempt to gain Judah for the league against the growing power of Babylon brought an embassy to Jerusalem, in which the king of Zidon was represented (Jer 27⁷). A revolt, apparently in B.C. 598, joined in by Judah, was stamped out by Nebuchadnezzar. Zidon's swift submission was due to devastating pestilence (Ezk 26⁵). The long resistance of Tyre led to her destruction and humiliation (Ezk 26¹²), Zidon once more assuming the leadership.

In the beginning of the Persian period the Phœnician cities enjoyed practical autonomy, and a time of great material prosperity. A friendly arrangement with Cambyes perpetuated this state of things, and in the Greek wars most valuable assistance was given by the Phœnicians to the Persians. The revolt of the Phœnicians, headed by Zidon, about B.C. 351, was remorselessly crushed by Artaxerxes Ochus. Zidon was betrayed into his hands by the despairing king, Tennes. To escape the cruelties of Ochus, the inhabitants burned the city, more than 40,000 perishing in the flames. The treachery of Tennes was matched by that of Ochus, who, having no further use for him, put him to death (Diod. Sic. xvi. passim). The city rose again from its ashes, and regained something of its former prosperity. The son of Tennes became king, and retained the sceptre till the advent of Alexander. While Phœnicia then lost her predominance in the trade of the Mediterranean, Zidon retained considerable importance as the possessor of an excellent harbour, and as a seat of Phœnician industry. Lying in the territory often in dispute between Syria and Egypt, in the following centuries Zidon several times changed hands. Under the Romans she enjoyed the privileges of a free city. Zidon figures in the Gospel narratives (Mt 11²¹, 15²¹, Mk 3⁸ etc.). Jesus possibly visited the city (Mk 7³¹). It appears in A.C. 12⁹, and was touched at by St. Paul in his voyage to Rome (Ac 27⁴). It became the seat of a bishop. Zidon suffered heavily during the Crusades. Under the Druse prince, Fakhreddin (1595-1634), its prosperity revived; but, in order to prevent the approach of the Turkish fleet, he caused the entrance to the harbour to be filled up, thus making it comparatively useless. The present walls of the city were built by Mohammed 'Ali of Egypt (1832-1840). The fortress, Kal'at el-Bahr, 'Castle of the Sea,' dating from the 13th cent., stands on the largest of the islands, which is joined to the mainland by a bridge of 9 arches. The present population is about 11,000. The chief occupations are fishing, and the cultivation of the gardens and orange groves for which modern Zidon is famous. While the oldest existing buildings date from the Middle Ages, there are many remains of great antiquity, traces of walls, hewn stones, pillars, coins, and the reservoirs cut out of the rock. The most important discoveries so far have been (1855) the sarcophagus of king Eshmunazar (early in the 4th cent. B.C.), with the well-known inscription, now in Paris; and (1887) the tomb containing 17 Phœnician and Greek sarcophagi, highly ornamented; among them that of Tabnit, father of Eshmunazar, and the alleged sarcophagus of Alexander the Great. W. EWING.

ZIHAI.—A family of Nethinim (Ezr 2³⁴—Neh 7⁴⁶ 11¹¹); called in 1 Es 5³⁹ Esau.

ZIKLAG.—A town given by Achish king of Gath to the outlawed David (1 S 27³ 30¹², 2 S 1¹ 41¹⁰, 1 Ch 12¹ 30). In the national register of cities it is assigned to Judah (Jos 15³¹) or to Simeon (1⁹), and is mentioned also in the post-exilic list (Neh 11³¹). It has been identified with Zuhetiga, 11 m. S. E. of Gaza, and 20 m. S.W. from Eleutheropolis. H. L. WILLETT.

ZILLAH.—See ADAH, No. 1.

ZILLETHAI.—1. A Benjamite family (1 Ch 8³⁰).

2. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12³⁰).

ZILPAH.—A slave-girl given to Leah by Laban, Gn 29²⁴ (P), and by her to Jacob as a concubine, 30⁹ (J); the mother of Gad and Asher, vv. 10-13 (J), 35²² 37³ 46¹³ (all P). Cf. art. TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

ZIMMAH.—A family of Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6³⁰ 61, a (37), 2 Ch 29¹²).

ZIMRAN.—A son of Abraham and Keturah, Gn 25²—1 Ch 1². The ethnological signification of the word is doubtful. The name is derived from zemer, 'mountain-sheep or -goat,' this animal having doubtless been the totem of the clan.

ZIMRI.—1. A prince of the tribe of Simeon, slain by Phinehas (Nu 25¹⁴, 1 Mac 2²). 2. Son of Zerah, and grandfather or ancestor of Achan (1 Ch 2⁶); called Zabdi in Jos 7¹. 3. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8³⁰ 9²). 4. See next article. 5. 'All the kings of Zimri' are mentioned in the same verse, Jer 25²⁶, with those of Elam and the Medes as among those who were to drink the cup of the fury of the Lord. There is considerable doubt as to what place is meant, or even as to the genuineness of the phrase.

ZIMRI seized the throne of Israel by the murder of his king Elah, but held it only seven days before Omri, another general of the army, asserted himself as claimant. Omri, as is well known, was the stronger, and established himself after disposing of two opponents. The characterization of Zimri, as one who caused Israel to sin by following in the ways of Jeroboam, is due to the author's desire to pronounce judgment on all the kings of the Northern Kingdom (1 K 16¹⁻³⁰). H. P. SMITH.

ZIN (Nu 13²¹ 20¹ 27¹⁴ 33³ 34², Dt 32⁴, Jos 15¹ 2).—A region passed through by the Israelites in their journeyings. The most exact indication of its position is given in Nu 34 and Jos 15. In Nu 13²¹ 'the wilderness of Zin' is named as the southern limit from which the spies began to search the land. In Nu 33² it is given as one of the stations in the journeyings. The brief note, 'the same is Kadesh,' serves to explain the following verse ('And they journeyed from Kadesh' . . .). Nu 20¹ records the arrival of the children of Israel 'in the wilderness of Zin' in the first month [the year is not stated], and the following vv. 3-12 relate the events which took place at Meribah. The remaining two passages, Nu 27 and Dt 32, which are duplicates refer to the punishment of Moses for his offence at 'the waters of Meribah of Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin.' Hence it may be inferred (a) that the Wilderness of Zin formed part of the southern boundary of Judah at its eastern end towards the Dead Sea; (b) that Kadesh was included within its limits.

The close similarity between the events recorded in Ex 17 and Nu 20, and other points of resemblance between occurrences before and after Sinai, suggest the question whether Sin and Zin, the Sin of the pre-Sinai and the Zin of the post-Sinai narrative, may be variations developed in the course of tradition. The hypothesis does not appear improbable, but the narrative in its present form indicates two regions bearing different names. Cf. PARAN, SIN [WILDERNESS OF].

ZINA.—See ZIZAH.

ZION.—See JERUSALEM, esp. II. 1.

ZIOR.—A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15³⁴). It is prob. to be identified with the modern village Sa'ir, about 6 miles N.N.E. of Hebron.

ZIPH.—1. A son of Jehalleel (1 Ch 4¹⁶). 2. A city of Southern Judah (Jos 15³⁴). Its site has not been recovered. 3. A city in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15³⁴); fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11⁵). The wilderness of Ziph was one of the refuges of David when fleeing from Saul (1 S 23¹⁴, 15, 24 26¹ 26¹⁶). The gentile name Ziphites occurs in 1 S 23¹⁵, 24 (LXX only) 26¹, Ps 54 4¹⁰. Ziph is Tell Zif, S.E. of Hebron.

ZIPHAH.—A son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 4⁶).

ZIPHION.—See ZAPHON.

ZIPHRON.—An unknown point on the northern frontier of Canaan (Nu 34¹¹); perhaps the same as Sibraim of Ezk 47¹⁵.

ZIPPOR.—Father of Balak (Nu 22², 4, 10, 16 23¹⁵, Jos 24⁹, Jg 11²⁵). The name, which doubtless in this case and in that of Zipporah has a totemistic significance, means 'sparrow.'

ZIPPORAH.—One of the daughters of the priest of Midian, Ex 2²¹, 22 (J), wife of Moses and mother of Gershom. According to 18² (E), she had another son. For the incident of Ex 4²⁴, see MOSES, p. 632^a.

ZIV.—See art. TIME.

ZIZ.—The ascent of Ziz is mentioned in 2 Ch 20¹⁶ as the way by which the allied Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunim made their way up from En-gedi to attack Jehoshaphat at Jerusalem. It has been identified as an ancient near En-gedi from the plain of the Dead Sea to the tableland of Judah. The Roman road from En-gedi to Jerusalem followed this track. H. L. WILLETT.

ZIZA.—1. A Simeonite chief (1 Ch 4²⁷). 2. A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11³⁰).

ZIZAH.—A Gershonite Levite (1 Ch 23¹¹). The name, prob. by a copyist's error, appears in v. 10 as Zina.

ZOAN.—A city in the N.E. of Lower Egypt (Egyp. Zani, Gr. Tanis).—It is now San el-Hagar, one of the most important of the ancient sites in Lower Egypt, with ruins of a great temple. The 21st Dyn. arose in Tanis, and it was probably a favourite residence of the Pharaohs, though it is now in the midst of a barren salt marsh, with only a few fishermen as inhabitants. Ramesses II. placed in the temple a colossus of himself in granite, the greatest known, which Petrie calculates from the fragments to have measured 92 feet in height. Zoan is not mentioned in Genesis, but elsewhere (Ps 78¹², 43, Is 19¹¹, 12, 30, Ezk 30⁴) it appears as almost or quite the capital of Egypt, perhaps as being the royal city nearest to the frontier. Tanis was very ancient: the curious reference to its building in Nu 13²² cannot be explained as yet. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

ZOAR.—See PLAIN [CITIES OF THE], LOT.

ZOBAB.—An Aramæan community, the most powerful of the coalition of 'Syrian' States which made war upon king David while he was engaged with the Ammonites (2 S 8¹⁰). The exact location is uncertain; but this whole group of Aramean settlements lay between Damascus and the entrance to Coele-Syria. Zobah was certainly east of Jordan, and probably the most southerly of the kindred peoples. 1 S 14¹⁷, which states that Saul fought against Zobah, is probably based on a confusion with the wars of David. J. F. McCurdy.

ZOBEBAH.—A Judahite (1 Ch 4⁸).

ZOHAR.—1. Father of Ephron the Hittite (Gn 23²⁵). 2. A Simeonite family (Gn 46¹⁰, Ex 6¹⁶); called in Nu 26¹¹ and 1 Ch 4⁴ Zerah. 3. A Judahite family, according to the K&T of 1 Ch 4⁷, which was followed in AV of 1611. The K&T is incorrectly reproduced in modern edd. of AV as 'Jezoar,' and in RV as 'Izhar.'

ZOHELETH, STONE OF.—An object mentioned in connexion with the attempt of Adonijah upon the throne of Israel (1 K 1⁹). It was near the spring En-rogel, which is supposed to be the 'Virgin's Fountain' in the Kidron valley. Its name ('serpent's stone' or 'brilliant stone') has not been explained, but it was evidently a sacred rock or stone. H. L. WILLETT.

ZOHETH.—A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4²⁰).

ZOPHAH.—An Asherite (1 Ch 7³⁴, 35).

ZOPHAI.—An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6³⁰ (11)) = Zuph of v. 30 (20) and 1 S 1¹.

ZOPHAR.—The third in order of Job's three friends, described in the LXX as 'king of the Mineans' (Job 2¹¹); probably the chief of a tribe on the borders of Idumæa. Cf. art. Job, esp. 2 (8).

ZOPHIM.—The 'field of Zophim' was one of the spots to which Balak took Balaam to view Israel, Nu 23¹⁴ (JE). It is questionable whether we have here a proper name; the Heb. expression means literally 'field of viewers or lookers out.' Such 'places of watching' were naturally situated frequently on the tops of hills. On the impossible combination Ramathaim-zophim of 1 S 1¹ see RAMAH, 4.

ZORAH.—A town allotted to Judah, according to Jos 15²²; but elsewhere spoken of as Danite (Jos 19⁴¹, Jg 18², 6, 11); specially noted as the home of Samson (Jg 13², 23), who was buried between Zorah and Eshtaol (16⁴). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11¹⁰), and is mentioned in Neh 11²² as peopled by Judahites after the Captivity. The gentilic name Zorathites occurs in 1 Ch 2², 4² and prob. 2⁴ (where read Zorathites for Zorites). Zorah is the modern Sur'ah on the northern side of Wady es-Surar (the Valley of Sorek) opposite Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh), which lies on the southern side.

ZORITES.—See ZORAH.

ZOROASTRIANISM.—See MAGI.

ZOROBABEL.—See ZERUBBABEL.

ZORZELLEUS (AV Berzelus, 1 Es 5¹⁰ = Barsillai of Ezr 2² and Neh 7²³).—A daughter of his, named Augia, is mentioned as married to Addus, the ancestor of a priestly family, who could not trace their genealogy at the return under Zerubbabel.

ZUAR.—Father of Nethanel the head of the tribe of Issachar (Nu 1⁸, 2⁵, 7¹⁶, 22 10¹⁶).

ZUPH.—1. An ancestor of Samuel (1 S 1¹, 1 Ch 6³⁰ (20); called in v. 30 (11) Zophai). 2. The land of Zuph (1 S 9⁴) probably derived its name from having been originally settled by the family of Zuph. The gentilic name Zuphite probably underlies the name Ramathaim-zophim of 1 S 1¹. No known site can be said to contain any certain trace of the name Zuph.

ZUR.—1. A Midianite prince slain by the Israelites (Nu 25¹⁵, 31⁸, Jos 13²¹). 2. A Gibeonite family settled at Jerusalem (1 Ch 8³⁰, 9³⁸).

ZURIEL.—A Merarite chief (Nu 3³⁸).

ZURISHADDAI.—Father of Shelumiel, the chief of the tribe of Simeon (Nu 1⁸, 2¹², 7³⁶, 41 10¹⁸).

ZUZIM.—One of the nations defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies when they went against the cities of the plain (Gn 14⁹). It is described as being in Ham. This name is read by some as Cham (i.e. with initial heth, not he as in MT) and regarded as possibly identical with Ammon (interchange between the aspirates heth and ayin), the Ammonites being descended from Ben-ammi, son of Lot's second daughter (Gn 19³⁸). This identification of Ammon with Ham led to the suggestion that Zuzim and Zamzumim (Dt 2²⁰⁻²²) were the same, by the contraction of am and um to z, which may be supported by Babylonian analogies. Robinson points out that Zuzim reminds one of Ziza (Ptol. v. xvii. 6), between Bosra and Lejün.

ADDITIONAL NOTE TO ARTICLE 'ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.'

SINCE the article ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA was put into type, the appearance of Mr. L. W. King's Chronicles concerning Early Babylonian Kings, and Professor H. V. Hilprecht's Chronological Tablets from the Temple Library at Nippur have made public a considerable amount of additional information as to early Babylonian and Assyrian history. A new set of synchronisms is established and new rulers are restored, while the chronology is considerably affected. A mere sketch of the new facts is all that can be attempted here. Three new rulers, Ilu-ellati, Enmennunna, and Apli-kishshu, must be placed centuries before the first dynasty of Babylon, almost doubling the historic period. The period of Sargon and Naram-Sin is more fully made known, the latter's conquest of Magan being especially important. Sargon aggrandized Agade at the expense of Babylon, already the seat of Marduk worship. The dynasty of Ur, founded by Ur-Engur (or Ur-Gur), can now be set out completely as follows:—

Ur-Engur . . .	reigned 18 years
Dungi, his son . . .	58 "
Bur-Sin, his son . . .	9 "
Gimil-Sin, his son . . .	7 "
Ibi-Sin, his son . . .	25 "

ADDITIONAL NOTE TO ARTICLE 'ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA'

For the reign of Dungi we have the additional information that 'he cared greatly for Eridu, which was on the shore of the sea,' and that he sacked Babylon. Gudea was his contemporary at Shirpula. On the fall of this dynasty the power passed to Isin, where the following dynasty reigned. The place of Gungunu is not certain.

Ishbi-Urra	.	.	reigned 32 years
Gimil-ilishu, his son	.	"	10 "
Idin-Dagan, his son	.	"	21 "
Ishme-Dagan, his son	.	"	20 "
Libit-Ishtar, his son	.	"	11 "
Ur-Ninib	.	.	28 "
Bur-Sin, his son	.	"	21 "
Iter-Kasha, his son	.	"	5 "
? , his brother	.	"	7 "
Sin...	.	"	6 "
Bél-bāni	.	"	24 "
Zame...	.	"	3 "
?	.	"	5 "
Ea...	.	"	4 "
Sin-magir	.	"	11 "
Damki-ilishu, his son	.	"	23 "

This last king has been thought to be a contemporary of Ammiditana, who, in the last year of his reign, destroyed the wall of Isin 'which the men of Damki-ilishu had erected.' But the reference may be to the third king of the second dynasty; and in any case is not very clear.

Two new names, Urra-imitti and Bél-ibni, are now to be placed high in the list of Assyrian kings. The latter was a gardener whom Urra-imitti raised to be his successor. They appear to have preceded Ilu-shuma, whom we now know to have been king of Assyria and contemporary with Sumu-abī, founder of the first dynasty of Babylon. Sulili may be another form of the name of Sumu-la-ilu, the second king of this dynasty, who thus reigned over Assyria as well.

We further learn that Hammurabi's conquest of Rim-Sin was not final, for Samsu-iluna had to fight with him again. Samsu-iluna also fought with Ilu-ma-ilu, who was king of the Sea-land, and Abēshu later waged indecisive war with him. In the time of Samsu-satana the Hittites invaded the land of Akkad. Ea-gamil, the last king of the second dynasty apparently, and king of the Sea-land, attacked Elam, but was defeated and deposed by the brother of Bitlilashu the Kassite. Agum, son of Bitlilashu, then conquered the Sea-land. These synchronisms, if the proposed identifications of the rulers named are correct, show that the second dynasty was contemporary partly with the first, partly with the third, and consequently that the dates of the first dynasty must be lowered. Whether the Kassite dynasty directly followed Samsu-satana is still uncertain.

Later, we learn that Adad-apliddina was an Aramæan usurper, and that in his reign the Sutu nomads ravaged Sumer and Akkad. The name of the Elamite who formed the seventh dynasty was Ae-aplusur. A new Tiglath-pileser has to be added to the kings of Assyria. He was the father of Ashur-dan II. and son of Ashur-resh-ishi II., grandson of Ashur-rabi II. Hence the Tiglath-pileser of B.C. 731 becomes IV. Merodach-baladan, 'the son of Baladan,' Marduk-apliddina III., was the son of Nabu-shum... We get fresh information as to the troubled times in Babylonia after Sen-nacherib destroyed Babylon; and the name of Erba-Marduk (who dispossessed the Aramæans from the estates which they had seized in Babylon and Borsippa, and restored E-sagila and E-zida, the temples of Marduk and Nabu) is, with others, rescued to history.

The changes which these new facts involve are likely to give rise to much discussion, and will probably not be settled till we have still further information.
